A Symposium celebrating the 90th Birthday of UC Berkeley Jain scholar, Padmanabh S. Jaini

THE STUDY OF JAINISM
by Alexander von Rospatt, Professor of Buddhist & South Asian Studies, and Director, Group in Buddhist Studies

Celebrating Prof. Padmanabh Jaini's ninetieth birthday and his pioneering contributions to the study of Jainism in the western world, a select group of academics from Europe and the US converged on Saturday, October 26, 2013 for a day-long symposium hosted by the Center of South Asia Studies (and supported by various other units on campus) to share their work on Jainism. This group included Prof. Jaini himself, who in his presentation took the packed audience back to the region of Vahura in Karnataka, where he grew up. Focusing on the Digambara Jain temple of the village of Belgul and its annual chariot procession, he investigated the role of the ritual officiants and traced their origins, demonstrating that they descend from Vedic Brahmanas who converted to Jainism. Staying in Karnataka, Peter Fliegel, Chair Padmanabh S. Jaini, is Professor emeritus of Buddhist Studies and co-founder of the Group in Buddhist Studies. Prof. Jaini has pioneered the study of Jainism in the English speaking world. His "The Jaina Path of Purification" has brought the study and knowledge of Jainism to a broader English speaking public, and his numerous further publications—such as his book "Gender and Salvation: Jaina Debates on the Spiritual Liberation of Women" (1991) and his "Collected papers on Jaina Studies" (2000)—have made him one of the leading scholars in this field. Even as a non-Jainian he continues to combine and work with Jaina at the forefront of Jain Studies.

DASTANGEI: A VIEW FROM A NON-URDU SPEAKING ENTHUSIAST
by Pablo Searud

It is certainly telling of the global flow and cultural knowledge today that UC Berkeley hosts a revived pre-colonial Urdu art form from India last week. The focus of the show, Prof. Manoj Parashar, got things rolling by introducing Mr. Mahmood Farooqui. He not only lauded Mr. Farooqui for his seminal role in reviving Dastangoi, but also for his other skills as a writer, actor, and a director. Although he initially spoke in English, he quickly switched into Urdu. As a non-Urdu speaker, I initially was quite at a loss as to what I would lose interest in the performance because it was unintelligible to me. Remarkably, however, my fears were allayed. Mr. Farooqui's resonating and high-pitched voice kept my attention throughout the 50 minute show. The performance, remarkable considering the scaled-back nature of the props, lighting, and clothing. And yet Mr. Farooqui managed to fuel my imagination. The references to Urdu so passionately made passionately made passionate my mind; it was more like a heady mix of traditional and modern Urdu art forms, and corresponded in reactions by the audience who understood Urdu. What kind of art does this kind of Urdu art form belong to and why? Is it possible for the artist and the audience to share the form and the meaning of the art? For the audience to imagine the Centre for Jaina Studies at SOAS, University of London, likewise examined temple rituals and priests. For this he turned to the famous Padmavati shrine in the village of Humcha and the rituals Jains perform there with the assistance (and under the control) of the temple priests, including rites of propitiation. Moving to Karnataka north, John Curt of Denison University focused upon the largely unexplored presence of Digambara communities in Gujurat, surveying their current spread and history. The engagement with the social dimension of Jainism was rounded off by UC Berkeley's Alexander von Rospatt, the convenor of the symposium, who expanded upon Prof. Jaini's examination (1980) of why Jainism did not share the fate of Buddhism in India and vanish, by probing into the social factors that allowed Mahayana Buddhism in Nepal uniquely to persist to the present. The other presentations of this carefully selected symposium were given in the study of literary sources. Phyllis Grannell of Yale University dealt with the 17th century debate on the treatment of Jain images and how they encode the life story of the Jina without visually referencing particular episodes. Paul Dundas of the University of Edinburgh probed into the contribution of Jain authors to the development of allegory in Indian literary history, focusing on the celebrated monk Hemacandra Malabharit. Robert Goldsmid, who has been Prof. Jaini's colleague at Berkeley for the past four decades, treated the highly charged and ambivalent appropriations by Jain authors of prominent figures from the early Sanskrit canon. Finally, two papers engaged with particular aspects of Jainism's complex doctrinal history. Olle Qvarnstrom of Lund University brought Jain and Buddhist doctrinal texts, and notably the works of the Jain Haribhadra Suri and the Buddhist Bhavyakavi, into conversation by contrasting their respective critiques of the Sautra model of cognition. Kriti Wiley, who earned her Ph.D. at Berkeley under Prof. Jaini's supervision, dealt with the crustal form of the well known in Jain: go, the conserved naga’s, and the doctrinal questions (and dilemmas) their postulation poses. The symposium with its rich research papers by leading scholars of Jainism captured something of the strength and breadth that characterizes the study of Jainism today and that is owed in no small measure to Prof. Jaini's immense contributions to that field. Thus the conference was a fitting tribute to his achievements as a Jain scholar, which are marked by his equally significant accomplishments as a scholar of Indian Buddhism.

On the symposium's occasion Prof. Jaini was honored with the DISTINGUISHED LIFETIME SCHOLAR AWARD by the FEDERATION OF JAIN ASSOCIATIONS IN NORTH AMERICA in recognition of his visionary leadership, exemplary engagement, and his efforts in teaching Jainism to the North American community.

Dastangoi: a non-urdu speaking enthusiast

Dastangoi, but also for his other skills as a writer, actor, and a director. Although he initially spoke in English, he quickly switched into Urdu. As a non-Urdu speaker, I initially was quite at a loss as to what I would lose interest in the performance because it was unintelligible to me. Remarkably, however, my fears were allayed. Mr. Farooqui's resonating and high-pitched voice kept my attention throughout the 50 minute show. The performance, remarkable considering the scaled-back nature of the props, lighting, and clothing. And yet Mr. Farooqui managed to fuel my imagination. The references to Urdu so passionately made passionately made passionate my mind; it was more like a heady mix of traditional and modern Urdu art forms, and corresponded in reactions by the audience who understood Urdu. What kind of art does this kind of Urdu art form belong to and why? Is it possible for the artist and the audience to share the form and the meaning of the art? For the audience to imagine
Foreword

P. S. Jaini’s career represents a fascinating scholarly journey. In introducing his Collected Papers on Jaina Studies to the interested academic and lay world, some words about his intellectual background might be felt to be of some value.*

Padmanabh Shrivarma Jaini was born into a devout Digambera Jain family residing in Nellikar, a small town near the famous Jain centre at Moodbidre in Tulu Nadu, that magical and culturally distinctive area in the southwest of the state of Karnataka. In similar manner to many Jains at the beginning of this century who were influenced by calls within the community to change their names in order to foster a greater sense of identity, Padmanabh’s father had abandoned his caste name of Shetty and taken the surname of Jaini, in this case in imitation of J. L. Jaini, a noted translator of the Tattvarthastu. Although the local languages of Nellikar were Tulu and Kannada, Jaini’s highly literate parents also encouraged the study of Hindi, and the household contained a large number of regularly consulted books from North India on Jain and other subjects.

