

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

UC-NRLF

B 3 021 331

REESE LIBRARY
OF THE
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.

Received June, 188*8*

Accessions No. 36854 Shelf No. 685

M946

v. 31

THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

London
HENRY FROWDE

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE
AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

TRANSLATED

BY VARIOUS ORIENTAL SCHOLARS

AND EDITED BY

F. MAX MÜLLER

VOL. XXXI

Oxford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1887

[All rights reserved]

39

THE ZEND-AVESTA

PART III

THE YASNA, VISPARAD, ÂFRÎNAGÂN, GÂHS, AND MISCELLANEOUS FRAGMENTS

TRANSLATED BY

L. H. MILLS

Orford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1887

[All rights reserved]

3654

CONTENTS.

PREFACE	PAGE ix-xvi
INTRODUCTION	xvii-xlvii
ABBREVIATIONS	xlviii

TRANSLATIONS.

THE GÂTHAS (YASNA XXVIII-XXXIV, XLIII-LI, LIII)	1-194
YASNA I-XXVII, XXXV-XLII, LII, LIV-LXXII .	195-332
VISPARAD I-XXIII	333-364
ÂFRÎNAGÂN I-III	365-375
GÂHS I-V	377-388
MISCELLANEOUS FRAGMENTS	389-393
INDEX	395-400

Transliteration of Oriental Alphabets adopted for the Translations of the Sacred Books of the East .	401-404
---	---------

PREFACE.

IT would savour of affectation for me to say very much by way of meeting the necessary disadvantages under which I labour as in any sense a successor of Professor Darmesteter. It is sufficient to state that I believe myself to be fully aware of them, and that I trust that those who study my work will accord me the more sympathy under the circumstances. Professor Darmesteter, having extended his labours in his University, found his entire time so occupied that he was obliged to decline further labour on this Series for the present. My work on the Gáthas had been for some time in his hands¹, and he requested me, as a friend, to write the still needed volume of the translation of the Avesta. Although deeply appreciating the undesirableness of following one whose scholarship is only surpassed by his genius, I found myself unable to refuse.

As to my general treatment, experts will not need to be informed that I have laboured under no common difficulties. On the one hand, it would be extremely imprudent for any scholar not placed arbitrarily beyond the reach of criticism, to venture to produce a translation of the Yasna, Visparad, Áfrinagân, and Gâhs, without defensive notes. The smallest freedom would be hypercriticised by interested parties, and after them condemned by their followers. On the other hand, even with the imperfect commentary which accompanies the Gáthas here, the generous courtesy of the Delegates of the Clarendon Press has been too abundantly drawn upon. One does not expect detailed commentaries in this Series. My efforts have therefore been chiefly confined to forestalling the possible assaults of unfair or forgetful critics, and so to spare myself, in so far as it may be possible, the necessity for painful rejoinder.

¹ See the Revue Critique, Nov. 26, 1883.

To print a commentary on the Yasna, &c., which would be clear to non-specialists, and at the same time interesting, would occupy many times more space than could be here allowed. In treating the Gāthas however, even at the risk of too great extension, I have endeavoured to atone for the necessary obscurity of notes by ample summaries, and a translation supported by paraphrase, as such matter has more prospect of being generally instructive than a commentary which must necessarily have remained obscure. These summaries should also be read with the more indulgence, as they are the first of their kind yet attempted, Haug's having been different in their scope. With regard to all matters of mere form, I expect from all sides a similar concession. It will, I trust, be regarded as a sufficient result if a translation, which has been built up upon the strictest critical principles, can be made at all readable. For while any student may transcribe from the works of others what might be called a translation of the Yasna, to render that part of it, termed the Gāthas, has been declared by a respected authority, 'the severest task in Aryan philology¹.' And certainly, if the extent of preparatory studies alone is to be the gauge, the statement cited would not seem to be an exaggeration. On mathematical estimates the amount of labour which will have to be gone through to become an independent investigator, seems to be much greater than that which presents itself before specialists in more favoured departments. No one should think of writing with originality on the Gāthas, or the rest of the Avesta, who had not long studied the Vedic Sanskrit, and no one should think of pronouncing ultimate opinions on the Gāthas, who has not to a respectable degree mastered the Pahlavi commentaries. But while the Vedic, thanks to the labours of editor and lexicographers, has long been open to hopeful study, the Pahlavi commentaries have never been thoroughly made out, and writer after writer advances with an open avowal to that effect; while the explanation, if attempted, involves questions of actual decipherment, and Persian studies in addition to those of the Sanskrit and Zend; and the language of the Gâthas requires also the study of a severe comparative philology, and that to an unusual, if not unequalled, extent.

¹ 'Es bilden diese fünf Gāthās, die insgesamt metrisch abgefasst sind, den sprachlich wichtigsten, aber auch den weitaus schwierigsten teil des ganzen Avesta, ja man kann sagen, ohne dass man fürchten muss der übertreibung geziehen zu werden, sie bilden den schwierigsten teil der ganzen indogermanischen philologie.' Altiranisches Verbum; von C. Bartholomae; Einleitung, s. 3.

The keen observer will at once see that a department of science so circumstanced may cause especial embarrassment. On the one hand, it is exposed to the impositions of dilettanti, and the hard working specialist must be content to see those who have advanced with studies one half, or less than one half completed, consulted as masters by a public which is only ignorant as regards the innermost laws of the science; and, on the other hand, the deficiencies of even the most laborious of specialists must leave chasms of imperfection out of which the war of the methods must continually re-arise. In handling the Gâthas especially, I have resorted to the plan of giving a translation which is inclusively literal¹, but filled out and rounded as to form by the free use of additions. As the serious student should read with a strong negative criticism, he may notice that I strive occasionally after a more pleasing effect; but, as we lose the metrical flow of the original entirely, such an effort to put the rendering somewhat on a level with the original in this respect, becomes a real necessity. I have, however, in order to guard against misleading the reader, generally, but not always, indicated the added words by parenthetical curves. That these will be considered unsightly and awkward, I am well aware. I consider them such myself, but I have not felt at liberty to refrain from using them. As the Gâthas are disputed word for word, I could not venture to resort to free omissions; and what a translation would be without either additions or omissions, may be seen from the occasional word for word renderings given. Beyond the Gāthas, I have omitted the curves oftener. I have in the Gāthas, as elsewhere, also endeavoured to impart a rhythmical character to the translation, for the reason above given, and foreign readers should especially note the fact, as well as my effort to preserve the colour of original expressions, otherwise they will inevitably inquire why I do not spare words. To preserve the colour and warmth, and at the same time to include a literal rendering, it is impossible to spare words and syllables, and it is unwise to attempt it. Non-specialists may dislike the frequency of alternative renderings as leaving the impression of indecision, while, at the same time, a decision is always expressed by the adoption of a preferred rendering. The alternatives were added with the object of showing how nearly balanced probabilities may be, and also how unimportant to the general sense the questions among specialists often are.

¹ That is approximately so; absolute literalness, even when treated as I propose, would be unmanageably awkward. In another work, I give a word for word rendering of the Gâthas.

In transliterating, I have followed the plan used in the preceding volumes to avoid confusion, but since the first volume was published, great progress has been made in this particular, and in a separate work I should have adopted a different arrangement¹. As to other unimportant variations from the preceding volumes in matters of usage and fashion, I trust that no one will dwell on them for a moment². As regards the usual and inevitable differences of opinion on more serious questions, see the remarks in the Introduction³. I would also state that I have often avoided rendering identical passages in identical language, as irksome both to reader and writer. I have also not invariably cited the obviously preferable variations of text which have been adopted, and which are so familiar to the eye in Westergaard, Spiegel, and Geldner. The texts of Westergaard have been followed necessarily as to extent of matter, as this work is printed before the completion of Geldner's text. The oft-recurring formulas and prayers at the ends of chapters and sections have been left unrendered, and finally for the most part unnoticed, by striking out the useless notes. Citations of the Pahlavi and Sanskrit translations have been given occasionally in full, in order to meet the extraordinary statements which sometimes appear to the effect that they have not been vital to the interpretation of the Gâthas. But by giving these extracts and by frequently citing the Pahlavi, Neryosangh, and the Persian, I have perhaps exposed myself to the misconception that I am an extreme advocate of the so-called tradition¹, whereas all conscientious critics will acknowledge that I follow the indications of these works with more reserve than any writer who professes to have studied them; in fact I may well apprehend censure from 'traditionalists' in this particular. These Asiatic renderings are cited by me the more fully when those who neglect them agree with their indications; and they are therefore cited to show that, whereas those most opposed to them are nevertheless forgetfully indebted to them in nearly every line, therefore in all cases of great difficulty they should be studied as an absolute necessity before rash conjectures are adopted. For it is exactly where we are all most in doubt, that their indications become of most worth, when rationally considered. These translations should be examined for the relics of the truth, the hints, and traces of original explanations, which may most abound where they are themselves most faulty as translations. I therefore never search them for exact reproductions. But the citations which I give here constitute only a very small fraction of those needed. An argument should be built up on the fullest statements of the circumstances, elucidated with scientific completeness. This alone would have any prospect of obliging investigators to acknowledge the truth; for not only inertia and prejudice are arrayed on the other side, but even interest. This much is said of the Pahlavi translations; for Ner. is properly cited only as a translation of a translation, and, as such, of the highest authority¹; so of the Persian.

¹ Chiefly as to 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12; but I write 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12.

² As in Āramaiti, Vohu Manah, &c. I also write Neryosangh, and in a few places Gātha(ā), Ahunavaiti(ī), &c. I regret not to have written Mazdāh everywhere.

³ Where I differ from Professor Darmesteter, I desire to be considered as merely proposing alternative renderings. I have therefore omitted a mass of references to the previous volumes as unnecessary.

¹ The relics of a 'tradition' direct from the fountain-head are present in the Asiatic commentaries, and also the relics of a tradition from later, and, as it were, modern scholarship; and, lastly, there are also present the direct results of an ancient scholarship; but to speak of the Pahlavi translations as 'tradition,' is merely to use a convenient phrase. I know of no scholar who supposes these commentaries to be in a simple sense 'tradition' from the earliest Zend writers.

Zendists will observe that I by no means abandon explanations merely because they are old, a practice which seems almost the fashion. I, however, fully approve of testing and assailing again and again all suggestions whether old or new. I would simply assert that, while the tasks before us remain still so very extensive, it would be better for scholars to exercise their sagacity upon passages which call loudly for wise conjecture, leaving those which are clear as they stand, for later assaults. It will be seen that I myself by no means approve of refraining from conjecture², but I would only in all humility insist that we should not abandon ourselves to unprepared conjecture. As is known³, I have attempted the present rendering after more than ten years of close labour, and after a full translation of the Pahlavi and Sanskrit translations, together with an edition of the Zend, Pahlavi, Sanskrit, and Persian texts of the Gâthas. It is proper to add that for the purpose of keeping the judgment free from prejudice, and open to honest conviction from the influence of the Rîg-veda, I have followed the practice for a number of years of transcribing the Hymns of the Veda into English in word for word written studies, having already so treated by far the greater part of them; some of these are in curtailed statement, others needlessly full. I have also, on the other hand, turned a large portion of the Gâthas into Vedic Sanskrit. (This, however, is practically a universal custom, as all words are compared with the Vedic, so far as analogies exist between the Gâthas and the Rîks.) If therefore the opposed schools regard me as erring in too implicit a reliance on the hints of the Asiatics on the one side, or in too decided a tendency to read the Gâthic as Vedic on the other, they may be assured that I have not erred from interest or prejudice. That my results will please both parties it is folly to expect, in fact perfection in the rendering of the Gâthas (as of some other ancient works) is for ever unattainable, and not to be looked for; moreover, it would not be recognised, if attained; for no writer, whosoever he may be, can produce a rendering of the Gâthas without meeting the assaults of ignorance or design. However imperfect my results may be supposed to be, it is to be hoped that they will contribute some little toward establishing a convention among scholars as to what the Gâthic and Zend writings mean; meanwhile it is confidently expected that they will fulfil the requirements of the science of comparative theology. Whatever may be the ultimate truth as to questions of close detail, the Yasna, as well as the rest of the Avesta, is clear as to its creed.

¹ It is to be hoped that our occupations are sufficiently serious to allow us to pass over the imperfections of Neryosangh's Sanskrit style. He was especially cramped in his mode of expressing himself by a supposed necessity to attempt to follow his original (which was not the Gāthic but the Pahlavi) word for word. His services were most eminently scholarly, and, considering his disadvantages, some of the greatest which have been rendered. Prof. R. v. Roth and Dr. Aurel Stein have kindly transcribed for me valuable variations.

² It will be regarded, however, as especially desirable that, in a report from a specialist to the learned public in general, the texts should on no account be violated by conjectural improvements where they are at all translatable; alternatives are therefore added. As has been remarked by a recent reviewer on the new version of the Scriptures, there is scarcely a line of very ancient writings which scholars are not tempted to amend; but such emendations are seldom agreed to among specialists. A first translation should always be attempted with the texts as they stand.

³ See the Athenæum, April 12, 1884; and the Academy, Sept. 13, 1884. On the entire subject in its connection with the Gnostic and modern philosophies, my special labours have included a much longer period of time than that mentioned.

My list of obligations is a long one, in fact so long that I fear I can express but little compliment in naming advisers, as I have made it a practice to consult all available persons, as well as books. Making one exception, I will therefore reserve to myself the pleasure of recalling them to a future occasion.

It is sufficient to say here that while I follow a new departure in the treatment of the Asiatic commentaries, yet the most prominent writers of the opposing schools have courteously favoured me with their advice. Availing myself of the exception named, I would take the liberty to express my gratitude, here especially, to Dr. E. W. West, our first authority on Pahlavi, for placing at my disposal various readings of the Pahlavi text of the Yasna, of which we have hitherto only possessed a single MS. in the Pahlavi character, that contained in the oldest Zend writing, the Codex numbered five, in the Library of Copenhagen. The variations referred to were transcribed by Dr. West from the venerable MS., the hereditary property of Dastur Dr. Gâmâspgi Minozihargi Asana of Bombay, and written only nineteen (or twenty-two) days later than that numbered five in the Library of Copenhagen. By this generous loan I have been enabled to print elsewhere the first text of the Pahlavi of the Gâthas yet edited with comparison of MSS., likewise also for the first time translated, in its entirety, into a European language. For this Dr. West, during an extended correspondence, has furnished me with information on the Pahlavi not obtainable elsewhere, together with corrections and revisions. There is another eminent friend whose sacrifices of time and labour on my behalf have been exceptional, but I will defer the mention of Zend scholars.

I take this opportunity to express my acknowledgments to Professor Dr. von Halm of the Hof- und Staatsbibliothek, in Munich, for allowing me the free use of Codex 12^b, of Haug's Collection, both at Stuttgart and Hanover; also to Professor Dr. Wilmanns of Göttingen; Geheimrath Dr. Förstemann of Leipsic; and Herr Rath Bodemann of Hanover, for the loan of a large number of valuable works from their respective public libraries, often, with great liberality, renewed.

L. H. MILLS.

HANOVER, February, 1886.

INTRODUCTION.

MANY readers, for whom the Zend-Avesta possesses only collateral interest, may not understand why any introductory remarks are called for to those portions of it which are treated in this volume. The extent of the matter does not appear at first sight a sufficient reason for adding a word to the masterly work which introduces the first two volumes, and, in fact, save as regards questions which bear upon the Gâthas, I avoid for the most part, for the present, all discussion of details which chiefly concern either the sections treated in the first two volumes, or the extended parts of the later Avesta treated here. But the Gâthas are of such a nature, and differ so widely from other parts of the Avesta, that some words of separate discussion seem quite indispensable, and such a discussion was recommended by the author of the other volumes. A second reason why a word of introduction is necessary, when the translation of the successive parts of the Avesta passes from one hand to another, is a reason which bears upon the subject with exceptional force.

It is this: the Avesta, while clearly made out, so far as the requirements of comparative theology are concerned, yet presents difficulties as to minute detail so great, that as yet no two independent scholars can entirely agree as to their solution. Master and pupil, friend and friend, must differ, and sometimes on questions of no trivial moment.

The preliminary studies requisite to the formation of ultimate opinions are so varied, and of such a nature, involving the rendering of matter as yet totally unrendered with any scientific exactness in either India or Europe, that no person can claim to have satisfied himself in these respects. Scholars are therefore obliged to advance biassed by the fact that they are preponderatingly Iranists, or preponder-atingly Vedists, and therefore certain at the outset that they must differ to a certain degree from each other, and to a certain degree also from the truth. It was also, as might well be understood without statement, with a full knowledge of the fact that I was inclined to allow especial weight to a comparison with the Veda, and that I modified the evidence of tradition somewhat more than he did, that Professor Darmesteter urged me to accept this task. But while I am constrained to say something by way of a preparatory treatise here, a sense of the fitness of things induces me to be as brief as possible, and I must therefore ask indulgence of the reader if my mode of expressing myself seems either rough or abrupt.

As to what the Gâthas are in their detail, enough has been said in the summaries and notes. From those representations, necessarily somewhat scattered, it appears that they ✓ comprise seventeen sections of poetical matter, equal in extent to about twenty-five to thirty hymns of the Rig-veda, composed in ancient Aryan metres, ascribing supreme (beneficent) power to the Deity Ahura Mazda, who is yet opposed co-ordinately by an evil Deity called Aka Manah, or Angra Mainyu. In all respects, save in the one particular that He is not the Creator of this evil Deity, and does not possess the power to destroy him or his realm, this Ahura Mazda is one of the purest conceptions which had yet been produced. He has six personified attributes (so one might state it), later, but not in the Gâthas, described as Archangels, while in the Gâthas they are at once the abstract attributes of God, > or of God's faithful adherents upon earth, and at the same time conceived of as persons, all efforts to separate the instances in which they are spoken of as the mere dispositions of the divine or saintly mind, and those in which they are spoken of as personal beings, having been in vain.

We have therefore a profound scheme, perhaps not consciously invented, but being a growth through centuries; and this system is the unity of God in His faithful creatures. It is not a polytheism properly so-called, as Ahura forms with his Immortals a Heptade, reminding one of the Sabellian Trinity. It is not a Pantheism, for it is especially arrested by the domain of the evil Deity. It might be called, if we stretch the indications, a Hagio-theism, a delineation of God in the holy creation. Outside of the Heptade is Sraosha, the personified Obedience (and possibly Vayu, as once mentioned); and, as the emblem of the pious, is the Kine's soul, while the Fire is a poetically personified symbol of the divine purity and power. As opposed to the good God, we have the Evil Mind, or the Angry (?) Spirit, not yet provided with full personified attributes to correspond to the Bountiful Immortals. He has, however, a servant, Aêshma, the impersonation of invasion and rapine, the chief scourge of the Zarathustrians; and an evil angel, the Drug, personified deceit, while the Daêvas (Devas) of their more southern neighbours (some of whose tribes had remained, as servile castes, among the Zarathustrians) constitute perhaps the general representatives of Aka Manah, Aêshma, the Drug, &c. The two original spirits unite in the creation of the good and evil in existence both actually in the present, and in principles which have their issue in the future in rewards and punishments. The importance of this creed, so far stated, as the dualistical creation, and, as an attempted solution, of the hardest problem of speculation, should be obvious to every enlightened eye. If there existed a supreme God whose power could undo the very laws of life, no evil could have been known; but the doctrine denies that there is any such being. The good and the evil in existence limit each other. There can be no happiness undefined by sorrow, and no goodness which does not resist sin. Accordingly the evil principle is recognised as so necessary that it is represented by an evil God. His very name, however, is a thought, or a passion; while the good Deity is not responsible for the wickedness and grief which prevail. His power itself could not have prevented their occurrence. And He alone has an especially objective name, and one which could only be applied to a person. These suggestions, whether true or false, are certainly some of the most serious that have ever been made¹, and we find them originally here.

¹ Haug long since called attention to the likeness of Hegelianism to the

As to the nature of religious rewards and punishments, we have suggestions scarcely less important in the eye of scientific theology, and, as a matter of fact, very much more extensively spread. To say that the future rewards held out in the Gâthas were largely, if not chiefly, spiritual, and in the man himself, would be almost a slur upon the truth. The truth is, that the mental heaven and hell with which we are now familiar as the only future states recognised by intelligent people, and thoughts which, in spite of their familiarity, can never lose their importance, are not only used and expressed in the Gâthas, but expressed there, so far as we are aware, for the first time. While mankind were delivered up to the childish terrors of a future replete with horrors visited upon them from without, the early Iranian sage announced the eternal truth that the rewards of Heaven, and the punishments of Hell, can only be from within. He gave us, we may fairly say, through the systems which he has influenced, that great doctrine of subjective recompense, which must work an essential change in the mental habits of every one who receives it. After the creation of souls, and the establishment of the laws which should govern them, Âramaiti gives a body, and men and angels begin their careers. A Mâthra is inspired for the guidance of the well-disposed. The faithful learn the vows of the holy system under the teaching of the Immortals, while the infidel and reprobate portion of mankind accept the seductions of the Worst Mind, and unite with the Daêvas in the capital sin of warfare from wanton cruelty, or for dishonest acquisition. The consequence of this latter alliance is soon apparent. The Kine, as the representative of the holy people, laments under the miseries which make Iranian life a load. The efforts to draw a livelihood from honest labour are opposed, but not frustrated, by the Daêva-worshipping tribes who still struggle with the Zarathustrians for the control of the territory. The Kine therefore lifts chief ideas in the Zarathustrian philosophy as centring in its dualism. And I think that it is quite evident, and I believe conceded by experts, that the Hegelian sublated dualism is a descendant from the Zarathustrian through the Gnostics and Jacob Boehme.

her wail to Ahura, and His Righteous Order, Asha, who respond by the appointment of Zarathustra, as the individual entrusted with her redemption; and he, accepting his commission, begins his prophetic labours. From this on we have a series of lamentations, prayers, praises, and exhortations, addressed by Zarathustra and his immediate associates to Ahura and the people, which delineate the public and personal sorrows in detail, utter individual supplications and thanksgivings, and exhort the masses assembled in special or periodical meetings.

Here, it must be noted, that the population among whom these hymns were composed were chiefly agriculturists and herdsmen. Circumstances which affected their interests as such were of course paramount with them, and as their land and cattle represented their most valuable property, whatever threatened them was the most of all things to be dreaded. Accordingly rapine, and the raid, whether coming from Turanians or Daêva-worshippers, were regarded as the most terrible of visitations. But their moral earnestness in their determination to avoid rapine on their part, even when tempted by a desire for retaliation, is especially to be noted¹. It was as awful when regarded as a sin as it was when suffered as an affliction; and their animus in this particular was most exceptional. While the above facts explain to us, on the one hand, the principal deities, and the peculiar hopes and fears which inspired their worship, they lead us also, on the other hand, to wonder the more that so subtle a theology as we have found expressed in the documents, should have arisen amid so simple a community.

In the course of the recitations we have also special intimations of an organised struggle of the Daêva-party to overwhelm the Zarathustrians. At times they seem very nearly to have accomplished their object. A distinct reference to a battle in the lines occurs, while sanguinary violence is alluded to more than once as in the line, or in skirmish. We conclude from the prevalence of a thankful tone that the Zarathustrians gained the upper hand during the Gâthic period, but although the result may have been assured, the struggle at the time of the last Gâtha was by no means over. In the latest Gâtha, as in the earliest, we have signs of fierce and bloody conflict. The same type of existence prevailed greatly later, in the time of the Yasts, but the scene seems very different, and Zarathustra's human characteristics are wholly lost in the mythical attributes with which time and superstition had abundantly provided him. By way, then, of summarising the chief characteristics of his original system, we may say that he and his companions were struggling to establish a kingdom under the Sovereign Power of God, whose first care was to relieve suffering, and shelter the honest and industrious poor¹. This kingdom was to be conducted according to His holy Order, or plan of salvation, to be permeated by living Piety, and with the ultimate object of bestowing both Weal and Immortality. This high ideal was also not left as an abstract principle to work its way. Society was far too rudimental, then as ever, for the efficient survival of unsupported principles. A compact hierarchical system seems to have existed, the sacramental object being the fire, before which a priesthood officiated with unwavering zeal; but the traces of this are very restricted in the Gâthas, and, according to all probability, it was greatly less elaborated at their period than later.

¹ They pray against Aêshma without qualification. They might practise desolating havoc in time of war; but the raid, as in times of nominal peace, seems to have been foreign to them.

Such, in very brief outline, is the system which meets us as Zarathustrianism in that period of Mazda-worship when Zarathustra lived and composed the Gâthic hymns.

As to the further question, 'Who was Zarathustra, and when and where did he live?' diversity of opinion still prevails, so much so that as regards it I differ slightly even from my eminent friend and predecessor. As such differences on the subject of the Avesta are however matters of course, I freely state my impressions. Who was then the person, if any person, corresponding to the name Zarathustra in the Gâthas? Did he exist, and was he really the author of these ancient hymns? That he existed as an historical person I have already affirmed; and as to the hymns ascribed to him and his immediate associates, I have also no hesitation. Parts of these productions may have been interpolated, but the Gâthas, as a whole, show great unity, and the interpolations are made in the spirit of the original. And that Zarathustra was the name of the individual in which this unity centres, we have no sufficient reason to dispute. The name is mentioned in the most sacred connections, as well as in those which depict the reality of the prophet's sufferings; and there is no reason at all why it should have come down endeared to humanity, unless it belonged to one, who, in the presence of a Sovereign and a kingdom, could impress his personality with greatly more defined distinctness upon his contemporaries than either that Sovereign or any of his adherents¹. That any forgery is present in the Gâthas, any desire to palm off doctrines upon the sacred community in the name of the great prophet, as in the Vendîdâd and later Yasna, is quite out of the question. The Gâthas are genuine in their mass, as I believe no scholar anywhere now questions.

¹ The practical operation of this prime principle seems to have been at times beneficial to a remarkable, if not unparalleled, extent. Under the Sasanids the lower classes enjoyed great protection. See the remarks of Professor Rawlinson, The Seventh Oriental Monarchy, page 440 ff. Also recall the extraordinary treatment of the poor during the drought and famine under Perozes. The account is, however, exaggerated. See Tabari II, p. 130, cited by Professor Rawlinson, p. 314.

For the characteristics of this great teacher, I refer to the hymns themselves, which stand alone, of their kind, in literature. Nowhere, at their period, had there been a human voice, so far as we have any evidence, which uttered thoughts like these. They are now, some of them, the great commonplaces of philosophical religion; but till then they were unheard (agustâ).

And yet we must say of Zarathustra, as of all our first announcers, that while he antedates all whose records have come down to us, he was probably only the last visible link in a far extended chain. His system, like those of his predecessors and successors, was a growth. His main conceptions had been surmised, although not spoken before. His world was ripe for them, and when he appeared, he had only to utter and develop them. I would not call him a reformer; he does not repudiate his predecessors. The old Aryan Gods retire before the spiritual Ahura; but I do not think that he especially intended to discredit them. One of the inferior ones is mentioned for a moment, but the great Benevolence, Order, and Power, together with their results in the human subject, Ahura's Piety incarnate in men, and their Weal and Immortality as a consequence, crowd out all other thoughts. His mental insight is as evident from his system as his deep moral inspiration. As to his secondary characteristics, his manner of thought and expression, we find them peculiar to the last degree. He has given us writings in which every syllable seems loaded with thought, sometimes much repeated, and to us of the present day, very familiar; but then, when he wrote, one would suppose that he intended to 'utter his dark speech.' Succinctness is carried to an unexampled extreme¹, while the wonderful idea that God's attributes are His messengers sent out into the human soul to ennoble and redeem, makes him at times so subtle that the latest scholars cannot tell whether he means Asha and Vohu Manah personified as Archangels, or as the thoughts and beneficent intentions of the Deity reproduced in men. I can recall no passage whatsoever in which Vohu Manah, Asha, Khshathra, &c., are not strongly felt to mean exactly what they signify as words, while at the same time they are prayed to, and besought to come, as Gods or angels. Either the personification is purely poetical, which would make it, as found in the Gâthas, considering their age and place, a very remarkable phenomenon, or else, having dogmatically personified the divine attributes, Zarathustra never forgets to express a respect which is higher than 'a respect for persons,' that is, a respect for the principles which they represent. In making every laudatory statement, however, I take for granted, what I fear is nevertheless far from uniformly granted, and that is, that the reader will weigh well what makes all the difference, namely, the very remote period at which we are obliged to place the Gáthas, and the comparatively rude civilisation amid which we must suppose them to have been composed. We must set the ideas which lie before us in this framework of time and place. If we fail to do so, as a matter of course the thoughts and their expression will contain for us nothing whatever new; but as viewed in the light of relation, after long weighing the matter, I cannot refer to them in any other terms than those which I use, without becoming aware that I am recoiling through fear of exaggeration from stating what I believe to be the truth.

¹ See especially the remarks preceding Y. I.

¹ I regard it as most unfortunate that Zendists should search for easy and natural expression in the Gâthas, and the expression of commonplace detail. It is only in passionate utterance that their style becomes simple.

As to the personal sentiment of Zarathustra, we can only say that it was devoted. His word zarazdáiti gives the keynote to his purposes. We are certain that he was a man of courage; but that he was not scrupulous at shedding blood is also evident. He was not reticent under misfortune, while yet endowed with rare persistence to overcome it.

His sphere was not restricted. The objects which concern him are provinces as well as villages, armies as well as individuals. His circle was the reigning prince and prominent chieftains, a few gifted men deeply imbued with religious veneration for the sacred compositions which had come down to them from primeval antiquity in ancient metres; and these, together with a priesthood exceptionally pure, leading on a sobered population, were also his public. But three orders appear in it, the king, the people, and the peers. That the times were disturbed is involved in what has already been said. One feature alone needs mention, it is that the agitations involved the tenure of the throne. Vistáspa had no easy seat, and the prospect of revolution in the sense of supersedure was continually before him. As to the family life of Zarathustra, we can only say that he commanded respect; nothing whatever is further known.

It will be seen from the above sketch that I make the widest distinction between the Gáthic period and that of the later Avesta. I do so, not influenced very greatly by the fact that the Gâthas are cited in the later Avesta. Most of these citations are indeed genuine and valid as proofs of priority, while others are mere displacements of the Gâthas made for liturgical purposes, as Genesis is read in churches sometimes after portions of later matter. But a book may be cited by another when it is merely prior to it, and not much older. Nor do I lay too much stress upon the difference between the Gâthic dialect and the so-called Zend; but I do lay very great stress upon the totally dissimilar atmospheres of the two portions. In the Gâthas all is sober and real. The Kine's soul is indeed poetically described as wailing aloud, and the Deity with His Immortals is reported as speaking, hearing, and seeing; but with these rhetorical exceptions, everything which occupies the attention is practical in the extreme. Grehma and Bendva, the Karpans, the Kavis, and the Usigs(-ks), are no mythical monsters. No dragon threatens the settlements, and no fabulous beings defend them. Zarathustra, Gâmâspa, Frashaostra, and Maidhyômâh; the Spitâmas, Hvôgvas, the Haêkataspas, are as real, and are alluded to with a simplicity as unconscious, as any characters in history. Except inspiration, there are also no miracles. All the action is made up of the exertions and passions of living and suffering men. Let the Zendist study the Gâthas well, and then let him turn to the Yasts or the Vendîdâd; he will go from the land of reality to the land of fable. He leaves in the one a toiling prophet, to meet in the other a phantastic demi-god. However ancient the fundamental ideas in the myths of the Yasts and Vendîdâd may be (and some of them were certainly older than the Gâthas or the oldest Rîks) in the forms in which they now stand, they are greatly later.

As we enter into further and necessary detail, this seems to be the place for a word as to the relative ages of the several sections which make up these hymns. We see struggle and suffering, fear and anger in some of them, and we naturally group these together as having been composed at a particular stage in Zarathustra's career. We read expressions of happy confidence, and we refer them to a period of repose, as we do those sections where meditation, speculation, or dogmatic statement, are prominent; but nothing is certain except that Y. LIII must have been written after Zarathustra had attained to a sufficient age to have a marriageable daughter. An ancient leader may have reached a position of influence from doctrinal productions, and afterwards expressed the vicissitudes of an active political career. One circumstance must, however, be held in view; and that is, that neither the Gâthas, nor any other ancient pieces, which were hardly at first committed to writing, have been preserved in the form in which they were delivered for the first time. The poet himself would file them into better (?) order at each subsequent delivery, and verses which referred originally to one period of time would, if especially striking, be reproduced in subsequent effusions. And pieces which the composer may have left in one shape, his early successors would be likely to modify by interpolations, excerpitions, or inversions. I believe that the Gâthas show the presence of less foreign matter than is usual, and that the interpolations which are present in them, are themselves of great antiquity, or even practically synchronous with the original. Certainly few of them show anything like an ingenious attempt at imitation. If there exist any interpolations, and we may say à priori that all existing compositions of their antiquity are, and must have been, interpolated, the additions were the work of the author's earliest disciples who composed fully in his spirit, while the position of sections in this or that Gâtha has little or nothing to do with the question of their relative age, the metres being all ancient, and the Ustavaiti, Spenta-mainyu, &c., showing as decided evidence of originality as any parts of the Ahunavaiti. (See remarks on the Gâtha Ustavaiti, p. 91 ff.)

As we proceed from the question of the relative age of the particular sections as compared with each other to that of their age considered as a whole, we are first met by the question as to place. Were the Gâthas first sung in the East or the West of Iran? I would here say that I regard this point as especially open, as I am even inclined to differ in one particular from my eminent friend

Professor Darmesteter, but let it be understood, only or chiefly, as to the place of origin of the Gâthas. I think that the scene of the Gâthic and original Zarathustrianism was the North-east of Iran, and that the later Avesta was composed during the hundreds of years during which the Zarathustrian tribes were migrating westward in Media.

One certain fact is the occurrence of geographical names in Vendidad I, which are obviously intended to describe the earliest homes of the Iranian races whose lore was the Avesta. The present forms of those names, as they appear in the Avesta, are indeed not the most ancient, but they occur in passages which plainly repeat very ancient myths. These names describe a region from the middle of the North of Iran to the East of it, including ancient Bactria, but extending as far West as Ragha ; and, as the Gâthas are unanimously acknowledged to be the oldest portion of the Avesta, dealing as they do with Zarathustra as an historical person, we naturally look for the scene of his life in the oldest seats. The Zarathustrian Ragha, much further West than the other places mentioned, seems to have a special claim to be regarded as his birthplace, as it possesses so firm a hold upon his name, but the epithet Zarathustrian, together with the special eminence of the governor of Ragha as needing no 'Zarathustra' over him, that is, no imperial chief (see Y. XIX, 19), may both be attributed to successors of Zarathustra. From some reason, probably the migration of Zarathustrian influence toward the West, Ragha became a stronghold of his descendants ; or his name, entirely apart from all family connection, may have become a title for leading politico-ecclesiastical officials (compare the Zarathustrôtema). There is no mention of a foreign origin of Zarathustra in the Gâthas, nor is there any expression from which we might infer it. His family seems as settled as himself. The Spitâmas are mentioned with the same familiarity as the Hvôgvas, and the persons named are, some of them, related to him. He was no isolated figure among the people whom he influenced. Unless then we can place Vîstâspa and Gâmâspa, Frashaostra, and Maidhyômâh, in Ragha, we cannot well place Zarathustra there, for he is to be placed beside them. Tradition of a late and dubious character places Vîstâspa in Bactria; but it is better to leave the exact region undecided, as certainty can never be reached.

