AHIMŚĀ—A Psychological Study

Dr. T. G. Kalghatgi, M. A., Ph. D.

(I) Romain Rolland said ‘Those who discovered the principle of Ahiṁśā are far greater than Napolean or Wellington’. Gandhiji said that non-violence is the law of our species and violence is the law of the brutes. And Zimmer said that Ahiṁśā or non-violence is the first principle or Dharma of saints or sages by which they lift themselves out of the range of normal human beings to the higher state of self-realisation.

The Jainas have given the supreme importance to the principle of non-violence. ‘Ahiṁśā paramodharanaḥ’ is the cardinal principle of Jainism. In ancient Indian thought Ahiṁśā was the important principle of conduct. In the Brhadāraṇyaka and Chhāndogya Upaniṣads one is advised to practise ahiṁśā and to develop qualities of self-discipline. Similar advice is given in the Bhaga-radgītā. Patanjali emphasises the importance of ahiṁśā as an important vratā to be practised as psychological preparation.

(II) Hīṁśā is the root of all evil. It should be avoided by all. And Ahiṁśā is the root of negative and positive virtues. Patanjali Yoga includes ahiṁśā along with four other vrata as necessary condition for the psychological background and the ethical preparation for the highest form of yoga that is samādhi. Self-realisation would be possible if we first prepare the background for the ethical foundation of meditation. Ahiṁśā gives this background. A person who has moral strength can alone practise the higher forms of meditation. And that would be possible if moral foundation is strong. Practice of non-violence does help the development of personality towards self-realisation. It is therefore necessary to understand the implications of the concept of ahiṁśā for the proper appreciation of the psychological basis of the development of personality.

(III) Ahiṁśā is non-injury. It is abstaining from doing harm to any living being physically or mentally. The Jainas have analysed the concept of ahiṁśā on psychological and ethical bases. This is possible if we understand the nature of the life, both in the empirical and spiritual sense. All things are divided into living and non-living. The Jainas believe in the plurality of jīvas living individuals. The jīvas in the phenomenal world are classified on the basis of various principles like the status and the number of sense-organs etc. There is the vegetable kingdom; there are one-sensed organisms like the earth-bodied, water-bodied, and the plants. The trasajīvas are the animal world. They have more than one sense, upto five sense-organs. The jīvas are possessed of prāṇas, life-forces. On the bases of the analyses of the living organisms and the life-force possessed by them, ahiṁśā is non-injury to any living being or a life-force of an individual being through the body, mind and speech and through three karaṇas, i.e., onself doing injury, causing others to injury or to consenting to the act of injury. We are not to injure any living organism, however small it may be, or a life-force of the organism directly with our own hands, by causing someone to do so on our behalf or by giving consent to the act of injury caused by others. Similarly we should not cause any injury to another person, we should not speak of causing injury to others nor should harbour any thought of injury to any living being.

actly two aspects: psychic injury, Bhāvahīṃsā and physical injury, dravyaḥīṃsā. Physical injury refers to the physical harm done to any living being. But psychic hīṃsā is concerned with entertaining thoughts of causing hīṃsā to another being. Physical hīṃsā is bad enough; but psychic hīṃsā has greater intensity of causing evil conscience. It is more dreadful than physical hīṃsā. For instance, there may be hīṃsā sometimes but without any evil intention and inspite of our efforts to keep ourselves away from it. In such cases, it may not be considered as hīṃsā to the extent to which the intensity of the injury would be considered evil if psychic accompaniment of hīṃsā is involved. Harbouring illwill of doing harm to another being or even having an idea of causing harm to another is much worse than actually causing physical injury to a living being. Therefore psychic violence has to be condemned with equal emphasis as the physical violence.