When he was ten and had completed his elementary education, Padmanabh Jaini’s parents sent him far from home to the north to board at a Digambera Jain gurukula at Karanja in Vidarbha (Maharashtra) in order to continue his schooling at secondary level. This establishment, Mahávira Brahmacaryaśrama Jaina Gurukula, had been founded by Brahmachari Devchand, who was later to become the celebrated monk Acárya Samantabhadrá. While the curriculum contained “modern” subjects such as English and the Sciences, the school was run firmly on traditional Jain principles and carried out regular daily rituals in accordance with Digambara practice. It was here during a period of eight years that the young Jaini gained his first familiarity with many basic Jain texts and encountered some of the great Digambara lay scholars of the period, such as Devakinandan Siddhantashastri, Kailashchandra Siddhantashastri, Hiradal Jain, Nathuram Premi and A. N. Upadhye.

*I would like to acknowledge the assistance of Professor P. S. Jaini and Ms. Kristi Wiley in the preparation of this Foreword.

After completing his secondary education, Jaini entered the Arts College at Nasik, which was affiliated to the University of Bombay, to take a B.A. Hons. degree in Sanskrit with subsidiary Prakrit. During this time he supported himself by supervising a boarding house for Śvetāmbara Jain students who belonged to the Oswal caste. The duties of this post obliged Jaini to travel to various Śvetāmbara centres to collect donations, as a result of which he became aware for the first time of the social diversity of Jainism and the fact that there were other Jain sectarian groups, such as the Sthānakavāsī, virtually unknown to the Digambaras of Tulunadu. For, while it is true that Jainism is in broad terms doctrinally unified, interaction between members of the two main sects, the Śvetāmbaras and Digambaras, was, and to a large extent still is, comparatively rare, apart from occasional ecumenical occasions.

This familiarity with Śvetāmbara Jainism was to stand in good stead when, on graduation in 1947, he was invited by the great Sthānakavāsī scholar Pandit Sukhlal Sanghavi to study with him in Ahmedabad. Although he died as recently as 1978, Sanghavi (born 1880) represents what now seems to be a virtually lost scholarly and intellectual world. Towards the end of the nineteenth century, leading members of the Śvetāmbara Jain community undertook to set up schools to train and develop academically promising youngsters as pandits who, as with the much stronger tradition of lay scholarship amongst the Digambaras, would master and edit Sanskrit and Prakrit scriptural and philosophical literature and thus serve the community's requirements for a learned understanding of the Jain religion. Sanghavi himself had been blind from the age of eleven (a victim of smallpox) but nonetheless became profoundly versed in Jain logic at such an institution, rising to be professor at Banaras Hindu University. Jaini's near-daily meetings with this scholar over this period involved not just formal instruction in nyāya, carried out in rigorous fashion through the medium of a close analysis of a portion of Hemacandra's Pramāṇavāmanaṇa, but also exposed the young Digambara to Sanghavi's views about the many controversies that had arisen in the Jain community at this time.

Jaini's intellectual formation within this traditional brand of Jain learning was a crucial factor in his scholarly development. It must also be regarded as virtually unique up to this time, because no one of Jaini's generation (nor, one suspects, anyone before it) could claim to have his familiarity with the culture and practice of the two main sects of Jainism. However, his interests were by no means confined to Jainism. Sanghavi had always insisted on the importance of the Pali canon for understanding the Jain scriptures, and Jaini was encouraged by him to utilise the library, housed at the Gujarati Vidyapith, of Dharmamandala Kosambi, India's most distinguished scholar of Theravāda Buddhism. Eventually, Jaini resolved to continue his postgraduate work in Sri Lanka and, with the help of Muni Jinavijaya, the director of the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan in Bombay, to which he had briefly moved from Ahmedabad, became in 1949 the first Dharmamandala Kosambi Memorial scholar, studying as a layman in Colombo at the Vidyodaya Pirivena, a monastic training centre headed by the Venerable Baddegama Piyarata Mahathero, a one-time fellow student of Kosambi.

During his two years there, Jaini thoroughly familiarised himself with the Abhidharmika Pitaka, later to become one of his main areas of scholarly expertise, and also studied widely in the commentary literature on the Sūtra and Vinaya Pitakas of the Pali canon. Unwilling to restrict himself to the confines of libraries, he was able to witness the richness of Sinhalese Buddhist ritual and devotional life as he accompanied Mahathero on his travels round the island and also memorably met Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, who visited Sri Lanka prior to his momentous decision to convert to Buddhism along with vast numbers of his followers. This period was to provide the basis for Jaini's first publication, Silonnām Be Varṣa (“Two Years in Ceylon”), which provides in Gujarati much information about the practicalities of Theravāda Buddhism and a discussion of the potential for a genuine Buddhist revival in India.

After being awarded the degree of Tripiṇīkācārya in 1951 at a special ceremony held at Prime Minister Senanayake's residence, Jaini returned to Ahmedabad to take up a lecturer's position. However, he was soon to be on the move again, being appointed in 1952 to a newly created lectureship in Pali at Banaras Hindu University. Paradoxically, there could have hardly been a course of action more likely to ensure that Jaini's academic interests in the real or imaginary. In P. S. Jaini’s case, the structuring feature of his writings can be easily defined. All his energies throughout his career have been devoted to the elucidation of the manifold facets of what Indian scholars call sramanasamskruti, “the culture of the strivers”, that is to say, the religious, philosophical and literary achievements of the Buddhists and the Jains. Jaini’s intellectual control over this area has meant that he has been able to adopt various styles of investigation. Sometimes Buddhism and Jainism are approached by him as independent phenomena, or, as with the case of the Jaina Purāṇas, with reference to their engagement with the encircling Hindu world. More often, however, Jaini has been preoccupied with the interaction and overlapping of the two great renouncer religions, with evidence from the one tradition being deployed so as to throw light on the other.
FOREWORD

To exemplify briefly the fruitfulness of this latter methodology. It is difficult to read far in Jain literature without encountering the terms bhavya and abhavya, expressions designating respectively those innately capable of advancing along the path of spiritual release and those innately destined to make no progress at all in this respect. This dichotomy, which implies acceptance of something akin to predestination, is highly problematic for a religion which argues for the supposedly essential equality of souls and their common ability to transform their status through effort, although Jaini seems to have been the first to draw serious attention to this. Jaini’s explanation in his paper “Bhavya and Abhavya; A Jain Doctrine of ‘Predestination’” of the two categories by reference to the Buddhist Vasubandhu’s Abhidharmakosabhasya and what can be reconstructed of the teachings of the Ājīvik leader Makkhali Gosāla is a masterly demonstration of the sectarian modifications of an old sramaṇa doctrine of predestination. In similar fashion, Jaini’s ability evinced in the paper “Jaina Monks from Mathurā; Literary Evidence for Their Identification on Kuśāṇa Sculptures” to draw upon Pali sources, as well as a wide range of Jain literary evidence, enables him to confirm and amplify the validity of U. P. Shah’s identification of Mathurā images of naked monks holding pieces of cloth as ardhaphālakas, possible forerunners of the influential medieval sect of the Vāparāyas.