The other circumstances which are imperative with many for a decision for the East as the region where Zarathustra laboured, have been stated with perhaps the greatest power and beauty by Darmesteter¹, who still inclines to the West. These are the strong analogies existing between the Zend language and the Vedic Sanskrit on the one side, and between the gods, heroes, and myths of the Avesta, and those of Veda, on the other.

As bearing, however, in favour of a western origin of the Gâthîc, as well as of the later Avesta, we must confess that the West Iranian of the Cuneiform Inscriptions possesses the same analogies with the Vedic which the language of the Avesta possesses with it; and no reader should need to be reminded that the West Iranian as well as the East Iranian was in no sense derived from the Vedic. The old Aryan from which all descended was once spread without distinction over both West and East, while, on the other hand, the mythological features of the Avesta, kindred as they are to those of the Eastern Veda, are yet reproduced for us, some of them, in the poetry of the mediæval West as drawn from the Avesta; and the name of Mazda, unknown (?) to the *Rîks*², appears cut in the rocks of Persepolis and Behistun, while all the sacred books of the Zarthustrians, including the Gâthas as well as the later Avesta, together with their interpretations, have come down to us from the West, where the Greeks also found their system from the time of Herodotus down.

Added to which we must acknowledge that the differences in dialect between the Avesta and Veda make a wide separation as to place far from startling, while myths as well as religions migrate as by a law.

We must therefore consider well before we venture to differ from those who decide for the West as the scene of Zarathustra's life.

¹ See the Introduction to the first two volumes, and also Ormuzd and Ahriman.

² But cp. Rv. VIII, 20, 17, divô—ásurasya vedhásaś (medhasaś (?)).

But as we mention the Inscriptions, we must make a very careful distinction. Is their theology that of Zarathustra? If it is, this would certainly constitute a point in conjunction with the descriptions of the Greeks, in favour of a still more extensive prevalence of Zarathustrianism in the West at the dates which the Inscriptions cover.

As to this disputed point, I would answer that their theology may be the Zarathustrian in a sense as yet too little applied to the term, for it may be Gâthic Zarathustrianism, or at least a Mazda-worship at a stage of development corresponding to the stage of Mazda-worship in which it stood when Zarathustra left it; but that it was the later and fully developed Zarathustrianism, provided with all the regulations of the Vendidad, seems out of the question.

In the first place there is no certain mention of Angra Mainyu, or of the Amesha Spenta, in the Inscriptions; and this silence must be accounted for¹ in any case².

The ready and just suggestion is made that the documents are exceedingly limited; that many deities would not be named on so narrow a space, while the statements of Herodotus and his successors make it probable that the entire system of Zarathustra was known in the near neighbourhood, and must have been very familiar to the persons who ordered the Inscriptions to be cut. To this the necessary rejoinder might be made, that the familiarity of Darius with the later, or indeed with the original, Zarathustrianism, if he was familiar with it, renders the absence of the name of Angra Mainyu at least all the more striking.

What more imperative call could there be for the use of that name than in denouncing the opponents whose overthrow forms the theme of the mighty writings?

As the 'grace of Auramazda' is mentioned on the one side, one naturally expects to see some reference to the 'opposition' of His chief adversary on the other, and one also expects to trace some certain recognition of the Bountiful Immortals. I think that both were omitted because their names retained less weight, as we cannot suppose that they were unknown, or, if once known, then forgotten. But allowing that it is not quite fair to reason from such scanty texts, we are met by the positive fact that an important Inscription is written on a tomb¹; and, as the burial of the dead was one of the most flagrant violations of the Zarathustrian ceremonial law, it is not conceivable that Darius could have been a Zarathustrian according to the later Faith. He was either a heretical schismatic departing from a sacred precept, or he was following the creed of his fathers, a Mazda-worshipper, but not 'of Zarathustra's order,' or, if a Zarathustrian, then a partial inheritor of Zarathustra's religion at an undeveloped stage, while burial was not as yet forbidden by it; and at the same time he neglected also prominent doctrines of the Gâthas.

¹ Some relief is given by a mention of the Draogha, but the bagâhya are probably Mithra and Anâhita (see the Inscription of Artaxerxes Mnemon, 4) rather than the Amesha Spenta. As we notice the name of Mithra, however, we must remark that, as the Mithra worship undoubtedly existed previously to the Gâthic period, and fell into neglect at the Gâthic period, it might be said that the greatly later Inscriptions represent Mazda-worship as it existed among the ancestors of the Zarathustrians in a pre-Gâthic age or even Vedic age.

² Angra Mainyu and the Amesha are also prominent in the Gâthas.

It is not possible that he could have been an isolated schismatic as to such a particular. If he composed the Inscriptions as a monarch of another religion than that of the later Avesta, it would seem to prove either that he was an adherent to a cruder, or half effaced, form of Gâthic Zarathustrianism, which had found its way during the long periods of its existence westward before the later Zarathustrianism arose in the western settlements, or else that it, the religion of the Inscriptions, simply originated where we find it, from an original and wide-spread Mazda-worship which had not yet forbidden the burial of the dead².

¹ And all are the Inscriptions of buried men. See also the statements of Professor de Harlez on the subject.

² And perhaps it had also not forbidden cremation. Geiger (see 'The Civilisation of the Eastern Iranians in Ancient Times;,' English translation by Dârâb Dastur Peshotan Saâgânâ, B. A., p. 90) conjectures that the dakhma were originally places for cremation. If this is a correct surmise, both burial and cremation may have been permitted at the Gâthic period, being forbidden long after. At least the original Mazda-worship did not recoil from cremation, otherwise the story of the attempt to burn the Lydian Cræsus could not have arisen. The earlier Persians had no abhorrence of either burial or burning. Only the developed Zarathustrian Magism of the Medes obeyed the Vendîdâd.

That such a Mazda-worship once existed in primeval Iran seems certain, and that it was greatly earlier than Zarathustrianism¹. It is also very probable that some form of it survived unadulterated by Zarathustrianism. And this is as probable à priori when we reflect on what might have happened, as it is when we seek for an explanation of the burial of a Mazda-worshipper in a tomb.

As the Asura (Ahura) worship extended into India with the Indians as they migrated from Iran, a form of Asura worship arose in Iran which added the name of Mazda to the original term for God. In the East it began to acquire additional peculiarities out of which, when Zarathustra arose, he developed his original system, while in other parts of Iran, and with great probability in Persia, it retained its original simplicity. At subsequent periods only, the Zarathustrian form spread, first at the Gāthic stage, and later a second time, and from a centre further West, as the Zarathustrianism of the later Avesta which is reported by the Greeks. Either then Darius was a Mazda-worshipper, like his fathers, following an original and independent type of Mazda-worship, or he was following a mutilated Gāthic Zarathustrianism, which may not yet have forbidden burial², he and his chieftains adhering to this ancient form, while the masses yielded to the novelties, as the patrician Jews held to Sadduceeism after the masses had become Pharisees, and as the patrician Romans clung to Paganism after Rome had become Catholic. In either case it seems to me that the Mazda-worship of the Inscriptions might be severed from the later Zarathustrianism; and that it must be so severed on some theory or other, all with one voice seem to agree.

In deciding for the North-east³ as the scene of Zarathustra's personal labours, and for the Gāthic dialect as its more particular form of speech, I am not, I trust, solely or unduly influenced by the occurrence of the eastern names in the first chapter of the Vendîdâd, for those names may indicate primeval homes from which the ancestors of Zarathustra migrated toward the west centuries before his appearance. I merely say that the occurrence of the names shows that the ancestors of the Zarathustrian Mazda-worshippers once lived in East Iran; and if that is the case, their descendants may have still lived there when Zarathustra developed his system, and it is also possible that masses of Zarathustrians may long have remained behind in the East Iranian mountains after the Zarathustrians of the later Avesta had gone west. The descendant may have arisen in the home of his ancestors, and in fact, other things being equal, there is a stronger probability that he arose there. I do not think that the appearance of a later Zarathustrianism in the west, is a sufficient reason for doubting that the founder of the system laboured nearer the land of the Vedas, where a Vistâspa once ruled (?), where a Daêva-worship long lingered, and where the common names of the Irano-indian gods were heard as household words, and which, we may add, was precisely the place where we should suppose the Indo-aryans to have left the Irano-aryans, as they descended into the Puñgâb.

¹ Compare even the Scythic name Thamimasadas, cited by Professor Rawlinson (Herod. 3rd edit. iii, p. 195). Were branches of the Scyths themselves in a sense Mazda-worshippers, or could the name have been borrowed?

² And which insisted less upon the personality of Satan.

³ The name Bactrian cannot be considered as more than a convenient expression.

Having formed an opinion as to the place where Zarathustra laboured, and proceeding to the question as to when he lived and wrote the Gâthas, we find ourselves under the necessity to form our estimate first as to the age of the later parts of the Avesta. While interpolated passages, or indeed whole Yasts, may be very late, I cannot place the later Avesta in its bulk later than the Cuneiform Inscriptions of Darius, for the fact that the Inscriptions preserve either a pre-Zarathustrian Mazdaism, or the Zarathustrianism of the Gâthas long previous as it was in its origin to that of the Vendîdâd, has nothing whatever to do with the relative age of the Inscriptions themselves. The later Avesta, with its forbiddal of burial and cremation, must have existed for a long time side by side with that religion which has left sepulchral monuments, and whose adherents could contemplate the burning of captives; and analogous facts are universal.

But aside from the seeming difference in the type of Mazda-worship, which simply severs the religion of the Inscriptions from that of the more developed Zarathustrianism, and which has, as we have seen, nothing whatever to do with the question of the relative ages of the Inscriptions and the later Avesta, I think that we have some signs of a later age in the language of the Inscriptions apart from their contents. As, however, Darmesteter is inclined to regard the West Iranian, or Cuneiform, as better preserved than the Zend of the later Avesta, I make my few remarks only with great hesitation.

The termination 𐬨𐬀𐬨𐬀, which would otherwise be justly considered as an evidence of degeneration in the Zend, I regard as merely a wrong writing for -ahya = Gāthic ahyā. The letter 𐬨 is a relic of the time when the Avesta stood in the Pahlavi character; I think that it is here merely a lengthened 𐬨 = ya¹. Terminations also seem much mutilated in the Cuneiform, and the name Auramazda written as one word, does not seem to me so original.

We must indeed remember that a later generation, owing to an isolated position, often preserves an older dialect, as it may an older form of religion, whereas an earlier generation, if its predecessors have lived in a compact society in smaller districts, varies the ancient forms, as the old Indian developed into Sanskrit and Prākrit. Still we have little reason to be certain that the civilisation of Media and ¹ Also 𐬨𐬀 is simply ayam, and should be so transliterated; so also in a throng of other words. Salemann has noticed the origin of 𐬨 = ê, but gives no other indication in the present sense. I think that 𐬨 and also 𐬨𐬀, where they equal Aryan ya, should be corrected everywhere, like all other instances of miswriting. Unless indeed we can regard the 𐬨, for which 𐬨𐬀 were often clearly miswritten, as itself of double significance, as in Pahlavi. 𐬨 might then regularly and properly equal both ê and ya; so 𐬨𐬀 may equal long ê or yâ (ayâ). Other instances of miswriting in Zend would be dat. dual -bya. The Aryan -âm was first written as the nasal vowel -â, and still further carelessly reduced to -a, but never so spoken. On the contrary, in the acc. fem. &c., the nasalisation was over-written, too much expressed. The final nasal caused the scribes to write the preceding letter as if nasalised, 'â,' but it was never nasalised in speech.

Persia was either more or less condensed and social than that of Bactria and the East. But beside a priority to the Inscriptions, we are obliged to consider the time needed for developments. The Greeks of the time of Herodotus probably, and those later certainly, found a form of Zarathustrianism in full development in Media; but if the contemporaries of Herodotus heard familiarly of a Zarathustrianism there, a long period of time must be allowed for its development if it originated in Media, and a still longer period if it found its way there from the East. If, then, the bulk of the later Avesta existed at the time of Herodotus and at that of Darius, how long previously must it have been composed; for such systems do not bloom in a day?

We have the evidence of historical tradition that the Magi¹ were influential even at the time of Cyrus, not dwelling upon the possibility of their existence at the earliest mention of Medes as the conquerors and rulers of Babylon.

Can we then, considering the recognised stagnation of ancient Eastern intelligence, ascribe to the development of the Median Zarathustrianism a shorter period than from one to three centuries? If, then, the bulk of the later Avesta must be placed so long before the Inscriptions of Darius, where shall we place the earlier Avesta with its most important remaining fragments, the Gâthas²?

After studying the Gâthas carefully in detail, and becoming also familiar with them as a whole by frequent perusal, we must measure the time needed for the change from their tone to that of the later Avesta. Could it have been less than a century, or centuries? Was not as much time needed for the Zarathustra of the Gâthas to become the Zarathustra of the later Avesta, as was afterwards consumed by the migration of the creed from the North-east, if it really originated there? As there is undoubtedly a difference of several centuries between the dates of the newest and oldest parts of the later Avesta, so we must think of a considerable interval between the oldest parts of the later Avesta and the latest parts of the older Avesta, for there is the other consideration which imperatively constrains us to avoid concluding for short periods in the stages of development. The Vedic Hymns, sung in metres closely similar to those in both the Gâthas and the later Avesta, and naming gods, demons, and heroes so closely related, not to speak of myths, challenge us to say whether they are, the oldest of them, older or later than the oldest parts of the Avesta, and, if there exists any difference as to the ages of these ancient productions, how great that difference is. The oldest Rîks have now an established antiquity of about 4000 ; were the hymns sung on the other side of the mountains as old ? The metres of these latter are as old as those of the Rîg-veda, if not older, and their grammatical forms and word structure are often positively nearer the original Aryan from which both proceeded. If it were not for two circumstances, we should be forced to ask very seriously which were the older, and to abandon altogether our mention of later dates. Those circumstances are the absence of the Aryan gods from the Gâthas ; and, secondly, their abstract conceptions. These latter are so little offset with expected puerilities that it is often hard to believe that the Gâthas are old at all. Their antiquity is placed beyond dispute by the historic mention of Zarathustra. But, if Zarathustra were not indisputably a living man in the Gâthas, their depth and refinement, together with the absence of Mithra, Haoma, &c., would, in themselves considered, force us to place them rather late. As it is, the absence of Mithra and his colleagues, who reappear in the later Avesta, permits us to place the Gâthas considerably later than the oldest Rîks. For no sudden and intentional dismissal of the ancient gods is to be accepted with Haug, nor any religious schism as the cause (!) of the migration of the Indians toward the south. The process was of course the reverse.

¹ I regard the Magi as representing the Zarathustrianism of the Vendîdâd. This the false Bardiya endeavoured to introduce, demolishing the temples which the old Mazda-worship permitted in Persia. See the Cuneiform Inscription of Behistun II; Darius 61.

² All in the Gâthic dialect is old.

The migrating tribes, in consequence of their separation from their brethren in Iran, soon became estranged from them, and their most favoured Gods fell slowly into neglect, if not disfavour.

We need time to account for this change, and no short interval of time. We can therefore place the Gâthas long after the oldest Rîks. While, therefore, in view of the established age of the Rîg-veda, the Gâthas may possibly have been composed as early as about 1500 B.C., it is also possible to place them as late as (say) 900–1200 B.C., while the fragments in the Gâthic dialect must be considered somewhat later. The dates of the composition of the several parts of the later Avesta, on the other hand, must be supposed to extend over many centuries, as the various sections in the Zend dialect are so much more numerous than those in the Gâthic, the Gâthas themselves representing practically but one date. Placing then the oldest portions of the later Avesta somewhat earlier than Darius, we are obliged to extend the period during which its several parts were composed so far as perhaps to the third or fourth century before Christ, the half-spurious matter contained in them being regarded as indefinitely later.

It seems necessary to state here for the information of non-specialists, and as bearing very seriously upon all the questions involved, that a very unusually severe controversy prevails upon the exegesis of the Avesta, and that it centres in the question as to the value of the Asiatic translations of it. A similar debate was once held on the Rîg-veda, but that is now silenced, all agreeing that the traditional renderings are neither to be slavishly followed, nor blindly ignored. Very different has been the fate of Zend philology, and in one important particular the studies are poles apart; for whereas the commentaries on the Rîks are written in Sanskrit, which is clear to experts, those on the Zend-Avesta are written in a language upon which the lexicography is most incomplete, and the elucidation of these explanations themselves remains by far the most difficult task now before us. Professor von Spiegel has accomplished much toward breaking the rough road of science in this direction, and scholars of the first order have followed his leading, while all with one accord express to him their acknowledgments. But Professor von Spiegel has not intended his editions and citations to represent full translations. He has, as a matter of course, taken it for granted that those who oppose him, as well as those who follow him, have studied his Pahlavi editions, not paying him the undesired compliment of making his commentaries the sole source of their knowledge of tradition. Moreover in no branch of science does scholarship make more rapid strides than in Pahlavi, several important works having appeared since Spiegel's commentaries.

In the attempt to master the Pahlavi translations of the Avesta we must consider many and difficult problems.

In the first place, and as a matter of course, they cannot be at all reasonably attempted without a full knowledge of the Gâthic and Avesta texts so far as they have been as yet otherwise and approximately elucidated. The two problems hang together like the arches of a circular building, and they should be studied together word for word; for the Pahlavi used is not fully that of the books. It is often turned quite out of its course, as Pahlavi, by an effort to follow the more highly inflected Zend literally. Then, again, a question of the utmost importance meets us in estimating the glosses, which are often, but not always, from a later hand. A translation of the Pahlavi must of course first be considered as in the light of the glosses, for the language is so indefinite as to many of its grammatical forms, that such an indication as a gloss, if it be proved to have been written by the same person who composed the text, would be decisive in determining the rendering; but a final translation should be made more strictly in the light of the Gâthic, so far as it affords on its side positive indications, and the glosses, where they do not correspond, should be set apart as from a later hand. Then, once more, and on the contrary, where the gloss is obviously right, and the text erroneous, the former should be appropriated unencumbered by the latter ¹. We must recognise the traces of former accurate scholarship whether we see them in text or gloss, and, from the accumulation of the correct surmises, we should construct an argument for the probability of the correctness of the hints of the Pahlavi in cases of great difficulty. In rendering the Pahlavi as a necessary prelude to rendering the Avesta, all possible help should of course be sought from the Asiatic translations of the Pahlavi, from those of Neryosangh in Sanskrit, and from the still later ones in Parsi and Persian. Here, again, those who read the Pahlavi only as rendered by Neryosangh need great caution. If Neryosangh is simply read like the classical Sanskrit, great errors will be committed. He needs a glossary of his own, and should be read solely in the light of the Pahlavi which was chiefly his original. So of the Parsi Persian translations, they must be read with especial attention to their originals. After these original translations have been fully mastered, and compared with an improved rendering of the Gâthic, likewise also studied in the full light of the Veda, the patient scholar will be surprised at the result. He will find that to a certain extensive degree, the two sources of information coincide when reasonably estimated, and, moreover, that where the Pahlavi gives us an indication differing from that derived from the Vedic, the surmise of the Pahlavi is the more often correct. I say 'reasonably estimated,' for not only is the Pahlavi, as a less highly inflected language, incapable of rendering the Avesta literally, but its authors do not uniformly make the attempt to do so; nor do they always follow the order of the Gâthic or Zend. Their translations generally run word for word as to their outward forms, for the ancient interpreters probably regarded such a following as essential to a complete rendering, but they found themselves compelled to resort to the most important exceptions. And, lastly, the rejection, or total neglect of the Pahlavi translations and their successors, on the ground that they contain errors, is a policy which seems to me defective, and to the last degree. What absurdities can Sāyana be capable of, and yet who would utter final opinions upon the Rig-veda without either the ability, or the attempt, to read Sāyana¹?

¹ I would here state to the distinguished scholars who have done me the honour to study my work on the Gâthas, that the Pahlavi translations contained in it are those made in the light of the glosses. Here and there final ones will be added in a later volume, as from the Pahlavi texts sometimes considered apart from the Pahlavi glosses, and in consequence often much nearer the Gâthic than those from both text and gloss.

It is hardly necessary to mention that the restoration of texts goes hand in hand with translation. For how are we to interpret a passage before we know that it exists? And of what inestimable worth are the Pahlavi translations as evidence to texts! Who does not see that where the ancient scribe is most free or erroneous as to form, or root, his rendering often shows plainly which of two words stood before him in his manuscripts. Our oldest MS. (that of Copenhagen, numbered 5) dates from the year 1323 A.D.; and what were the dates of the ancient documents before the eyes of the Pahlavi translator who writes in it?

We must now ask whether our present Pahlavi translations are improvements upon their predecessors, or the reverse. That they are improvements in some few instances is undeniable, for, as we have seen, some of the glosses to them from later hands give the truth where the text is wide. But the glosses which show a later origin are, for the most part, inferior in richness to the texts. Here and there a talented, or fortunate, Parsi threw new light on the subject, but the general tendency was one of deterioration; that is, before the revival of Parsi-learning under Neryosangh (400–500 years ago). This deterioration would naturally decrease as we approach successive periods in going back to the time when MSS. of the Gāthas existed according to positive evidence, that is, to the time when, according to the Arđā Virāf, Alexander's servants found skins at Persepolis on which the Avesta had been traced in gilded letters (for it is not positively proved that the informants of Herodotus heard the Magian priests singing their 'theogonies' from written books). At each of these periods scholarship is proved to have been competent by the results which it accomplished. The first of them we must place in the sixth century when, on Spiegel's estimate¹, the Zend characters were modified into their present lucid form from the Pahlavi, and distinct short vowels took the place of the unknown signs which existed previously. Then all MSS. which were to be found must have been collected and copied, and, so to speak, re-edited; and here we must accordingly place a period when the Pahlavi translations were more valuable than those of any later date. As we go further back we come upon another period, when, under Shapur II, Âdarbad Mahraspend brought the surviving portions of the Zend-Avesta together (about A.D. 330). Still earlier the servants of Artaxerxes, the Sasanian, collected yet more abundant writings, when Zarathustrianism was instituted as the state religion. Then, under the Arsacids (possibly under Vologeses the first), those most competent in the realm were directed to gather the then extant documents.

¹ Well has Geldner mentioned the 'epoch-making' Études Iraniennes of Darmesteter (KZ. vol. xxviii, p. 186). It is to be hoped that these brilliant pieces will stimulate the study of the relation between the Zend and the New Persian through the Ancient Persian and the Pahlavi.

While, if we hold that the entire Avesta was written originally in some character different from the Pahlavi, we must finally infer the existence of an early epoch, when the entire Avesta was brought over in its bulk from the earlier East (or West?) Iranian character in which it was first inscribed. If this character differed radically from the Pahlavi, this transliteration must be regarded as one of the most remarkable of literary events. Notwithstanding all the now rapidly corrected errors, the texts have been handed down with the minutest distinctions of dialect preserved², and this proves the existence of competent interpreters at a period practically contemporaneous with the composition of the later portions of the later Avesta. What commentaries must then have existed, not free from error, as we see from the Zand of the Avesta, but, as to language and general sense, how close ! Even if the degree of linguistic knowledge increases only gradually or steadily in going back, without any epochs from the time of Neryosangh to the inferable date of the latest Zend writings, and if the character in which the Avesta was first recorded (after a lengthy life as an orally extended lore) differed only as to mode and fashion, and not radically, from the Pahlavi (which, so far as the later Avesta is concerned, is most probable), we have yet the transliteration of the Gâthas to account for, which perhaps were brought over (after long oral life) from the so-called Aryan character, while the existence of a gradual tradition of a scholarship does not refute the fact that this scholarship must have been at times of the highest character ; it makes high scholarship more probable.

¹ Eranisches Alterthumskunde III, s. 767.

² See Hübschmann, KZ. bd. 24, s. 326.

What translations, we again remark, may have existed among these early sages ! And, if they could once make translations fresh from the exegesis of the latest Zend writers themselves, is it not practically certain, considering the tenacity of life manifested by Zoroastrianism, that their explanations still lurk in the commentaries which have come down to us. And if these inferences be at all correct, how should we labour to discover from our present translations what these predecessors were ; and what scholar cannot perceive that gems of evidence as to texts and sense may yet linger in those of our present Pahlavi translations which may yet be otherwise most filled with phantastic error ? And shall we not therefore conclude that their expected inaccuracies, whether small or great, cannot destroy their inherent value ? What, then, are we to think of it, when the New Persian, a quasi-daughter of the Pahlavi, is superficially referred to for linguistic analogies, when even the Armenian is also scanned, while the Pahlavi is left unmastered ? Is a quasi-mother language of the New Persian any the less likely to afford linguistic analogies because an actual translation of the Avesta has been attempted in it, and because the Avesta once stood in its characters, while it may also present claims to be considered to a certain limit a daughter language to both the Gâthic and Zend ?

And should the acknowledged difficulty of the character continue to be a reason for avoiding all efforts to make it out?¹

In the endeavour to divide our Avesta texts into originals and gloss, we are greatly aided by the metre. Interpolated words and phrases are often obvious at a glance, and we should never suspend our efforts to discover all the traces of metre which exist in the Avesta, as a necessary step to the restoration of the documents to their first form; but we should avoid exaggeration, and a carelessly dogmatic procedure in insisting upon reducing lines to an exact, or to a supposed exact, number of syllables². I regard it as unwise to suppose that the metrical lines of the Avesta, or indeed of any very ancient poetical matter, have been composed with every line filed into exact proportions. The ancient poets would have brought out the measures in many a place by accent and a sandhi which are no longer known to us. The Vedic Hymns may, to a great extent, form an exception, but who would not say that where uniform evenness is at hand, an effort to improve the metre has often corrupted the text. Priests or reciters of intelligence would here and there round off an awkward strophe, as year after year they felt the unevenness of numbers. Metre must inevitably bring a perfecting corruption at times, as a deficiency in the metre must also prove a marring corruption. Cases should be carefully discriminated. The expression of passionate feeling, for instance, would be likely to cause

¹ One of the most powerful tributes ever paid to the Pahlavi translators was Haug's conversion to them. Before studying them he lost no opportunity to stigmatise their deficiencies; later, however, he followed them in many an important place, and sometimes with little reserve.

As writers of the opposed extremes seem honestly convinced of the radical error of each other's views, it is obvious that association and interest have much to do with decisions. A scholar should put himself fully under the influence first of one school and then of the other. The necessity for well-balanced studies is extremely great.

² It is only lately that the variation from eleven to twelve syllables in the lines of Trishup has been applied to the Gâthic metres, nor has the possibility of a shifting caesura been acceded to till lately.

unevenness in lines. The language would be vigorous and idiomatic, and of unusual value as a fragment of ancient phrase, but the metre would have suffered.

Then as to conjectured texts; after texts have been improved from all available relics of ancient tradition, or scholarship, as afforded by the Pahlavi translations, and from the evidence of metre, we are at times still left with readings before us which could not have been original. The composers have indeed here and there constructed sentences which they either could not, or would not, make easy, but as a general thing we may say, that where the text, as it stands, gives no satisfactory sense to us, after we have exhausted the resources of previous Asiatic scholarship, or direct analogy, in our efforts to explain it, it is in that case not the text as the composer delivered it. We are then reduced to conjecture, for how are we to translate a text before we are certain that it is integral? Our first efforts should be directed to the detection of losses; for a text may still be of great value when considered as a mass of broken sentences, for, if we are certain that such is its character, we can often fill out the missing members with much probability. But whether we insert supplementary conjectures, or merely bracket later interpolations, we must by all means in cases of real necessity make the effort to amend the text (as also in the Veda).

Even if we fail in our attempted improvements, we are often little worse off than before, for whereas it is possible, or even probable, that the composers wrote what we suggest, it is sometimes not possible that they wrote exactly what stands in our texts. We should even suggest alternative readings where our present ones are only less probable (for the suggestion of an alternative is not the wholesale destruction of a sentence), while even when we declare their outcoming meaning totally unsatisfactory, the MSS. still remain to other writers to begin on afresh. And in estimating what would be reasonable meanings, we should guard carefully against both extremes, and we should especially exercise a strong negative criticism against the recognition of too much meaning, or too subtle a meaning. Profound and subtle conceptions placed where we are obliged to place the Gâthas, and other ancient portions of the Avesta, are indeed precious relics, as such conceptions at any age show a higher mental power, but we must doubt them only so much the more, and doubt, if we would be scientific and conscientious, till doubt becomes no longer possible. Beyond that we should turn our suspicions against our doubts themselves, which is the proper course if we would exhaust the meanings of the Gâthas. Unless these are a fortuitous concourse of syllables, religiously profound modes of thought are manifest throughout. It is therefore strictly unscientific to force parts of them to express shallow details, and it is above all deplorable to change the text itself in order to produce out of it less enlarged meanings¹. I say to force parts of them, for the great mass of them confessedly defies all attempts to reduce them to the statements of simple commonplace.

They can never possess the rich colour of the Rîks; it is therefore the more to be deplored if we fail to see their deep, but awkwardly expressed, and oft-repeated thought. I must express my regret that until lately, when the enclitics have been more carefully considered, the form of sentences in the Gâthas does not seem to have been noticed, writers conjecturing infinitives and simple accusatives at the ends of sentences. Both may, of course, fall there, but when we wish to reconstruct a word, we should not change it to a form which is not placed according to prevailing analogies. Infinitives and accusatives generally, both in the Gâthas and the Rîg-veda, avoid the end of the sentence. The accusative, when it falls there, is generally preceded by qualifying words often in apposition or agreement with it. Also in the conception of translations, authors seem to suppose it impossible that the lines can contain anything but lengthened prosaic sentences (too often with an accusative, or infinitive, pushed awkwardly out to the end). To me the Gâthic sentence is often very short, and so better adapted to poetic expression.

¹ Non-specialists must not suppose that our texts are more apparently uncertain than (say) many portions of the Old Testament. Large portions of them are also as clear, at least, as the Rîg-veda; and the emendations referred to need very seldom affect the doctrines. Let the learned public, however, insist on scholars making honest attempts to render the texts as they stand before their emendations, and greater harmony would result.

It has been already implied, and it has been taken for granted throughout¹, that the Avesta should be closely compared with the Veda, but let it never be forgotten, in the name of science, that the force and meaning of analogous words in the Gâthic and the Vedic cannot be expected to be uniformly identical, considering the extent of territory, and the length of time, by which those who spoke the two languages were separated. The meanings of the Vedic words could not hold their own even in India, developing into the Sanskrit and Prâkrit which differ widely, how truly misguided is it therefore to attribute necessarily the same shades of meaning to the terms of the two sister tongues. If even the Gâthic hymns stood in the Indian forms, and had been discovered in India, having also reference to Indian history, no thoughtful writer would have rendered them in complete analogy with the Rig-veda. The Gâthic usages would have been added in our dictionaries to those of the Vedic, just as the Sanskrit definitions are added.

An additional word seems called for as to the results of Zarathustrian theology. Besides its connection with the modern philosophy through Gnosticism which has been already noticed², a relation between it and the Jewish theology since the Captivity has long been mentioned. The hagiology, the demonology, the temptation, the parables, the eschatology, have all been supposed to show traces of the time when Persian power was dominant in Jerusalem, and with it, Persian literature; but the discussion of such questions requires separate treatises.

As to the general benefit which has resulted from Zarathustrianism in the past, few reflections need to be added. If the mental illumination and spiritual elevation of many millions of mankind, throughout long periods of time, are of any importance, it would require strong proof to deny that Zarathustrianism has had an influence of very positive power in determining the gravest results. That men should be taught to look within rather than without, to believe that suffering and sin do not originate from the capricious power of a Deity still called 'good,' that the 'good thought, word, and deed' should be recognised as essential to all sanctity, even in the presence of a superstitious ceremonial, that a judgment should have been expected according to the deeds done in the body, and the soul consigned to a Heaven of virtue or to a Hell of vice, its recompense being pronounced by the happy or stricken conscience, these can never be regarded by serious historians as matters of little moment, and if, on the contrary, they are allowed to be matters of great moment, the Zend-Avesta should be revered and studied by all who value the records of the human race.

¹ See remarks in the Preface, p. xv.

² See note on p. xix.

ABBREVIATIONS.

Barth. = Bartholomae.

B.V. S. = Vendidad Sade, von Dr. Hermann Brockhaus. Leipzig, 1850.

D. = dastur.

De inf. = De infinitivi linguarum sanskritae bactricae persicae graecae oscae umbricae latinae gotticae forma et usu, scripsit Eugenius Wilhelmus, phil. doctor. 1872.

G. = Gâmâspgi.

H. = Hübschmann.

Inf. = Geschichte des Infinitivs im Indogermanischen, von Dr. Julius Jolly. 1873.

K. = Kopenhagen MSS.

K. Z. = Kuhnische Zeitschrift für vergleichende Sprachforschung.

M. † K. = Mainyô-† Khard. Ed. West. 1871.

Ner. = Neryosangh.

P. = Paris MSS.

Rv. = Rig-veda.

Sp. = Spiegel.

Trlr. = translator.

V. S. = Ein Kapitel vergleichender Syntax, von Dr. Julius Jolly. 1872.

Wg. = Westergaard.

Z. D. M. G. = Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft.

An asterisk denotes irregularities.

THE GÂTHAS.

THE five Gâthas of Zarathustra and his immediate followers are placed here before the other parts of the Yasna on account of their higher antiquity. There existed no other Yasna for years or centuries beside them.

The more remarkable circumstances connected with them have been already discussed in the Introduction.

If it is necessary to recall any of them here, the most prominent would be that they are undoubtedly the productions of a small group of influential men who are referred to in them for the most part by name; that Zarathustra, everywhere else nearly or quite a demi-god, is here a struggling and suffering man. He is a prophet, or a divinely appointed instructor, but thoroughly human and real, so far as his situations become apparent.

Secondly, their historical tone may be emphasised. Their doctrines and exhortations concern an actual religious movement taking place contemporaneously with their composition; and that movement was exceptionally pure and most earnest. Their tone is therefore everywhere serious. Nearly all myths are dropped, and likewise, as perhaps their most striking peculiarity, even the old Aryan gods, who reappear in the later Yasna, Vendîdâd, and Yasts, are, save one, wholly absent.

The movement in its reformatory character seems to have thrown them out, not perhaps with definite intention, but because the minds of the devout enthusiasts excluded them as having inferior interest, in view of the results immediately before them.