The Jaina conception of ahīṃsā has been based on the scientiic psychological notion of hīṃsā. In the Tattvārtaśātra we read ‘Pramattayogātrāṇavyaparopanām hīṃsā’. Hīṃsā is injury or violence caused to the living being due to carelessness and negligence and actuated by prejudice and other passions, like hatred. In the Yaśastīlaka Somadeva defines hīṃsā as injury caused to the living being through the error of judgment. He says ‘Yat syāt pramādāyogena prāpīsu prāṇa hāpanam hīṃsā’. This has two elements: (i) injury to life, and (ii) motivation to cause injury. To injure another life is to cause pain to it. But, as we mentioned earlier, mere injury may not be characterised as hīṃsā. It has to be considered with reference to motive and the disturbing emotion which characterise the fall of one’s personality. Similarly hīṃsā caused with the specific purpose like causing injury to animal for sport or for some gain will be hīṃsā. In this the will or the saṅkalpa is a dominating factor. On the contrary, a careful and a pious man who is not disturbed by passions and who is kind towards animals will not suffer the sin of violence even if, by accident, injury is caused to any living being. Psychologically considered motivation and psychic accompaniments promoting the act of hīṃsā may be considered the mental set. Thus, physical injury is hīṃsā, but more important and harmful is the psychic condition of hīṃsā. Speaking harsh and harbouring ill-feeling against a fellow being is also to be considered as hīṃsā.

(IV) It has been suggested that the principle of ahīṃsā as moral principle has certain inherent limitations: (i) it is said that the practice of ahīṃsā is inconsistent with human nature, because man is not purely a rational being, but he has sensibility and he is governed by passions and impulses. The instinct of pugnacity is natural to man. It is in our blood to quarrel and fight. If we cannot fight in the modern set of the civilised world, we at least take pleasure in witnessing fights like the bullfight and cockfight and the stunt pictures. There is a philosophy of war which says that wars are natural and necessary for the development of man and his society. To preach meekness and non-violence is against the very nature of man. Nietzsche demands religion that preaches meekness as virtue, as it lowers the dignity of man. Non-violence promotes cowardice. The second objection to the practice of ahīṃsā is that it is impossible to practise ahīṃsā in its complete and real sense, as there are psychological and social limitations. Mrs. Stevenson said that the principle of ahīṃsā is scientifically impossible for a life motto, since it is contrary to the code of nature. Complete and unexceptional practice of ahīṃsā would be impossible in this, the human nature as it is. Except for the heaven-born prophets like the Buddha, Tirthankaras and Mahatma Gandhi, it is not possible for the average man to practise ahīṃsā fully.

These objections are not without significance. There is some truth in saying that animals including human beings do exhibit the instinct of pugnacity and they are not totally free from its influence. However, we should realise, as Kant the famous philosopher puts it, man is an autonomous creature. He is not merely governed by sensibility as other lower animals are, but he has reason also. Reason is the distinguishing feature of man. He knows that he is governed by animal-nature, while the lower animals are not aware of this fact. This gives him a special ability and a special responsibility in the hierarchy of the world of life. He can transcend his lower nature and channelise his energies for a higher purpose. He can sublimate his instinctive energy. For instance, a man frustrated in love can sublimate his energy and channelise it for social service. Similarly abundant energy of man can be sublimated for struggling towards the betterment of humanity. In this sense we can interpret the lives and activities of great souls and social reformers. This does not mean that their activity is the result of frustration. They are supermen who have to be emulated by us. And in this sense, we can understand Gandhiji’s statement that non-violence is the principle of man and violence is the principle of the brutes.