In the specifically Buddhist area, Jaini’s earliest articles emerged from his work on the Abhidharmadīpa, being originally components of the voluminous introduction to his doctoral dissertation. They display at the outset two of the main virtues which have consistently characterised Jaini’s work: close familiarity with the primary sources, which are carefully documented, and, above all, clarity. Jaini’s travels in Southeast Asia led to the publication of a further body of work on the apocryphal Pāli jātakas. Only recently have scholars begun to approach Theravāda Buddhism as a trans-national phenomenon and it is likely that Jaini’s publications in this area will prove an important point of reference in shifting the philological and ethnographic emphasis away from the canonical Pāli literature of Sri Lanka.

Many scholars in this time of enforced specialisation would have been content to rest on their laurels purely on the basis of these Buddhistological publications. Jaini studies, however, had never been far from Jaini’s thoughts even at the beginning of his career. During his stay in London, for example, he prevailed upon the leaders of the Mahāvira Jain Vidyalaya in Bombay to produce editions of the Śvetāmarāja Jain scriptures in the (still continuing) Jain Āgama Series on the critical model employed by the Pali Text Society. Having begun productive research on Jainism during the 1970s, most notably with his edition and translation of a unique Digambara philosophical stotra, the Lāghutattivasphota of Amāntacandrasūri, for which he used photographs and a handwritten copy of the only manuscript given to him by Muni Puniyavijaya, Jaini eventually came to realise that Jain studies had to be given a higher profile within undergraduate teaching of Indian religions and, specifically, to be more fully integrated into the South Asian Studies programme at Berkeley. Not finding any suitable textbook with which to effect this, he resolved to write one himself and so produced in 1979 the work for which he is probably best known, The Jaina Path of Purification. This book can be regarded, with only slight exaggeration, as having attained the authority of virtual primary source and its value in promoting and providing an entrée to its subject in the English-speaking world in recent years is inestimable, to the extent that the late Kendall Folkert felt able to talk of pre- and post-Jaini eras in recent Jain studies.*

It may be the case, as some friendly critics have suggested, that The Jaina Path of Purification, and some of Jaini’s articles, do occasionally present the Digambara idiom of Jainism at the expense of the various Śvetāmarāja sectarian traditions, although this increasingly strikes the present writer as a strength rather than a defect, since Digambara Jainism remains a woefully neglected subject. However, possible bias is certainly not a criticism that can be levelled at Jaini’s most recent book, Gender and Salvation: Jaini Debates on the Spiritual Liberation of Women, whose Introduction is reprinted here (No. 9). In this remarkable and trailblazing work Jaini translates and analyses a range of Śvetāmarājā, Digambara and Yāpaniya sources to provide a broad and yet detailed conspectus on what is, for South Asia, a unique debate on female religiosity, a subject growing in importance in Indian studies. As with Jaini’s work on the apocryphal Pāli jātakas, one feels that the full significance of Gender and Salvation will continue to emerge on further acquaintance.

If this were the foreword to a festschrift dedicated to Professor Jaini, then no doubt its writer would extol the honorand’s many personal attributes, such as his affability, raconteurship and generosity with his copious knowledge. Such productions do, of course, have their place in academic life, but I would suggest that the publication of these two volumes represents something better. They will enable seasoned aficionados to refresh their familiarity with and appreciation of Jaini’s work, provide those working exclusively in either Buddhism or Jainism with a sense of the mutual illumination these two traditions can cast upon each other, and, lastly reveal to a younger generation of scholars a corpus of writing at once inspiring, informative and provocative.

May Professor P. S. Jaini’s Collected Papers be consulted and profited from for many years to come.

University of Edinburgh

Paul Dundas

---

Preface

Papers are written, for the most part, on a wide variety of topics for panels at conferences and for felicitation volumes in honour of distinguished colleagues in one's area of research. It never occurred to me when I was writing these papers that one day they would be brought together in some coherent form. Several of my colleagues suggested to me that a collection of them would be useful in focusing attention on two of the heterodox traditions of ancient India, namely Buddhism and Jainism. Notable among these is John Cort, a leading Jainologist at Denison University, who recommended the format of the volumes. It was also his suggestion that a senior scholar well-acquainted with both of these areas should write a Foreword, and he invited Paul Dundas, the celebrated author of The Jains (Routledge, 1992), to undertake this task. I am grateful to my esteemed friend Paul Dundas for his very generous Foreword, in which he reviews my career and evaluates my research.

Of the fifty papers collected here in two volumes, eleven were written as contributions to Festschriften (Jaina Studies: 4, 5, 10, 14 and 16 and Buddhist Studies: 4, 5, 8, 16, 20, and 22) and fifteen were invited papers at conferences (Jaina Studies: 1, 5, 7, 12, 15, 17, and 21; Buddhist Studies: 1, 7, 9, 10, 17, 21, 24, and 26). There are a few texts and translations of small Sanskrit and Pali works, some in fragmentary form. A total of twelve papers, nine related to Buddhism (10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 18, 24, 25, 27) and three to Jaina Studies (17, 18, 19) were published in the Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London, while others were published in India and elsewhere. This accounts for the variety of stylistic conventions for diacritical marks, spellings of words (Jaina/Jain) as well as bibliographical references, and so forth. Although the papers have not been revised, I have taken the opportunity where appropriate to recommend important works that have appeared since their initial publication.

The first paper of each volume ("Ahiṃsā: A Jaina Way of Spiritual Life" and "States of Happiness in Buddhist Heterodoxy") is presented as an introduction to the Jaina and Buddhist faiths, respectively. These are followed by articles on the state of Jaina Studies and Buddhist Studies at the time of their publication, 1976 for Jainism and 1956 for Buddhism. In the case of the Jaina volume, two rather lengthy Introductions reproduced from two of my earlier books (3 and 9) provide a detailed study of the doctrine of the bondage of the soul and the debate over salvation of women. Seven papers in the volume on Buddhist Studies are primarily based on Buddhist material but include also a number of Jaina sources. They demonstrate the interdependent nature of these two traditions and stress the need for exploring them together. Their titles are as follows: Śramaṇas: Their Conflict with Brāhmaṇical Society (1970); On the Sarvajñatva (Omniscience) of Mahāvīra and the Buddha (1974); The Jina as a Tathāgata: Amṛtacandra’s Critique of Buddhist Doctrine (1976); Samśāra-duḥkhatā and the Jaina Concept of Suffering (1977); The Disappearance of Buddhism and the Survival of Jainism in India: A Study in Contrast (1980); Values in Comparative Perspective: Svadharma versus Ahiṃsā (1987); and On the Ignorance of the Arhat (1992).

I am deeply indebted to the original publishers of these papers for permission to reproduce them here. Special thanks are due to Kristi Wiley, a doctoral student in our programme, for efficiently organizing the material and preparing the copy for the Press. I also would like to commend Mr. N. P. Jain for his enthusiasm in publishing these volumes and thus promoting the study of Jainism and Buddhism.