So far as a claim to a high position among the curiosities of ancient moral lore is concerned, the reader may trust himself freely to the impression that he has before him an anthology which was probably composed with as fervent a desire to benefit the spiritual and moral natures of those to whom it was addressed as any which the world had yet seen. Nay, he may provisionally accept the opinion that nowhere else are such traces of intelligent religious earnestness to be found as existing at the period of the Gâthas or before them, save in the Semitic scriptures.

As to their speculative depth; wherever theosophical speculation is put into words, the evidence of their grasp and subjectivity becomes positive. As the extent of documents necessarily produces a certain impression upon the mind of an investigator, it must not be forgotten that the Gâthas were in all probability many times more voluminous than the fragments which now remain to us. The historian may argue from what has survived to what once existed, and the inevitable conclusion is imposing.

For additional details see the Introduction, and the summaries at the head of each Gâtha and chapter.

THE GÂTHA(Â) AHUNAVAITI(Î).

This Gâtha, consisting of seven chapters of the Yasna (XXVIII-XXXIV), takes its name from the similarity of its metre to that of the Ahuna-vairya formula which also occurs before it in the Yasna. It is composed of homogeneous material, but as its material is also homogeneous with that of the other Gâthas, it probably owes its existence as a group of sections to its metrical form. Its lines were intended to number sixteen syllables, and they are put together in stanzas of three. It is all very ancient and probably nearly all original with Zarathustra himself, though parts seem to be put into the mouths of his immediate associates and disciples. Whether any persons existed in the immediate circle of the sage capable of composing hymns like these unaided, is of course a question; but that some were able to put poetical matter together under his guidance or inspiration seems certain.

An analysis and general summary is placed before each chapter as more convenient than massing them all together. The reader is reminded that the rhythm of the original, so far as it could be reasonably conjectured, is somewhat imitated in parts of the translations.

THE GÂTHAS.

YASNA XXIX.

THE WAIL OF THE KINE. THE CALL OF ZARATHUSTRA. HIS PRAYER FOR AID.

This chapter, the second in the manuscripts of the Gâtha Ahunavaiti, is placed here as in a more natural order. It may be regarded as containing the terminus a quo of the divine revelation. The Soul of the Kine, as representing the herds of the holy Iranian people, their only means of honourable livelihood, raises its voice, and expressing the profoundest needs of an afflicted people, addresses Ahura and His Divine Order, Asha, in bitterness.

1. Recalling another and a later 'groan of the creation,' she demands wherefore and for whom she was made, since afflictions encompass her; and as her comfort, if not her existence, was threatened as much by the unsettled habits induced by constant alarms as by the actual incursions of her predatory neighbours, she beseeches the Bountiful Immortals to instruct her as to the benefits of civilised agriculture, and confirm her protectors in its practice, as her only remedy against the evils of which she complains.

2. Ahura answers by a question to Asha, the personified Righteous Order, as to what guardian he had appointed in order to smite back the fury which assails her, intimating that some chief ought to have been set over her originally who would have averted her miseries, training her people in steady tillage and bucolic skill, and repelling the destructive raids.

3. Asha answers that her sufferings were inevitable, that no chief could be appointed who could prevent them since none was himself without his share of injustice and of passionate resentment. He could not answer why this was the case. The question, involving the insolvable problem of the origin of evil, lay at the foundation of those influences which move the stars of destiny; that the religious revelation afforded by the Ratu (as in chapter XXX) was intended to meet these problems so far as they could be answered¹, and that therefore all who were entering upon active enterprises were in the act of approaching, not him Asha, the subordinate archangel, but Mazda himself, who was the greatest of beings, and alone able to answer their prayers and questions.

4. Zarathustra², poetically conceived to be present, here intervenes to reaffirm the homage just paid by Asha. He declares Ahura Mazda to be himself the most mindful of all the previously revealed assertions and directions uttered by himself, and fulfilled in the actions of both the Demon-gods of their enemies, and of good or evil men. He is also said to be fully cognisant of what they will do in the future, and to discriminate between what is good and evil as an infallible judge, allotting to us all our destiny in future sufferings or rewards. 5. Addressing Ahura and Asha, and uniting with the Kine's Soul in her supplication, he questions Mazda in his doubt, not in peaceful confidence, as later in the impressive hymn, each verse of which begins with the words, 'This ask I Thee, aright, Ahura! tell me!' but deprecating from himself, and constructively from the Kine, the impending destruction which he sees will justly fall upon the wicked as visited by the discriminating vengeance acknowledged to be Ahura's attribute (see verse 4). 6. At last Ahura, showing the intention of His questions, answers them himself; no regulating lord in full sympathy with the Righteous Order had as yet been discovered or discoverable, but He himself will make a selection. He therefore declares himself as solemnly appointing Zarathustra to that office.

And Zarathustra, inspired by His Good Mind, and guided by His righteousness, will accomplish more than has as yet been done to rally the thrifty community, and settle their virtuous polity upon its desired basis of training and defence. 7. As Zarathustra is a listener in the colloquy between the Deity, the Kine's Soul, and Asha, the Righteous Order, so the other Immortals beside Asha³, here join in, as if the appointment just made had not been heard, or was incredible (see below). Mazda is indeed declared to have revealed the sacred Word-of-reason in harmony with the consenting Righteousness, and to have provided food for the Kine and the needy consumers, but who was there adequately endowed with the Good Mind, who could promulgate that Māthra with its revealed directions as to sustenance of both body and mind?

¹ Something like this is implied.

² If verses 4, 5, 6, were originally connected.

³ Or possibly a company of the religious chiefs poetically conceived to be present.

8. Ahura repeats his announcement of Zarathustra, as if to silence the objections.

As Zarathustra alone had heard the doctrines from the voice of inspiration, so he desired to declare them, and had authority to do so, together with a settled position of such a character as to make his statements felt.

9. But an unexpected difficulty arises. The Kine's Soul is by no means impressed by the personality of the individual selected as her guardian. So far from being the demi-god of the other parts of the Avesta, Zarathustra's declarations are characterised by her as 'the voice of a pusillanimous man,' while she, on the contrary, expected one truly kingly in his rank and characteristics, and able to bring his desires to effect, while the Bountiful Immortals (or the attending chieftains), as if they had meant their question in verse 7 to be a question uttered in mere perplexity or contempt, join in with chorus, asking when indeed an effective helper will be provided.

10. Zarathustra, undismayed by the coldness of his reception, enters at once upon his office as priest and prophet, praying Ahura for the people; and recognising the names of the 'Immortals,' Khshathra, Asha, and Vohu Manah, in their original sense, asks Ahura to grant to the people in their straits, a Sovereign Authority established in the Divine Order, and bestowing the needed quiet and happiness for which the suffering provinces, as represented by the Kine's Soul in her wail, had expressed their desire.

And as he prays, he avows his own steadfast confidence in Ahura rather than in the Daêvas, as the prime possessor and bestower of blessings.

11. Then, as if eager to receive full equipment upon the spot, he not only beseeches for the Righteous Order, the Kingly Power of God, and His Good Mind for the masses as represented by the Kine, but asks when they are coming to him, and hastening; and he entreats Ahura to bestow His help at once for the great cause, and to a very abundant degree, upon himself and his associates. (It is singular that the name of Âramaiti does not occur in this section.)

Translation.

(Homage to you, O Sacred Gâthas!)

1. Unto you (O Ahura and Asha!) the Soul of the Kine (our sacred herds and folk) cried aloud: For whom did ye create me, and by¹ whom did ye fashion me? On me comes the assault of wrath, and of violent power, the blow² of desolation, audacious insolence, and (thievish)³ might. None other pasture-giver⁴ have I than you, therefore do ye teach me good (tillage) for the fields (my only hope of welfare⁵)!

Ahura speaks.

2. Upon this the Creator⁶ of the Kine (the holy ¹ Kz mâ tasha/ can only mean this here. The Pahlavi translator probably read kahmâi. He has val mûn li tukhshîd (?) hômanam.

² One might think of 'inertia' as a rendering for remô, (if read), but the afflictions complained of seem rather to imply active violence.

³ Or read tâyusâ (robbery?) with the Pahlavi translation; 'yu' and 'vi' would be written much alike in a manuscript.

⁴ Vastâ has been found, as I understand, in some manuscripts. The Persian manuscript of Haug has a curious vâstîrîdâr (vâstârîdâr?) in the Pahlavi text, which seems to confirm vastâ in the sense given.

⁵ As there are very many non-specialists to whom it is important to weigh this present subject as closely as it may be possible, and as everything here is a matter of the keenest questioning among experts, I add occasionally a word-for-word rendering, although necessarily very uncouth: To you the Kine's soul cried-complaining: For whom me did ye fashion? Who me made? Against me assaulting-rapine, violence-and, desolations-[blow], daring-insolence-and, (thievish) might-and (possibly change the text). Not for me a pasture-giver than-you other; therefore to-me teach-ye good (things) for-the-pasture (adj. acc. pl. neut.).

⁶ I fear that I cannot follow Haug in his later view, where he follows tradition in rather an extreme manner, rendering 'the cutter (wounder) of the Ox.' Neither Spiegel nor Justi would confide to a later myth to this degree (see Y. XXXI, 9 and XLVI, 9). This is herds) asked of Righteousness¹: How (was) thy guardian for the Kine (appointed) by thee when, as having power (over all her fate), ye made her? (In what manner did ye secure) for her, together with pasture, a cattle-chief who was both skilled and likewise energetic? Whom did ye select² as her (life's) master who might hurl back the fury of the wicked³?

Asha answers.

3. To Him the (Divine Righteousness) answered with⁴ his sanctity. (Great was our perplexity); a chieftain who was capable of smiting⁵ back (their fury), and who was himself without hate (was not to be obtained by us); among such things as these, those things are not to be known (by beings such as we) which are the influences which approach⁶ (and move) the lofty fires⁷ (revealing the favour and the will of God⁸).

Of beings He is the mightiest to whom those⁹ mentioned, however, not as complaining of an error, but solely to guard the reader against the mistake of an eminent authority. (See also Roth, Z. D. M. G., Bd. 25, s. 9.)

¹ Observe the personification of righteousness.

² Or, 'what salvation-lord,' governed by dâtâ from the preceding line; so also the Pahlavi translator mûn avô pavan nadûkîh khûdâi. Ustâ occurs only here as a verbal form. Supply angha/in b.

³ The Pahlavi aêshmô anâêr zanisnô.

⁴ Or read ashem. The Pahlavi has ashavahistô pasukhvô gûft. I am not at all inclined to accept vocatives for nominatives in the Gâthas.

⁵ Sar-gan, compare Verethragan. The Pahlavi indicates this by tanû sardârîh. ⁶ Possibly, 'by which he approaches.'

⁷ The Pahlavi rôshanô î râstô.

⁸ Cp. Y. XXX, 1 : yâ raoêbîs daresatâ urvâzâ.

⁹ The Pahlavi indicates a third person; and keredushâ is far the most simply explained as a nom. pl. Recall mâ mashâ and man (?) mathâ. Otherwise, 'to whom I will come with activity and invoking.'

who have performed their actions approach with invocations. (He has no need to ask!)

Zarathustra intervenes ¹.

4. The Great Creator ² (is himself) most mindful of the uttered indications which have been fulfilled beforehand hitherto in the deeds of ³ demon-gods ⁴ and (good or evil) men, and of those which shall be fulfilled by them ⁵ hereafter. He Ahura is the discerning arbiter; so shall it be to us ⁶ as He shall will ⁷!

5. Therefore it is that we both, my soul ⁸ and (the soul) of the mother ⁹ Kine, (are) making our supplica-

¹ A verse or verses may here have fallen out.

² I cannot persuade myself to accept the nearly universally accepted comparison of Mazdau and medhâ. See note on p. 104.

³ Or, 'He has done by Daêvas?' If thus, absolute and not qualified sovereignty would be indicated. See the last line.

⁴ Observe that while 'by Daêva-worshippers' would be an admirable rendering for Daêvâis, because more commonplace and therefore safer, it is here impossible on account of mashyâisââ. We are closely confined to the acceptance of a large idea. Ahura was mindful of what transpired in the deeds of Daêva-gods, and not in those of Daêva-worshippers alone. The inst. must be modified.

⁵ As varshaitê is elsewhere used in an active sense, it is possible, but not probable, that a special predestination may be indicated. 'He shall do by means of Daêvas and men.'

⁶ 'To us men,' not to us Ameshôspends, of course!

⁷ Verbatim. Mazda the-words most-mindful which for have-been-fulfilled before by-means-of- (the actions of) Daêvas-and men-and what-and (shall)-be-done after, He the discriminating lord; so to-us shall-it-be as He shall-choose.

⁸ This seems to prove positively that a human being speaks here and in the previous verse; 'the soul of Righteousness' is of course impossible.

⁹ Some have referred the word to the root zan obscurely present in it; otherwise a drivable cow; one mature and fit for use. The term used in the Vendîdâd in a common meaning as merely tions for the two worlds to Ahura, and with hands stretched out in entreaty, when (we pray to the Great Creator¹ with questions in our doubt²; (and He will answer).

Not for the righteous liver, not for the thrifty (tiller of the earth), shall there be destruction³ together with the wicked!

Ahura.

6. Upon this the Lord, the Great Creator, He who understands the mysterious grace⁴ by His insight⁵, spake thus: Not in this manner⁶ is a spiritual master found for us, nor a chieftain moved by Righteousness and appointed (in its spirit); therefore Thee⁷ have I named⁸ (as such a head) to the diligent tiller of the ground⁹!

designating a cow at a certain age, may be the familiar use of an adjective here applied in the ancient Gâtha in a sacred sense.

¹ This passage is one of the strongest for the comparison of Mazda and medhâ. The sense 'asking wisdom in our doubt,' is admirable. I cannot however accept the comparison.

² Pavan gômânîkih hampûrsânî; root dî.

³ The Pahlavi awasînisnîh*, but in other connections fragyâitis might well mean 'continued life;' 'life long endured with the wicked.'

⁴ The Pahlavi has vishûpisnô, which here affords a better meaning; see however Y. XLVIII, 9. We might read as alternative here, 'knowing the calamity to be averted.'

⁵ Uncertain. The Pahlavi however indicates 'discernment.'

⁶ One is strongly tempted to read aêvô, 'not a single chief,' but the ancient writing read by the Pahlavi translator had aêvâ ahû.

⁷ This indicates that Zarathustra had been the speaker in the previous verses.

⁸ Appointed.

⁹ Verbatim. Thereupon spake Ahura Mazda knowing the wonderful (thing) through-insight (?) not thus a master found, nor a ruler righteous-order-from-even from, therefore for thee to-the-thrifty-and to-the-husbandman-and (I) as-a-creator I-have-made.

The Ameshôspends¹.

7. Mazda has created the inspired Word-of-reason which is a Māthra of fatness (for the offering), the (Divine) Righteousness consenting with Him in his deed. Food he has prepared for the Kine and for the eaters², He the one bountiful with his (saving) doctrine; but whom hast Thou, endowed with the Good Mind, who may give forth those (doctrines) by word of mouth to mortals³?

Ahura.

8. This man is found for me here who alone⁴ has

¹ Or a company of the saints conceived to be present.

² So some writers, accepting an irregular reading hvarushaēibyô after the indication of the Pahlavi translation. Otherwise compare 'rush' (?), uru=ru, and render 'to the estranged.' We have often to stretch the meaning more than this. Converting instructions are elsewhere suggested for 'all mankind.'

³ The translation of Neryosangh is added here not merely because it is of interest, but because it is, together with the Pahlavi translation, of the last importance in forming correct conclusions. It may be rendered as follows; and the reader may regard it as a specimen, but by no means a particularly favourable one. At the words âzûtôis and maretaēibyô different texts were before him and the Pahlavi translator as well. Those words are elsewhere rendered by the latter karpîh and ansûtâân: This greatest magnitude (sic) of the Māthra, the Lord produced together with righteousness as his fellow-worker []. The Great Wise One discloses the herds to the eaters; and he discloses also the great matter to the well-taught scholars. Who is thine, who endowed with the best mind, gives the two things, with the mouth to those who are prosecuting studies (sic)? To expect an ancient rendering to be closer would be unreasonable. The errors (as to root) are not errors, but the certain signs of differing MSS. This constantly occurs; and it is hardly necessary to add that sometimes from such supposed mistakes we get the only possible means of recovering the original text.

⁴ Repeating the announcement in verse 6. The aêvâ in 6 would incline one to read aêvâ (ye ne aêvâ), but the manuscript before the Pahlavi translator read aêvô=khadûk. It is quite out of the question to suppose his aêtûnô and khadûk to be accidental. A sharp distinction is made.

hearkened to our enunciations, Zarathustra Spitama! Our mighty and completed acts of grace he desires to enounce for us, for (Me), the Great Creator and for Righteousness; wherefore I will give him the good abode¹ (and authoritative place) of such an one as speaks²!

The Gæus Urvan.

9. Upon this the Soul of the Kine lamented (: Woe is unto me) since (I have obtained for myself) in my wounding a lord who is powerless to effect (his) wish, the (mere) voice of a feeble and pusillanimous man, whereas I desire one who is lord over his will (and able as one of royal state to bring what he desires to effect³).

The Ameshôspends⁴.

((Aye,) when shall he ever appear who may bring to her⁴ help strong-handed⁵?)

¹ So the Pahlavi translator, giving the only critical etymology in his hûdemûnfh, the gloss aside.

² The Pahlavi text corrected by the Persian MS. may be rendered as follows: This gift I obtained []. For this one is he who was listening to that which is our teaching, Zartôst, the Spitâmân. For us, Aûharmazd, and for Aharâyih is his desire, [that is, that perfectly performed duty, and good works are desired by him]. He recites also a remedy-making (free or erroneous), [that is, he declares a remedy-making against the Drûg who is in the world]; on account of which saying for his word of piety which he utters, they give him a good abode []. (The glosses are often from a later hand and erroneous. Sometimes, however, they contain the truth while the text is futile. I drop them in the present citations when they are of no importance.)

³ Observe that Zarathustra, like other prophets, met at times little honour from his fellow-countrymen who are here well represented by the voice of the Kine's Soul. (See Y. XLVI, 1.)

⁴ Or could not hôi be taken in a reflective sense, and referred to the first person like the possessive sve; see the connection.

⁵ Verbatim. Thereupon-and the Kine's Soul wept: (I) who Zarathustra¹.

10. Do ye, O Ahura and thou, O Righteousness! grant gladness unto these (our disciples), and the sovereign Kingdom (of the Deity) such as (is established) in (His) Good Mind by which one bestows upon them the peaceful amenities of home and quiet happiness (as against the fearful ravages which they suffer²), for of these, O Great Creator! I ever thought Thee first possessor³!

11. And when shall the (Divine) Righteousness, the Good Mind (of the Lord, and His) Sovereign Power (come) hastening⁴ to me (to give me strength for my task and mission), O Great Creator, the Living Lord! (For without his I cannot advance (lament) one-not-able-to-effect-his-wish in-wounding as-a-master (or, I established?) [], whom as-against I-wish one wish-controlling-and-effecting-as-a-sovereign. When ever he may-(shall)-be who to her (possibly to-me-myself?) shall-give effected-by-the-hand help.

¹ Zarathustra, having accepted his call to be the Ratu or his substitute, at once interposes with a prayer for his suffering charge.

² See verse 1, to which reference is continually made as the chief expression of the sufferings to be remedied.

³ The Pahlavi without glosses may be rendered as follows: Give ye assistance to these, O Aûharmazd, Ashavahist and Khshatraver! So also Vohûman, who gives him a pleasing habitation, and also joy. I also think that the first gain and obtaining of this is from thee. (With the gloss slightly different; but valman should be rendered according to ahyâ.)

The text literally is as follows: (Do) ye to these, O Ahura! happiness (? possibly strength; see the Pahlavi) grant, O Asha! Khshathra-and (=the Kingdom) such (kingdom as) by Vohu Manah by-which amenities peaceful-joy-and (one) may give-or-establish; I-even of this, O Mazda! Thee I thought foremost possessor.

⁴ So the Pahlavi translation indicates; compare gimâ and frâ man (?) mathâ; otherwise mâmashâ = I hasten (to fulfil my mission).

or undertake my toil.) Do ye now therefore assign unto us your aid and in abundance¹ for our great cause. May we be (partakers) of the bountiful grace of these your equals² (your counsellors and servants)³!

¹ The Pahlavi has kabed. For the fundamental idea compare prāksh + suffix.

² The Ameshōspends just mentioned, together with whom Ahura governs and blesses His people. Ahmâ (so conjecturing with Barth.), is also quite sufficiently indicated by the lanman of the Pahlavi. Whether an instrumental zhmâ can be accepted is doubtful. The form should be altered.

If zhmâ stands, istem must be understood, or the instrumental taken in a possessive sense.

Ahmâ has no authority from MSS., but is better than anghâmâ, as being nearer the MSS.

³ As an impartial specimen I render Ner. thus: Whence will that gift come to me, (the gift which is) Asavahista, Gvahmana, and Saharevara, [that is, sanctity, the highest (best) mind, and the sovereignty, where is the place of the reward which will thus come to me?]. (Here the translation falls into confusion from an error which is most interesting and instructive, because it is corrected by Ner. in an alternative rendering in the gloss. As has been seldom noticed his original was the Pahlavi word pâdâdahisnfnêd, rather than the Gâthic paitî-zânatâ. This Pahlavi form he could not at first believe to be a second plural. Indeed the Pahlavi glossist may have taken it as a third sg. Neryosangh therefore abortively renders word-for-word as follows: You, O Great Wise One! it offers or presents more excellently through the 'greatest exaltation' (the holy cause). But he recovers himself in the gloss by reading the Pahlavi pâdâdahisnō vâdûnyên as an imperative: [Provide a reward through that spotless exaltation (the irreproachable cause)] continuing: Here, O Lord! is the gift (which is) ours, and (which comes) to us from Thee.)

YASNA XXVIII.

PRAYERS CHIEFLY FOR GRACE AND FOR THE WORDS OF REVELATION.

2. Zarathustra, having entered upon the duties of his office (XXIX, 11), composes a liturgy for the use of some of his more eminent colleagues, possibly, but not at all probably, for the original mover in the entire religious effort (see the expressions 'to Zarathustra and to us,' 'to Vîstâspâ and to me,' 'to Frashaostra and to me'). This reciter, whoever he may have been intended to be, is represented as standing in the appropriate place as a priest, with hands stretched toward Ahura, or His Fire, and praying for the possession of spiritual graces from an unselfish motive, and in order that he might appease the grief of the Kine's Soul, for whose relief Zarathustra had just been appointed (see XXIX, 1, 6, 8).

3. He approaches Ahura Mazda, spiritually inspired by the Good Mind as he declares, and asking for attainments and boons for both the bodily and spiritual lives, derived from Righteousness, whereby that personified Righteousness might establish the elect in a beatified state.

4. The personality of the Ameshôspends comes again strongly forward, as it does so often in worship, in addresses in which Righteousness (Asha), the Good Mind (Vohu Manah), Khshathra (the active Power of the Divine Sovereignty), and Âramaiti (practical piety in the souls of believers), are besought to come, as the Vedic Gods so often are, to the appeals of the suppliant, and to his help in the act of worship itself, which is recognised to be the one efficient means for furthering the cause of redemption which is ever held in view.

5. As one who offered his soul to heaven, and would know by actual experience the blessed rewards bestowed by the holy ceremonial and moral actions prescribed by Ahura Mazda, the reciter declares that he will teach on in the effort to propagate the holy Religious Order, and possessed by the one desire for its increase, while power shall last.

6. With a piety as fervent as it is profound, and speaking with great earnestness, he asks Righteousness, as a person, when he shall see him, becoming fully acquainted with the Good Mind of God, the way which leads to Him, and above all with Obedience. But although he addresses these lofty abstractions as persons, it is utterly out of the question to suppose that he did not speak in the deepest meaning of the words as expressing states of mind, and qualities of character : O thou Divine Righteous Order ! (Thus he seems to have meant), O thou divine Righteous Order ! when shall I see Thee as if present in my own soul and in those of the people whom Ahura has committed to my charge ? When shall I know the Divine Benevolence as made one with the disposition of my congregation ? When shall I possess by knowledge that only way to our most bountiful Ahura which is, not a mythical angel Sraosha only, but that angel interpreted 'Obedience to Ahura' (observe the dative). One cannot well exaggerate the religious depth or subjectivity. Then, with a bathos which shows how then as ever superstition could hold its own side by side with the truest piety, he exclaims (if the third line was really so composed by him as it has come down to us); 'By such a prayer as a Māthra spell we can with the greatest vigour repel the unclean beasts and creatures which defile our sanctity, or endanger our lives.'

7. Alluding immediately to this revelation, he beseeches Ahura once more to 'come with His Good Mind,' and to grant, not booty, nor even wealth, but 'Asha-gifts,' and (as a bestower of righteousness) long life and powerful spiritual grace to the leading agent Zarathustra (in all probability the composer of the section), and to himself, the officiating priest with his helpers, in order that, not with carnal weapons, but by his 'lofty' and holy 'words,' they all combined may overcome the torments of the ravagers who had made havoc of the settlements, and who were still liable to overwhelm the faithful with their raids and rapine (see XLIV, 20).

8. With an intentional and interesting alliteration he prays to Asha for an ashi ; that is, a blessing, even the strenuously attained-to gifts of the great Benevolence. Āramaiti likewise becomes the object of his petition together with Ahura ; and this time for the benefit of Vistāspa the monarch, and for himself that they might hear the gracious Māthras, which is indeed the burden of the entire piece.

9. Once more he affords an early (or the earliest (?)) instance of the rhetorical trick, and fills one line with three 'vahistas,' praying Ahura, as being of one mind with Asha (here, for the first time in the Avesta, called 'the best'), to grant the same blessing ; and this time again with an intentional change, 'to himself and to Frashaostra ;' and not for this world, but for 'all the duration of the Good Mind,' using the expression in its concrete sense as heaven ; for heaven to him consisted in an inward state. (So also elsewhere in the Avesta, even where the palate and the olfactory nerve are the media of felicity or of torture, there also conciliating language on the one side, or 'vile speech' pointed with finest irony on the other, is equally prominent. It is the mind which chiefly enjoys or suffers.)

10. Deeply sensible of the spiritual benefits for which he is asking, he seems touched with gratitude. Accordingly he adds one more petition, which is, that he and his coadjutors, the three just mentioned, may never anger the indulgent mercy which had granted them their request; and that they may persevere, as they have begun, in the strenuous service of Ahura, Asha, and Vohu Manah. For they are, as he declares, easy to be entreated, and beings who desire to bestow spiritual blessings upon mortals, rather than to exercise merely capricious favour or cruelty, and who also possess the power to bring their benevolence to effect.

11. As if unwilling to trust his own perception as to his real spiritual needs, he prays Ahura 'to fill up his desire,' not with what he, the reciter, may in particular request, but with what He, Ahura, knows to be the gifts of Righteousness and the divine Benevolence. And these gifts are again mainly the holy revelation, for he knows, so he earnestly declares, the words of those mighty three to be never void, and to be a sustenance able indeed to fill up his wishes, giving him more than he has of himself either the intelligence or the grace to ask.

12. Having added, in verse after verse, some particular to heighten the fervour of his request, he sums up all in a final expression, as remarkable for its earnestness as for its depth, and begs Ahura, as one set for ever for the defence of the Righteous Order and the Good Mind (whose hallowed influences he accurately foresaw were destined to endure for ages), to tell him, with His very 'voice of spirit,' in order that he may declare them to the waiting masses, the laws which pervade the moral universe, and according to which it arose. For according to these holy principles and so alone, could he promulgate a system which might reclaim society from its imperfections and the Iranian saint from his sufferings. } Ahura who, be it remarked, is alone addressed in this culminating verse, hears and answers by a revelation of these eternal principles, and this answer is contained in chapter XXX. By a thorough comprehension of that most important document, I hold that we may see how it met its purpose as indicated by the capacities and needs of those to whom it was addressed, and how by discriminating truth from falsehood it helped on the defence of Asha, and the founding of the true Benevolence.

Translation.

1. (A strengthening blessing¹ is the thought, a blessing is the word, a blessing is the deed of the righteous Zarathustra. May the Bountiful Immortals² accept and help on³ the chants. Homage to you, O sacred Gâthas⁴!)

2. With venerating (desire) for this (gift) of gracious help, O Mazda⁵, and stretching forth my hands (to Thee) I pray for the first (blessing) of (Thy) bountiful Spirit; (that is, I beseech of Thee that my) actions

¹ Yânim cannot well mean 'revealed,' except by the most far-fetched conception. The Indian yâna, as in devayâna, should give the fundamental idea, easily reconcilable as it is with the ancient rendering of the Pahlavi translator.

² Notice that the Amesbôspends are mentioned in this early heading. In the Gâthas themselves the name, 'Bountiful Immortals,' does not occur.

³ Possibly, 'take up and continue on the Gâthas.' Literally, 'seize forth.'

⁴ It is hardly necessary to say that this is no part of the Gâthas. It is, however, in the Gâthic dialect, and as it needs not, or perhaps cannot, be considered an intentional imitation, it must be very old.

⁵ Vocative with the Vendîdâd Sâdah, otherwise the accumulation of genitives would be suspicious. Ahura is, however, beyond any question elsewhere spoken of as 'the most bounteous Spirit.' The usage is like that of the Semitic scriptures; the Holy Spirit is both God and 'of God.' As to the rendering 'bounteous,' I fear that 'holiest' (so many) is too bold. Ashavan occurs side by side with spenta as applied to Ahura, and ashavan cannot mean 'righteous' there, but must mean 'holy.' The Pahlavi renders etymologically afzûnîk. Comp. svânta. The sole etymological bases for the meaning 'holy' are presented by the Lithuanian and Ecclesiastical Slavonic; but, as Justi has well remarked, in the conceptions of the Avesta that which increases the kingdom of Ahura is equivalent to what is holy. 'Bountiful' must therefore be understood in a particular sense, only to be rendered by the words, 'gracious, sacred, and august.'

(toward) all (may be performed) in (the Divine) Righteousness; and with this I implore from Thee the understanding of Thy Benevolent Mind, in order that I may propitiate the Soul of the Kine¹ (our herds and folk, which cries so bitterly to Thee).

3. And therefore, O Great Creator, the Living Lord! (inspired) by Thy Benevolent Mind, I approach You², (and beseech of Thee³) to grant me (as a bountiful gift) for both the worlds, the corporeal and (for that) of mind, those attainments which are to be derived from the (Divine) Righteousness, and by means of which (that personified Righteousness⁴ within us) may introduce those who are its recipients into beatitude and glory⁵!

4. O (thou Divine) Righteousness, and thou Be-

¹ See Y. XXIX, 1.

² The plural of majesty, or the literal plural, referring to the Bountiful Immortals as together.

³ Plural and singular interchange throughout.

⁴ Possibly, 'one may introduce.'

⁵ See Y. L, 5. Hvâthrâ and its allied forms are so often associated with raoḥah and the like, that I do not hesitate to accept an Iranian hvan=to shine (with Justi). As there is an Indian svar which means 'to roar,' and another 'to shine,' and again a svan=to sound, so in Iranian there is a hvan=to sound, and another=to shine, as in asmanem hvanvantem. The 'comfortable stone heaven' is difficult. Comfortable, or even 'delectable mountains' (so we should have to say elsewhere), are not very likely to have been recognised or appreciated in the Avesta. 'Glorious beatitude' is a better rendering here. If hvâthrâ always means 'comfort,' how comes it that hvarəno is said to be hvâthrava? 'Comfortable glory' is hardly probable. Compare also the ancient subha. When it is the fashion to accept a separate Iranian root at every difficulty, small and great, I see no reason for stopping here, where the pressure is considerable. The Pahlavi also may be read to favour my view. (Comp. hveng=hvan.)

nevolent Mind (of Deity)! I will worship you, and Ahura Mazda the first¹, for all of whom the Pious ready mind (within us) is² causing the imperishable Kingdom to advance. (And while I thus utter my supplications to You), come Ye to my calls to help³!

5. (Yea, I will approach You with my supplications, I) who am delivering up (my)⁴ mind and soul to that (heavenly) Mount (whither all the redeemed at last must pass⁵), knowing (full well) the holy characteristics and rewards⁶ of the (ceremonial and moral) actions (prescribed) by Ahura Mazda. (And)

¹ Or, 'having no first' (Roth, reading apourvim).

² I am very far from a positive rejection of the forms suggested by the Pahlavi translator, although he should never be pressed on such a point, being often free. As alternative read 'may Piety who bestows increase (fem. participle) come to my calls to give grace.'

³ The Pahlavi translator, unable to credit 'ye as=I who' (so also modern authority sometimes with regard to other occurrences of ye in this chapter), renders as follows: When I shall be your own (thus for 'worship,' and possibly deceived by the form of the words, ufyânî and nafsman being nearly alike in the Pahlavi character), O Ashavahist and Vohûman! the first [], Aûharmazd's also [his own I shall be], through whose unweakened acquisition his rule over them exists [], and [hers also I shall be], Spendarmad's, the giver of increase. She comes to me with joy when I invoke her [when I shall call upon you, come ye on toward me with joy]. (A plain and noticeable instance of an alternative rendering in the gloss. The verb was first thought of as a 3rd sing. middle subjunctive, afterwards as an imperative and plural.)

⁴ Meñ = m + the nasal vowel, and may represent man, or I think also mãm, adverbially for mênâ; or 'mân' = 'demânê.'

⁵ Mount Alborg, where the Kînvaf Bridge extends; so also important authority; but we might read mêngairê = mângairê (Garôdman).

⁶ Ashi, a blessing given in reward; so elsewhere.

so long as I am able and may have the power, so long will I teach¹ (Your people concerning these holy deeds to be done by them with faith toward God, and) in the desire (for the coming) of the (Divine) Righteousness (within their souls)².

6. And, thou Righteousness! when shall I see³ thee, knowing the Good Mind (of God), and (above all the personified) Obedience⁴ (of our lives which constitutes) the way⁵ to the most beneficent Ahura Mazda. (Asking this, I thus beseech thee, for) with this holy word of supplication we most hold off⁶ with tongue the flesh-devouring fiends, (the very sign and power of all spiritual foulness)⁷!

¹ I think it is better to hold by the parallel passage and the sense of 'teach' here. The Pahlavi has an irregular form which probably means 'I teach,' but might be intended for 'I am taught.'

After the words 'so long as I have the power,' 'I will teach' is rather more natural than 'I will learn.' Haug's rendering of this word has never been accepted. Those most opposed to tradition follow it here. Perhaps, 'I will teach to desire R.'

² The Pahlavi translation corrected by MSS. may be rendered thus: He who gives up his soul within Garôdmân does so by the aid of Vohûman [], and is also intelligent concerning the veneration which belongs to the doers of good works [] in that which is Aûtharmazd's [religion]; as long as I am a suppliant and have the power, so long do I inculcate the desire of Righteousness [which is, duty and good works].