Yet Indian philosophers were aware of the limitation of the average human being in the practice of non-violence. They were also aware of the difficulty of common men to accept unqualified practice of ahimsā. The principle of ahimsā has to be fitted with the social structure that makes it possible to practise non-violence as far as possible and with the best motivations. Therefore the Jaina Sūtras presented the graded system of ethical rules. There is the higher code of conduct meant to be practised by the persons who have renounced this world and have become recluses. They have to practise the vratas to the highest degree of perfection possible. This is muni-dharma and the vratas are called Mahāvrata. The monks and nuns have to practise the ahimsāvrata most rigorously without exception to the extent humanly possible. But in the case of Śrāvaka (householders) a more liberal view is taken in giving instructions to the practice of ahimsā. This is anuvrata. In the Ratnakaraśārāvakaśāra, the Śrāvaka is enjoined not to cause injury himself or be an agent for injury or appraise the act of injury knowingly and intentionally i.e., saṁkalpaś. He should be free from sthālāhimsā. In the case of the citizen prohibition of himsā begins with two-sensed organisms, because it would be impossible for him to practise non-injury to one-sensed organisms intentionally or unintentionally in the conduct of his daily life. He is therefore, exempted from such restrictions. This is social ethics.

Even in the practice of non-violence by the citizen, certain forms of injury are permitted as exceptional cases. For instance, it is recognised as a duty of a kṣatriya to defend the weak even with arms. In the Adipurāṇa there is a description that Rābha, the first Tīrthankara gave teaching to his subjects in agriculture, in trade and in the use of arms. However, one is not to cause injury to living being wantonly and with malice and hatred. Do not hate the enemies. In the Yaśṭilaka Somadeva forbids a kṣatriya to indulge in indiscrete killing even in battle.

Here we are reminded of Gandhiji’s words that violence is preferred to cowardice. He exhorted the Indian women to resist the Goondaś (scoundrels etc.) even with violence, if necessary. He said, ‘where there is choice between cowardice and violence, I would advice violence. Hence, it was I took part in the boer-war and the so-called Zulu rebellion and the late war.’ But Gandhiji said that non-violence is infinitely superior to violence. It is the principle of courage. Forgiveness adorns the soldier. A coward has no moral strength to observe non-violence. A mouse hardly forgives a cat when it allows itself to be torn to pieces by her. For Gandhiji non-violence was a creed, but for lesser men it might be a policy.

(V) Non-violence is not mere non-injury in the negative sense. It has a positive content also. It implies the presence of cultivated and noble sentiments like kindness and compassion for all beings. Non-violence is love. It also implies self-sacrifice. The Buddha renounced the pleasures of the world out of compassion for all living creatures. Jesus was filled with compassion when he said ‘whoever smite thee in the right cheek, turn to him the other also.’ In the Yaśṭilaka Somadeva enumerates the qualities that should be cultivated to realise the ideal of ahimsā. The qualities are—(i) maitri, (ii) pramoda (affection coupled with respect for men eminent for their virtues, (iii) kārunya (compassion) and (iv) mādhyastha (equitable attitude). Ahimsā is thus a positive virtue which resolves itself into spontaneous attitude of jīvadaya in higher beings. For us, we have to carefully cultivate it.
We should also note that the ultimate end of the practice of ahimsa is not merely to save other souls but in a positive sense to save our own souls. Self-culture is the main problem in the practice of ahimsa. In the Sutrakrtanga it is said that if a person causes violence out of greed or if he supports such violence of others, he increases the enemies of his own soul. In the Acaranga-sutra we are asked to consider ourselves in the position of the persons or animals to whom we want to cause injury. Gandhiji said, ‘I believe in loving my enemies. I believe in the power of suffering to melt the stoniest heart.’

Ahimsa is kindness, it is beneficial to the soul for its realisation of perfection. In ahimsa there is the force of the soul and in himsa there is the expression of our animal-nature. Ahimsa is beneficial to all, to the persons who practise ahimsa and to those who are saved by ahimsa. Ahimsa destroys all anxiety; disorder and cowardice. It can overcome and defeat the most cruel brute force. Gandhiji has shown this by the Satyagraha movement against the mighty British empire. Zimmer says, ‘Gandhiji’s Satyagraha is the battle waged in the colossal modern scale and according to the principles from the textbooks not of the Royal Military college, but of Brahman.’

The sun of Ahimsa (non-violence) carries all the hosts of darkness, such as hatred, anger, malice before himself. Ahimsa in education shines clear and far and can no more be hidden even as the sun cannot be hidden by any means.