University of California, Berkeley

Padmanabh S. Jaini

Contents

Foreword by Paul Dundas v
Preface xiii

Section I
INTRODUCTION TO JAINA FAITH

1. Ahiṃsā: A Jaina Way of Spiritual Discipline 3

Section II
JAINA STUDIES

2. The Jainas and the Western Scholar 23

Section III
SOME ASPECTS OF REALITY IN JAINA DOCTRINE

3. Amṛtacandra Sūri’s Exposition on Reality 39
4. Svatantravacanāṁrta of Kanakasena 83

Section IV
SOME ASPECTS OF KARMA THEORY

5. Bhavyatva and Abhavyatva: A Jaina Doctrine of ‘Predestination’ 95
6. Tīrthaṅkara-Prakṛti and the Bodhisattva Path 111
7. Karma and the Problem of Rebirth in Jainism 121
8. Muktivicāra of Bhāvasena: Text and Translation 147
10. [Kevat] Bhaktivicāra of Bhāvasena: Text and Translation 199
SECTION V
JAINA ETHICS AND PRAXIS

11. Sāmāyika
12. The Pure and the Auspicious in the Jaina Tradition
13. Jaina Festivals
14. Indian Perspectives on the Spirituality of Animals
15. Is There a Popular Jainism?
16. Fear of Food: Jaina Attitudes on Eating
17. Jaina Monks from Mathurā: Literary Evidence for Their Identification on Kuśāṇa Sculptures

SECTION VI
JAINA PURĀNAS

18. Jina Ṛṣabha as an Avatāra of Viṣṇu
19. Mahābhārata Motifs in the Jaina Pāṇḍavapurāṇa
20. Bhaṭṭāraka Śrībhūṣaṇa’s Pāṇḍavapurāṇa: A Case of Jaina Sectarian Plagiarism
21. Jaina Purāṇas: A Purānic Counter Tradition

INTRODUCTION TO JAINA FAITH
CHAPTER 17

Jaina Monks from Mathurā: Literary Evidence for Their Identification on Kuśāṇa Sculptures*

Among the thousands of Jaina images found throughout India, those from Mathura produced during the Kuśāṇa period are unique, for they alone contain representations of unclothed Jaina ascetics holding a single small piece of cloth in such a way as to cover their nudity. These curious figures cannot be identified with monks of the present-day Jaina sects of the Digambaras, who practise total nudity, or of the Svetāmbaras, who wear two long pieces of unstitched white cloth wrapped around their bodies and occasionally a white blanket over their left shoulders. The veteran art-historian, the late Dr. U. P. Shah, in Aspects of Jain art and architecture briefly mentions these figures, noting that nowhere in the above references from Svetāmbaras as well as Digambara texts do we come across a reference to those figures on the simhāsana of a Jina which we find in a number of sculptures of the Kuśāṇa period from the Caṅkāli Tīlā. Subsequently, in Jaina-Rūpa-Mandana, he calls these figures ardhaphālakas (monks with partial covering) and speculates that these figures might be Yāpaniya monks, another Jaina sect that is now extinct, and states that these figures need further investigation. In addition to Shah, N.

P. Joshi has also discussed these ardhaphālaka images. He states that 'all the monks seen in the bas-reliefs, except one known to me, seem to belong to the Ardhapālaka sect....Besides the monks seen in the bas-reliefs, those hovering in the air (vidyā cāranaḥ) or seen on some of the śilāpaṭṭās are all Ardhapālakas. This suggests that during the pre-Christian and early Christian centuries a large number of Jainas at Mathura followed this sect.13

The earliest appearance of the terms ardhapālaka and yāpana together can be traced to the Digambara Jaina narrative called the Bhadrabāhukathānaka (§ 131) in the tenth-century Brhathahākōśa of Hariśena (c.a.d. 931). This story, composed in a place called Wadhawan in Kathiwar, is of the legendary account of a major schism in the hitherto undivided community of Jaina mendicants that purportedly took place during the time of a pontiff (ācārya) named Bhadrabāhu of uncertain date.4 A Kannada version of this legend (with numerous variations) is found in the Vaddārādhane of Śivakoṭi, probably of the second half of the tenth century.5 Shahi's use of the terms ardhapālaka and yāpaniya along with his brief account of the story in the Brhathahākōśa6 certainly shows an acquaintance with the researches on these obscure schools by Upadhye. Upadhye, on the other hand, gives no indication of being aware of the problems posed by the peculiar Mathura images of the Jaina monks under study by Shah. The following is the extent of Upadhye's comments on the Bhadrabāhukathānaka:

Though it presents some difficulties for a clear understanding and consequently needs careful collation and comparative study with other sources, both earlier and later, the story of Bhadrabāhu (no. 131) is important in various respects: it refers to the migration of Jaina Saṅgha to Punnāta territory in the Deccan and to the division of twofold Kalpa, Jina- and Sthāvira- kalpa, and outlines the circumstances under which Ardhapālakasangha, Kambala-ṭīrtha and Yāpaniya-saṅgha were started.8

A more recent study of the Sanskrit and the Kannada versions of the Bhadrabāhukathānaka by B. K. Khadadb9 and subsequent research on the history of the Jaina sects of the Gupta era by Suzuko Ohira10 also show a complete lack of interest in the Jaina antiquities of Mathura. I believe that a detailed comparative study of the Mathura images with Jaina texts such as the Bhadrabāhu-kathānaka and Buddhist texts that mention their rival Jaina ascetics—a task not undertaken by Joshi, Shah, or Upadhye—will shed further light on the mystery of these obscure Jaina mendicants of the Kusāna period.

We may note here briefly the events leading to the formation of the Yāpana-saṅgha as narrated by Hariśena in the earliest version, the Bhadrabāhu-kathānaka:

(i) vv. 1—27: Once, the Jaina monk Govardhana, the fourth knower of the Fourteen Pūrvas in the tradition of Vardhamāna (Mahāvīra), arrived in the city of Devakoṭṭa of the Paṇḍravardhana country ruled by King Padmaratha.

There he obtained a young boy (kṣaṭvam svānte cahara) named Bhadrabāhu from his Brahmin parents, Somāsārma and Somāśri. He taught him various sciences and eventually initiated him as a (Digambara) Jaina mendicant. After Govardhana's death, Muni Bhadrabāhu became the head of the Jaina saṅgha and travelled to the country of Avantī, which was ruled by a Jaina king called Candragupta11 from the city of Ujjayini on the banks of the Vīpṛ river.

(ii) vv. 28—44: One day, while wandering for his alms in the city of Ujjayini, Bhadrabāhu entered an empty house and heard a baby's voice saying, 'O Sir, please quickly go away from this place (kṣipram gaccha tvam bhagavann itah).12 Bhadrabāhu by his super-knowledge realized that this was a prophecy of a twelve-year drought. He then counselled his mendicant followers 'to go near the salt-ocean (yāta lavoṇābhīṣamipatām)', but considering his own old age, he stayed behind in Ujjayini. King Candragupta also became a Jaina monk, and this group of monks (saṅgha), under the leadership of Viśākhācārya, travelled to Punnāta (modern Karnatak) in the Southern Country (Dakṣiṇadesa). Three other groups of monks led respectively by the ācāryas Rāmilla, Sthūla-vṛddha and Bhadrācārya went to the country of Sīndhu (svasaṃghasamudayena Sīndhvādevvījayam yath). Eventually, the ācārya Bhadrabāhu, having fasted for many days, died in the Bāhīdrapada-deśa of Avantī.