³ Kadâ mriîkâm sumânâ abhî khyam (Rv. VII, 86, 2).

⁴ Obedience, throughout the Avesta and Parsi literature, guides the soul to heaven.

⁵ Or, 'knowing the throne of Ahura' (so the Pahlavi, most scholars following); but the construction would be awkward. 'Finding the way' occurs in the Rîks, and gâtu need not always mean 'place' in the Gâthic, because it has that sense most frequently in the Zend.

⁶ Possibly, 'we may teach the foul polluted men.' Or, 'confess the greatest One with Khrafstra(-slaying) tongue.' Perhaps the text is to be amended; yet see XXXIV, 5, 9.

⁷ The Pahlavi translation may be rendered thus: O Ashavahist! when do (shall) I see thee? I know this one by means

7. And do Thou, O Lord, the Great Creator! come to me with Thy Good Mind; and do Thou, who bestowest gifts through Thy Righteousness, bestow alike long-lasting life on us. And (that this life may be spent aright, do) Thou by means of Thy lofty words (bestow) the (needed) powerful spiritual help upon Zarathustra and upon us¹, whereby we may overcome² the torments of the tormentor.

8. (And) do thou, O (Divine) Righteousness, bestow (upon me) that sacred blessing which is constituted by the attainments of the Good Mind (within my soul)³; and do thou also, O Piety! grant unto of a good mind's instruction [that is, I see thee in that time when every man is intelligent because he is pious; but when shall it be?]. And the place of Aðharmazd, when do (shall) I see it, I who am a suppliant for a benefit? That place is known through Srôsh [], that greatest of Māthras is to be taught, given forth with tongue to him whose understanding is confused.

¹ It certainly involves a question how the words 'to Zarathustra and to us' can be compatible with Zarathustra's authorship. Vîstâspa and Frashaostra (verses 8, 9) are equally excluded. Who is then the individual who thus refers to himself with others? And is this verse an interpolation, and with it 8 and 9? This last seems to me a very feeble suggestion. Was this piece, together with the rest (for they all are connected), the work of some unnamed man of influence, the true author of Zarathustrianism? I think that there is also little gained by this supposition. There is no particular reason why Zarathustra's name should have come down to us as the chief figure, while that of the prime mover failed to reach us. I should say that the piece was composed by Zarathustra and put into the mouth of a leading priest, or that it was composed with many others under his inspiration. Or, can there have been a school, or family, of Zarathustrians, religious poets, similar to the Vedic seers? (See chap. LIII, 2 Zarathustris Spitâmô.)

² This mention of 'overcoming an enemy,' strengthens the probability of my view of vâvarôimaidî (vâurôimaidî).

³ The Good Mind is now, as we should say, 'the Spirit of God' in the mind of God, and again His Spirit in the human soul.

Vistâspa and to me our wish ; (yea) may'st Thou grant (us), O Mazda, ruler¹ (as Thou art ! that grace) whereby we may hear² (with understanding) Thy benignant words.

9. That best (of gifts therefore) do I beseech (of Thee), O Thou best (of beings) Ahura ! who art one in will with (Thy Divine) Righteousness (within us, likewise), the best³ (of spirits), desiring it (as I now do) for the (heroic) man Frashaostra, and for me⁴, upon whom also may'st Thou bestow it (not for time alone), but for all the ages of Thy Good Mind (that reign of Thy Benevolence which shall be to us as Heaven⁵) !

¹ The Pahlavi correctly renders pâdakhshâ.

² Probably originally heard, inspired words. Compare Manyus haâ Thwâ æunghâ, verse 12. So often. Oral communications are figuratively alluded to everywhere. No literal articulation or sound (!) is of course intended. (Or 'srayaêmâ=proclaim.')

Neryosangh may be rendered as follows : Grant, O Sanctity ! this devotion which (results) from the priority (an error from misreading the characters of the Pahlavi, chiefly his original) of the Good Mind [that is, make me so religious that prosperity may result to me from my good conduct]. Grant thou to the perfect mind [in, or to, the earth (so the Parsis understood Âramaiti)] the wish that proceeds from Gustâspa and from my people []. Grant praisers, O great wise One ! kings, who may be announcers of your word, and bestowers of arrangements (for the service) ; [that is, who may teach thy word, and render it progressive].

³ The earliest occurrence of Asha Vahista. The Pahlavi : 'Since the best thing that Thou hast [Thy Religion] is better than all other things, the best through Righteousness.'

⁴ See verses 7 and 8.

⁵ In the millennial (sic) renovation as well as in heaven. See chap. XXX, 4, where Vahista Manah is equivalent to heaven. The Pahlavi gloss has : Aigh Frashôstar va hâvistân î Frashôstar, vad tanû î pasîno hamâi nadûkîh padar vâdûn ; that is, for Frashôstar and the disciples of Frashôstar for ever, until the final body provide a benefit thereby.

10. And (impressed and moved) by these gifts of strengthening grace¹ (which Thou may'st give in answer to these prayers) may we never anger You, O Ahura Mazda! (nor Thy) Righteousness (within us), nor yet Thy Kindly Mind (toward us), since we have most earnestly made effort (helping to advance Your cause) in the (chanted)² offering of Your praisers, for most easy to be invoked (are Ye). (Yours are verily both) the desire for (spiritual) blessings (for us), and the (Divine) Possession (of their power)³.

11. And therefore do Thou, O Lord, the Great Creator! fill up and satisfy (my⁴) desire with these attainments (of the grace) of Thy Good Mind, which Thou dost know to be derived from Righteousness, (and) which (are verily) sublime⁵, for I have known⁶

¹ Possibly, 'may we not anger you with our prayers for these blessings.' Kīm me havyám áhrinâno gusheta.

² That dasemê may now better be referred to a similar root with dasvare, I regard the more probable because the Pahlavi also freely renders as if it so understood. Its author knew the meaning of dasema=dasama. One is reminded of course of the dâra-gva.

³ The Pahlavi with its peculiar view of anâis (not to be rejected too confidently; see note at another occurrence of it) is interesting (as corrected by the Persian MS.): On account of a not-coming to you, O Aûharmazd! This I would not do []. Ashavahist also I will not pain for the sake of a blessing; [that is, I do not desire a single blessing which appears displeasing to Ashavahist (this turn of the sense is followed by some who have hitherto opposed tradition, but I cannot follow it, although I value every hint of the ancient writers). Also Vohûman, the excellent [I do not harass him].

⁴ Or, 'to those whom thou seest as creatures (?) of V. fill up the desire with attainments.'

⁵ Possibly, 'the righteous,' erethweng; cp. ritâvânas (?). Pahl. trans. 'î frârnô.' ⁶ Possibly, 'I obtain.'

Thine instructions to be never void¹ of their effect (in the struggles) for our (daily) food², and therefore worthy objects of desire³.

12. (Yea, I approach Thee with my prayers, I) who by these (great gifts of grace) will⁴ protect (Thy) Divine Righteousness, and (Thy) Good Mind (within us) for ever. And do Thou therefore, O Ahura Mazda! teach me from Thyself, yea, from Thine own mouth of spirit, that I may declare it forth to (these Thy waiting people) by what (powers and according to what laws⁵) the primeval world arose⁶!

¹ Ner. has analaso(-aḥ) for asūnâ more correctly than the Pahlavi asūdak.

² Or, 'well reaching their aim;' but the Pahlavi translator gives his evidence for the meaning 'food' = khûrisnō. Recall the constant prayers for nourishment in the Rîks. And as favouring the ancient translation, see XXIX, 7, where 'food for the eaters' is declared to be the gift of God, who is at the same time 'bounteous with his doctrine.'

³ Neryosangh: Evam ye dharmasya vettâraḥ * uttamasyaḥ dâter manasaḥ [] ekahelayâ * Mahâgñânin Svâmin! tebhyaḥ * pûrnam pariṇohi * kâmam; [kila, [] subham tebhyaḥ kuru]. Evamka igisneḥ * analaso labhatâm khâdyâni vastrâṇika vadanena.

⁴ One is tempted to read nipauṅghé as an infinitive, but the Pahlavi translation anticipates us all with its more critical barâ netrûnam.

⁵ This question is answered in Y. XXX.

⁶ Ner. improving upon the Pahlavi has as follows: Yadi sunirîk-shanatayâ dharmam pâlayâmi manaskâ * uttamam sadâpravṛttaye; [kila, ket satyasya sadvyâpârasyaḥ rakshâm karomi]. Tvam tat * Mahâgñânin Svâmin! prakṛisham me śikshâpaya * [] vâti. Adṛiṣya Tvatto mukhena [sphuṣaya] antar bhuvane pûrvaṁ babhûva [tâm srishîm me brûhi].

A translation truly remarkable considering the circumstances under which it was made.

YASNA XXX.

THE DOCTRINE OF DUALISM.

1. Accustomed to instruct the masses who throng him on public occasions seeking light, the composer constructs this hymn for similar opportunities. He may be regarded as continuing the thoughts in the close of Y. XXVIII, where he besought Ahura to inform him concerning the origin of the world. He says that he will declare the counsels of God, by which, as we see, he means the great doctrines concerning the origin of good and evil. With these he will declare also the praises, the laudatory portions of the Māthra, and the sacrifices. And he prays that propitious results may be discerned in the heavenly bodies.

2. He further introduces what he has to say by telling the throngs before him that a decisive moment is upon them. They are to choose their religion, and not by acclamation with the foolish decision of a mob, but man by man, each individually for himself. They should therefore arouse themselves and hear with all attention, and gaze at the holy Fire with a good and receptive disposition of mind.

3. He then delivers the earliest statement of dualism which has come down to us. There were two original spirits, and they are called, be it well noted, not two persons, or at least not only two persons, but a better thing, or principle, and a worse one. (The qualifying words are all in the neuter¹.)

At the next sentence they are personified as a pair, each independent in his thoughts, declarations, and actions. Such is the short Theodicy, followed at once by an admonition to those before him to choose the better.

4. These two spirits came together as by natural combination, to make the opposing phenomena of life and its absence, of Heaven and of Hell.

And Hell is described not as a scene of cruelty inflicted on the innocent and the ignorant, but as 'the worst life,' and Heaven as equally remote from a superstitious paradise; that is, as the 'best mental state.'

¹ It is also noticeable that the name Angra Mainyu does not occur in this section.

This is the proper Zarathustrian creation. It is undeniably 'abstract,' very, and just in proportion as it lacks colour and myth are its depths visible. The account of it is also very limited. But it must never be forgotten that its existence is the probable proof that very much more of the kind existed beside it. Instead of there being one hymn sung like this, Y. XXX, there were probably many. The two original forces or beings, although separate clearly, come together; but they do not lose their distinction. Their difference remains as clear as their union. 5. They do not blend unrecognisably; for having created the two principles, they choose each his own particular realm. Ahura chooses the righteous order of religion, and with it the pious of all ages. The evil spirit chooses the wicked.

The point and meaning of the entire doctrine is that a good God cannot be responsible for permanent evil; that imperfection and suffering are original, and inherent in the nature of things, and permanently so. The swallowing up of sin and sorrow in ultimate happiness belongs to a later period. It is not Gāthic Zarathustrianism. Evil was the work of an independent being.

The great thinker saw his point; and it was that the Deity Himself could not prevent the evolution of base and revolting moral qualities with their consequent miseries in both victim and aggressor. An evil God was therefore their author.

6. But the blood-feuds of War, not to speak of the theological animosity, were too much for his philosophy. The sage could not regard all men and their circumstances with broad and equable impartiality.

The hated Daêva-worshippers, who were doubtless equally conscientious with the Zarathustrians, are said to have failed of correct discernment.

As they were deliberating, so he recalls, the Worst Mind, a very real although 'abstract' Satan, came upon them, to induce them to choose him and his evil realm. They acceded, becoming furious in their intention to injure human life. This may be regarded as a dramatic, but at the same time, in a moral sense, a philosophical statement of a temptation and fall. (For a later one, with more colour and less truth, see the temptation proper of Zarathustra himself¹, recalling as it does so vividly the temptation in the Gospels.)

7. If we can accept the words ahmâikâ to mean merely 'upon this,' we may hold that the statements proceed without a break. Even a gap of lost verses does not interrupt the sense. The clothing of souls with bodies seems indicated. If so, the doctrine of the Fravashis, otherwise foreign to the Gâthas, may have its origin by inference here, and directly in verse 4. After the creation and first activity of the souls of the Archangels on the one hand, and of the Daêvas on the other, together with their respective human adherents, the one choosing good and the other evil, the remaining Ameshôspends unite with Âramaiti in bestowing a body upon the newly created soul. (So we must conclude from the language.) And the prophet breaks in with the prayer that in the future, and possibly at the Frashakar², the completion of progress, these created souls might possess such advantages as they had when Ahura came at first with his acts of creation; that is, that they might be restored again to a state of sinless happiness, provided with bodies by Âramaiti as at the first. (See Yast XIX, 89.)

¹ Comp. Vd. XIX, 1-10. Consider how much time would be required for the name of Zarathrustra to become so involved in myth.

8. But, as he implies, and perhaps expresses in a lost verse, vengeance shall come upon the wretched beings who choose the Evil Mind as their master. And it shall come, not in the abstract merely by any means, but as executed by a numerous, if not once predominant party, 'the offspring of the Evil Mind.' And when this shall have been completed (and XXXI, 18 shows us that the weapons to be used to bring it about were not to be those of verbal argument alone) then, as he declares with enthusiasm, 'to God shall be the Kingdom,' a Kingdom established in the Divine Benevolence, which will pervade its organic life, and which will likewise, as the personified 'Immortal,' utter encouragements and commands to its loyal citizens. And these citizens will then not only defeat the Lie-demon, who is the life of the Daêva-party, but they will deliver her up as a captive to the great Genius of Truth, the personified Righteousness. 9. And, as he ardently hoped for the coming of the Kingdom into the hands of Ahura, he as ardently beseeches that he and his coadjutors, the princes already named, may be honoured as the immediate agents in bringing on this 'millennial' completion; nay, he even prays that they may be as Ahuras¹ in merciful services, declaring that all their thoughts were centred in that scene where religious light dwelt as personified in her home.

10. Once more he announces the certain defeat and chastisement of the incarnate falsehood and her adherents, which enables him only the more impressively to describe the rapid reunion of the righteous amid the home-happiness of Heaven.

¹ As the Ahuras of Mazda, the Ameshôspends.

11. Having delivered his brief but weighty communication, he commends his hearers for learning the holy vows of the Religion on account of the duration of the announced rewards and punishments. They shall be long indeed; and upon their complete inauguration full salvation shall be realised for those who shall have learned and heeded the invaluable truths.

Translation.

1. And now I will proclaim, O ye who are drawing near and seeking¹ to be taught! those animadversions² which appertain to Him who knows (all things) whatsoever; the praises which are for Ahura, and the sacrifices (which spring) from the Good Mind, and likewise the benignant meditations inspired by Righteousness. And I pray³ that propitious results may be seen in the lights.

¹ As 'ish' means approaching with desire, the Pahlavi translator has, freely, khvahîsnō.

² Read māzdathâ.

³ So with long ê; but yaêkâ (P¹¹ supported by the Pahl.) may be the lost dual neuter of the pronoun, referring to the two principles discussed below. Yê*kâ=I pray for, although the most natural rendering grammatically, does not seem so well adapted here, as a prayer for the success of his communication does not harmonise with the otherwise dogmatic statements of the composer. The urvâtâ (vrata) founded upon the doctrine of dualism bring about salvation. They may therefore be touched upon in this introductory verse. And that the heavenly bodies contained indications bearing directly or indirectly upon human destiny seems to have been early an accepted doctrine. (Compare also chap. XXIX, 3, where 'the lofty fires' seem alluded to as moved by the Deity, and this in immediate connection with the discussion of the most important problems concerning the fate of the holy community.) It is, however, not impossible that the lights of the altar may have been meant. (See sûtâ in the second verse.) The Pahlavi translation

2. Hear ye then with your ears; see ye the bright flames¹ with the (eyes of the) Better Mind. It is for a decision as to religions, man and man, each individually for himself. Before the great effort of the cause, awake ye² (all) to our³ teaching!

3. Thus are the primeval spirits who as a pair⁴ (combining their opposite strivings), and (yet each) independent in his action, have been famed (of old). (They are) a better thing, they two, and a worse⁵, as to thought, as to word, and as to deed. And between these two let the wisely acting choose aright. (Choose ye⁶) not (as) the evil-doers⁷!

has dên rôshanô pavan vênisnô hû-ravâkh-manîh. As to yê*¹â or yaê²â, the Pahlavi does not favour a verbal form. But if the pronoun is accepted, even then change is needed; yaê²â yâ=yé³ka yéna is hardly possible. We should be obliged to render: And which two things (were those?) whereby (adverbially) propitious results have been seen in the stars. Others have experienced difficulty, and even ashayaê⁴â(?) has been conjecturally suggested for this place and chap. LI, 2. Neither Sp. nor Westg. report a long ê.

¹ Gôshânô srûd nyôkhshisnîh [aighas gôsh barâ varammûnd]—Zak î rôshanô. Otherwise 'with the eye;' but see yâ raoêbîs daresatâ urvâzâ. The altar-flame would not unnaturally be mentioned after the heavenly lights.

² Literally, '(be ye) wakeful.'

³ Hardly, 'to teach us.' Possibly, 'to teach this, each one.'

⁴ Pahl. transcribes. Notice that paouruyê (pourviyê) is neut.* as are vahyô and akemâ, which is not lightly to be passed over.

⁵ The Pahlavi freely: Benaſsman—[aighânô vinâs va kirkak benaſsman barâ yemalelûnd]. They announced themselves as sin and good works. Ner. yau punyam pâpamka svayam avokatâm.

⁶ Barâ vigîd. Ner. vibhaktavân*. If a third plural subjunctive, still the force is as if imperative. Possibly it is preterit.

⁷ On this important verse I cite Neryosangh. He may be rendered as follows: Thus the two spirits [Hormigda and Âharmana] who uttered first in the world each his own (principle); [that is, who each uttered, one his own good (deed), and the other his own sin], these were a pair, in thought, word, and deed, a highest

* Adverb (?).

4. (Yea) when the two spirits came together at the first to make¹ life, and life's absence², and to determine how the world at the last shall be (ordered), for the wicked (Hell) the worst life, for the holy (Heaven) the Best Mental State³,

5. (Then when they had finished each his part in the deeds of creation, they chose distinctly each his separate realm.) He who was the evil of them both (chose the evil), thereby working⁴ the worst of possible results, but the more bounteous spirit⁵ chose the

and a degraded one. And of these two, the one endowed with good intelligence [] was the distinguisher of the true, and not the one endowed with evil intelligence []. (Both he and the Pahlavi fail to credit a plural form in eres vîshyâtâ with Spiegel and Hübschmann.)

The Gâthic verbatim. Yea (=thereupon) the-two the-two-spirits the-two-first-things which-two two-twins two-self-acting-ones were-heard-of in-thought in-word-and in-deed these-two a-better an-evil-and. Of-which-two-and the wisely-acting (ones) aright may discern, not the evil-acting ones.

¹ The Pahlavi read as an infinitive, dazdê=avô zak dahîsnô. (So also an important authority recently.) Otherwise it has the place of a third dual perfect; 'they two made.' The place of an infinitive is not generally at the end of a sentence in Gâthic. Can it be simply a third singular? '(Each) makes' (kamasâ karôti).

² Pavan zendakîh—va mûnik azendakîh. Ner. gîvitenakâ agîvitenakâ. Observe the singular abstract agyâitîmkâ, which is not lightly to be passed over. Why not a more ordinary expression? Have we not here an unusual antithesis? The danger is great that by aiming to reduce all to commonplace for the sake of safety, we may demolish many an interesting conception of antiquity.

³ Observe the subjectivity. These verses settle the question as to the depth of the Zarathustrian hymns. Grammar forces us to see that the composer had large ideas. The entire cast of reflection in the Gâthas tends to be abstract as well as subjective. Not so their invective and partisan exhortations.

⁴ Verezyô is a nom. sing. masc., as would seem natural from its position in the sentence. Compare mâthraîs verezyâis.

⁵ Observe that Ahura is undoubtedly called spenista mainyu. Elsewhere we must sometimes render, 'His bountiful spirit.'

(Divine) Righteousness; (yea, He so chose) who clothes upon Himself the firm¹ stones of heaven (as His robe). And He chose likewise them who content Ahura with actions, which (are performed) really in accordance with the faith².

6. And between these two spirits the Demon-gods (and they who give them worship) can make no righteous choice³, since we have beguiled⁴ them. As they were questioning and debating in their council⁵ the (personified⁶) Worst Mind approached them that he might be chosen. (They made their

¹ Zak † sakht sag nihūftō āsmāniš. Ner. Gādhātaram * ākāsam dadau.

² 'Who with actions really good piously content Ahura.' Let it be noticed that fraore/ is not independently translated by the Pahlavi. It is freely included in avō Aūharmazd; and yet this is supposed by some to be a word-for-word rendering! Ner. prakatāišta karmabhiš.

Verbatim. Of-these-two spirits he-chose-to-himself (he)-who (was) the evil (the one) the worst (deeds) working*. The-Righteous-Order (accusative) (chose) the spirit most-bountiful (he)-who the most-firm stones clothes-on-himself, (those) who-and will-content Ahura with real actions believingly Mazda.

(Properly a verbatim rendering is only possible in an inflected language.)

³ Lā rāstō vigīnēnd. They suffer judicial blindness; a common idea in the Gāthas; compare, 'who holds them from the sight of the truth,' &c.

⁴ The root is indicated by va mūniš valmansān frift. I can see no escape from the above rather adventurous rendering. See also dafshnyā hentū in chap. LIII, 8. Perhaps the idea of injury here preponderates over that of deceit; 'since we have impaired their power.' The choice between a preterit or an improper subjunctive is also difficult. Possibly, 'so that we may fatally deceive them.' Poss. nom. 'deception came upon them, even A. M.'

⁵ This recalls Vendīdād XIX, 45, where the demons assemble in council to consider the advent of Zarathustra.

⁶ Compare verse 4, where Vahistem Manō equals heaven. The fatal decision.) And thereupon they rushed together unto the Demon of Fury, that they might pollute¹ the lives of mortals².

7. Upon this³ Âramaiti (the personified Piety of the saints) approached, and with her came the Sovereign Power, the Good Mind, and the Righteous Order. And (to the spiritual creations of good and of evil) Âramaiti gave a body, she the abiding and ever strenuous⁴. And for these (Thy people) so let⁵ (that word is the subject of 'gasat,' and has the proper place of a nominative in the sentence; cp. Vedic usage.

¹ That they might disease (so literally) the lives of those who had not yet been tempted or fallen.

The Pahlavi: Vīmārīnīdō ahvân ī marđūmân [aigh, levatman aēshm anrūtâân ahûkînēnd].

Ner. : Ye nigaghnur bhuvanam manushyânâm.

Hübschmann: 'um durch ihn Plagen über das Leben des Menschen zu bringen.'

² Verbatim. Of these two spirits not aright may choose the Daêvas, since these we have beguiled (or have injured). To the-questioning ones upon came-he in-order-that he might-be-chosen (subjunctive middle) he-the worst mind. Thereupon to-furious-rapine they rushed-together in-order-that (yena) they might disease (or ruin) the-life of-man.

³ Or, 'to him;' some unnamed benefactor; hardly 'to us.' The Pahlavi has, avō valman, but Ner. has only tatraka. Observe ahmâi in chap. XLIII, 1, and in chap. XLVII.

⁴ Root ān=in. The Pahlavi freely, pavan astūbīh. He seems to have thought of nam + a priv.

Kehrpem is feminine. Ānmâ may be a neuter in apposition.

Otherwise we must accept -mâ as a suffix. Or can kehrpem (corpus) be a neuter here? The clothing of the spirits with corporeal natures enabled them to advance in the development of moral qualities by self-restraint and pursuit. As has been observed in the summary, no Fravashis appear in the Gāthas. Have we here possibly an indication of the pre-existence of souls? If Âramaiti gave a body, it may be inferred that a period elapsed between the acts of the two spirits and this.

⁵ That bodies are to be given to the saints as at the first is to body) be (at the last), O Mazda! as it was when Thou camest first with creations¹!

8. And (when the great struggle shall have been fought out which began when the Daêvas first seized the Demon of Wrath as their ally²), and when the (just) vengeance shall have come upon these wretches, then, O Mazda! the Kingdom shall have been gained for Thee by (Thy) Good Mind (within Thy folk). For to those, O living Lord! does (that Good Mind³) utter his command, who will deliver the Demon of the Lie into the two hands⁴ of the Righteous Order (as a captive to a destroyer).

9. And may we be such as those who bring on be inferred from Yast XIX, 89. (Which see in part ii of the translations of the Zend-Avesta.)

¹ Verbatim. To-this (to us?)-and with-Khshathra came, with-Manah Vohu, with Asha-and (Âramaiti) thereupon a-body the-continuing gave Âr(a)maiti the strenuous (Âramaiti, or the body, a vigorous and strenuous thing).

Of these thine (or to thee) to let-it (the body)-be as thou-camest in-creations the-first.

² See verse 6.

³ What else can be the subject of sastî?

⁴ Observe the pronounced personification of Righteousness. As a matter of course the ultimate sense is more commonplace, as is the case with all poetical matter. 'Into the hands of Asha,' is the same as to say, 'into the power of the servant of God.'

But would this be a proper mode of rendering a line of real though rudely primitive poetry? Such renderings are commentary rather than translation. The Pahlavi may be rendered as follows: Thus also in that creation [in the final body] hatred comes to these haters and sinners; [that is, the avengers shall execute chastisement upon them]. And, therefore, O Aûharmazd! what to thee is the sovereignty, by that (so possibly) shall Vohûman give a reward. Through these, O Aûharmazd! [through the religion of Aûharmazd], when one is instructed in Righteousness, [that is, as to the interests of the pious] then the Drûg is given into one's hand, [the Drûg who is Aharmôk].

this great renovation, and make this world progressive, (till its perfection shall have been reached). (As) the Ahuras of Mazda¹ (even) may we be; (yea, like Thyself), in helpful readiness to meet² (Thy people), presenting (benefits³) in union with the Righteous Order. For there⁴ will our thoughts be (tending) where true wisdom shall abide in her home⁵.

10. (And when perfection shall have been attained) then shall the blow of destruction fall upon the Demon of Falsehood, (and her adherents shall perish with her), but swiftest in the happy abode of the Good Mind and of Ahura the righteous saints

¹ Otherwise, 'the Ahura-Mazdas,' or, 'O Mazda and the Ahuras!' I think that the most natural rendering according to the grammar should first be given, notwithstanding something uncommon about it. 'All the Ahura-Mazdas,' has been seen by Roth in chapter XXXI, 4.

² The Pahlavi has the gloss [aighsân hamîshakō hangaman madam tanû î pasîñō kûnîsnō], needlessly enlarged of course, but showing the proper root, which is mi; (so Spiegel.)

³ Or possibly sustaining (the feeble). The Pahlavi reads simply dedrûnîsnō.

⁴ The Pahlavi renders hathrâ in the Indian sense as asâr*, endlessly; so others elsewhere. Hathrâ and yathrâ are of course distinctly in antithesis.

⁵ The Pahlavi mihânō, Persian makân. That maêthâ is an adverbial instrumental meaning, 'in one's home,' seems the more probable from the two hathrâ, yathrâ, adverbs of place. Compare, for instance, athrâ-yathrâ in XLVI, 16, where shaêitî follows. Hübschmann, 'Dort mögen (unsre) Sinne sein, wo die Weisheit thront;' see also husitôis in the next verse.

The Parsi-persian MS. has—Aedûnō (sic) ham mâ kih ân i tû hastam (sic); [kû ân i tû 'hwêr hastam] îñ—rastâ'hiz kardan andar gihân.

(c) Kih—minîsn bêd [kû minîsn pah—dârad] as ângâ dâñât hast [kû, â'hîr i kîz pah nêkî bih dânad] andar makân.

shall gather, they who proceed in their walk (on earth) in good repute¹ (and honour)².

11. Wherefore, O ye men! ye are learning³ (thus) these religious incitations which Ahura gave in (our) happiness⁴ and (our) sorrow⁵. (And ye are also learning) what is the long wounding for the wicked, and the blessings which are in store for the righteous. And when these (shall have begun their course), salvation shall be (your portion⁶)!

¹ Pahlavi, 'mûn vâdûnd zak î sapîr nâmîkîh = they are creating a good repute,' as if zazentê were understood in the sense of produce. See the sense 'bear' as given for hâ, Rig-veda 843, 2 (X, 17). The analogy is, however, not strong.

² The Pahlavi translation may here be rendered as follows: Thus in that dispensation [in the later body] the Drûg [who is Gan-râk Mînavad] will be overthrown [] when (his) host is scattered. Thus they move keenly on [to seize the reward], which is attained through the good citizenship of Vohûman [when they shall have dwelt in piety]. They who are creating a good renown are thus moving on toward Aûharmazd and Ashavahist [that is, the person who is of good repute goes forward to seize the reward].

³ Once more the anomalous form âmûkhtisnô meets us in the Pahlavi. May this not be intended to express 'learning,' whereas âmûzisnô would express 'teaching?' I hardly think so.

⁴ The Pahlavi translation is only remotely if at all responsible for hvîtiâ as = sua sponte. This would require hvîti as = hvâti* with difficulty comparing 'yim' and 'yem'(?). It is generally considered now as = hu + iti; but the letter h = h seems doubtful.

⁵ Read aniti = 'with impeded progress.' 'In prosperity or adversity.' But these are conjectures.

⁶ The Pahlavi: Aêtûnô akhar valmansân aîtô nadûkîh. I do not think that we ought to regard the words of the original as expressing universal restoration. But they may well have given the first indication toward this later view. Literally, they state it, but not when correctly understood.

(SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE. The Pahlavi word yômâi which transcribes yesnâ in verse 4 cannot mean 'by day.' Its imperfect form induced the translators to translate rûzhâ and bhûmandale, but these scholars, as in many other instances, hinted at a correction.)

YASNA XXXI.

THE PROGRESS AND STRUGGLES OF THE CAUSE.

This composition differs from that in XXX as descending from the more general to the particular, and from the doctrinal to the practical. One might even trace an immediate connection, urvâtâ occurring in the last verse of the one and in the first of the other. It is, of course, very possible that the verses before us are only a remnant of those which originally constituted the piece, and here and there one may have been interpolated from other scriptures.

Some writers prefer to assume a loss of the original text or an addition to it at the smallest change of tone, and to assume also a change of subject with it. I do not regard it as very useful to lay too much stress upon these occurrences.

Whether caused by gaps or interpolations, they do not at all affect the fact that the subject-matter is homogeneous and contemporaneous; and, probably, like many more modern compositions, the verses gain in rhetorical effect by being weeded of repetitions.

We might divide as follows 1, 2, an address to the congregation to be connected with XXX as its concluding words; 3-5, an address to Ahura; 6, an address to the faithful; 7-17, to Ahura; 18, to the congregation; 19, to Ahura; 20, 21, to the congregation; 22, an addition.

Treating the section then as containing homogeneous matter which combines well into a unit, I proceed as follows. The sage chants his hymn in the presence of the multitude as before.

1. He declares that while he is reciting things unwillingly heard by the hostile party, those same truths are valued as the best of existing things by those who are sincerely devoted to Mazda, their good disposition quickening their perception.

2. He then declares that if the truths of the holy Religion are not yet clearly seen by the instrumentalities provided, he will approach them still more effectively in accordance with the especial regulation of the spiritual chieftainship, which Ahura Mazda had prepared in response to the lament of the soul of the Kine; i.e. of the Iranian herds and people possibly as representing the entire holy, or clean, creation upon earth. And he further asserts that this regulation concerns the struggle of the two parties, and will bring the cause of the Righteous Order to a successful issue.

3. Changing his address to Ahura, he proceeds to pray at once for that satisfying decision which would be the natural result of the regulation just promised, and which could be given by the instrumentality of the Sacred Fire and holy ritual, affording mental keenness to the two contending parties. And he declares that this is the doctrine which should be proclaimed for the conversion of mankind. Here we observe that the Zarathustrian Mazda-worship was aggressive and missionary in its spirit, and in a proselyting sense by no means indifferent to the final destiny of the Gentile world. (The later and traditional system announced indeed the restoration and so the conversion of all men, and that not as an object proposed to the efforts of charity, but as a necessary result (so by inference; see Bundahis (West), pp. 126, 129). I can find no trace of this in the Gâthas.

Here we have only the effort to convert.)

4. Addressing all the Bountiful Immortals, and with the striking title of the Ahuras of Mazda, he prays for the establishment of the 'mighty kingdom' by means of which he might overcome the personified and aggressive falsehood of the opposing and persecuting Daêva-worshippers.

5. In order to enable himself to fulfil his mission, he asks for prophetic and judicial knowledge as to what ought to be done, or as to what is about to happen in the immediate future.

6. He lauds the Mâthra which we may suppose him to recognise as delivered to him afresh in answer to his prayer for prophetic light, and he praises co-ordinately with the Word of God that Sovereign Authority of Ahura, which was to be established in a kingdom where goodness would increase, and be prosperous, if not predominant.

7. He takes the heavenly bodies as evidence of the wisdom of Him who created the Sacred Order personified as the 'Immortal' Asha, and also the Good Mind, his equal. And he ascribes the support and extension of their hallowing influence to Ahura, because He never changes.

8. He reiterates, in expressions which form the basis for another hymn, his conception of Mazda as the supreme object of devotion, as the father of the Good Mind personified as His child, as the creator of the Righteous Order, and as both the controller and the judge of human actions. Therefore the Good Mind and Righteousness are to be worshipped as standing in the closest possible relation to him.

9. He ascribes the 'Immortal' Piety to Him as well. She is His own, and elsewhere His own daughter. He is declared, as in chapter XXIX, to be the Creator of the Kine, and of Understanding, (His own intelligence), to guide Him in the disposition of the destiny of the holy Iranian people. And according to it He makes the path for the Kine, which as a matter of course has no meaning as applied to bucolics, but is full of meaning when read in view of the wail of the Kine's Soul in chapter XXIX, and of the intervention of the Deity in her behalf, for He actually appointed Zarathustra to meet her necessities. He adds, however, that her free choice is not abolished by the construction 'of this path.' It is elsewhere called the 'religion of the Saviour-prophets,' and she is free to proceed in it, guided by the first prophet, the ideal husbandman, or she can follow the profaner nomad.

10. But he thankfully exclaims that she does not pause in indecision, nor does she choose perversely. She selects the guardian appointed by Ahura, the diligent and pious husbandman, elsewhere identified with Zarathustra himself. He is rich with the spiritual wealth of the Good Mind; and she rejects in his favour the idle and free-booting nomad, excluding him from all share in the sacred religious system.

11. The composer then delineates the struggle which inevitably follows this establishment of the needed means of deliverance. When Mazda has completed the inspiration of doctrines, teaching whither the one endowed with free volition (like the Kine [verse 9]) should direct his choice in action (12), there upon the spot, as it were, the ignorant Daêva-worshipper makes himself heard beside God's spokesman. But the prophet is consoled by the reflection that the pious mind will not question the evil Spirit, or the good Spirit superficially. It searches both the Spirits, questioning them, as it were, in their very home. (Hence it is that Ahura speaks so fully concerning Angra Mainyu, delineating his opposition to Him in extended detail. See XLV, 2.)

13. The composer is still more reanimated by the certainty that Ahura is gazing into the depths of all questions, trivial and profound; which is to say that he observes most closely the men who are discussing them. And he declares that he also sees the cruel injustice of the punishments which the tyrants visit upon the smallest offences, as well as the more flagrant wickedness of those who persecute his adherents without even a pretence of justice.

14. As he recalls the divine forecasting omniscience, he asks Ahura once more concerning the future which was close at hand with its portentous events. And he inquires as to the nature of the veritable and not iniquitous confessions, which were properly due to be made by the righteous believer in order to avert the impending calamities, and secure the upper hand in the struggle for the throne. And he inquires also as to the proper expiatory prayers which were to be offered by the believer. He does not however fail to inquire analogously concerning the wicked, nor to ask how they, as well as the righteous, shall be situated in the final consummation.

15. Particularising as to the latter, he asks what shall be the punishment for those who succeed in installing an evil monarch, one of the Daêva-party, a prince who cannot exist without the ruthless persecution of the pious husbandman, who repudiates the Lie-demon presiding over the counsels and efforts of the opposing religion.

16. He further asks how and by what actions the wise man may become like Ahura, or his faithful adherent, the expressions used implying deep religious feeling.

17. Striving to arouse the perceptions of his hearers, he inquires as to which one of the two parties holds to the greater or more important religion, the disciple of Asha, the personified Righteous Order Ahura's immediate creature (see above), or the opponent. And he prays that no blind guide may deceive him, or those who belong to him, 'but that the enlightened, yea, even Ahura Himself, may speak to him, and become the indicator and demonstrator of the truth.'

18. Closing this address to the Deity, he turns to the congregation, vehemently forbidding them to listen to the doctrines of his opponents, warning them against the ruin and death which would ensue, and fiercely appealing to the sword.

19. Once more addressing Ahura, he prays that they may on the contrary listen to Him who has power to vindicate the conscientious Zarathustrian, inculcating veracity upon him, and encouraging him in its practice; and this by means of the holy sacrifice, or ordeal of the Fire.

20. He solemnly warns those who would seduce the righteous of their ultimate fate, and adds that their sorrows will be self-induced, if they persevere in their hostility. Their own consciences (as we see from Yast XXII) would not only bring on their ruin, but would form a part of their punishment.

21. On the other hand, happiness and immortality will be the lot of the faithful. And these 'eternal two' will be given to them, accompanied by the fulness of Righteousness, and the exuberant vigour of the Good and Kindly Mind within them and bestowing its blessings upon them.

22. In conclusion he apostrophises the manifest certainty of the truths which he declares, and, addressing Ahura, animates the faithful not merely with the hope of the objective recompense, but with the prospect of being efficient as servants of God.

Translation.

1. These doctrines (therefore) we are earnestly declaring to You as we recite them forth from memory, words (till now) unheard¹ (with faith) by those who by means of the doctrinal vows² of the harmful Lie are delivering the settlements of Righteousness to death, but words which are of the best unto those who are heartily devoted to Ahura³.

2. And if by this means the indubitable truths⁴ are not seen in the soul⁵, then as better (than these words) I will come to you all (in my person) with

¹ Roth, 'wollen wir Worte künden—ungern gehört von denen, welche nach des Unholds Geboten,' &c. Hübschmann preferring 'wir sprechen Worte nicht anhörbar für diejenigen' (Casuslehre, s. 223). A dative of the pronoun is certainly more natural than the ablative as inst. But on the whole agushtâ seems better in its ordinary sense, although in so rendering we are obliged to supply a word.

² Valmansân mûn pavan âfrîngânîh î Drûg zak î Aharâyîh gêhân barâ marenkînênd.

³ The Pahlavi may be rendered as follows: Both these benedictions, which I (we) recite as yours [the Avesta and Zand], we are teaching by word to him who is no hearer, [to the destroyer of sanctity (the heretical persecutor) []]. Those who utterly slay the world of righteousness through the benedictions of the Drûg [], even those might be an excellent thing, if they would cause progress in what belongs to Aûharmazd.

⁴ Read perhaps advayâo; see the Pahlavi. Otherwise 'the way' advâo as panthâs; but the participle * does not agree. Compare for meaning kavîm âdvayantam, sâkhâ âdvayâs.*

⁵ The Pahlavi renders 'in the soul' freely by 'believes:' Pavan nikîrîsnô lâ hêmnunêdô as pavan zak î agûmânîkîh. The general indications are to be observed.

* Is it a loc.?

that power, and in that way according to which Ahura Mazda knows and appoints His ruler¹, that ruler over both the two (struggling) bands², in order that we (in obedience to him), may live according to Righteousness³.

3. And that keenness, that deciding satisfaction, which Thou hast given by (Thy) Spirit⁴, and (Thy) Fire, and by Thy Righteousness (itself) to the two battling⁵ (sides), do Thou declare unto us, O Ahura! that vow which is for the seeing⁶ (as those endowed with mental light). Yea, do Thou declare this that we may know it, O Mazda! With the tongue of Thy mouth do Thou speak it (that as I preach its mighty truths⁷) I may make all the living believers⁸!

¹ Comp. chap. XXIX, 2, where the Ratu is discussed; here the word might be the abstract.

² Roth, 'dieser beiden Parteien (Yasna XXXI).'

³ He repels and condemns the evil, and he hallows and helps the good.

⁴ Most striking is the use of mainyu. It is 'the Spirit' = God. It is 'His Spirit.' It is also used of man's spirit.

⁵ Or, 'from the two arəi;' but see āsayāo in verse 2. The Pahlavi translator has avō patkârdârânō shnâkhtârîh; so uniformly. In Y. XLIII, 12, K₅ and most MSS., except K₄, and likewise excepting the printed B.V.S., read ranôibyô which excludes the dual form; also the fire is not mentioned there. It is however far from impossible that the present Pahlavi translation may be a growth beyond an earlier one more in accordance with arəi. The strivers, or fighters, might describe the two rubbing-sticks (?).

⁶ Aîmar (sic), vigârdâr. This meaning suits the connection admirably. The word is otherwise difficult, and this general sense is followed by some who do not so often cite the Pahlavi translator.

⁷ See verse 1.

⁸ Roth, 'wie ich alle lebenden bekehren soll.' So also the general indication of the Pahlavi translator. Pavan hûzvânô ī Lak—zîvandakân harvist-gûn hêmnund. Observe that the religious system contemplated universal proselytism.

4. And when the Divine Righteousness shall be inclined to my appeal¹, and with him all those (remaining ones who are as) Mazda's² (own) Ahuras then with the blessedness (of the reward), with (my) Piety and with Thy Best Mind (active within me), I will pray³ for that mighty Kingdom by whose force⁴ we may smite the Lie-demon⁵.

5. Aye, do Thou tell me that I may discern it, since through (Thy) Righteous Order the better (lot) is⁶ given; tell me this that I may know it with (Thy) Good Mind (as it speaks within me), and that I may ponder⁷ that to which these my truths⁸ belong (and

¹ The general indications karitūtntâr and bavîhūnam point to the proper sense.

² Or, with Roth, 'wenn wirklich sich rufen lassen die Ahura-Mazdas.' Otherwise, 'O Mazda and the Ahuras.' Hübschmann also maintained that Mazdau was here a plural; (see his Y. XXX, 10.)

³ Roth, rendering ishasâ in accordance with the Pahlavi, 'erbitte ich.'

⁴ Mûn pavan zak î valman gûrdîh—khûshîdō Drûgō aē sufficiently indicates the proper sense. Roth, 'kraft deren wir den Unhold bemeistern mögen.'

⁵ The Pahlavi may be rendered thus: Since in that dispensation [in the final body], I shall be an invoker of Ashavahist, and of Aîharmazd also []; and of her who is veneration 'Spendar-mad' [], I desire [that best of things which is the reward] of Vohûman. Let also that authority which belongs to my people [] be from the strong one [] by whose fortitude [] the Drûg is overcome [].

⁶ Literally, 'Ye gave.'

⁷ I am far from sure that the indication of the Pahlavi is not correct here. According to it, when properly understood, we have here an accusative with the infinitive; 'that I should establish.' Its own translation is however avō li yehabûnâi. Men=man or mām; en(g)=ā the nasal vowel. The Pahl. translator recognises men elsewhere as=mînisnō. It was from no ignorance (!) of the particular word that he wrote 'li' here.

⁸ Or 'my prophet;' comp. rîshi; that is, 'that with which my prophet is concerned.'

of which my prophet speaks ; yea), tell me those things, O Mazda Ahura ! which may not be, and which may be¹.

6². And that verily shall be the best of all words to Him which the All-(wise one) will³ declare to me in very deed, that word which is the Māthra of Welfare and of Immortality (for it proclaims His beneficent power). And to the Great Creator (shall there be) a Realm such as that (whose strength I asked for victory⁴), and which (at the last) shall flourish⁵ in its holiness to His (glory⁶) !

7. (For He has sovereign control.) He who conceived of these (truths of the Māthra) as their first (inspirer), (and as He thought their existence they

¹ Or, possibly, 'which shall not be, or which shall be.' Is the subjunctive here used to express obligation ? Roth has 'was nicht sein soll oder was sein soll.' Ner. may be rendered as follows : Tell it to me distinctly [], that which is the highest gift, and which is given to me through sanctity ; [that is, because duty and righteousness are fulfilled by me, the best gift of thy reward (is gained) by this means ; but how is it possible to make it (actually) one's own ?]. Grant me the knowledge through the best mind ; [that is, declare that intelligence to me which comes through good conduct], and by which also safety is (secured) to me []. And declare either that which is not, or that which is, O Great Wise One, the Lord ! [].

² An interval of silence seems here to intervene, or lost verses leave an unexplained transition. The sage turns again to the people.

³ Vaokâ K 4 (Barth.).

⁴ See verse 4.

⁵ The Pahlavi has Aûharmazd având (sic) khûdâiyih kand dên valman vakhshêd Vohûmanô.

⁶ The Parsi-persian MS. is as follows : Û hast buland, kih ân man âgahîhâ (sic) gû-î âskârah [] mânsar i tamâm raftanî ; [kû, tamâm pēdâim pah rāh i mânsar bâz ân 'hwêš i Hôrmuzd rasêd], kih pah Šawâb dârad—bî-marg raftanî azar []. Hôrmuzd—'hudâi kand andar û afzayêd Bahman [Kûs pādîsâhî pah tan i mard—kandî (?) Hôrmuzd pah tan mihmân].

(all) as (His)glorious¹ (conceptions first) clothed themselves in the stars²), He is through His understanding the Creator³ of the Righteous Order. And thus likewise He supports His Beneficent Mind (in His saints). And these (holy creatures) may'st Thou cause to prosper by Thy Spirit (since they are Thine own), O Ahura Mazda! Thou who art for every hour the same⁴!

8. Therefore⁵, as the first⁶ did I conceive of Thee, O Ahura Mazda! as the one to be adored with the mind in the creation, as the Father of the Good Mind within us, when I beheld Thee⁷ with my (enlightened) eyes as the veritable maker of our Righteousness, as the Lord of the actions of life⁸!

9. Thine, O Ahura! was Piety; yea, Thine, O Creator of the Kine! was understanding and the ¹ Mūnas avō rōshanīh gūmīkhtō khvārīh. Hvāthrā and khvārīh can hardly mean 'comfortable' here. 'Ease' is the later sense.

² Raokebīs certainly means, with illuminating objects, stars or shining lights.

³ Hübschmann, 'der Schöpfer des Asha.'—Casuslehre, s. 190.

⁴ Pavan mīnavadīkīh vakhshīnēd [] mūn kevaniš ham khūdāi.

⁵ Compare the frequent expression 'spēntem at Thwā menhī,' in chap. XLIII.

⁶ Roth, 'vornehmsten.'

⁷ When I seized Thee (took Thee in) with my eye. The Pahlavi: Amatam [] pavan hamkashmīh avō ham vakhdūnd hōmanih.

⁸ Dēn ahvānō pavan kūnīsnō khūdāi hōmanih.

Ner. may be rendered as follows: Thus thou wert thought at the first by me, O Great Wise One, the Lord! when thou wert engaged in the production of Gvahmana []. In which (production) they apprehend the father of the Best Mind when they observe him with a full-faced look []. (And thou art the father) of that creation which is manifestly righteous; [that is, thou makest the purer creation good in conduct]. Thou art a King in the world as to action; [that is, where it is fitting to confer a benefit, and also where it is fitting to inflict a punishment, in each of these thou art capable].

Spirit¹, when Thou didst order a path for her (guiding). From the earth's tiller (aided²) she goeth³ (in that allotted way), or from him who was never tiller. (Thy path hath given her choice⁴.)

10. (But she did not pause in temptation.) Of the two she chose⁵ the husbandman, the thrifty toiler in the fields⁶, as a holy master endowed with the Good Mind's wealth⁷. Never, Mazda! shall

¹ His spenta mainyu; otherwise 'spiritual (understanding),' but mainyu is used elsewhere (verse 3 and 7) alone, and certainly not as an adjective even with a substantive understood. The rendering 'spirit' as 'Thy spirit' is suspiciously significant; but what is the help? We are forced by grammar so to translate.

² The ablative has this force as in Ashâ/ haâ.

³ I can hardly accede to an infinitive here: -tê is a rare infinitive termination in Gâthic. Also the infinitive seldom falls to the end of the sentence. The Pahlavi has yâtûnêz, a present; but the Pahlavi should never be positively cited for the forms, as it is free.

⁴ Observe that we are forced by every dictate of logic and common sense to avoid the commonplace rendering here. Cattle do not have 'paths' made for them, nor do they cry aloud for an overseer, or complain at the appointment of one who does not appear to them promising; nor is it one main effort of religion 'to content the soul of cattle.' Cattle, as the chief article of wealth, are taken to signify all civic life. The 'path' is the path for the people to walk in, securing safety for soul and life and herds. The adhvan is 'the way' which 'is the religious characteristics and teachings of the prophets' (XXXIV, 13).

⁵ Observe that this cow (some would say 'ox') chooses her master, unlike other cattle. But observe also, what is more interesting, that she seems reconciled to the guardian appointed by Ahura. In Y. XXIX, 9, she actually 'wept' at the naming of the pusillanimous Zarathustra, desiring a kingly potentate. Now, however, we see that she must have dried her tears, as she is satisfied with the simple workman whom he represents notwithstanding high rank.

⁶ In the later Avesta this first vâstrya fruyant is declared to be Zarathustra.

⁷ Mûn fruih pavan Vohûmanô.

the thieving¹ nomad share the good creed². (For the Kine's choice would bestow it³!)

11. (And this doctrine was the first of rules to regulate our actions. Yet the opposer speaks beside Thee.) For when first, O Ahura Mazda! Thou didst create the (holy) settlements, and didst reveal the religious laws⁴; and when Thou gavest (us) understanding from Thine own mind, and madest our (full) bodily life⁵, and (didst thus determine) actions (by Thy power), and didst moreover deliver to us (nearer) injunctions whereby (as by a rule) the wisher may place his choices⁶,

12. (There strife at once arose, and still is raging.) There (beside Thy prophet) the truthful or liar, the enlightened or unenlightened, lifts his voice (to utter

¹ Pahlavi davāsahak; Ner. pratārayitre.

² Khûpō-hōshmûrīsnih. 'Judicial blindness' is everywhere indicated. (The wicked are kept from the sight of the truth.) Hübschm., Casuslehre, 'der frohen Botschaft.'

³ This seems implied.

⁴ Or, 'madest the worlds and the souls (?)'.

⁵ Geldner admirably 'flesh.' The Pahlavi: tanû-hōmandânō gân yehabûnd. Notice that 'bodily life or flesh' is mentioned after 'understanding.' Compare Y. XXX, 7, where Âramaiti gives 'a body' after previous creations.

⁶ The Pahlavi has the following interesting gloss: [That is, even the actions and teachings of the pious are given forth by thee; and this was also given in this wisdom of thy mind]. And when there is a person in whom there is a desire for the other world, that desire is granted to him by thee; [that is, what is necessary when he is arriving in the other world, this which is thus required (or desired) by him at that time, is given by thee—through that which is thy mind and wisdom]. Although not able to follow the indications of the Pahlavi fully, I think that there is no question but that we have an important statement in the last line. It does not seem to me possible to render less profoundly than 'where the wisher may place his choices,' his religious preferences and beliefs, including all moral volition.

his faith), and with devoted mind and heart¹. (But without hindrance from this striving, or pausing with feeble search², our) Piety steadily³ questions the two spirits⁴ (not here on earth) but (there in the spirit-world) where (they dwell as) in their home⁵.

13. (Yea, my Piety questions searchingly, for Thou, O Maker! hast Thy view on all; we cannot question lightly.) What questions are asked which are open⁶ (permitted to our thoughts), or what questions (are asked) which are furtive⁷ (hiding themselves from the light), or (what decision soever we may make, and the man) who for the smallest sin binds on the heaviest penance, on all⁸ with Thy glittering eye(s) as a righteous guard Thou art gazing⁹!

¹ Avô zak libbemman.

² See verse 13.

³ Pavan hagisnô î: the Persian MS. (Haug XII, b) transliterates khêzirnô: Ner. has mano-utthânena (sic). Or, 'immediately.'

⁴ The evil as well as the good spirit is questioned. The two spirits of Y. XXX, 3-6 were here inspiring the conflict.

⁵ The Pahlavi unvaryingly in the sense of mihânô [-as gâs tamman yehevûnêdô]; Ner. paralokanivâsân. See Y. XXX, 9; XXXIII, 9; XXXIV, 6. A questioning which was lightly made would indicate a willingness to tamper with error. The Persian MS. following the Pahlavi has: Ânga bâng i buland ân i durûgê guftâr [Ganâ Mînû] wa ân ham i râst guftâr [Hôrmuzd], &c. But Neryosangh is more accurate or literal: Atra bumbâm* karoti [antar gagati], mithyâvaktâ vâ satyavaktâ vâ, &c.

⁶ Pavan zak î âshkârakô.

⁷ Nihânfk.

⁸ Thou seest even the questions and decisions of our thoughts as to matters which are simple or difficult, permitted or occult.

⁹ I have not followed what may yet possibly be a valuable and correct hint of tradition. I render Neryosangh: He who asks through what is open [through righteousness], or he who asks through what is secret [through sin]; or he (also) who through, or on account of, a little sin which has been committed, commits the great one to secure a purification; [that is, who for the sake of purification necessary on account of a little sin which has been committed, commits a greater one, in order that the first may not

14. This then I will ask Thee, O Ahura Mazda! (as I seek Thy counsel once again¹). What events are coming now, and what events shall come in the future²; and what prayers with debt-confessions³ are offered with⁴ the offerings of the holy? And what (are the awards) for the wicked? And how shall they be in the (final) state⁵ of completion⁶?

15. And I would ask Thee this, O Mazda! (concerning the coadjutor of the wicked): What is the award⁷ for him who prepares the throne⁸ for the evil, for the evil-doer⁹, O Ahura! for him who cannot else reclaim¹⁰ his life, not else save¹¹ with lawless become known], upon these two, each of them, look with thy two eyes. [Over sins and righteous actions thou art in one way, everywhere and again, the Lord.] The concretes here may give the right indication.

¹ See verse 5.

² Mûn madō, mûniš yāmtûnêdō, 'What has come? And what is coming?'

³ Mûn âvâm.

⁴ Hačâ in the Indian sense.

⁵ Angarōkîh, the judgment; but Ner. vipâkatâ, consummation.

⁶ Neryosangh has as follows: Tad dvitayam tvattaḥ prikkhâmi, Svâmin! yad âgatam, âyâtika, yo* rinam dadate dânebhyah* punyâtmane* [Hormigdâya yathâ yugyate dâtum], yeṭa, Mahâgñânin! durgatimadbhyaḥ; katham teshâm asti vipâkatâ evam* [kila, yaḥ tat kurute, tasmai nidâne prasâdadânam kim bhavati, yaska tat kurute, tasmaiṭa kim bhavati 'ti; me brûhi!] This seems to me very close, far more so than we have any right to expect as a general rule from a Parsi living in India, and only five or six centuries ago, too late for 'tradition,' and too early for close criticism.

⁷ Roth, 'Ich frage—was die Strafe ist?'

⁸ The head of a party seems to have been plotting to introduce a hostile sovereign.

⁹ Î dūs-kûnîsnō.

¹⁰ The Pahlavi translator, nîvidînêdō, (otherwise nivêkînêd, which I much suspect has become confused with nîvidînêdō through a clerical blunder); Ner. labhate. They both refer vīnastī to vid (so Justi) followed by most. Roth (Yasna XXXI, p. 11), 'der sein Brot nicht findet ohne Gewalthat an der Heerde.'

¹¹ The Pahlavi translator sees the root han in the sense of harm to the tiller's herd, to the pious husbandman's flock, who speaks no word with lying, (who abjures the Lie-demon's faith¹)?

16. Yea, I would ask Thee such a thing as this : How such an one as he who, with wise action, has striven to promote (Thy holy) Rule² over house, and region, and province, in the Righteous Order and in truth, how he may become like Thee³, O Great Creator, Living Lord? And when he may so become, (this also I would ask), and in what actions living he may so be⁴?

17. And which of the (religions) is the greater (and the more prevailing⁵ as to these questions which thus concern the soul?) Is it that which the acquisition, and not from ignorance of the sense given above. In another place, he renders vigîd min; (see XLVII, 5.)

¹ Neryosangh may be rendered as follows: Thus I ask thee: What is for him who seizes upon destruction, and who provides the sovereignty for the wicked [], and commits that evil action, O Lord! from which he does not acquire life even through a bribe* (so meaning), [] and who is a calamity to the man who acts for herds and men removing calamities from them []?

² Roth, 'der die Herrschaft über Hof Gau und Land um das rechte zu fördern hat.'

³ Pahlavi, Lak hâvand; Neryosangh, tvattulyo; Roth, 'deiner werth.'

⁴ I render the Sanskrit of Neryosangh thus (it improves on the Pahlavi): I ask (thee) thus: How [dost thou bestow] the sovereignty upon one when he is beneficently wise? [] (in the body) of him who, through the increase of sanctity, is no opposer (of prosperity) in provinces or villages; [that is, with him who is discharging his duty and performing acts of sanctity. He is this teacher's teacher, he does not contend]. Thine equal, O Great Wise One, the Lord! thus is he verily, who (is such) in action, [who is thus Thine equal through activity].

⁵ Possibly mazyô has the sense of mazista in chap. L, 1. There 'the most prevailing' seems to be the proper rendering.

righteous believes, or the wicked¹? (Let then our questionings cease.) Let the enlightened (alone) speak to the enlightened. Let not the ignorant (further) deceive us, (high though he may lift his voice²). Do Thou thyself, O Ahura Mazda! declare³ to us (the truth) as Thy Good Mind's full revealer.

18. (And you, ye assembled throngs!) let not a man of you lend a hearing to Māthra, or to command of that sinner⁴ (ignorant⁵ as he is), for home, village, region, and province he would deliver to ruin⁶ and death. But (fly ye to arms without hearing), and hew ye them all with the halberd⁷!

¹ Literally, 'Which of the two (creeds as) the greater does the righteous (the believing saint) or the wicked (opponent) believe?'

² See verse 12.

³ Or with others 'be Thou'; but the gloss of the Pahlavi translation contains an explanation which may well afford the true solution as in so many instances in which he is both consciously and inadvertently followed. It reads [aīghmānō barā khavītūnīnō—]. May we not see an az=ah in the form, or at least a separate Iranian root, as also in azdā (L, 1), where the Pahlavi translator gives the same explanation admirably suited to the context.

Neryosangh: Which is it, the pure of soul, or the wicked who teaches as the great one? [] The intelligent speaks to the intelligent []. Be not thou ignorant after this; because (ignorance is) from the deceiver. Instruct us, O Great Wise One, the Lord! [] Furnish us with a sign through the Best Mind; [that is, make me steadfast in good conduct through the recognition of the dīn]. Such renderings may suffice to show that an examination of these ancient translations in our search for hints is imperative. Yet the practice prevails of omitting a knowledge of the Pahlavi language, on which not only the oldest translation of the Avesta, but also the irregular Sanskrit of Neryosangh, closely depends.

⁴ Jolly, 'Keiner von euch höre auf die Lieder und Gebote des Lügners.' Roth, 'Rath und Befehle.'

⁵ Compare evīdvāo in verse 17.

⁶ Dūs-rūbismīh.

⁷ Sazēd sanēh, 'prepare the sabre.' It was however a two-handed weapon; see Y. LVI, 12, (4 Sp.).

The Parsi-persian MS.: Wa ma kas aēdūn az sumâ kih ū

19. Let them hear Him who conceived of the Righteous Order for the worlds, the (all)-wise One, O Ahura! For truthful speech He rules with absolute sway over words, and ever free of tongue (to guide us in our way¹). By Thy shining flame² (He doth guide us³, Thine altar's flame with its signs of decision and of grace) sent forth for the good of the strivers⁴.

20. (But, O ye listening men!) he who renders darwand mânsar sunawad wa âmû'htisn (sic); [kû az Âsmôkân (?) Awestâ wa Zand ma sunawad], kih andar—mañall sahar wa deh dehad bad-raftisn wa marg ân i Âsmôgh; aêdûn (sic) ôrân Âsmôghân râ sâzad silâh. (Again very close.)

¹ So conjecturally.

² Compare chap. XXX, 2. 'Behold ye the flames with the better mind;' possibly, also chap. XXX, 1, 'the signs in the lights seen friendly.'

³ According to the grammatical forms the agent here must be a divine being, as ye mantâ ashem ahûbis (see verse 7) is characteristic of the Deity. The vocative, strange as it may seem, does not necessarily exclude Ahura, as the subject referred to in ye. Several analogous cases occur. The Deity may here however represent His prophet, as the Daêvas do their worshippers in the later Avesta. Some writers force the language into a reference to the human subject for the sake of the greatly to be desired simplicity.

One places Ahurâ in the instrumental, a case in which the Almighty seldom appears. The above translation needs no alternative, as the language would be the same whoever ye refers to.

⁴ See note on verse 3, and read as alternative 'from the two aramî.' As an inferior rendering of tradition I cite Neryosangh here: The matter should be heard (taking gûstâ as a third singular in a subjunctive sense); [that is, a study should be made of it by him] who is even (in any degree) acquainted with the righteous design of Hormigda for both the worlds. He is independent in the literal truth of his words, in his freedom of speech, [and his fear has no existence]. Thy brilliant fire gives the explanation to the contenders. [It makes purity and impurity evident.]

the saint deceived¹, for him shall be later destruction². Long life shall be his lot in the darkness; foul shall be his food; his speech shall be of the lowest³. And this, which is such a life⁴ as your own, O ye vile! your (perverted) conscience through your own deeds will bring⁵ you⁶!

21. But Ahura Mazda will give both Universal Weal and Immortality⁷ in the fulness of His Righteous Order, and from himself⁸ as the head⁹ of Dominion (within His saints). And He will likewise give the Good Mind's vigorous might¹⁰ to him who in spirit and deeds is His friend¹¹, (and with faith fulfils his vows¹²).

¹ I follow the admirable lead of the Pahlavi here, as the previous verse mentions veracity. Its indication is pavan frīsnō, freely.

² I differ with diffidence from the hint of the Pahlavi here (as elsewhere). It has shīvan=tears, which however is free for 'calamity' and 'sorrow.' Nom. sing.; see its position.

³ Anāk rūbīsnīh yemalelūnêžō. This, placed together with such passages as XLVI, 11, XLIX, 11, and LI, 13, formed the basis for the more complete Yast XXII.

⁴ Others prefer 'place,' but see âyû in line b.

⁵ 'Has led on'?

⁶ I cite Ner.: He who betrays the pure through his fraud, may (deceit) be (also his portion) at the last; [that is, let it be so afterwards; it is in his soul]. Long is his journey, and his arrival is in darkness; and evil food and increasing lawlessness is his []. Darkness is your world, O ye wicked! your in-bred deeds, and your dīn, are leading you on.

⁷ That Ameretatā means more than long life is clear from amesha.

⁸ Afar nafsman patīh. The Gāthic would be more literally perhaps 'from His own Dominion.'

⁹ Sardârīh.

¹⁰ Vazdvarīh; Ner. pīvaratvam.

¹¹ One naturally thinks of urvatha (vratha), as having something of the sense of vratyā. But usage compels also the sense of friendship. Hübschmann, Casuslehre, s. 259, 'der durch Gesinnung und Thaten sich ihm als freund erweist.'

¹² Ner.: Mahāgrānī dadau Svāmī* avirdādāt* amirdādāt sampūr-

22. And to the wise are these things clear as to the one discerning with his mind (not blinded by the perverter¹). With Thy Good Mind and Thy (holy) Kingdom he follows the Righteous Order both in his words and his actions. And to Thee, O Ahura Mazda ! such a man shall be the most helpful and vigorous being² (for he serves with every power³)!

natvam punyatmane [] nigam prabhutvam râgne * âdhipatyena [] uttamena pîvaratvam manasâ [-tasmâi dadate], yo nigasya adris- yamûrte karmanâ mitram.

¹ So according to frequent indications.

² Tanû aîthô. Ner.: Sa te—mitram asti niveditanuñ.

³ See chap. XXXIII, 14. The Pahlavi translator renders freely as follows: Manifest things (so possibly; otherwise 'manifestly') (are) these to (so a MS. not yet elsewhere compared) the wise when according to his understanding he disposes and reflects, [that is, he who meditates with thought upon that which his lord and dastur declares to him]. Good is the King for whom they would effect righteousness in word and deed, the man whose body is a bearer of Thee, O Aûharmazd!

YASNA XXXII.

THE STRUGGLE IS CONTINUED IN THE MIDST OF REVERSES.

1. The same author may well be supposed to continue. The first stanzas have been lost, but we observe that the subject of the section is still face to face with the Daêva party. He seems to see them arrayed and engaged in hostile devotions. But he is not intimidated. The friendship of Ahura is before his mind, and he expresses his desire that he and his colleagues may become, or continue, His apostles, notwithstanding the temporal sorrows which, according to XLIII, 11, we see that he clearly anticipated as the portion of those who would propagate the holy faith.

2. Mazda answers him, and through him his followers, as established in His spiritual sovereignty, accepting the devotion of their piety with commendations and implied encouragements. He whom they would serve is supreme; they need not fear.

3. After reporting this response of Ahura, the composer turns with vehemence toward the Daêvas, poetically conceived to be present as if before their adherents, who also, according to verse 1, are supposed to be in sight (or are dramatically so conceived) celebrating their profane devotions; and he addresses them as the 'very seed' of Satan. Their worshippers belong to the religious falsehood and perversity. And they have persistently propagated their evil creed, which is in consequence spreading.

4. They have, so he acknowledges with grief, perverted men's minds, making them spokesmen for themselves, and in consequence deserters from the great Kindly Disposition of Ahura Mazda, and outcasts, fallen from His understanding.

5. They have destroyed the hopes of mankind for a happy life upon earth, and for Immortality in heaven. And in this they are not only the seed of the Evil Mind personified, but his servants rallying at his word.

6. Their leader is striving energetically, so he mournfully bewails, to effect his evil ends; but it is time that he should recall the counteracting measures of Ahura. His holy doctrines are to be announced, and their authority established by the divine Khshathra, His Sovereign Power personified.

7. The composer then contemplates with religious irony the infatuated security of the wretched delinquents whom he is apostrophising. Not a man of them knows the destruction which awaits him, and which, as he intimates, is close at hand, but Ahura, he significantly exclaims, is aware of it. And it will be proportionably severe. The blindness of sinners to danger seems as definite a judgment upon them in his estimate as their blindness to the truth.

8. To point his anger with an instance he names the apostate Yima, whom he supposes to have erred in first introducing the consumption of the flesh of cattle. He disavows community with him as with them all, declaring himself separate from them in Ahura's sight.

9. He acknowledges that their leader has to a certain degree defeated his teachings, and impaired the just estimates of life which he had striven to form within the people, (or that he will do this if not checked), declaring also that he had made inroads upon his property, which was sacred to the holy cause. And he cries aloud to Ahura and to Asha with the words of his very soul.

10. He repeats that their leader threatens to invalidate his teachings, blaspheming the supreme object of nature, the Sun, together with the sacred Kine, injuring the productive land, and carrying murder among the saints.

11. He utters his bitter wail in view of attempted slaughter, and actual spiritual opposition. He points out the plots among the powerful and their illegal confiscation of inheritances, as well those of women as those of men. And he declares that his opponents are endeavouring to injure his adherents, as if repelled by the best spiritual qualities which an individual could possess.

12. He announces the solemn judgment of God upon it all, especially reprobating those who deal treacherously against the mystical Kine; that is, the holy herds and people, and apostrophising those who prefer the Grēhma above the saving and sanctifying Asha, and the Kingdom of the Lie-demon above the Divine Khshathra.

13. He declares that Grēhma, an opposing chief, desired that evil kingdom in the abode of the personified Hell. And he cannot refrain from adding that he also enviously desires to share in the holy apostleship. But, as he severely rejoins, the messenger of God will hold him afar from the sight of the (Divine) Righteousness. He can have no share in the Faith.

(Here it may be noticed that we have some data for presenting the main features of the struggle. In several instances, centring perhaps in the actual description of a battle in XLIV, 15, 16, we see traces of the closeness of the controversy. In XLIV, 15, the two hosts seem to be closing in regular lines for the 'holy vows themselves.' Here, on the other hand, we read of willing complaint or 'regretful desire,' while judicial blindness is referred to over and over again under various phrases. One might suppose that the Daêva-party were very near the Zarathustrians in many of their religious peculiarities, but that they could not accede to, or understand, the dualism. After the manner of Pagans they implicated the Gods in their sins. (Compare the drunken Indra.) At all events a bitter and violent war of doctrines was waging with both speech and weapons. I think it looks like the struggle 'of two parties' who each claimed to be the proper representative of some similar form of faith, similar, of course I mean, outwardly.)

14. Deploring the establishment of the Kavis who approach with stratagems and false teachings to aid the opposing party, the composer declares that they say that the Kine herself is to be injured instead of blessed by the very fire-priest who kindles¹ the altar-flame.