(iii) vv. 45—48: When the drought was over, Viśākhācārya and his disciples, who had gone to the Southern Country, having adhered to their mendicant vows [for they were able to obtain proper food], returned to the Middle Country (Madhya-deśa, i.e., Avanti). But the other three groups (led by Rámilla and so forth), who had gone to the country of Sindhu, were unable to obtain food or water during that severe drought. Upon returning [to Avanti?] they reported the following [in Ujjaini]:

(iv) vv. 49–53: At that time of terrible drought, when there was neither food nor water, people gathered at the doors of houses and made a lot of noise. Because of this, the householders could not eat their food. They remained hungry during the day and started eating only at night (to avoid the crowd outside). [There laypeople said to us] 'You, sirs, for fear of the people [outside], please obtain begging bowls (pátras) from our houses [and collect food going from door to door] during the night and eat the gathered alms during the day inside the residence of your host layman (sva-právakā-grhé). Thus abiding by the wishes of the people, our ácāryas and other mendicants fed themselves accordingly.

(v) vv. 54–60: One night a certain emaciated monk visited a Jaina household with his bowl in hand, and the sight of that naked (niṉgranañna) monk caused such a fright to a young pregnant woman that she aborted the fetus. Seeing that, the Jaina laymen approached the heads of the monks and said, 'O sages! This is a time of calamity. When the good times arrive, you may, having undertaken the appropriate expiations (práyasacita), abide again by the rules of mendicancy. Therefore, for the duration of this period, you should [visit the households] at night covering yourself with half-a-piece of cloth (ardhahálaka) held on your left arm and holding the begging bowl in your right hand, and eat the food [thus collected] during the daytime.' Hearing these assured words of the laypeople, the monks acted accordingly.

(vi) vv. 61–68: Time passed and there soon arrived conditions of prosperity and people became happy, freed from the state of misery. Then the three ácāryas consulted with each other and addressed their communities of monks: 'O monks, with your minds happy, abandon now your half-a-piece of cloth (ardhahálaka), and for the sake of emancipation (mokṣa), resort to the excellent vow of nudity (niṉgranthatá).' Hearing those words, some monks resumed the vow of nudity. The three ácāryas, namely, Rámilla, Śhavira and Śhúlabhadra, also approached the venerable Viśākhācārya and abandoning the half-a-piece of cloth (ardhakarpáta) assumed anew the vow of nudity. But certain others, the cowardly weaklings, ignorant of the highest good, who did not like the advice of the teachers, formed this order (tirtha) called the Ardhahálaka, and [thus] created a twofold mendicant order: the Jina-kalpa and the Śhavira-kalpa.

(vii) vv. 69–79: In the country of Saurashtra, in the city of Valabhi, there ruled a heretic (i.e. a non-Jaina) king named Vapraváda (Vaprápála in the Vaḍḍhárádhane). But his chief queen Śvámíni became a great devotee of these Ardhahálaka ascetics. One day a group of these monks arrived at the palace of this king at midday to collect alms. Seeing them the king became curious and said to the queen, 'O Lady! Your group of Ardhahálaka monks is no good; they are neither clad nor naked; it is ridiculous (saśadambana).' On another day, when a group of Ardhahálaka monks entered the city, the king said to them, 'You should abandon this half-a-piece of cloth and assume nudity [as is proper]. They did not desire that, and the king, even more astonished, said, 'O ascetics, if indeed you are unable to assume the form of nudity, then give up this half-a-piece of cloth, the cause of your ridicule, and attire yourselves in proper clothes and reside happily here in my kingdom.'

(viii) vv. 80–81: From that day onward, by the order of the king Vapraváda, in the country of Lāṭa (Gujarat), there came into being the Kambala-tirtha (the sect of monks who use a blanket) [Vaḍḍhárádhane, 93: Those who were of the Kambala-tirtha came to be called Śvetapāta (=the Śvetámbara). From that Kambala-tirtha, in the Sávalipattana, was born the Yápanasaṅgha in the Southern Country.] [Vaḍḍhárádhane, 93: In the Dāśināpather, King Sāmaliputta became the leader of the Śvetabhikṣu Japulisaṅgha, which descended from the Śvetapātas.]

Since this is a Digambara account of the origins of their opponents the Śvetámbaras and since there is no Śvetámbara counterpart to any of these stories, it may not serve as a totally reliable document. However, after a careful examination of the ardhahálaka monks as depicted in the Mathura sculptures, I believe that the Bhadrabāhu-kathānaka may indeed contain a kernel of truth. The narrative is primarily talking about what one may call an apaváda-veśa, a temporary measure appropriate to a calamity, i.e., an exception to the mendicant laws regularly observed. The story assumes that all Jaina monks were Digambaras to start with, who—as is the practice even to this day—adhered to the twin vows of nudity (nāgnyya) and of eating food from joined palms (pāṇi-tala-bhojana) once a day during the daytime only. The Digambaras have traditionally held a belief—partly supported by the sixth-century inscriptions of Shravanabelgola—that a migration of monks to the South took place under the leadership of Bhadrabāhu, a contemporary of the Mauryan emperor Candragupta, during a 12-year period of drought in Magadha. They also have claimed that those monks who did not migrate and chose to stay in Magadha relaxed the rules of mendicancy, began to wear clothes, and started to use wooden bowls for collecting alms. For the Digambaras, these are the apostate monks (jaina bhāsa) who came to be labelled at a later time as Śvetāmbaras or 'white clad' monks.

However, a direct connexion (assumed by the Digambaras) between a shortage of food and the wearing of clothes by hitherto naked monks remained unexplained, rendering this traditional Digambara account (of the origin of 'clothed' Jaina monks) unsatisfactory to any neutral observer. The Bhadrabāhu-kathānaka seems to provide the missing link in the story of the naked monk on his nocturnal begging rounds frightening a pregnant woman resulting in a miscarriage. This led to the lay people’s request that the monks should henceforth visit the households covering themselves with half-a-piece of cloth held on their left arm. The correspondence between these words and the way in which the Mathura monks are shown covering their nudity—with a short piece of cloth held on their left forearm—is truly remarkable and may not be purely accidental. Since such depiction appears nowhere else in Jaina art before or after the Kuṣāna era, the sculptures described above may be recalling a period of crisis through which the community of the Digambara monks had passed in not too remote a past.