15. He supports himself however with the hope of ultimate success, and with the prospect of his reward, when he and his fellow-labourers should be gloriously borne to heaven by Weal and Immortality, the 'eternal two,' who not only, as we see, bear saints to bliss, but also constitute the beatitude of heaven itself.

16. He confides all at last to Ahura, who is able to control all events, and to solve all doubts, and who will support his servants in bringing the wicked to vengeance by means of verbal instructions and commands.

Translation.

(That rival-monarch (thus we may supply the sense of lost verses) for whom some are plotting to secure the sovereignty, and who, once in power, would deliver over home, village, town, and province to ruin and to death², is active in his efforts, and offering the devotions of his false religion to accomplish his ends.) 1. His¹ lord-kinsman will pray² (as I Zarathustra prayed), and his labouring villagers, with his (trusted) peers, and his (fellow) Daêva-worshippers³. But in my mind is the friendship⁴ of Ahura Mazda, the Great Creator, the living Lord; and Thine heralds, O Ahura! may we be; may we hold back⁵ those who hate and who offend You!

¹ See, however, the notes.

² Compare XXXI, 15, 18.

2. To these (for whom the prophet spake) Ahura Mazda answered, ruling⁶ as He does through His Good Mind (within their souls), He replied from His Sovereign Power, our good friend (as he is) through His surpassing⁷ Righteousness: We have accepted

¹ Some prominent teacher, representing the entire Daêva-party, is alluded to; see verses 6, 7, 9, 10.

² Compare yâsâ in XXVIII, 2.

³ Or, 'his are the Daêvas;' but the verb yâsa perhaps affords a sufficient expression for Daêvâ; yâsen or hentî may be understood. We may also understand the Daêvas here, as the embodied Daêvas, in the manner in which the pious worshipper is called Vohu Manah. That Daêva should however be used quite simply for Daêva-worshipper in this early composition is not probable. In the later Avesta it is frequent usage.

⁴ Or, 'the friend;' I recoil as much as possible from abstracts, but the Pahlavi has hû-ravâkh-manîh, and Geldner admirably proposed brahman.

⁵ Aighrân min Lekûm lakhvâr yakhšenunêm; so the Pahlavi translation, first venturing on the meaning 'holding back from;' dar in the sense of pâ, which latter in Iranian can mean hold back from advantages as well as from misfortunes. High modern authority coincides with the most ancient authority on this latter point. It is apt to be a subject of scepticism with some who neglect the evidence of tradition.

⁶ 'Pavan sardârîh î Vohûman;' Ner. svâmîtâyâm *. It seems difficult to apply the meaning 'being as a refuge' here; see the following 'from His Kingdom.'

⁷ Lit. 'glorious.' This casts light upon the expression hvanvaitis verezô.

your good and bountiful Piety, and we have chosen her ; ours shall she be¹ !

3. But you, O ye Daêvas ! are all a seed from the Evil Mind². He who offers sacrifice³ to You the most⁴ is of the Lie-demon, and (he is a child) of perversion⁵. In advance⁶ (are your) deceits whereby ye are famed in the sevenfold⁷ earth !

4. For ye (are) confusing our thoughts⁸, whereby men, giving forth the worst deeds, will speak⁹, as of ¹ Aîgh Spendarmad Lekûm râi sapîr dôshêm [bûndak mînir-nîh] zak î lanman aîto [aîghmânô pavan tanû mâhmân yehevûnâd].

Neryosangh : To these the Great Wise (One), the Lord, answered in the lordship of the highest (best) mind ; [that is, if, or since, Gvahmana had arrived, as a guest, within (their) body] ; from Saharevara he answered [] through (their) righteousness, from the well-inclined, and through good conduct, [if truly good conduct had arrived as a guest within (their) body]. And he said : I befriend your Earth (so Âramaiti was later understood), the perfect-minded one, and your highest one ; she is mine [].

² Compare Yasna XXX, 6. Where the Daêvas are approached by the worst mind as they are consulting.

³ As those who offer sacrifice to these Daêvas are mentioned separately, we are forced to concede a large idea to the composer. He addresses the Daêvas as poetically conceived to be present, and not merely their worshippers as in verse 1. And this must have its weight in the exegesis of other passages.

⁴ The Pahlavi translator has kabed. Or mas for mashyô (?).

⁵ Or possibly arrogance, avarmînistar ; Ner. apamanastaras/ka.

⁶ Sâtûnînêd freely, but indicating the root. The word is a locative.

⁷ The seven karshvars, or quarters of the earth, were already known.

⁸ I correct frô me (=man) mathâ (adj. nom. pl. ; compare yimâ keredushâ and mâ mashâ). I do so after the admirable reading of the Pahlavi translator, as frâz mînîsnô varðînêd [aîghas barâ frîfêd, afas mînîsnô barâ avô vinâs kardânô varðînêd]. Ner. prakrîsh/am mana/—mathnâti. Notice that aîstâ is awkward as a masc., although I have so rendered as more personal.

⁹ Vakhshyentê stood in the ancient writing used by the Pahlavi translator, as also now in some of our surviving MSS. ; otherwise the Demon-gods beloved, forsaken by the Good Mind¹, (far) astray from the understanding of the Great Creator, the Living Lord, and (far astray) from His Righteousness!

5. Therefore ye would² beguile mankind of happy life³ (upon earth) and of Immortality (beyond it), since the Evil Spirit (has ruled) you with his evil mind. Yea, he has ruled⁴ you, (ye) who are of the Demon-gods, and with an evil word unto action, as his ruler⁵ (governs) the wicked⁶!

reading vakhshentê with Justi and most others, and mîmathâ with Bartholomae: 'Ye have caused that men who produce the worst results are flourishing, loved of the Daévas (as they are).' But in the Casuslehre, Hübschmann preferred 'sie sprechen was den Devas angenehm ist,' also reading vakhshentê (?) (page 240).

¹ So the Pahlavi also indicates arân Vohûman sîzd; Ner. Gvahmana * dûre * âste.

² Improper subjunctive; otherwise ye (have) beguiled.

³ The Pahlavi also freely frîfêd anrûtâân pavan hû-zîvisnîh.

⁴ Frâkinas far from necessarily means 'gave'; 'assigned,' 'indicated' renders it more closely. The Pahlavi has here correctly, but freely, âshêd.

⁵ The Pahlavi has here salitâh for khshayô, and in XXVIII, 8 it has pâdakhshâ for khshayâ. I do not think that the word is an accusative there. A simple accusative does not so naturally fall to the end of the sentence in Gâthic; it is generally in apposition when so situated. The nominatives tend toward the end of the sentence.

⁶ Ner.: It is through both of these that he is deceiving (sic, unable to follow the Pahlavi which probably renders as a second plural; see mûn lekûm) mankind in regard to prosperity and immortality, [(saying) if it is possible to live, immortality lies in our path]. Since he is yours, O ye base-minded! O ye base Devas! he is inculcating the lowest actions [] of the miscreants; he says that sovereignty [is from Âharmana; (that is, the sovereignty) of certain ones (meaning over every one)].

The Gâthic verbatim is as follows: Therefore ye beguiled (would beguile) man of-happy-life, of-immortality-and since you with-evil mind (you) who-(are)-and Daévas' (worshippers) the evil-and spirit with an-evil (-word as concerning) action with-word (rules), by

6. Full of crime (your leader) has desired to destroy¹ us, wherefore he is famed, (and his doctrine is declared); but if this be so of these, then in the same manner, O Ahura! Thou possessest² (because Thou knowest) the true (teachings) in Thy memory³. And in Thy kingdom and Thy Righteous Order I will establish Thy precepts (in Thy name)⁴.

7. Among these wretched beings⁵ (this their leader⁶) knows not that those things⁷ which are de-which (same) means (has-)commanded the wicked (his) ruler (nom. sing. masc.; see Y. XXVIII, 8). The nom., as in Vedic, at the end.

¹ Or, Full of crime ye have striven to attain your ends (?) by those things which are reported. (If verse 5 originally preceded) ənakhstā would naturally be regarded as a singular as paouru-aēnō is an impossible plural masculine. It might, however, be a singular used collectively. In that case we could put the verb in the plural with verse 5 in view. As to concrete or abstract, the first is obviously correct, and is also so rendered by the Pahlavi translation.

² Vid (with the perf. vaēdā) seems to occur in the Gāthas in this sense. Or, 'Thou knowest with the Best Mind.'

³ Or 'in the memorised recital;' Ner. praka/am kalayati.

⁴ Parsi-persian MS.: Bisyâr kīnah-varzandah kīnah 'hwâhad, [kûs wanâh-kârân pâdafrâh kûnêd], kih, guft + srûd istêd [kih guft istêd]; kû, kih ôrân bî-sumâr [kû, pâdafrâh pah ân zamân tamâm bih kunand, kih ruwân bâz ân tan dehad]. Zâhir sumâr-kunandah Hôrmuzd [kû pah wanâh wa kirfah sumâr-kunand]; wân i buland âgâh pah Bahman [muzd dânad; kû ân kih bâyard dâdan]. Pah ân i Tû i Sumâ, Hôrmuzd! 'hudâ, ân i Şawâb âmû'than bih dânêstuwân (sic vid); [kih Sumâ padirâhî tamâm bih bêd + ya'hni + bârad, har kas pah nêkî âgâh bih bârad].

⁵ The Pahlavi has kinîkânō.

⁶ The hvaētu of the first verse, the dursasti of the ninth, &c.

⁷ The Pahlavi curiously errs with his rôshanō=clear; Ner. parishphuātaraḥ. It would be straining a point to call him free in interpreting what is 'collected' and so 'obvious' as 'clear.' We must, however, never forget that the supposed error of the Pahlavi is sometimes the reflex of our own (often necessary) ignorance. Vīdvau must refer back to the same subject as ahyâ in the first verse, or possibly to Aka Manah, going a step further back.

clared as victorious¹ (by his allies) are bound together for the smiting; yea, those things by which he was famed (as victorious) by his (blade of) glittering iron². But the utter destruction³ of those things Thou, O Ahura Mazda! knowest⁴, most surely⁵!

8. Of these wretched beings⁶ Yima Vtvanghusha was famed to be; he who, desiring to content⁷ our men, was eating kine's flesh in its pieces. But from⁸ (such as) these, O Ahura Mazda! in Thy discerning discrimination, am I (to be seen as distinct⁹).

¹ Possibly, 'which are by Thee announced as destined and proper to be smitten.' The Pahlavi has mûn zanisnô âmûkhtênd (sic). Jôyâ=jâyâ to jan, as âkâyâ is to kan.

² Compare other allusions to weapons, snaithirâ, and possibly dakhshtem.

³ So also the Pahlavi, ristak and pâdâfrâs.

⁴ Naêhîr vidvau and vaêdistô ahî are in antithesis and emphatic.

⁵ A literal rendering of this difficult verse would be as follows: Of these wretches, nothing knowing (is he that) for the smiting (dat. jâ, jan; cp. form Sk. jâ, jan) (are) the-collected-things, which things (as) victorious (read jâyâ) are declared forth, by which (things) he has been heard (of) through glittering iron, of which things Thou, O-Ahura! the ruin, O-Mazda! most knowing art. Others take senghaitê in the sense of 'cut' (?) and render very differently.

⁶ The Pahlavi has shedâân; Ner. tân dveshinah.

⁷ Or 'teaching,' so the Pahlavi; Ner. samâsvâdayati.

⁸ The Pahlavi translator hits the true rendering here: 'from among these I am chosen out by Thee.' Otherwise we have a question: Am I of these? The allusion is to the fall of Yima. As to the first eating of the flesh of beasts, recall Genesis ix. 3. Some have rendered: With regard to these I am of Thine opinion, O Mazda (?).

⁹ The Pahlavi may be rendered as follows: Among (of) these demons Yima of the Vivanzhânas is famed to have been a wicked scourge. It was he who taught men thus: Eat ye our flesh in pieces [wide as the breast, long as the arm—(or better with West, 'in lapfuls and armfuls')]. From among these [] I am chosen out by Thee, O Atharmazd! hereafter; [that is, even by Thee I am considered as good].

9. An evil teacher (as that leader is), he will¹ destroy (our) doctrines, and by his teachings he will pervert the (true) understanding of life, seizing away² (from me) my riches³, the choice and real wealth of (Thy) Good Mind. To You and to Asha, O Ahura Mazda! am I therefore crying with the voice of my spirit's⁴ (need)!

10. Aye, this man will destroy my doctrines (indeed, for he blasphemes the highest of creatures that live or are made). He declares that the (sacred) Kine⁵ and the Sun are the worst of things which eye can see; and he will offer the gifts of the wicked (as priest to their Demon-gods). And at the last he will parch⁶ our meadows with drought, and will hurl his mace at Thy saint (who may fall before his arms⁷).

¹ An improper subjunctive. Otherwise: He (has) destroyed (not irretrievably, of course; the case was not decided, and finally issued favourably).

² Apô—yantâ; otherwise 'they would take'; Ner. apaharati.

³ Zak î li îshî avôrtô [—khvâstak î pavan dastôbar].

⁴ Pavan valmansân milayâ î minavadhâ; Ner. vâgbhih mâ-nasavrîtyâ aham—âkrandaye (not following our present Pahlavi text, the gloss however). Observe that in reading Ner. we by no means ipso facto read the Pahlavi, either in correct translation, or as following our texts. Compare XLVI, 2.

⁵ One thinks somewhat of the familiar foes of the Vedic kine; but there can be of course no connection. The Iranian sacred Cow did not represent the rain cloud, at least not at all directly.

⁶ Read viyâpa/ as a demon. without sign: 'v' was miswritten for 'y' as often 'y' for 'v.' The Pahlavi language, not to speak of the Pahlavi translation, suggests it. How are we to account for the word viyâvânînd? We should not arrest our philology at the Zend and Sanskrit. The long vowel is most awkward for a comparison with the Indian vap=shear. And I think that 'destroying the means of irrigation' gives as good a meaning as 'shearing the land.' Notice that elsewhere a more correct form appears, viâpôtēmē (Vd. III, 15, (51 Sp.))=viyâpôtēmē.

⁷ Literally, 'he will discharge his club at the righteous.'

11. Yea, these will destroy my life, for they consult with the great¹ of the wicked (enlightening themselves by their words²). And they are seizing away³ the gifts of inherited treasures⁴ from both household-lord and from house-wife⁵; (wretched men that they are), and those who will fiercely wound (my folk, repelled and in no way kindly moved) by the better mind of the holy⁶.

12. (But Ahura will speak His rebuke, for) as to those doctrines which (such) men may be (basely) delivering⁷ (repelled) by the holiest action, (and galled⁸ by its sacred truth) God hath said: Evil (are they! Yea, unto these He hath said it) who have slain the Kine's life by a blessing (and have cursed her while they offered to help her⁹), men by whom Gr̥hmas are loved above Righteousness, and the Karpans,

¹ The Pahlavi translator erroneous, or free, as to nikōiteres, indicates the proper sense of mazibīs by pavan masâf [—pavan pêshpâyih va pâspâyih—]; but Neryosangh, mahattayâ-purâh-saratayâ.

² Comp. XXXI, 12, 'there high his voice lifts the truthful or liar.'

³ Literally, 'he takes.'

⁴ Riknah vindisnō.

⁵ Kadâk-khûdâi gabrâ nêrman.

⁶ Reshînênd; see V, 10. The ablative of the cause, comp. ashâ/haâ; otherwise with Hübschm., 'Sie die Schaden nehmen mögen durch den besten heiligen Geist, O Mazda!' (Casuslehre, s. 241.)

⁷ The Pahlavi translator had probably before him a text reading rashayen; he renders freely rêsh srâyênd. With such a text which is far preferable to the one afforded by the MSS. we may read: Whereby (yéna) men will be opposing and retarding (literally wounding) the doctrines which (are derived) from the best (moral and ceremonial) action; but to these men Mazda declared: Evil (are ye). See the previous verse.

⁸ See the previous verse.

⁹ The Pahlavi has hû-ravâkh-manih yemalelûnd.

and the Throne of those who have wished¹ for the Demon of lies (as their deity and friend²).

13. And the Grēhma will seek³ for these things by means of his (evil) kingdom⁴ in the abode of (Hell which is⁵) the Worst Mind (who both are together) the destroyers of life, and who, O Mazda! will bewail⁶ with glad but (envious) wish the message of Thy prophet. (But he will not abate with his vengeance), he will hold them afar from the sight⁷ of the truth!

14. His is Grēhma⁸; aye, his! And to (oppose) Thee⁹ he will establish the Kavis and (their) scheming

¹ So also indicated by the Pahlavi bavîhûnd.

² There is elsewhere evidence enough of a desire to encroach upon the truth.

³ So also indicated by bavîhûnêd.

⁴ Or, 'which kingdoms, sovereign power.'

⁵ Comp. XXX 6.

⁶ Or, 'they gladly complain;' so also the Pahlavi: Mûn—garzîsnô kâmak. The singular gîgereza is difficult with yaêkâ. Many would alter the text at once, and the temptation is great.

⁷ Hübschm., 'ye îs pâ/daresâ/ashahyâ der sie abhalte vom Schauen des Asha' (Casus. 241). So of XLVI, 4. So also indicated by pâdênd mîn nikêzîsnô î Aharâyîh; evidence of a struggle, or at least of a desire on the part of a rival party to possess themselves of some religious privilege or precedence. See the previous verse; also XXXI, 10: Never, O Mazda! never shall the thriftless and thieving one share the good doctrine. See still further XLIV, 15, where the two hosts meet in hostility 'on account of the doctrinal vows.'

⁸ Grēhma appertains to, but is not the particular evil teacher referred to throughout. The Pahlavi translator indicates bribery as the meaning of the word. Possibly some impious chieftain is meant whose procedure was of that nature. The word occurs in the plural.

⁹ Â hôi; Thwôî is difficult. Or (see Y. XLIV, 14), 'Thine understanding has subdued the Kavis.' The Pahlavi translator renders masîh, as if he had read ahuthwôî, offering an important alternative.

plans. Their deeds¹ of power are but deceits since they have come as an aid to the wicked², and since he has been (falsely) said (to be set) to conquer the Kine³, he who shall kindle that (very) help of grace which removes our death afar, (and lightens Thy saving flame).

15. And therefore will I drive from hence⁴ the Karpans' and Kavis' disciples. And after these (have thus been driven hence and away) then these (my princely aiding saints) whom they (now) render no longer rulers at will over life, (and deprive of their absolute power), these shall be borne (at

Read: In his dominion he has established the Kavis and their intended plans. Reading hōithōi, 'his G. is to be bound.'

¹ The predecessors of the Pahlavi translator seem to have understood the word var(e)kau as conveying the idea of power rather than that of brilliancy. He renders freely pavan zak ī varzânân avârûnō dânakânō. Supposing the text to stand, and not supplying a formation from var(e)z, we may hold that there existed a var(e)k beside var(e)z, as there undoubtedly was a har(e)k (see harek) beside har(e)z. This casts light on the Vedic várkas.

² Amatiḱ paḍīrēnd valman darvandân aīyyārīh [] amatiḱ avō Tōra zanisnō gūftō. The sufferings of the sacred Kine form the central thought of much that occurs.

³ Can gāus be a genitive here? But if a nominative, must not ye refer to it? How then could the Kine 'kindle' the aid of grace? A genitive looks difficult. It is, however, accepted by Spiegel, although he renders differently from my translation. The Pahlavi may give us invaluable relief here by restoring the text. The ancient translator read vaokaya. Reading with him, we might render: When the Kine which (yâ?) caused a death-removing help to be declared, was said to be meet for subjection (or slaying, reading an infinitive from gan). This rendering is more probable than that from saoḱaya. The Kine distinctly caused this help to be declared. See XXIX. But I make it a matter of principle to follow the MSS. in a first translation, where that is at all possible.

⁴ The Pahlavi translator differs greatly here, having taken anâis with adverbial force, and as possessing the a priv. (they being last) by the (immortal¹) two to the home of (Thy) Good Mind (in Heaven)²!

16. (And) this entire³ (reward of the righteous) is from that Best One who teaches⁴ in the wide (mental) light of the pious⁵, ruling (as supreme), O Mazda Ahura⁶! whose are my woes and my doubtnot inclined). He also read somewhat as follows: anâis avaênî(?) as ye=from his non-inclination he was blind who (belongs to the Karpan and to the Kavi). Whether a truer text is indicated by him here is doubtful on account of XLIV, 13, and its nâshâmâ; but the unvarying explanation of the Kavis as blind probably derives its origin from some such reading here, or elsewhere in lost documents.

Certainly if âis can be used as a particle, anâis is not altogether impossible in some such sense. Moreover, the Pahlavi translation here and elsewhere has afforded us such a multitude of valuable concretes, that we shall do well to think twice before we reject its most startling suggestions. Lit. trl. 'what (things are) of the K.'

¹ The Pahlavi translation gives a fine suggestion in the concrete sense here; seeing the dual âyâ, it explains it as referring to Haurvatât and Ameretatât, which is very probably correct. So Spiegel also renders. It is very difficult to decide in which sense yeng daintî nôit jyâteuŕ khshayamaneng vasô is to be taken. If in an evil sense (as *vase-khshayan*t is sometimes elsewhere taken) one might think of such a rendering as this: I have driven the Karpans' and Kavis' disciples hence to those (evil rulers) whom they (my servants) render no longer wanton tyrants over life. But these (my champion saints) shall be borne by the two to the home of Thy Good Mind. But strict grammar demands of us that tôit should refer back to yeng. Accordingly I suggest as above first.

² Observe that Vohu Manah equals heaven. Recall XXX, 4, 'but for the holy Vahista Manah; that is heaven.'

³ The Pahlavi has ham; Neryosangh has sarvam.

⁴ Reading sâk(a)yâskîŕ (P¹¹, skyaskîŕ; Pahlavi, âmûkhtisnô (sic); Ner., sikhâpanam). Otherwise syaskîŕ, which may well mean 'lying, reposing' in the wide (mental) light of the pious (or of the offering). Geldner lately admirably suggests a 2nd sg.

⁵ Pavan farâkhû hûshîh.

⁶ If this 'best one' is the Ratu of XXXIII, 1, all is grammatically clear; but the expressions are rather strong in view of ings¹ (yea, they lie in His power to heal), when I shall make (my prophets) men to be sought² for the harm of the wicked. And this I shall do by the word of my mouth (to defend and avenge my saints)!

XLVIII, 9, where similar language is certainly applied to Ahura. If Ahura is here meant, we have only one instance more to add to the many in which Ahura is spoken of in the third person, with an address to Him thrown in. See the differing views of XLV, 11. Possibly the 'Best One' was Ahura's Spenta Mainyu.

¹ Zak î pavan gûmânîkîh. As to âiithi, âiithivant seems to prove that its meaning must be calamity also in this place. Otherwise one is strongly tempted to heed the vigorous indication of the Pahlavi translator. Here and in XLVIII, 9, he renders 'manifest,' 'what is clear in the midst of my doubt.' The etymology would be far simpler. Alternatively dvaêthâ=terror (bî).

² Valman î pûmman khvâstâr. The Pahlavi sees 'to be desired' in ishyeng. Otherwise one might render: I will cause (verbal) missiles (comp. zastâ-istâis) to be cast forth from the mouth for the harm of the wicked.

(SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE. 'Parch with drought' in verse 10 may be regarded as having figurative application. The destruction of the means of irrigation, so often resorted to in the same regions later, would point also to a literal sense, but 'waste our meadows like drought' is a safer expression. See further vîvâpa, and vîvâpem=viyâpa, viyâpem.)

YASNA XXXIII.

PRAYERS, HOPES, AND SELF-CONSECRATION.

Brighter times seem to have arrived. The vengeance so confidently promised in the close of XXXII is described as near at hand. In fact the first three verses seem to belong as much to XXXII as to the present chapter. They remind one of the choruses of attending saints, or 'Immortals,' in XXIX, perfectly germane to the connection, but referring in the third person to a speaker who closes the last chapter with a first, and who begins again with a first in verse 4. The propriety of a division of chapters here rests upon the fact that the thought comes to a climax at XXXII, 16, beginning afresh at XXXIII, 4. Whether Zarathustra, or the chief composer, whatever his name may have been, composed these three verses relating, as they do, to himself, and put them into the mouth of another, or whether their grammatical form indicates another author, is difficult to determine. I doubt very greatly whether either the expressions 'I approach,' 'I offer,' &c., or the words 'he will act,' 'let him be in Asha's pastures,' are at all meant to express more than some modern hymns which use 'I' and 'he.' Both are in constant employment in anthology with no change in the person indicated. 'I' and 'Thy servant' are merely verbal variations. Here, however, the change is somewhat marked by the allusion to the chastisement of the wicked just previously mentioned in XXXII, 16. 1. It is to be noticed that the strictest canon with the original, as indeed with the later, Zarathustrians of the Avesta was the 'primeval law.' Unquestionably the precepts understood as following from the dualistic principle were intended; that is to say, no trifling with any form of evil, least of all with a foreign creed, was to be tolerated. Ahura has no share in the evolution of anything corrupt. We may even add that He had no power to prevent either sin or sorrow, although He possessed all conceivable power to oppose them. According to these fundamental laws, then, the Ratu is said to act, as sternly severe upon the evil as he is beneficent to the saint. 2. The fierce hostilities hitherto pursued are more than justified. The injury of the wicked by denouncing, planning, or by physical violence, is on a par with advising the good. They who pursue the enemies of Ahura are actually operating in love to God, and sacrificing to religion itself.

3. And accordingly the reciter is made to pray in this immediate connection for a sincere and useful friend (a vahista) to the believer, to whichever class he may belong, whether chief, allied peer, or villager, a friend spiritually enlightened (vidās), and, according to Ahura's prescript (XXIX, 2), keen, persevering, and brave in the cultivation of cattle (thwakhshanghâ gavôî). 'Let such an one as this, so asked for by the Lord himself, so needed by the Kine, let him,' he prays, 'be supported in his holy toil for us. Let him till and tend, not in the pastures of our valleys only, but in the spiritual pastures of the Divine Benevolence where the mystic kine is grazing.'
4. Taking up the peculiar 'I who' of XXVIII, the composer returns to the first person, continuing in that form with little exception until the last verse, which, naming Zarathustra in the third person, implies (if it is not an addition, which, however, it may be) that Zarathustra had been the speaker throughout. As it is highly probable that the author who uses this 'I who' is the same who uses it in XXVIII, and if we may take verse 14 as fair evidence that Zarathustra is the speaker here, we acquire some additional grounds for believing that the person who wrote (if we can apply such an expression to the author) the words 'to Zarathustra and to us,' as well as 'to Vistâspa and to me,' and 'to Frashaostra and to me,' was universally recognised to be Zarathustra himself composing a piece to be recited by another. As if in response to the expression in verse 3, recalling that although a vahista (a best one) to some of each class (verse 1) he was no contentor of the wicked (XLIII, 15), he begins a prayer which is only completed by its izyâ in verse 6, and which gathers force by each preceding profession of fidelity. And true to a practical dualism, he first abjures the leading sin of disobedience to God, and of arrogance, discontent, and dishonesty toward man, accompanied (as it seems to have been) with neglect of the all-important duties to the cattle who shared the sanctity of 'the soul' of their representative. And perhaps it is this practical severity of dualism as opposed to the more facile 'lying' of the opposed religion, which was the cause of that high reputation of the Persians for veracity, which was grouped with avoiding debt by Herodotus among the virtues of the race.
5. I, he goes on to say, or to imply, I who not only abjure disobedience, insolence, complaint, and lying, but especially invoke the great genius who is Obedience himself, Obedience toward God, (Thee), endeavouring as I do by this abjuration and prayer to attain, not to a 'hundred autumns' of booty and glory, but to a long life in the kingdom which was established in the spirit of the Divine Benevolence, and to paths not only for the war-cart, or for commerce, but to those rigidly straight paths of moral purity in which Ahura dwells, 6. I, he adds once more, who am thus Thine actually invoking (zbayâ) invoker, 'straight' like the paths (erezus), I am seeking with longing (kayâ) to know from that Best Spirit (Thy Spenta Mainyu?) animated once more by that best mind, to know-what? Shall we regard it as a bathos when we read that he thus with cumulative urgency prays to know what the Best Spirit thought should be done for the recovery and perfection of the fields? If we turn back to XXIX, 1, we shall see that the identical word (vâstryâ) describes the original want of the kine's soul. It was vohû vâstryâ which she implored as her salvation; and it was the sacred agriculturist who alone could afford it, and who as the 'diligent tiller of the earth' always remained the typical saint. And as his useful deeds in reclaiming, irrigating, and cultivating land, were justly ranked among the first services of a human being, and as the last preparation of the gathered grain was perhaps humorously, but yet pungently, said to make the Daêvas start, and shriek, and fly (see Vendîdâd III, 32, Sp. 165), and as further, a life from the fruits of the earth to this day constitutes the main difference between those who live by murderous theft and those who live honestly in nearly the same regions, I think we may not only see no bathos here, but on the contrary admire the robust sense of this early religion¹, and say that a knowledge as to a true policy in the department of agriculture was one of the wisest possible desires, and the most of all things worthy of a 'sight of Mazda and of consultation with Him.' How the fields had better be worked, and how the people could best be kept from bloody freebooting as aggressors or as victims, this involved Ahura's Righteous Order, Benevolence, Power, and Piety, the four energising Immortals all at once. And this only could secure the other two rewarding personifications, Welfare and Immortality.

7. Having prayed for that which is the first virtue of civilised existence, work (verezyêidyâi), he proceeds to further petitions. 'Come Ye,' he beseeches in Vedic fashion. Come Ye, O Ahura, Asha, and Vohu Manah! and behold the attentive monarch, the leading Magavan, as he listens to my instructions with the other chiefs, and the thronging masses. And let too the sacrificial gifts pour in for offering and worship.

¹ In this particular. As to ceremonies it had at a later period more than its share of absurdities; but as to honest work as against 'foraging on the enemy' there is a great difference between the Gâthas, and some other ancient hymns, for instance the Rîks of the Veda. In fact these latter may be regarded as representing the opposite extreme.

8. He rests at no bare morality for the simple multitude. He knows too well the human foible, therefore he asks with vigour for sacrifice and hymn.

9. Encouraging the two pious chiefs whose souls go hand in hand, he prays that an influence like that of the 'eternal two' might bear their 'spirit' (sic) to the shining home of Paradise, it having attained to perfection by the help of the Best Mind of God within it. (For mainyu in this sense compare XLIV, 11.)

10. Asking of Mazda to grant in His love (or 'by His will') all the happy phases of life which have been, or which shall ever be experienced, he prays that their bodies, that is, their persons, as separate accountable individuals (compare nareṃ nareṃ hvahyâi tanuyê) might flourish in the graces of the Good Mind, the Holy Sovereignty, and the Sacred Order, till they were blessed with the ustâ, the summum bonum.

11. He here prays all the grand abstractions, Piety, the Righteous Order (which alone can 'push on' the settlements), the Good Mind of God within His people, and His kingdom, to turn their mental ears and listen, and listening to pardon.

12. And specifying the one central object of desire, the Thrift-law, the Avesta of the Ratu, or Saoshyant, he asks Ahura to arise to his help and give him spiritual strength by sustaining him through the inspiring Righteousness and the Good Mind, in an effective invocation.

13. With a spirituality still deeper than his Semitic colleague, he asks, not to see the person of God, but His nature, and especially to be able to comprehend and bring home to his mind what the Sovereignty of God implies with its 'blessed rewards.' And he asks of Piety as first acquired, practised, and then speaking within him, to reveal the Gnosis, the Insight, that is, the Religion.

14. After the fervent language of the previous verses we may accept verse 14 as a legitimate continuation. Its 'Zarathustra' may mean 'I' just as 'David' is used by the Psalmist for 'me.' And the language can mean nothing but a dedication of all that he is and has to God, his flesh, his body, his religious eminence, the obedience which he offers in word and deed, inspired by Righteousness, and the Kingdom which he has succeeded in saving and blessing. (I do not think that I have at all exaggerated the grasp and fervour of this section. Less could not be said, if the words are to be allowed their natural weight.)

Translation.

1. As by the laws of the primeval world, so will our spiritual chieftain act (that chief besought-for by the Kine¹, and named as Zarathustra² by the Lord). Deeds most just he will do toward the wicked, as toward the righteous, and toward him whose deeds of fraud³ and righteous deeds combine (in equal measure).

2. Yea, (he will act with justice but with vengeance, for) he who does evil to the wicked by word, or with thought (and plan), and (who therein does not dally, but toils labouring as) with both the hands, or he (again) who admonishes one for his good⁴, such as these are offering (a gift) to their religious⁵ faith in the love (and with the approving view) of Ahura Mazda⁶; (they are offering to conscience.)

¹ See XXIX, 1.

² See XXIX, 6, 8.

³ So the Pahl.; and so also Roth (Z. D. M. G., vol. xxxvii, 5, 223) taking mithahyâ as a nom. pl. (comp. vañahya). But I am strongly inclined to a former view of my own. Yêhyâ-mithahyâ look irresistibly like two genitives. I would render as an emphatic alternative 'what fraud he may lay hold of (hemyâsaitê with the gen.), reach (of the one), and what (seem) to him the righteous deeds (of the other).' But if Roth and the Pahlavi are right, we have here the origin of the later hamêstagâ, the souls in the intermediate place between Heaven and Hell, whose sins and good works have been equal (West, Gloss. to M. i K.). The Persian manuscript of Haug 12 b. has: Kih iê (pro ham) û i ân ham rasîd êstêd ân i durûgâ, kih iê (ham) û ân i 'hâlis [kû, hamêstân].

⁴ So the Pahlavi also indicates: Val valman î sapîr---kâshisn. Ner. uttamasya vâ âsvâdayanti dehinañ.

⁵ Literally, 'they are offering a gift to their own choice' (var=varena; comp. yâvarenâ).

⁶ They are holding fast by the holy cause, and their vehemence in vengeance does not negative the fact that they are toiling in the love of Ahura. Pahlavi: Pavan zak î lak dôshisnô, Aûharmazd î

3. (And so may it be), O Ahura ! Let the man who is the best toward the righteous saint, whether lord's kinsman¹, or as village labourer, with the allied² peer (of the master), having light, and endowed with energy for the cattle (a Ratu such as Ahura sought to satisfy their wail), let such an one be (for us)³ in the work-field of the Righteous Order, in the pastures of Thy Good Mind⁴.

4. (And I beseech for Thine instruction), I who will abjure⁵ all disobedience (toward Thee, praying that others likewise may withhold it) from Thee ; I who abjure the Evil Mind as well, the lordly kinsman's arrogance⁶, and that lying sin which is (alas !) the next thing to the people⁷ (their most familiar fault), and the blaming ally's falsehood, and from the Kine the worst care of her meadows⁸ (the crime of stint in labour⁹),

¹ Literally, 'with, or as, the kinsman.'

² 'With the true ally.'

³ See XXIX, 2 : 'Let that pasture-giver whom ye would appoint for us, teaching by example and precept vohû vâstryâ, let him be on our sacred pastures, and on our side.'

⁴ The Pahlavi may be rendered as follows : He who affords increase to the righteous on account of the relationship [that is, something is given to him ?] does so also on account of the labourer's duty, or class [that is, the labourer is to be considered as his own]. Through the loyalty ; that is, the loyal class, that which adheres to Aûharmazd, he has a thorough understanding as to what is (true) energy toward the herds. Thus Vohûman (a good mind) is a workman with him to whom Righteousness also belongs.

⁵ Hübschm. Casuslehre, 'der ich von dir den Ungehorsam und schlechten Sinn durch Gebet abwenden will' (s. 180).

⁶ Observe that hvaêtu certainly designates an upper class. Why else arrogance ?

⁷ Possibly this severity was the cause of the later high reputation of the Zarathustrians for veracity.

⁸ Literally, 'from the pasture of the Kine.'

⁹ The Pahlavi may be rendered : Him who will not listen to

5. I, who (abjuring these sins), call earnestly on Thine Obedience of all (assisting guardians) the greatest one for our help¹, gaining (thereby²) long life in the Realm of (Thy) Good Mind (incarnate in our tribes), and paths that are straight from their Righteous Order, wherein Ahura Mazda dwells³,

6. (Yea), I who, as this Thy faithful priest, invoke Thee through (my) Righteousness, (now) seek⁴ with longing from (Thy) Best Spirit, and with that⁵ (best) intention of mind, (to know) what⁶ he himself thought of the working of (our) fields⁷. Therefore (because I abjure the Evil Mind, and all disobedience, Thee, O Aûharmazd! will I abjure, and Akôman also, for by him there is the despising of relations, and the deception of the labouring men who live close at hand [that is, of neighbours]. And he is ever bringing censure upon the clients. And he holds to the lowest measure of duty toward the Herd.

¹ Avanghâ ne, or avanghânê, an infinitive (see Wilhelm, de Infin. p. 16). The Pahlavi has avô aîyyârîh.

² Sraosha (= listening obedience) is the greatest for help, because by a Mâthra which appeals to him the way to Ahura is found out (XXVIII, 6) and the Demon defeated. If apânô is read, so strictly. The Pahlavi translator seems to have understood apâ ne; barâm ayâfinâi pavan dêr-zîvisnîh, zak î pavan khûdâyîh î Vohûman.

Ner.: Avâpaya dîrghe gîvitatve. This may well restore for us the proper text. Reading apâ ne we should render 'obtain for us.'

³ Ahura Mazda dwells as in His abode amid the paths where His saints walk (see XLVI, 16).

⁴ So also indicated by bavihûnêd. Kayâ properly refers to ye.

⁵ The Pahlavi translator seems to have seen an imperative in avâ, rendering it freely aîyyârînêdô.

⁶ Yâ may be an instr. sing. or an acc. pl. neut. 'I ask what he thought meet to be done;' yâ does not necessarily equal yéna in every instance.

⁷ I need hardly remind the reader that agriculture was the great question of orderly and religious life with the Zarathustrians. Without it there was of course no resource but wandering and plunder for them.

arrogance, falsehood), O Mazda ! would I beseech of Thee for a sight of Thee, and for consultation with Thee ! (What is Thy will and mind ?)

7. Come Ye, then, to my best (regulations. Come to my men, and my laws¹), my very own, O Mazda ! and let them see through the Righteous Order and (Thy) Good Mind (which Thou wilt bestow in Thy drawing near) how I am heard before the rich giver² (in the assembly of Thy worshippers). Yea, (come Ye) ; and let the manifold offerings of worship be manifest among us³. (Arouse Ye, and help our zeal⁴ !)

¹ So I render from the context. Otherwise see tâ tôi izyâ in the previous verse.

² I was formerly inclined to understand Ahura here, Indian usage permitting. (Indra and other Gods are maghavan.) But modern authority, aided by the ancient Pahlavi translator, brings me to a better mind. The Pahlavi has pavan fravôn magîh. It is better to refer the word to the disciple. The more prominent members of the congregation are meant.

³ Ner. renders the last line thus : And may these offerings be manifest in the midst of us, and accompanied with (sincerest) worship.

⁴ There are certain cases where allowance for an ancient scholar working under great disadvantages becomes a critical necessity. Here the Pahlavi translator was clearly the victim of a manuscript. The word 'âidûm' (sic) stood, as similar words so often stand, in his MS. as 'âi. dûm.' Deeply imbued with a superstitious regard for every letter, and with a public equally scrupulous, he saw no course before him but to translate each as best he could. He chose to render 'âi' by an infinitive, preserving the root, and could only think of a form of 'dâ' for dûm (so also moderns in another case). Many writers, seeing such a step, cast away his paper, regarding themselves as absolved by such a 'blunder' from mastering his translations. But a little honest labour will always bring one back to sounder exegesis. In the next following verse we have identically the same form in another word, which he renders awkwardly but correctly, using dâ again, but as a proper auxiliary.

8. (Come Ye) and show me the worthy aims of our faith, so that I may approach and fulfil them with (Thy) Good Mind, the offering, O Mazda! of the One like You¹, or the words of praises offered with Righteousness. And give Ye as Your offering² (of grace to me) the abiding gifts of Your Immortality and Welfare!

9. And let (one like those³), O Mazda! bear on to Thee the spirit of the two leaders who cause the holy ritual Truth to flourish; let him⁴ bear them to (Thy) brilliant home⁵ with⁶ preternatural insight, and with the Better Mind. Yea, let him bear that spirit on as a fellow-help⁷ in (furthering) the readi-

¹ To approach the offering of a praiser seems certainly an unnatural expression. I think that we are obliged to regard khshâmâvatô as another way of saying Yourself rather than 'of Yours'; and if it equals 'Yourself' here, it may elsewhere; see XXXIV, 2, khshâmâvatô vahmê, also XLIV, 1, neme khshâmâvatô. All acknowledge mavaitê to mean 'to me.' Hübschmann, Casuslehre, s. 200: 'dass ich mit frommem sinne an eure Verehrung, Mazda, gehen kann.'

² It is curious that draonô seems to be in apposition here. The word is used merely in the sense of offering in the later Avesta. It might possibly mean 'possessions' here.

³ See XXXII, 15. There helping princes are spoken of 'as borne by the two (Haurvatâ and Ameretatâ).' Here in immediate connection with the same two it is said: Let one bear the spirit of the two united chiefs. By the term 'spirit,' which sounds so suspiciously modern, we must nevertheless understand very nearly what the word would mean in a modern phrase. By these two leaders we may understand either Gâmâspa and Vistâspa (XLIX, 9) or Gâmâspa and Frashaostra. (Compare yâvarenâ Frashaostrâ Gâmâspâ.)

⁴ 'Let one bear them.'

⁵ Khvârîh mânînisnô.

⁶ The Pahlavi gives its evidence for an instrumental and for a less pronounced meaning than the one above.

⁷ Hamkarzârîh. If the second kar is the root, the sense is figurative.

ness¹ of those (in their holy work) whose souls go hand in hand².

10. (And not for these alone do I pray, but for us³ as well.) All prosperous states⁴ in being which have been enjoyed in the past, which men are now enjoying, and which shall be known in the future, do Thou grant (me) these in Thy love⁵. (Yea), cause (our) bodily and personal life to be blest with salvation⁶ through (Thy) Good Mind, (Thy) Sovereign Power, and (Thy) Sanctity⁷.

11. And, O Thou who art the most beneficent Ahura Mazda! and thou who art Âramaiti (our piety), and also the Righteous Order who dost further on the settlements; and Thou, the Good Mind, and the Sovereign Power! hear ye me all, and have mercy⁸ for every deed which I do whatsoever⁹!

¹ Bûndakô.

² Pavan akvîñô rûbânô.

³ So more probably. See the first person in verses 8 and 11.

⁴ So the Pahlavi also, hû-zivîsnih.

⁵ So the Pahlavi also : Pavan hanâ î lak dôshîsnô. 'In Thy will' is here very weak.

⁶ Nadûkîhiê î avô tanû [am yehabûn] ; Ner. subham tanau.

⁷ Neryosangh : Let them continue to live well, and be prosperous in all things [] those females (yâh most curiously) who are born thus [that is, come from elsewhere (and not from us)], and who are [gained over by myself]. Those, O Great Wise One! who shall exist [(or) come in the future], let them render these persons thine own through friendship to thee. Cause thou the Best Mind to increase within me, O Lord! [that is, make my mind ever the more piously zealous]. And in view of my righteousness grant me a benefit in my body, or person [].

⁸ So the Pahlavi also : Am barâ âmûrzêd.

⁹ Observe that all the Ameshôspends, except the two mentioned in verse 8, are here bidden as persons to listen and be merciful. These recurring instances (recall the two hands of Asha &c.) necessitate the view that the idea of personality is never lost in that of the abstract quality; and vice versâ; (the latter especially in the Gâthas where the names always retain much, if not all of their original force). As to âdâi; see vanghuyâ (sic) zavô-âdâ in the next verse.

12. And Thou, O Ahura! do Thou (Thyself) arise¹ to me! Through Âramaiti give me power, O most bountiful Spirit Mazda! through (my) faithful appeals and offerings²; and for (my) Righteousness grant me mighty strength, and (Thy) thrift-law³ through (Thy) Good Mind⁴.

13. (Arise to give me power), and then for grace in a wide perception⁵ (that I may view its depth and extent), do Thou reveal to me Thy⁶ nature (?), O Ahura! (the power of Thine attributes), and those of Thy (holy) kingdom, and by these, the blessed gifts⁷ of (Thy) Good Mind! And do Thou, O bountiful Piety⁸ show forth the religious truths through (Thy) Righteous Order.

¹ We seem obliged to suppose that Ahura was poetically conceived of as sitting (like Vohûman in Vendidad XIX, 31 (Wg.)) upon an ornamented throne, or we may take the expression as pure metaphor equalling 'exert Thy power.' Âramaiti may be a voc.

² See âdâi in verse 11.

³ Pavan zak î Vohûman sardârîh. The 'thrift-law' is the regulation established by the Ratu demanded in Y. XXIX for the redemption of the Kine. It expresses the entire polity and theology of the Zarathustrian people as summed up in the original Avesta.

⁴ Neryosangh: Up! O Lord! purify me [that is, make me pure, or free, from the influence of that tormentor, the Evil Mind]; and grant me perfect spirituality and zeal. For we are recipients of Gvahmana, O more mighty spirit [that is, let him be as a guest, arrived within my body]! And let sanctity have power over the murderer (?) [], and through the lordship of the Best Mind.

⁵ The Pahlavi has here pavan kâmak kâshismô, on which see Darmesteter, Études Iranienues, vol. ii, as per index.

⁶ Literally, 'Your.'

⁷ Ashi has this meaning in the later Avesta. It also means 'sacred regularity,' 'exactness' in religious duties.

⁸ So the Pahlavi also: As pavan Aharâyîh dînô frâz dakh-

14. Thus, as an offering, Zarathustra gives the life¹ of his very body. And he offers, likewise, O Mazda! the priority of the Good Mind, (his eminence gained) by his holiness (with Thy folk); and he offers (above all his) Obedience (to Thee) in deed and in speech, and with these (Thine established) Sovereign Power²!

shakîñö; Ner.: Punyena dinim prañihñaya. Possibly, 'give light to our consciences through Asha' would be better.

¹ The tissues; the word seems contrasted with bones elsewhere. The Pahlavi has khayâ, and Ner. givam (sic).

² The Pahlavi translation may be rendered as follows: Thus, as a gift of generosity, I who am Zartûst (so freely, and with no error from ignorance (!)) give the life of my own body, as the advance [as the chieftainship] to Vohûman and to Aûharmazd, and to Ashavahist, in actions [that is, I would do the deeds which Aharâyih desires], and would give obedient attention to the word (literally the hearing of the word) to (i. e. of) Khshatraver.

YASNA XXXIV.

1. A tone of thankfulness continues. As if in gratitude for better fortunes, the prophet declares that he will bestow upon Ahura with the foremost, according to the measure of the gifts which he has received. Those gifts were the secured Immortality (not mere temporal 'deathlessness'), the Righteous Order, and the Sovereign Power established in holiness and bestowing the Universal Weal.

2. The kind of gifts which are proposed for offerings are not sacrificial beasts or fruits, but the actions of the truly pious citizen whose soul is intimately united with Righteousness, the homage of prayer, and the songs of praise. As no piety could exist without strict ecclesiastical regularity, so no ceremonial punctuality was conceived of apart from honour and charity (see verse 5 and Yast XXII).

3. Accordingly the meat-offering, the mention of which immediately follows, is spoken of as offered with homage to the Righteous Order and to the Divine Sovereignty for the benefit of all the sacred settlements, in order to equip the wise man fully, and as a helpful blessing among the Immortals themselves and their adherents.

4. And the Fire is likewise mentioned, which was worshipped not so much like Agni as the friendly god of the hearth and the altar, but more and chiefly like Agni as the priest of the church.

Not unlike Agni, it is called upon both for inward spiritual strength and for temporal blessings in various forms, together with vengeance hurled very much as if in the form of a thunderbolt (zastâ-istâis derestâ-aênanghem). 5. To explain what he means by his supplications for the coming of the Kingdom, and for holy actions (that is, to make it certain that he does not mean punctilious ritualism apart from the noblest charity), he rhetorically asks: 'And what is Your Kingdom, that which Zarathustra establishes and offers to You? (XXXIII, 14). What is the kind of prayer (comp. XLVIII, 8, and LIII, 1) which I must use, so that I may become Yours (Your property) in my actions, not to load Your priesthood with sacrifices, nor to fatten Your princes with booty (as too often in the Riks), nor yet to secure a heavy gift to the poet, but to 'nourish Your poor?' This was the essence of the desired Sanctity and the Sovereign Authority. The Kingdom of God, exalted and personified as a separate intelligence, is positively said to be something more than a gaudy pageant of material display, even Tavâ Khshathrem yâ erezigyôî dâhî drigavê vahyô (LIII, 9). (See also even Vendîdâd II [part i], where moral duties are lauded.)

And the composer himself seems to be so conscious of the sharply defined difference between such a kingdom and that of the rival religion, that he immediately adds an interdict: 'Such is Your Kingdom, caring for the righteous poor, and therefore we declare You irreconcilably distinct from the Daêvas and their polluted followers. Ye are beyond them and before in the spirit of Your Reign!'

6. He then utters an impressive doubt, which only deepens our admiration at his expressions of faith: 'If it be really true,' he continues (see XLIV, 6), 'that Ye are thus with the Righteous Order and the Good Mind, the God who looks upon the goodness of the heart and the activity of the hands, then give me a sign of it, that I may persevere and increase in the depth of my homage while life shall last.' 7. For the struggle, though not without signs of a favourable issue, was far from over yet. (Hence his misgivings.)

He then asks with some wistfulness after the 'ar(e)drâ,' the men that could help, who from the experience of the grace of God, could turn sorrow into blessing by establishing the holy religious system firmly, but with enlarged and not narrowed understanding. And, still a little dispirited, he declares, as so often: 'None have I other than You; therefore I can wait for the ar(e)drâ. Do ye save us alone by Your already offered means of grace.'

8. 'For Ye have given me already, as it were, a sign. The enemy are checked, and for the moment cowed, if they are not repelled. They among whom there was death for so many when they had the upper hand, and when their ruler persecuted the holy vows, are not only struck with terror by the action which we take, but their chief retribution is, as we hold it, spiritual, and therefore, in the eye of truth the more severe. They will not encourage righteous Order and righteous intentions, and accordingly, the personified Good Intention, grieved, will depart from them.'

9. 'Yea,' he reiterates, amplifying, 'the unfortunate sinners who depart from Thy kindly and sacred Piety in this ignorance of all experience of Thy Good Mind, will suffer an equal desertion. The characteristics of righteousness will, in their turn, avoid them as the unclean creatures flee from us.' 10. 'And this is,' thus he continues, 'a sign or result which the All-wise declares to me to steady my soul as I waver.' 'And these are indeed the cheering proofs of Thy favour,' he adds, addressing Ahura, 'which terrify our enemies and advance us, giving us a righteous eminence (XXXIII, 14) in Thy Kingdom.'

11. 'Therefore that kindly Piety whom these desert in their judicial ignorance, will increase for us both the all-comprehensive blessings; spiritual Deathlessness begun in anticipation here, and its necessary condition, Welfare. And they shall be increased as food (sic) for Mazda's straitened people, or better, to His glory as their monarch. And by their means Ahura may defend Himself efficiently from the persecuting and idolatrous foe.' 12. Taking into consideration all that depends on a correct understanding as to religious and political duties, he fervently prays to be guided aright in the establishment of a ceremonial and of praises, beseeching Mazda to speak, declaring the kind of worship which may secure the ashis (which are the blessed rewards). And he asks to be taught those religious paths about which no error was possible, the paths which are the Good Mind's own.

13. After a fashion already known to us (as in XXIX), he answers his question himself. That way which Ahura had already revealed as the Good Mind's own, was made up of the revealed precepts of the Saoshyants. There, as in the paths where Ahura dwells (XXXIII, 5; XLVI, 16), the well-doer may prosper from his devotion to the religious truths, and gain a reward immediately from the hand of God. 14. As if never forgetting the original calamity, the woes of the Kine, he further declares that way to be the one of all to be chosen for this earthly life, as the vestibule to the heavenly one. And he asserts that they who toil for the Kine (who represents here, as generally, the holy settlements as well as their chief source of riches and support) are striving to further and demonstrate the wisdom of that way by every righteous contrivance.

Nay, he declares that the deeds of Piety are themselves the highest wisdom, just as the words and righteous actions of the Saoshyants not only declare and make, but constitute, 'the way.'

15. Again, concluding with a climacteric and synoptical prayer, he beseeches Ahura to speak and reveal to him all the most available statements, ceremonies, and praises. And never forgetting that all ceremonies, hymns, and sacrifices, sacred as they are, are only means to a greater end; he prays the Deity that He may exert that Sovereign Power which is alone supremely efficient in relieving actual distress (LIII, 9), for by its holy laws and spiritual arms it can alone bring on the Frashakarz, and produce that condition in society in which all human progress shall have become complete.

Translation.

1. As to those (three gifts of blessings), Immortality, the Righteous Order, and the (established) Kingdom of Welfare, which Thou, O Mazda! hast given through (holy) deeds, words, and the sacrifice unto these (Thy servants here in my sight¹), gifts (shall) be offered² by us in return to Thee, O Ahura! and with the foremost of them all.

2. Yea, and all those gifts of the Good Spirit³ have been given (back in gratitude) to Thee by the mind and the deed of the bountiful man, whose soul goes hand in hand⁴ with the Righteous Order in the settlement, in homage toward the One like You⁵,

¹ The hymns seem to be all composed for public declamation, as is evident from various passages. Similar indications often occur in the Veda. I formerly connected aêshâm with Ameretatâ, &c., 'a thank-offering for these (gifts).'

² I am very sorry to oppose progress on such a subject as dastê, but I do not think that it is an infinitive, nor that âitê or mrûtê are such. -Tê, or what it represents, I regard as seldom or never a Gâthic suffix, and especially not, as here, where dastê falls to the end of the sentence. Too little attention has been paid to the Gâthic sentence. The infinitive seldom falls to the end of it; vidvanô vaoâ; ta môi viđidyâi vaoâ; viduyê (vidvê) vohû mananghâ; menkâ daidyâi yêhyâ mâ rishis; ashâ fradathâi aspezeratâ; âgôi (?) hâdrôyâ; ye akistem vaênanghê aogedâ; but zbayâ avanghânê (?) yâ verezyêidyâi mantâ vâstryâ; srûidyâi Mazdâ frâvaoâ; kahmâi vîviduyê (-vê) vashî; ta verezyêidyâi hya môi mraotâ vahistem; arethâ vôizhdyâi kâmahyâ tem môi dâtâ; dazdyâi hâkerenâ; but vasmî anyâkâ viduyê (-vê); men-dâidyâi yâ Tôi Mazdâ âdistis, &c. The Pahlavi renders here with admirable freedom as a first person, yehabûnem.

³ Observe this expression. It is the spenta mainyu which, like the 'Holy Spirit of God,' is sometimes identical with Him.

⁴ Souls are elsewhere said to go hand in hand; see Y. XXXIII, 9.

⁵ I suppose that it is possible that khshmvatô, here and elsewhere, may refer to the human subject, 'to the praise of your wor-

O Mazda ! and with the chants of the (thankful) praisers¹.

3. And unto Thee, O Ahura ! will we offer the (thankful) meat-offering with self-humbling praise, and to Thy Righteousness (like Thee a person), and for all the settlements in Thy kingdom which are guarded² by Thy Good Mind. For in the perfect preparation of the justly acting (has that offering its power), O Mazda ! together with all (others of its kind). Among those like You and worthy of Yourselves, it is a blessing³.

4. And we pray likewise for Thy Fire, O Ahura ! strong through Righteousness (as it is), most swift, (most) powerful, to the house with joy receiving it, in many wonderful ways our help, but to the hater, O Mazda ! it is a steadfast⁴ harm as if with weapons hurled from the hands⁵.

shipper,' but it does not sound at all natural. I think that khshmvatō is merely another way of saying 'of you,' as mavant=me. So the Pahlavi also seems to render here: Avō zak ī lekūm va nīyāyisnō. Ner. also: Samāgātāhāmi yushmākam namaskrītaye, Mahāgānān.

¹ This recalls the dasemē-stūtām of Y. XXVIII, 10.

The Pahlavi renders freely and not uncritically, regarding the spenta nar as Zarathustra himself: Aftānō dēn Garōdmānō stāyem. Ner. : Garothmāne staumi te.

² So also the translations: Aīghas parvarisn va min frarūnīh. Ner. : Uttamena pratipālyā manasā. Compare Y. XXXII, 2 : sāremanō khshathrāt. The singular verb is difficult.

³ Or, 'for as those justly acting, and in preparation will we offer it as a blessing together with all who are among "Your own." ' Here khshmvant equals 'Your own'; rather than 'Yourselves.'

⁴ Or 'visible' as fire, but this seems too feeble a conception for the place. The Pahlavi translator read derestā as a participle from dar(e)z, which is quite as possible as that it should be from dar(e)s. He renders yakhšenunēd kīnō ; Ner., vidadhāti nigraham. That he so translated because he was not aware that derestā could be also a participle from dar(e)s, is no longer tenable.

⁵ As by no means a partially selected specimen, let the reader

5. What is¹ then Your Kingdom, O Mazda? What are Your riches? that I may become² Your own in my actions, with the Righteous Order, and (Thy) Good Mind, to care for Your poor (in their suffering³). Apart from all would we declare You, yea, apart from Daêvas⁴, and Khrafstra-polluted mortals!

consider the following from the Pahlavi: Thus, O Aûharmazd! this which is Thy Fire, which is so powerful, is a satisfaction to him whose is Aharâyih [-when my chieftain (the glossist seeming to have a text with a first pronoun; otherwise the first translator who never saw? us(e)mahî) becomes one by whom duty and charity are fulfilled], for it is quick and powerful [the Fire], and remains continually in friendship with him, and makes joy manifest to him. And therefore, O Aûharmazd! on him who is the tormentor it takes revenge as if with a mighty wish.

¹ Kaŕ is often a mere interrogative particle, so modern interrogatives are also often merely formal.

² Bartholomae admirably follows K₄ here with its hakhmî; it gives a more common explanation of vâo, which I am obliged to take in a possessive sense beside nē. The manuscript used by the Pahlavi writer had, however, ahmî, as many others now extant.

³ Note the recurrence of this care for the poor, showing what the frequent mention of righteousness, the good mind, &c. meant.

⁴ Observe that daêvâis must mean the Demon-gods and not their worshippers here; parē vâo indicates this, and also mashyâis = men, who are separately mentioned. The Pahlavi translator is finely critical here, giving us our first hint as to the meaning: Pêsh Lekûm min harvisp-gûnō levînō gûft hōmanêd [aigh tûbân-kardar hōmanêd, &c.]. So with antare-mrtyê (-vê), he was the pioneer also. I render with impartiality: Which (of what kind) is your sovereignty? [that is, what thing can I do, whereby your sovereignty may be increased through my instrumentality?] And which is your wealth? [that is, what thing shall I do whereby riches may be kept in your possession by my means?] How thus in the actions of Aûharmazd shall I become yours? [That is, I (?) shall do that thing through which, by my means, your sovereignty is extended; and also wealth is kept in your possession by me.] For whenever I (?) shall do righteous deeds, [that is, when I (?) shall do duty and good works], Vohûman gives nourishment to our poor. Before all of every kind, even before them ye are

6. If thus Ye are in verity, O Mazda! with the Righteous Order and Thy Good Mind, then grant Ye me a sign¹ of this in this world's entire abiding² (while I live amid its scenes), how offering sacrifice and praising³ You the more devoutly⁴, I may approach You (in my worship)!

7. Where⁵ are Thine offerers, O Mazda! Thy helpers, who as the enlightened of the Good Mind are producing the doctrines with wide mental light as inherited treasures, (delivering them as Thy word) in misfortune and in woe⁶? I know none other than You; then do Ye save us through Your righteousness!

8. Through these our deeds (of sacrifice and zeal⁷), they are terrified⁸ among whom there was (once) destruction, and for many (at the time) when the declared; [that is, ye are more capable] than the demons, for their (?) intellect is perverted, (and ye are also before) men.

¹ So also the Pahlavi dakhsrak.

² So indicated by ketrûnânî. I have no doubt whatever that maêthâ should have this sense. See also Y. XXX, 9.

³ So also the Pahlavi: Pavan âfrînağânô dahisnô va stâyisnô sâtûnam madam.

⁴ Urvâidyâo, if in its original form, looks like a comparative. One naturally thinks of a vrâd* (?) equivalent to 'vrîdh.'

⁵ Rhetorically interrogative as often in English, or indeed a mere particle. (Compare XLVI, 9.)

⁶ So also the Pahlavi indicates with its âmûkhtisnô (sic) î hû-varisnô [î avô kâr va kîrfak], mûniê pavan âsânîh va mûniê pavan tangîh vâdûnyên frâkh-hushîh. Ner.: Sikshâm satyâya yaî samâdhânatve, samka/atve * 'pi kurute vipulakaitanyaî [kila, yaî kâryam punyam yat samriddhatayâ kurute] taêka yat samka/atayâ 'pi kurute, tasya vigñânakaitanyam tasmâd bhavati.

⁷ Nao being taken in a possessive sense.

⁸ But the Pahlavi has: 'Min zak î valmansân maman kûnismô lanman bîm'; possibly 'by these actions they terrify us'; the middle in the sense of the active.

oppressor of Thy holy vows was as the stronger oppressing the weaker¹. They who have not thought (in consonance) with Thy Righteous Order, from these Thy Good Mind² abideth afar.

9. Aye, they who desert Thy bountiful Piety, O Mazda! that one desired of Thee³, O Thou omniscient! and who thus abandon her by reason of the evil-doer, and in their ignorance of (Thy) Good Mind, from such as these (Āramaiti) with her holiness utterly departs⁴ as the red Khrafstras (who destroy and pollute all life, flee) from us⁵ (Thy faithful servants).

10. Through the action of this (His) Good Mind (as he works his grace within us) the benevolently wise⁶ One declared a result as its fruit, He knowing the bountiful Piety, the creatrix of righteous beings⁷. These all, O Mazda Ahura! in Thy Kingdom (are

¹ It is a mistake to suppose that the Pahlavi translator and his followers, Ner. and the Persian MS. (of Haug's Collection), refer nāidyauṅghem and nadentō to the same Sanskrit word. They translate them as if referring the first to nādh, and the last to nid.

² Min valmansân barâ rakhîk âtō Vohûman. Asmanô seems an impossible reading, and cannot be reconciled with Vohû.

³ The hint of the Pahlavi points, as usual, to the general sense, leaving us the task of discovering the grammatical structure.

Here I do not follow the indication of sedkûnyên; Ner. parikshipyanti. The voc. 'O Thou' is free.

⁴ So also in general the Pahlavi: Min valmansân kabad Aharâyîh segdak; Ner. *tebhyaḥ *prabhuto dharmaḥ prabhrasyati.

⁵ So if ahma is read, but the MS. before the Pahlavi translator read ahmât; Ner. etebhyaḥ (freely). A simpler rendering results; 'as from him flee away.'

⁶ Observe the evidence of the Zend to the prevalent meaning of 'khratu.'

⁷ Or reading hithām, and in the sense of 'bond,' we coincide with Ner. sukhanivâsam. Haithām=the true; hâtām ?=of beings. Lit. 'the true creatrix of Asha (the holy).'

‘helps to our progress’) for they smite (our tyrants) with fear¹.

11. And for Thee hath Âramaiti (who is Our Piety) increased both the Universal Weal and (its continuance in) Immortality, and (with them as ever united) the Righteous (ritual and moral) Order (established and made firm) in the Kingdom of (Thy Good Mind). Those powerful lasting two (hath she increased) to (give us the needful) food². And through these, O Mazda! art Thou with Thy perfect expellers of hate³. (Thou removest Thy foes afar⁴!)

12. What then are Thy regulations⁵? And what wilt Thou? What of praise, or of (fuller) offering? Speak forth that we hear it, O Mazda! what will establish the blessed rewards of Thine ordinance⁶!

¹ The word voyathrâ is difficult to place; the Pahlavi translator divided, reading âvo-yathrâ (possibly âvoi athrâ), and rendered frôd kûshî-ait=is smitten down; the Persian better: Frôd zadar, is smiting down. We may well hesitate before rejecting this indication, which may point to a better text. Like vafus, it may indicate the severity of the influences of the righteous system, in the midst of genial allusion. The tâ vîspâ might refer quite naturally to dus-skayasthanâ in the previous verse. The form voyathrâ (corrected) may represent some derivative from the root bî=to fear. Compare byantê in verse 8.

² So likewise the Pahlavi with its khûrisnô; otherwise ‘for glory;’ hvar=svar. Lit. ‘To Thee (are) both Weal and Immortality.’

³ Gavîd bêsh min lak hômanih; Ner. vîtakash/as tvam asi.

⁴ Ner.: Thus both are (to be derived) from thee, Avirdâda’s food, and that of Amirdâda also, [the (food) of the Lord-of-water, and of the Lord-of-wood* (so the later Avesta and Parsism)], and in the kingdom of the best mind, righteousness is making a revelation together with the perfect mind. Do thou also bestow zeal and power upon this one, O Great Wise One, the Lord! From torment art thou exempt.

⁵ So also vîrâyisnô.

⁶ Pahlavi ârâyisnô.

* Otherwise simply ‘water and tree.’

Teach Thou us the paths through Righteousness, those verily trod by (Thy) Good Mind¹ as he lives within Thy saints².

13. (Do I ask what is that path?) That way which Thou declarest to me as the path of the Good Mind, O Ahura! (is made³ in its parts by) the religious precepts and laws of the Saviours, wherein the well-doer thrives⁴ from (his) Righteousness⁵. And it marks for the good a reward of which Thou art Thyself the bestower.

14. For that (reward), O Mazda! ye have given as the one to be chosen for (our) bodily⁶ life through ¹ The Pahlavi has the gloss: Teach us the way of the original religion.

² Neryosangh: Kim te sammârganam [kila, kâryam, te kim mahânyâyitaram?] Kah kâmah? Kâka yushmâkam stutiñ? Kâka yushmâkam igisniñ? *Srinomi, Mahâgñânin! prakrîshîtam brûhi! yat ðetsi dharmasya sammârganam, [aho vireshena parya! tasmât mahânyâyitarât kuru!] *Sikshâpaya asmâkam dharmasya mârgam uttamena svâdhînam manasâ. [Mârgam yam pûrvanyâyavantam asmabhyam brûhi.]

³ Observe the certainty of a subtle meaning, 'the way is the consciences or laws.'

⁴ Geldner has admirably suggested a comparison with vrag on account of the connection 'way.' But as this necessitates two urvâz=vrâz, and as Ahura is spoken of as 'dwelling' in 'paths,' I do not think that 'thriving in paths' is very difficult. The prominent thought is not the going, but the 'right going.' That path indicates a reward (so also the Pahlavi kâshîdô, Ner. âsvâdayah). But we must be thankful for the keen and vigorous discussion. Compare urvâkshshanguha gâya gighaêsa. The Pahlavi has hûravâkh-manîh and in Y. XLIV, 8. If vrag is compared, the idea must be happy progress; but varh (Justi) seems the more obvious correspondent.

⁵ Asha, very often personified, is a stronger expression than 'correctly.'

⁶ Of course our life on earth, merely in the bodily state. Comp. Y. XXVIII, 3. There astavatasâ evidently means 'of earth,' mananghô, 'of heaven' (—of corporeal—of mind, without body).

the deeds of Thy Good Mind (in us). They who work in the toil of the mother¹ Kine, these further² Your merciful care through the understanding's action³, and (taught) by Thine Order's (word)⁴.

15. Yea, (show me, O Mazda ! that path and its reward); tell me the best (of truths); reveal the best words and best actions, and the confessing⁵ prayer of the praiser through Thy Good Mind (living within us); and through the Righteous Order, O Ahura ! And by Your Sovereign Power and grace may'st Thou make life really progressive⁶ (till perfection shall have been reached) !

¹ Or the 'mature,' 'drivable' (?) cow. She 'goes on her path' of toil.

² So frâz yehabûnd.

³ Observe that verezenâ cannot well mean 'stall' in this line. The Pahlavi likewise sees varzî-aît in it ; Ner. vidhîyate, both free as to form.

⁴ Neryosangh : Sa yato, Mahâgñânin ! kâmo'smâkam yat tanumate gîvamate dîyate [âkâryâya], uttamena karmaze manasâ [khshatriyâya], yasta gavâ* âkârayitre* Aginâmnyâ, [ku'tumbine], yo yushmâkam sunirvânagñânatayâ, Svâmin ! buddhyâka, punya-pradattayâ vidhîyate [dînih].

⁵ I concede this shade of meaning to the constant and unvarying evidence of the Pahlavi translator. He translates uniformly by avâm yehabûnêd or its equivalents.

⁶ Bring on 'millennial' perfection when progress shall have been completed.

The Pahlavi translation is as follows : Pavan zak î lekûm khûdâyih-Aôharmazd ! frashakarðo pavan kâmakô âshkârakô dén ahvânô yehabûni-aît.

Ner. : Yushmâkam râgyena, Svâmin ! akhshayatvam svekkhayâ parisphu'tam dâsyate bhuvane.

THE GÂTHA(Â) USTAVAITI(Î).

This Gâtha, consisting of Yasna XLIII–XLVI, is named from the word which begins it, like the three last collections. The fact that the word ustâ possesses special significance may have influenced the minds of the Parsis of a later age, inducing them to associate this first chapter with happy anticipations, but it was of course not owing to any such circumstance that the name was given to the Gâtha. The Gâtha, like its fellows, has its existence as a unit from the nature of its metre.