Our assumption that the Mathura depiction of the ardhaphalāka attire was in response to an exceptional situation may not be altogether fanciful. There is at least one recorded instance of the Digambaras making a similar concession (subject of course to expiations) under unfavourable political conditions. In late medieval times the Digambara monks could not move about freely in certain areas of northern India where public nudity was frowned upon by Muslim rulers. The Digambara cleric (bhajāraka) Śrutasāgara (c. sixteenth century) reports an incident where a Digambara monk Vasantakirti (of unknown date) living in Mandapadurga (Rajasthan?) allowed his monks an exceptional garb (apavāda-vēsa), namely, to cover themselves with a mat (tattī) or a piece of cloth (sādara or cādara) while on their outings for meals and so forth. While he admits that this was an exceptional practice, Śrutasāgara nevertheless has no hesitation in condemning it as heretical. In view of such a tradition of uncompromising attitude on the part of the Digambaras, it would not be incorrect to surmise that the ardhaphalāka monks of the Kuṣāna period, after a brief spell of public adoration—as demonstrated by the Mathura images—for their heroic efforts to survive the drought, might have returned to the original fold soon after the crisis had ended. This could be one explanation for the total absence of the depiction of the ardhaphalāka images in the Jaina tradition in subsequent periods.

Furthermore, the meaning of the term yāpanīya itself lends credence to this particular account of the origin of this sect, which is, in fact, shrouded in mystery. It is referred to by that name (Yāpanī[ī]ya) in the Sanskrit inscriptions of the fifth-century Kadamba king Mṛgēśavarmā. The eighth-century Śvetāmbara author Haribhadra quotes a long Prakrit passage from a text of that sect which he calls the Yāpanīya-tantra. In the Kannada Vaddārādhane it appear as Jāpuli. Upadhye, who made an extensive study of the inscriptions of the sect (originating for the most part in the districts of Belgua, Dharwar, and Gulburga of Karnataka), found the name Yāpanīya appearing under various spellings, e.g., Jāpanīya, Yāpulīya, Jāvalīya, Jāvaligeya, and so forth. This led him to believe that the term yāpanīya could be an incorrect Sanskritization of the canonical Prakrit javanīja (yamaniya, as in indijavani, i.e., those who control their senses).

Upadhye’s search for a Prakrit origin of the name Yāpanīya—justified no doubt by the inscriptive evidence—must be considered unfortunate. It has the effect of ignoring the true significance of the term ‘yāpana’ employed to describe the conduct of the apostate Jaina monks in Hariśena’s narrative. This word reminds one of the Pali form yāpaniya (from yā+āpe) meaning ‘sufficient, i.e. just enough for supporting one’s life’, an adjective commonly applied to provisions (such as food, clothing, and shelter) for a Buddhist monk. The Jaina monks in Hariśena’s narrative could be designated as yāpana or yāpaniya because, faced by the calamity of a long period of drought, they followed an ‘exceptional’ way of obtaining food ‘just sufficient for supporting’ their mendicant lives.

Whether the relaxation of the rules allowed during this period of crisis eventually became a permanent way of life for these ardhahālaka monks or whether it led to the wearing of full clothes as is claimed by the Bhadrabāhukathānaka cannot be answered by the evidence available. The arrival of such ardhahālaka monks in Valabhi need not be disputed; but King Vapravāda’s intervention and the subsequent rise of the order of fully-clothed monks—the kambala-ūrtha (leading the author of the Vaddārādhana to characterize these new monks as the Śvetapātas) appears highly suspicious. It is significant that the narrator of the story applies the designation Yāpana-sāṅgha not to those who lived in Gujmath (Lāta) but to those who migrated still further into the Deccan. The ardhahālaka monks may indeed have appeared in the South with the half-a-piece of cloth as their mendicant emblem. Groups of such monks could have been identified initially as Yāpana or Yāpaniya, ‘only just sufficient for supporting a mendicant way of life’, possibly even as a derogatory term. Eventually the word was rendered into Kannada under different spellings and the original meaning was lost. Gradually as its members merged with the Digambaras in the South by adopting nudity or becoming advanced lay-disciples called the bhāṭārakas, and with the Śvētāmbaras in the North by wearing full-length clothes, the old Yāpana-sāṅgha could have lost its independent identity.

Nevertheless, certain later pieces of literature give some clue about the manner in which the origin of the Yāpana-sāṅgha was not altogether forgotten. Guṇaratna, the fifteenth-century Śvētāmbara commentator on Haribhadra’s Saddarājanasamuccaya, counts the Yāpaniyas as a sect of the Digambaras and yields a bit
Plate II

(Courtesy of American Institute of Indian Studies, Varanasi.)

Plate III

Lucknow Museum, no. J. 105. Relief fragment showing a Kinnara and a Jaina monk.
Mathura (Kankali Tila), red sandstone, 1st century B.C. (Courtesy of American Institute of Indian Studies, Varanasi.)
JAINISM AND EARLY BUDDHISM:
ESSAYS IN HONOR OF
PADMANABH S. JAINI

Part I

Edited by Olle Qvarnström

ASIAN HUMANITIES PRESS
[An Imprint of Jain Publishing Company]
Fremont California
CONTENTS
(Part I)

FOREWORD (Paul Dundas) .................................................................................. ix

PUBLICATIONS BY PADMANABH S. JAINI .................................................... xiii

FROM NICODA TO MOKSA: THE STORY OF MARUDEVI
(Padmanabh S. Jaini) ..................................................................................... 1

ARTICLES IN HONOR OF PROFESSOR PADMANABH S. JAINI

Lawrence A. Babb (Amherst College)
Thwarted Sacrifice: On the Origin Myths of Jain Caste ................................ 29

Nalini Balbir (University of Paris-3)
The Ajījāṅgakatha Viewed from Inside and from Outside ............................. 47

Marcus Banks (Oxford University)
Indian Jainism at Social Practice at the End of the Twentieth Century ........ 79

Johannes Bronkhorst (Université de Lausanne)
Jainism's First Heretic and the Origin of Anekānta-vāda ............................. 95

Colette Cailler (Institut de France, Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres)
Mythosis and Mystic Experience in Yoginī's Poem Pampāttimārapakāśa ...... 113

John E. Curt (Denison University)
Doing for Others: Merit Transfer and Karma Mobility in Jainism .............. 129
Foreword

On June 4 1998, an international gathering of scholars of Buddhism and Jainism assembled in the charming old town of Lund to take part in a conference hosted by the Department of History of Religions at Lund University. For the next three days, under the genial and capable stewardship of Dr. Olle Qvarnström, they delivered and discussed specialist papers on India’s great renouncer religions and at the same time experienced some unforgettable Swedish hospitality.

The occasion for this was the desire of all present to honour one of the world’s most distinguished experts on Buddhist and Jain studies, Padmanabha S. Jaini, until recently Professor of Buddhist Studies at the University of California at Berkeley. It was also an opportunity for many, particularly those coming from Europe and Japan, who meet this most agreeable of intellectual companions more rarely than they would wish, to salute him in person. The papers delivered over that weekend were numerous, informed and ranged widely, and each one was unfailingly enlivened by Professor Jaini’s own comments and interventions. Seldom, at least in this writer’s experience, has there been such a convivial and rewarding conference.

Anyone wishing to trace the trajectory of Professor Jaini’s academic formation and career, of a type now increasingly rare, can consult the biography I included in my foreword to his reprinted Collected Papers on Jain Studies and Collected Papers on Buddhist Studies published by Moddai Banarsidas in 2000 and 2001 respectively. In that foreword I rather mischievously suggested that the publication of distinguished scholars’ “opuscula minora” serves a more worthwhile purpose in both academic and commemorative terms than the production of festschriften. However, in this particular context, admitting in Jain fashion to the necessity of taking alternative perspectives into account when formulating a judgement and also emboldened by the fact that it is hardly a run-of-the-mill festschrift which contains a lengthy and important contribution from its dedicatee, I will now firmly assert that the publication of congratulatory volumes honouring the contribution of respected senior scholars such as Professor Jaini is one of the most pleasant and indispensable of academic customs.

The papers in this festschrift address many aspects of Buddhist and Jain thought and civilisation. A variety of scholarly perspectives are employed by the contributors, some treating Buddhism and Jainism separately, others attempting, in the spirit of a great deal of Professor Jaini’s work, to demonstrate linkages between the two. The historical range of these papers reaches from the very beginnings of the two renouncer religions to aspects of modern practice. Because of the large number of contributors, this festschrift has been published in two parts. Part 1 contains those essays that focus primarily on Jainism. Part 2 contains those essays that are more comparative in nature or that focus on Buddhism or Brahmanical traditions. The following represents a brief description of the contents of the two parts, with the authors represented in alphabetical order.

Part I. Babb delineates the manner in which narratives involving sacrifice and the transformation of its values have shaped the sense of self-image and origin of some Jain castes in western India. Balibic describes the history and teachings of the Śvetāmbara image-worshipping sect, the Aśća Gaccha. Banks gives an account of aspects of the reconfiguration of Jainism in the modern world. Bronkhorst discusses the Jain scriptural tradition about the teachings of the heretic Jamāli. Caillat analyzes the relationship between standard Jain prescriptions and mystical experience in the Aparākṣāna poems of Yogācāra. Cott investigates the evidence for Śvetāmbara Jainism accepting the possibility of transferring the fruits of karma to others in order to alter their karmic destiny. Dundas analyses the medieval story of the conversion of the Jain monk Siddhārṣi to Buddhism and the descriptions of Mahāyāna Buddhist and Ājīvika teachings given in Haribhadra’s Lalitavistara. Flügel describes the institution of meritorious service and compulsory religious production among the ascetic community of the Terīpaṇṭhi Jains. Fujimura assesses the historical development of the “three jewels” of right faith, right knowledge and right conduct as representing the Jain path to liberation.

Jaini analyses the accounts of the karmic career of Queen Marudevi, according to the Śvetāmbaras the first individual of this movement of time to achieve liberation. Johnson offers a novel interpretation of the nature of the experience involved in Jain image worship. Keldsgaard investigates a range of Jain narratives involving women and the way in which they provide idealized exemplary models for female devotees. Leoshko examines ways in which interpretations of Jain art could be broadened by an inside view of what such works mean and whether this approach can be accommodated in current art historical practice. Sato deals with the role of awareness (aṣṭavada) in epistemology as discussed by the seventeenth-century Śvetāmbara Jain Yāsovijaya. Skoog offers an ethical perspective on saṅkalpa-buddhi, fasting to death, as climaxing the religious life in Jainism, and the manner in which it can be differentiated from egotistical suicide. Surkov applies the insights of Jungian psychology to the accounts of the various rebirths of two characters given in the Jain Haribhadra’s Prakīrti romance the Samavatsaravatā. Vēluppillai gives an overview of Jainism as depicted in Tamil inscriptions from earliest times to the late medieval period. Finally, Wiley analyses the working of dhyān karmas, “life karmas”, with specific reference to Digambara and Śvetāmbara Jain stories about King Śrenika who after killing himself and experiencing a period in hell will be reborn as the first śīrśadhāra of the next movement of time.

Part II. Asher describes the configuration of Jain temple architecture in contemporary north India and its relationship with its Hindu counterpart. Assavirulkarn describes the role of chanting in Thai Buddhism in providing a source of protection and worldly prosperity. Breškić draws parallels between Jain and Buddhist attitudes towards holy places at the end of the nineteenth century. Chappel draws parallels between the yogic perspectives of the Jain teacher Haribhadra and the Hindu Panini, author of the Yogasītras. Gombrich provides an explanation of an early Buddhist sectarian theory of the materiality of karma very similar to that of Jainism. Granoff discusses Hindu and Jain narratives about the appropriateness of worshipping divinity in physical form. Hara delineates the various ways in which plants and trees are depicted in early Indian literature. Koller compares the Jain willingness to engage with certain metaphysical questions and the Buddhist tendency to set them aside.

Lienhard draws attention to a version of a famous Buddhist narrative in the sixth anga in the Jain scriptural canon. Norman discusses a section of the Pali Suttaññhāsutta and the extent to which it can be regarded as representing the earliest form of Buddhism. Parpola investigates the background to the Jain term śīrṣadhāra by reference to Old Tamil sources. Qvarnström provides text, translation and annotation of the ninth chapter of Śiddhasena Divakara’s Devacīrīthā, the earliest systematic treatment of Vaiṣṇava by a Jain author. Schalk draws attention to the earliest references to Śaivism in the Buddhist community in Sri Lanka. Shinohara explores the Buddhist attitude towards image making in some seventh-century Chinese sources. Von Simson uncovers structural connections between the narratives of the Buddha and his cousin Devadatta and the Mahābhārata heroes Bhīṣma and Karna. Skilling provides a textual analysis on a set of verses dealing with “gladdenings” (anubodha) which occurs in a variety of Buddhist traditions. Smith discusses the story of Kuśa and Lava as found in the earliest Jain version of the Rāmāyana, the Pañcarātra of Vimalātīriṇī, concluding that it does not derive from Vaiṣṇava’s version of the narrative. Soni introduces and edits the passage refuting Mahāyāna Buddhist epistemology in the Susāvatamāparikṣa of the Digambara Vidyānandī. It is very much to be hoped that Professor Jaini, thankfully still highly productive, will relish his colleagues’ efforts in those scholarly areas in which he has himself so frequently provided the guiding light and welcome these volumes as a token of the admiration and affection in which he is held.

Paul Dundas
CONTENTS
(Part II)

FOREWORD (Paul Dundar) .................................................................xxvii

ARTICLES IN HONOR OF PROFESSOR PADMANABH S. JAINI

Catherine B. Asher (University of Minnesota)
Hidden Gold: Jain Temples of Delhi and Jalpaig and Their Urban Context...359

Prapod Assavavinthakarn (University of Chulalongkorn)
Mahābhaktamātrī — A Reflection on That Chanting Tradition .................379

Torkel Brekke (Oslo University)
Historical Consciousness in Theravāda Buddhism and Śvetāmbara Jainism at the Turn of the Century and Its Impact on the Attitude to Places of Religious and Historical Significance ..............................................................407

Christopher Key Chapple (Loyola Marymount University)
Purity and Diversity in the Yoga Traditions of Patañjali and Haribhadra....415

Richard Gombrich (Oxford University)
Merit Detached from Votition: How a Buddhist Doctrine
Came to Wear a Jain Aspect ................................................................427

Phyllis Granoff (McMaster University)
The Absent Artist as an Apology for Image Worship: An Investigation of Some Medieval Indian Accounts of the Origins of Sacred Images .........................441

Minoru Hara (International College for Advanced Buddhist Studies)
A Note on the Concept of Plants and Trees .........................................465

Johu M. Koller (Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute)
Aṣṭākata and Vībhajyavāda in Early Buddhism and Jainism ...............491

Siegfried Lienhard (Stockholm University)
A Jaina Version of the Śīvadīpikā .......................................................505

C. R. Norman (Cambridge University)
The Ājñākāvantya and Early Buddhism ................................................511
Asko Parpola (University of Helsinki)
Sanskrit Balancing Place and Transcendence: Dravidian Kata(tui) as the Source of Indo-Aryan Ghaṭ, Tīrtha, Tīrbhakara and (Tr)ṣṇikrama .... 523

Olle Qvarnström (Lund University)
Early Vedānta Philosophy Preserved by the Jain Tradition: The Vedāṇḍadvīpākā of Siddhasena Divākara ........................................ 575

Peter Schalk (Uppsala University)
The Earliest References to Jatutthavil Pantar ........................................ 595

Keichi Shinohara (McMaster University)
Image Makers in Xuanzang’s Record of the Western Regions and Daoxuan’s Miracle Story Collection ........................................ 609

Georg v. Simson (Oslo University)
Characterizing by Contrast: The Case of the Buddha and Devadatta, Bājīma and Karṇa ........................................ 621

Peter Skilling (The Pali Text Society)
On the Agnibhotramukha Yajñāh Vāra ....... 637

W. L. Smith (Stockholm University)
The Source of Vināśatī’s Version of the Kulaśreypākhyāna ........................................ 669

J. Soni (Philipps-Universität Marburg)
Vidyādharin’s Sattatāsanaparikāśa and His Examination of the Buddhist Viṣṇūsūtra ....... 577

Contributors ....... 589
Publications by Padmanabh S. Jaini

Books

17. Silomāṅga be varah (=Two years in Ceylon).
Gujarat Vidyāsahā, Ahmedabad, 1952.

Articles

3. “Karma and Environment in Buddhism.”
International Symposium on Buddhism and Environment, for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Faculty of Buddhist Studies, Rissho University, Tokyo (ed. Kenyo Mitomo), 2001.

5. “States of Happiness in Buddhist Heterodoxy.”

Collections on Jaina Studies, Motilal Banarsidass, Delhi, 2000, pp. 3-19.

7. “Pāṇḍava-Purāṇa of Vādica: Text and Translation.”

8. “Shades of Greed.”

9. Sraddhena Tatyasāṁ ca akhaṇḍa dhvayadhyāya.

10. “Pāṇḍava-Purāṇa of Vādica: Text and Translation”

11. “Pāṇḍava-Purāṇa of Vādica: Text and Translation”

12. “Jaina Monks from Mathura: Literary evidence for their identification on Kośāna sculptures.”
24. “Jainism as a World Religion.”

25. “Pādmapadā-jñātaka: Gautama’s last female incarnation.”

26. “Political and Cultural Data in References to Mathurā in the Buddhist Literature.”

27. “Stages in the Bodhisattva Career of the Tāthāgata Mañjuśrī.”

28. “Indian Perspectives on the Spirituality of Animals.”

29. “Values in Perspective: Svadharma versus Aśrama.”

33. “Mahābhārata motifs in the Jaina Pāṇḍava-Purāṇa.”

34. “Jaina Festivals.”

35. “Some Śūdras verses of the Lokāyata-pakaraṇa.”

36. “Sectarian Awareness in Jainism.”

37. “Professor John Brough (1917-1984).”
Journal of the International Association of Buddhist Studies, Madison (Wisconsin), 1984.

38. “The Buddhist and Jaina concepts of man and society as revealed in their religious literature.”

41. “Karma and the Problem of Rebirth in Jainism.”

42. “Tīrthaṅka-ra-prākāśa and the Bodhisattva Path.”

43. “Jaina Concept of the Sacred.”

44. “On the Buddha Image.”

45. “Pracāra and ḍhātī in the Vaibhāṣika Ablīdharma.”

46. “Jina Rṣabha as an Avatāra of Viṣṇu.”

47. “Sāmaveda-kalhād and the Jaina concept of suffering.”

49. “The Jina and the Western Scholar.”

51. “Sāmāyika: A Jaina path of purification.”
52. “On the Omniscience of Mahāvīra and the Buddha.”
54. “Jainism.”
55. “Śrāmanas: Their Conflict with Brahmanical Society.”
56. “Vasudhārā-dhāranī: A Buddhist work in use among the Jains of Gujarat.”
58. “Mahādibbambanta: a patita manuscript from Cambodia.”
59. “Abhidharmadīpa.”
60. “The origin and development of the viprayukta-sayukhāna.”
62. “The Vaibhāṣika theory of words and meanings.”
63. “On the Buddha’s prolongation of life.”
64. “On the theory of two Vasubandhus.”
   Vīśevavallabhasiri Commemoration Volume. Mahāvīra Jain Vidvyālaya, Bombay, 1956, pp. 74-76
66. “Buddhist studies in the East and West.”

Publications

Forthcoming

   Professor Minoru Hara Felicitation Volume, (Ed. A. Wezler, Institut für Kultur und Geschichte Indiens und Tibets, Universität Hamburg)
2. “Hemarā Pande’s Caṇḍāla Bolo”
   Śri Muni Jamaisvijaya Felicitation Volume, Sharadaben Chimanbhai Educational Research Centre, Ahmedabad. (Ed. by J. B. Shah)
3. “Umāsvāti on the Quality of Sukha.”
   Proceedings of the International Seminar on Umāsvāti and His Works, Bhogilal Leherchand Institute of Indology, Delhi, January 4-6, 1999. (Ed.V.P. Jain)
4. “A Note on Māra-bhāṣita in Abhidharmadīpa 235d.”
   Professor Hajime Sakurabe Felicitation Volume, Tokyo.
5. “Abhidharmadīpa-Vibhāṣāprabhāvṛtti: Summary.”
Articles continued from 2000 to 2013:

(68) "A Note on Māra-bhāṣīta in Abhidharmadīpa 235d." Buddhism and Abhidharma Thought in Honor of Dr. Hajime Sakurabe, Kyoto, 2002.

(73) "Jain Sectarian Debates: Eighty-four points of Contention (Cauryāṃśi Bol) Between Śvetāmbaras and Digambaras (Text and Translation)." JIP, 36, pp. 1-246, 2008.

(76) "Pāṇḍava-Purāṇa of Vādicandra: Text and Translation." JIP, 42, 1, sargas 7-9, 2013.