It has lines generally of eleven syllables, arranged in stanzas of five. It seemed convenient to chant all the hymns of one particular metre together. This hymn, from some unknown reason, or from pure accident, having stood first in the collection in this metre, the Gâtha was named from its first word.

The question naturally arises at this place whether this Gâtha, in its parts or as a whole, is older than the Ahunavaiti and the others. For supplementary statements on this subject, see the Introduction, page xxvii, also elsewhere. It is sufficient to recall here that the procedure of the Ahunavaiti, and the sequence of the other Gâthas in the MSS. of the Yasna, have little importance in determining the question of relative age. If originally grouped in the order of their age, they might easily become transposed for the purpose of liturgical recitation. (See the inserted Haptanghâiti, and Y. LII.) As to the metres present, they afford no indications as to relative age. The metre of the Ustavaiti, approaching as it does the Trishûp, may be as old as, or older than, that of the Ahunavaiti. The oldest Rîshis sang in Trishûp. The sole remaining test of the relative age of pieces, is their contents. Do those of the Ahunavaiti show a priority to those in the Ustavaiti as regards the particular circumstances of which they treat? So far as I am able to judge, no part of the Ahunavaiti is older than Y. XLVI. There we have the man before us at a period in his life before he had attained to his supreme position. He not only laments the unfavourable prospects of his cause, but he is full of vehement animosity, urging on his adherents to the overthrow of some powerful opposing leader, and anticipating an armed struggle so formidable that its partisans are elsewhere alluded to (in Y. XLIV) as 'hosts.' We see him also exhorting the various chiefs of his party as they are evidently standing before him in some large assembly, possibly as the army on the eve of an important encounter.

He refers intimately to the monarch, to his own family, the Spitâmas, and to the Hvôgvas, as represented by Frashaostra. He offers the rewards of Ahura, as he pronounces His threats and condemnations. Every feature bears the strongest evidence of originality. But have we not the same in the Gâthas Ahunavaiti, Spentâ-mainyu, and the others? Beyond a question. Those passages which express grief, fear, and passionate resentment, we should naturally refer to Zarathustra personally, and to the earlier portion of his career; and we can make no distinction between such passages when they occur in the Ahunavaiti, Ustavaiti, or elsewhere. As to chapter XXIX with its logical commencement, as expressing the sufferings to be remedied in the entire effort, together with the call of Zarathustra in immediate connection, and chapter XXX with its theosophical statements, we should say that they were composed later, during a period of success and reflection. But this would be a mere surmise. The time of the sage need not necessarily have been consumed in struggles even during the early years of his career.

Chapter LIII seems to belong to a period of mature age, but not necessarily to a period of advanced age. It celebrates the marriage of Zarathustra's daughter, but maidens were married early. With the exception of Y. LIII, I would say that the occurrence of a piece in this or that Gâtha has little, if anything, to do with determining the question of its relative age.

YASNA XLIII.

SALVATION IS ANNOUNCED AS UNIVERSAL FOR BELIEVERS. REFLECTIONS OF ZARATHUSTRA UPON THE SUBLIMITY AND BOUNTIFULNESS OF AHURA.

As, in every instance, it is probable that verses have fallen out here and there in this important piece, and some may have been inserted, not necessarily from another composer, but from other compositions. After certain limits, however, marked signs of at least external connection are present. After the first three verses, which are quite apart, then from the fourth and fifth on, every alternate verse has the formula Spentem a/ thwâ Mazdâ menhî Ahurâ. It would indeed present no difficulty for a successor to add these words to stanzas otherwise also imitated, but whether from the leading sage or not, whether from him in one strain, or from him as collected from different fragments, the course of thought does not so fail in logical sequence as that it is either impossible, or displeasing, as a whole in a poetical composition.

Verses 1-3 are admirable as preliminary. Verses 4-6, with their lofty descriptions of power and benevolence in the Deity, prepare the way well, with their allusions to the final judgment, for the closer reflections in verses 7-15 upon the prophet's call, uttered at the instigation of Sraosha (his obedient will). Verse 16 is a closing strophe looking much like an addition from another hand, not at all because Zarathustra is mentioned in the third person, but from its general cast. It possesses, however, very great interest from these circumstances. If a later addition, it enables us to see how the principal features of the system were viewed at a period not identical with the earliest, but closely following it.

1. If we can accept the deeply interesting suggestion of the Pahlavi translator, which is, 'Salvation to him to whom there is salvation for every man,' we need then suppose no necessary loss of verses. Otherwise we are obliged to consider the loss of some laudatory verse, or verses, containing such matter as perhaps Y. XXXIV, 14, 'This princely priest has devoted all to Thee, therefore, salvation to him, whosoever he may be.' Whatever may be the actual truth, the main stress of the thoughts is clear and appropriate. Using the word vase-khshayās in a good sense, the composer beseeches Ahura to grant those two 'mighty and eternal ones,' which logically form the complement to each other, universal wholeness, welfare of soul and body, without which beatitude was inconceivable, and then the unlimited duration of that condition; for it is quite impossible that 'long life' alone was here meant by a term, the equivalent of which soon after designated the Bountiful Immortals. We have here again ample data for affirming the richness and depth of the religious conceptions.

The 'powerful and continuous two' are sought together with splendour as rewards, not for the gratification of any selfish sentiment, but in order to maintain Asha, the religious Order, on which the sacred polity, and the tribal, as well as the national wealth depended, but more than any general blessings, the individual sanctity of life. 2. And this is signalised as the highest good; and to this a prayer is added for the 'māya,' which recalls the supernatural wisdom of the Indian Hercules, about which much phantastic and highly coloured myth is grouped; but here, with the ever-recurring contrast, the māya is the mysterious wisdom of the Divine Benevolence, colourless and abstract indeed, but yet possessing how great religious depth!

3. The highest blessing, in another and more than once repeated phrase, is again besought, as 'the better than the good,' even the attainment of the one who guides to the 'straight paths,' which are the 'way, even the conceptions and revelations of the Saviours' (Y. XXXIV, 13; LIII, 2), in which the believer prospers, and Ahura dwells, as he dwells in his kingdom, and his 'chosen home' itself (Y. XLVI, 16). Whether 'this man who shows the paths' of 'the bodily and mental world' is the same as he who prays for the âyaptâ ahvau astvatasâ hya/kâ mananghō (the boons of the two worlds) in Y. XXVIII, 3, here referred to in the third person, there speaking in the first, and whether he is Zarathustra himself, are questions. It is only necessary to say that, if any relief is gained by the supposition, then beyond a doubt Zarathustra may have been the composer of both pieces or fragments, here, as in Y. XXVIII, 7, referring to himself as in the third person, there, in Y. XXVIII, also further representing another who prays, referring by name to him as in the third.

But was Zarathustra the only sacred singer, or was he the centre of a group only, of which he was the life? (Compare Yathrâ ve afsmâinî (?) senghânî—Gâmâspâ Hvôgvâ; Y. XLVI, 17; see also the Introduction.)

4. Proceeding as if the first three verses were absent from his mind (as indeed they may have been only later brought together with what now follows), the composer begins his ascriptions of praise. He will regard Ahura as all-bountiful and mighty, since He has carefully nurtured, as with His very hand, the aids of grace which He will bestow, as gifts of forbearance on those now wicked, in the hope of penitence, and in the merciful threat of punishment, and to the devout disciple, whose piety is never ceremonial only. And these means of grace, although abounding in the inculcation of moral sanctity in thought, and word, and deed (see Vendîdâd VIII, 100 (Sp. 283)¹, where 'thought' clearly refers to intention in the strongest sense of the term), are yet profane, aside from the flame of that holy Fire which rallied the masses to a national worship, and which was strong for the holy order, as well as by means of it. For these reasons he adores their giver, but for still another. It was because the might of the Good Mind of Ahura approached him within them, and gave him strength for all that was before him. 5. Like the Semitic prophet, he poetically conceives himself as having beheld Ahura, as the chief of the two spirits, and as sovereign over all other powers when the world was born. And he regards Him as having also then established rewards and punishments by his holiness, so separate in its dualistic distinction from all complicity with evil either by infiction or permission. And these rewards and punishments were to have their issue not in time alone, but in 'the last turning of the creation' in its course.

6. And for Ahura's coming in this last changing he fervently beseeches, as well as for the appearance of the Sacred Kingdom, established and guarded by the divine Benevolence. And this consummation, he implies, will take place when the settlements shall be furthered in the Righteous Order, and by means of it, the end of progress having been attained; for then the piety of men's souls will itself be their instructor, delivering the regulations which shall silence the controversy of the two sides (Y. XXXI, 3). And these regulations are as the wisdom of Ahura's understanding (Y. XXVIII, 2), so penetrating that all thoughts lie bare to it (Y. XXXI, 13).

7. He now declares the principles on which he accepted the divine call. Sraosha (verse 12), he says, drew near to question him. As he is called by Ahura, Obedience, the same who constitutes the way to Ahura (or finds His throne (Y. XXVIII, 6)), now draws near him, (I say Sraosha (i. e. Obedience), for if he is not so described as drawing near in this verse, he assuredly is so described in a verse nearly following (the twelfth)). Beyond a question, the fine subjectivity here expressed was intended. As the seer cried: O Righteousness! when shall I see thee (in myself and within my people), so now he means that his obedient spirit listens to the call of God. 8. And as his personified conscience questions him as to his origin, and the principles on which he would proceed, it represents the obedient people, as well as the obedient sage (for the sense of Sraosha, while originally applied to the personal will, is not restricted to it). 'Loyalty' questions him, that 'loyalty' may report his answers. He therefore responds, speaking in his name as Zarathustra (or else one thoroughly in unison with him, here speaks in his name). And this is his statement as to the indications which shall determine his personality. His course will be without a compromise. The unbelieving opposers, as he declares, shall meet no favour at his hands, but detestation, while to the devout disciple he will be as powerful an aid. And this because his mind and thought are (as if blinded to the present) fixed upon the ideal Kingdom, while for the present he never ceases to toil on, making preparations for the Frashakarê, and constructing hymn after hymn to set up the needed machinery of lore.

¹ Anaêshem manô, anaêshem vaêô, anaêshem skyaothnem prove that the thought, word, and deed referred to were not limited to a ritual meaning.

9. Again, his conscience and obedient will, as the angel of the Deity, questions him; and this time offers him that chief of wished for objects to him, religious knowledge. He mentions the holy Fire, with its proper offering, as the theme of his first inquiry.

10. And he beseeches Ahura to answer and to favour him, since he invokes such a complete endowment, going hand in hand with true Piety, and with no selfish interest in his prayer. He then, with a depth which I confess seems suspicious, asks of Mazda to put his petitions for him, recalling Y. XXVIII, 11, where he beseeches Ahura to fill up his desire with what not he, the speaker, but with what He, Ahura, knows to be the Good Mind's gifts. Or, with a conjectural improvement (?) of the text, he asks of Ahura to question him that he may be questioned indeed, saying as it were, 'search me, and know me.' But the other reading being retained as having superior point, and needing no conjectured text, we may see his further thought: 'Ask Thou our questions for us, and then we shall never fail; then we shall be no desireless (anaêsha) men, spurned by the wailing kine as flinching champions (Y. XXIX, 9), but we shall be indeed Thy rulers, "speaking our mighty wish."

Like the isha-khshathra, whom she sought (Y. XXIX, 9), our wish shall work our will; it will accord with the will of God.'

11. He is, however, not blind to all that lies before him in accepting this call. He worships the bounty and majesty of Ahura while he is impressing his soul with the import of this conference, and that notwithstanding, and none the less, because His will, when obeyed in actions, will bring on earthly sufferings.

12. But notwithstanding all that may be in store for him, he hopes to make those doctrines treasures (Y. XXXIV, 7), that is, a spiritual wealth (compare also Ahura's īsti). One only qualification would he add: 'Wait only before Thou givest the word that I should go forth with Thy new truths (which bring such suffering to him who first pronounces them), wait till my obedient will, listening fully to all which Thou shalt say, shall come to me, and then shall that obedient reverence in me and my beloved, help on our effort, that we may spread abroad the tidings of Thy promised recompense to win the living to Thee (Y. XXXI, 3).' 13. 'And that I may know and make known (so he continues) the true aims and objects of desire to those to whom I am at Thy word to go, grant me for this long life within Thy Realm, although that life be full of bitterness (verse 11; and Y. XXXII, 10, 11; XLVI, 1), for those who propagate Thy cause.' 14. 'Yea, as a friend, both wise and powerful, gives to a friend, send to me not only Sraosha, an obedient listening will, but raṣ(e)nô frâkhshnenem, abundant grace. Then, and then only, shall I be flanked with a proper ally. Then with Thy Sovereign Power, like my Obedient will, as an angel sent forth from Thee, and inspired by Thy righteous Order in law and ritual, in thought, and word, and deed, then I will go out to arouse and head the chiefs, gathering into spiritual hosts the many believing priests who even now would bear in mind and celebrate Thy mysteries.'

15. And as he began with fearless severity, so he would end without a compromise. 'My patient suffering (so he implies as he proceeds (Y. XLVI, 1)) reveals its lesson to me. My mind is long-enduring, but that patience, although it may seem to some the cowardice of a pusillanimous protector (Y. XXIX, 9), yet it is not such in truth, for it declares within me, and forces me to say: Let no man please the wicked; this is our only prospect of success.'

16. And casting back his thoughts he (or another in his name) sums all up well: 'Thus doth Zarathustra choose the spirit, that spirit which animates the faithful in their chiefs (Y. XXXIII, 9), and by his side every true believer utters his sympathising prayer : Let the Order of life and of the ritual become incarnate in our tribes, and strong because it has the valiant power of faithful men to obey and to defend it. And let Piety prevail till it covers our land blest with the favours of the sacred sun, and as she lives in the lives of true adherents, may she in sympathy with the Good Mind, thus grant rewards for all our deeds !'

Translation.

1. Salvation to this man¹, salvation to him who-soever (he may be²)! Let the absolutely ruling Great Creator grant (us, He) the living Lord, the two eternal powers. Yea, verily³, I ask it of Thee (O Ahura) for the maintaining⁴ Righteousness. And may'st Thou also give it to me, (O inspiring) Piety! splendour⁵ (as it is), holy blessings, the Good Mind's life⁶.

2. Yea, to this one⁷ may the man endowed with

¹ Ahmâi as=to us, does not seem to be good grammar here, as it necessitates a forced separation between it and yahmâi-kahmâikî. Cp. ahmâi yahmâi-kahmâikî in Y. XLIV, 16.

² I turn from the fine rendering of the Pahlavi with the greatest reluctance: Nadûk valman mûn zak î valman nadûkîh kaðârzâi [aîgh kaðârzâi ansutâ min nadûkîh î valman nadûkîh], happy is he whose benefit is for every one; [that is, for every man there is happiness from his benefit]; Ner. follows.

³ There is a question whether the particle ga (gha?) may not have originated from gât. Barth. here follows the Pahlavi, reading gatô (?) = pavan yâmtûnisnô. Lak may have been added, as often, to serve as an alternative rendering.

⁴ Or 'I will,' so Prof. Jolly (infinitive for imper.).

⁵ So also the Pahl. rayê-hômand, not as a rendering merely, but as a philological analagon. Otherwise 'riches.'

⁶ Gaêm recalls sraêsta gaya g(i)vainti.

⁷ As ahmâi would more naturally mean 'to this one' in the previous verse, it is desirable to render it in the same way here.

glory¹ give that best of all things, the (spiritual) glory. And do Thou likewise (Thyself) reveal² Thine own³ (gifts) through Thy most bountiful spirit, O Mazda! (And do Thou teach us) Thy wonderful thoughts of wisdom⁴, those of Thy Good Mind, which Thou hast revealed (to us) by Thy Righteousness (within us) with the happy increase of (our joy⁵), and on a long life's every day⁶.

3. And may that (holy man) approach toward that which is the better than the good⁷, he who will show to us the straight paths of (spiritual) profit, (the blessings) of this corporeal life, and of that the mental⁸, in those veritably real (eternal⁹) worlds, where dwells Ahura; (that holy man) an offerer of Thine¹⁰, O Mazda! a faithful citizen¹¹, and bountiful of (mind).

¹ It is to the last degree improbable that hvâthrôyâ (hvâthravâ; 'y' miswritten for 'v') indicates a condition of ease and comfort here. The 'easy man' is the farthest possible from the thoughts of the composer. The 'best of all things' makes a word kindred to hvang (hvan) appropriate here.

² Kîkî (?), if an imperative (?), may mean guard over; but the Pahlavi translator gives us the better view; he has lak pēdākînō; Ner. tvam prakâsaya. Geldner's kîkîthwâ is important.

³ Thwâ=thy properties. ⁴ The Pahl. has merely padmânō.

⁵ This shade of meaning is expressed by the Pahlavi.

⁶ Ayâre, acc. pl.

⁷ This expression seems to equal the summum bonum; so also 'worse than the evil' is the ultimate of woe.

⁸ Cp. Y. XXVIII, 3.

⁹ Does haithyeng mean 'eternal,' with every passage in which it occurs considered?

¹⁰ Thwâvant may, however, like mavant, simply express the personal pronoun here. The position of aredrô, &c. is awkward if thwâvant=thy: 'Where dwells Ahura, Thyself, O Mazda! beneficent, wise, and bountiful.' But aredra is almost a special term for a zealous partisan.

¹¹ The Pahl. has khûp-dânâkîh, indicating a meaning which would

4. Yea, I will ¹ regard Thee as mighty and likewise bountiful, O Ahura Mazda! when (I behold) those aids of grace (approach me), aids which Thou dost guard and nurture ² as (Thy) just awards to the wicked (to hold him far from us), as well as to the righteous (for our help), Thy Fire's flame therewith so strong through the Holy Order ³, and when to me the Good Mind's power comes ⁴⁺⁵.

5. (For) so I conceived of Thee as bountiful, O Great Giver, Mazda! when I beheld Thee as supreme ⁶ in the generation of life, when, as rewarding ⁷ deeds and words, Thou didst establish evil for the evil, and happy blessings for the good, by Thy (great) virtue ⁸ (to be adjudged to each) in the creation's final change.

6. In which (last) changing Thou shalt come, and with Thy bounteous spirit, and Thy sovereign power, better apply to Ahura than the one given, which cannot be applied to Him.

¹ Subjunctive (see Prof. Jolly, V. S. p. 28).

² 'By Thy hand.'

³ The holy Fire of the altar.

⁴ Gimaŕ may be regarded as an improper subjunctive here.

⁵ The Pahlavi: 'and that too which renders justice to the wicked and also to the righteous. And this Thy Fire is burning, since by it the strength of him who lives in Righteousness is (maintained) when that violence which approaches with a good intention comes to me.'

⁶ See Y. XXXI, 8, where the word is also rendered as = vornehmster.

⁷ Literally, 'When Thou didst render deeds provided with rewards.' We are forced to put the action in the past on account of zāthōi, but the influences originally set in motion were to have their issue in the end of the world.

⁸ I render hunarâ literally, and bring its Pahlavi translation to the same sense as necessarily. Otherwise hunar would generally mean 'skill.' Ner. has tava guzeshu. The Pahlavi would here be recognised by all reasonable scholars as striking in its closeness.

O Ahura Mazda ! by deeds of whom the settlements are furthered through the Righteous Order. And saving regulations ¹ likewise unto these shall Âramaiti utter, (she, our Piety within us), yea, (laws) of Thine understanding which no man may deceive ².

7. Yea, I conceived of Thee as bountiful, O Great Giver Mazda ! when he (Thy messenger, Obedience) drew near me, and asked me thus : Who ³ art thou ? And whose is thine allegiance ? And how to-day shall I show the signs that give the light on this (our) question, (signs) as to the lands (from whence thou camest) and in thyself ?

8. Then to him I, Zarathustra, as my first answer, said : To the wicked (would that I could be) in very truth a strong ⁴ tormentor and avenger, but to the

¹ The word ratûs reminds one of the work of the Ratu for the afflicted kine. In the last changing, which shall complete the Fra-shakarâ, he, or his representatives, will appear as the last Saoshyant, introducing 'millennial' blessedness.

² I render the Pahlavi here as in evidence: 'Through Thee, O (?) bountiful Spirit! the changing comes [(later (?) gloss) from wickedness to goodness]. And it comes likewise through Aûhar-mazd's supremacy within a good mind, through whose action the progress of Aharâyih's settlements is furthered, those which the master is instructing with a perfect mind [], and in which this Thy wisdom shall in no wise be deceived thereby.'

³ As the kine thought little of her deliverer (see Y. XXIX, 9), so Sraosha, the obedient host, is here represented as inquiring as to the antecedents of the newly-appointed prophet. But he asks more properly concerning the settlements from which he comes than the lands. Gaêtha is not dahv(h)yu. An origin external to that of other chieftains is not at all necessarily indicated by the question.

⁴ The Pahlavi sees a denominative in isôvâ (isôvâ; y for v); it is denom. in the Altiranisches Verbum. It differs, however, as to root. I offer an alternative in its sense. An open tormentor; [that is, I openly torment the wicked] even as much as I desire, do I torment (them) [(later (?) gloss) Ganrâk minavad].

righteous may I be a mighty help and joy¹, since to preparations² for Thy Kingdom, and in desire (for its approach), I would devote myself so long as to Thee, O Mazda ! I may praise, and weave my song.

9. Yea, I conceived of Thee as bountiful, O Ahura Mazda ! when (Thine herald) with Thy Good Mind near approached me, and asked me thus : For what dost thou desire that thou may'st gain, and that thou may'st know it ? Then for Thy Fire an offering of praise and holiness (I desired. And on that offering for myself)³ as long as I have the power, will I meditate⁴, (and for its holy power among Thy people will I plan⁵).

10. And may'st Thou likewise grant⁶ me (Thy) Righteousness (within me), since I earnestly invoke that perfect readiness (of mind), joining in my prayer with Âramaiti (our Piety toward Thee. Yea, pray Thou Thyself within me through these holy powers). Ask Thou (Thyself) our questions, those which shall be asked by us⁷ of Thee ; for a question asked by

¹ We must be cautious in accepting the statement that the Pahlavi translations attempt to be literal. Here is one which is free and far from erroneous: Aētūnō avō aharūbō min valman ī aōg-hōmand aītō ; [aīghas, rāmīnam].

² The Pahlavi here shows only the correct root. ³ Mā=smā ?

⁴ 'So long as I can, will I be of this mind,' seems hardly expressed here. Observe the nearly parallel construction in verse 8.

⁵ The Pahlavi, Sanskrit, and Persian translations would here be regarded once more as extremely close even by opponents, if reasonable in their estimates. Manayâi seems to me hardly an infinitive, as it is comparatively seldom that an infinitive falls to the end of a sentence either in Gâthic or Vedic. I prefer the indication of the Pahlavi with Justi and Bartholomae (in the Altiranisches Verbum).

⁶ Read perhaps daidhīs (later shortened to suit the metre).

⁷ Or, 'ask us that we may be questioned by Thee.'

Thee (as its inspirer), is as the question of the mighty, whene'er Thy (?) ruler speaks his potent wish.

11. Yea, I conceived of Thee as bountiful, O Ahura Mazda! when (Thy messenger) with Thy Good Mind near approached me, and with your words I¹ first impressed (my soul). Woes then 'midst men Thy heart-devoted one² declared³ (to be) my (portion); but that will I⁴ do⁴ which Thou did'st⁵ say was best.

12. And since Thou, coming thus, Thy legal Righteousness in fulness⁶ spakest, then declare not to me words as yet unheard (with faith or knowledge; command me not) to go forth (with these upon my task) before Thy Sraosha⁷ (Obedience) comes to me, to go on hand in hand with me with holy recompense and mighty splendour⁸, whereby to

¹ The Pahlavi translation bears evidence to a less subtle, and therefore more probable sense here, but at the same time to a rarer grammatical form. It renders dīdāinhē as a third person, indicating an instance of a third person in ē, and not in the perfect. It also recognises a reduplicated form by its pavan nikēzīsnō nikēzēdō.

² The Pahlavi translator with a curious error, or still more curious freedom, has rūbāk-dahisnīh here and elsewhere. Possibly the Gāthic text before the last compiler differed from ours.

³ I still prefer Professor Bartholomae's earlier rendering, after the Pahlavi, as more in harmony with mraotā and mraos.

⁴ Professor Jolly has the important rendering 'das will ich thun,' the infinitive in a future or imperative sense.

⁵ 'Ye said.'

⁶ The Pahlavi unvaryingly kabed.

⁷ Here we probably have the missing subject in the other verses.

⁸ Reading māzā rayā. (Rayā cannot well mean 'riches' here.) The Pahlavi also indicates the division by its free or erroneous mas ratū (rad). Sraosha, an obedient will personified, guides the soul as in the later Parsism. Cp. the Arđā Virāf.

give the contending¹ throngs(?), as a blessing², (Your) spiritual gifts (of certainty and peace).

13. Thus I conceived of Thee as bounteous, O Ahura Mazda! when with Thy Good Mind (Sraosha, Obedience) approached me. (And I would therefore pray thus of Thee, that bounteous one.) In order that I may make known to men the true and sacred aims of their desires (in the rite or daily toil), grant Ye me long life³ for this, (that blessing⁴) which none with daring may extort⁵ from You, even this (gift) of that desired⁶ place which has been declared to be within Thy Realm.

14. Yea, as the man enlightened⁷ (in Thy law), and who has possessions, gives to his friend, (so give Ye) me, O Great Creator⁸! Thy rejoicing and

¹ Here we have the important reading rânôibyô as against the dual of K₄, &c. (see Geldner). No mention of the fire occurs; and as the form does not agree with arazi, we may well doubt that comparison in view of āsayau in Y. XXXI, 2, and the unvarying and uniform patkarâdârânô of the Pahlavi. The rendering 'with the sticks' is, however, admirably adapted, and must be considered as an emphatic alternative.

² The Pahlavi supports the reading vi for ve; it has barâ. Ashî might also mean merely 'holy,' as adjective.

³ In Y. XXVIII, 7, he asks for it that he may crush the malice of the foe.

⁴ Justi admirably suggested yânem understood.

⁵ The Pahlavi divides dârstaitê, and, as I hold, mistakes the root as was inevitable. The ancient scribe feared to restore the severed fragments, which appeared, as so often, in the MSS. before him. I would read darsaitê with Spiegel's c(?) (so Bartholomae, later, however, recurring to a division, with Geldner after the Pahlavi, for the sake of bringing out an infinitive).

⁶ Vairyau contracted from vairyayau by a corrupting improvement to regulate the metre.

⁷ So the Pahlavi indicates, Bartholomae following as against the rendering 'possessing.'

⁸ With regard to Mazdau and medhâ, I should perhaps long abounding grace, when through Thy sovereign Power, and from (the motives of Thy cause of) Righteous Order, I stand forth ¹ to go out to ², or to arouse, the chiefs ³ of Thy (pure) proclamation, with all those (others) who recite Thy well-remembered ⁴ Māthra word.

15. Yea, I conceived of Thee as bounteous, O Ahura Mazda! when with the Good Mind's grace Thy Sraosha (Obedience) approached me, (and said): Let the quiet and long-enduring better mind with understanding teach (thee); let not a foremost ⁵ man since have stated that I object to the comparison, not only because medhā is a feminine, and, as Grassmann has supposed, possibly represented by the Zend madh, Greek math, but because 'wisdom' is an abstract (while su-medhās, as a compound, does not apply so directly). I hold, however, that mazdā, the fem. noun in Y, XL, 1 = medhā. It is also not impossible that this word may be represented (with differing shades of meaning) by both madh and mazdām (fem.) in Zend.

¹ Read, perhaps, frākhstā; or frāstā, 'with Thine advancing kingdom I (am) to go forth to'; (frā + as, participle.)

² Prof. Jolly has the important rendering, 'Ich will mich erheben'; the infinitive in a future or imperative sense.

³ Chieftainships. Compare (not with exactness, however) sārdhāmsi.

⁴ The idea of reciting from memory seems to be included in marentē.

⁵ The rendering pourūs (?) as = pl. of pūrūs is attractive, but dregvatō hardly needs, and seldom has, a substantive. The wicked = wicked men; and, on the other hand, nā constantly claims an accompanying word; (nā ismanō; nā vaêdemnō; hvō nā-erethwō; nā spentō, ye-nā, ke vā-nā, &c.) Also it is improbable that the words nā and pourūs, as = pūrāvas, should come together; 'let not a man men evil ingratiate (?).' Compare for sense here purviās in one or more of its applications. Possibly the meaning is, 'let not a man be foremost in conciliating the wicked.' The Pahlavi likewise has kabed (freely). Ner. has: Mā naraḥ prakuram durgatinām bhūyāt* yathā kathamkit satkartā*. An important rendering is that of Professor conciliate the wicked (as sycophant desiring aid), for with that (quiet mind of faith), Thy saints have brought full many a sinner unto Thee (as convert, and in penitence¹).

16. Thus, O Ahura Mazda ! this Zarathustra loves² the Spirit³, and every man most bounteous prays⁴ (beside him) : Be Righteousness life-strong, and clothed with body. In that (holy) Realm which shines (with splendour) as the sun, let Piety be present ; and may she through the indwelling of Thy Good Mind give us blessings in reward for deeds⁵ !

Jolly, V.S. s. 47, 'möchte es wenige Verehrer des Lügners geben.' Cp. Y. XLVI, 1, where the composer speaks of the chiefs as on their side, 'not contenting' him.

¹ Or, with the Pahl. : Mûn aêtûnô lak harvisp-gûnô aharûbânô pavan anâk yakhsenund, for they consider all Thy saints as wicked. The rendering above is less natural as conveying the idea of a conversion (comp., however, yâ g(i)vantô vîspeng vaurayâ), but it renders the grammatical forms more simply. It is bad policy to force a text to express what we happen to believe to be a more natural idea. Using the hint of the Pahlavi here in an understanding manner, we might then render 'for they hold all sinners as holy.'

² I had long since compared verentê with vrinîte (-devânâm ávas) ; and am now sustained by Bartholomae's view.

³ Possibly the Spenista mainyu of Ahura. (See also Y. XLIV, 2.)

⁴ The Pahlavi, on the contrary, bears evidence to the meaning 'comes,' which I cannot accept as 'tradition' in view of the following precatives.

⁵ Ner. : 'The kingdom becomes established (in a manner completely manifest) in sun-publicity through mental perfection [] ; and upon the workers of righteousness the Good Mind bestows it.'

YASNA XLIV.

QUESTIONS ASKED OF AHURA WITH THANKFULNESS AND DEVOTION.

Many verses may here have fallen out, or, on the other hand, the piece having been made up of homogeneous, but not originally connected fragments, has been left with some abrupt transitions. These, however, occasion very little difficulty in exegetical treatment, and are also not displeasing. The formula, 'This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright' seems to have been suggested by Y. XXXI, 14. We might therefore look upon this piece as composed later than Y. XXXI, but not necessarily in a later generation, or even from another hand. In fact the style is thoroughly homogeneous in certain places with that of pieces which we ascribe without a doubt to Zarathustra, and the signs of struggle point to the earliest period. It is possible that the words in Y. XXXI, and the formula here were of common origin, neither having any extended priority to the other, or the words may be original here, and derived in Y. XXXI.

Whether Zarathustra, or another of the narrow circle of religious leaders, was the composer throughout depends upon the further questions already more than once broached, as to how far a corresponding intellectual cultivation was extended at the period in the community, and as to what is the probability of the existence of more than one man in the small group, endowed with the peculiar qualities everywhere manifested in these hymns (see remarks in the Introduction and elsewhere). It is safest to say that Zarathustra composed most of the matter here before us, and that the supplementary fragments were composed under his dominating, if not immediate, influence.

Verses 1 and 2 seem an introduction, but hardly give added emphasis to the fact that the following questions were expressions of devotion, and only in a few instances appeals for knowledge. Verses 3-5 are certainly questions intended to express veneration while naming particular objects of devout inquiry. Verse 6 stands somewhat apart. Verses 7-11 enter into details touching the moral and religious improvement of the people, 12-14 are polemical, 15 and 16 are prophetic, &c.

1. More closely; the composer beseeches Ahura to speak to him, and in a manner characteristic of Himself as in distinction from the falsifying utterance of the opposing religion, which was so familiarly described as the religion of 'Falsehood.' He is entreated to reveal, as is His wont, 'the holy truth.' And the first question propounded to Him by the composer, as comprehensive of all others, is how he may offer homage, the homage of God Himself or of His bountiful spirit; (see mainyû in verse 2). And he further asks that Ahura may speak to him, showing him by what ceremonial he may conciliate him, and by what helps of grace that spirit, or Ahura Himself, may be inclined to draw near to him in accordance with his frequent prayer.

2. Once more he asks how he may serve that Spirit as the foremost one of Heaven (compare Y. XXXI, 8, and the Parsi vahist) who seeks for this addition of praise to praise, for as the supreme claim to our veneration, He had, as a guardian (Y. XXXI, 13) like Ahura in yet another place, held off destruction from all believing saints and from all repentant men (Y. XXXI, 3), and that although as 'the chief of Heaven,' yet also as a benignant friend.

3. From these introductory petitions, inserted perhaps before many lost verses, he proceeds in another tone, although he may still be said to say what is homogeneous to the foregoing: 'Yea, I ask how I may serve Him, O Mazda! for He is indeed Thyself, and therefore, to show my fervent homage, I ask: Who was, not the first establisher alone, but the first father, of our holy Order as the personified Immortal, and that not by creation, but by generation, as the parent generates the child? Who fixed for stars and sun that "way," the undeviating path through space, long noticed and studied by our fathers, as no random course, or unknown progress save Thee?'

4. The laws of gravitation then become the theme of his praise still expressed in the form of questions, also the atmospheric phenomena, especially the clouds driven by winds, not like the Maruts beyond the mountains perhaps, but still terrible as winds can be. But he cannot leave even the sublime objects of nature without thinking once more of that spiritual power, the strength of righteous character, which was justly more impressive, although still more familiar, and which he designates, as ever, by the 'Good Mind.' Here this great Immortal is left an immortal thought, and is spoken of as 'created,' not 'born' like Asha (in verse third). 5. Beyond a doubt, recognising the satisfactions of energetic life as well as the solaces of slumber, and as forming by their contrast the necessary change which builds up happiness, he alludes to the supreme arranger as 'well-skilled,' and asks : Who so wisely relieved the day by night ? But, again, he cannot close without reverting to the course of moral duty. 6. Seized with a doubt which again only heightens the fervour of his assurance, he asks whether indeed the facts which he proclaims are really what they seem. Whether piety, although aided by the Good Mind, implanted through Ahura's grace within us, will indeed at last, or soon, assign the purified Realm to the servants of Ahura, who were there among the masses before his eyes (taēibyō), or to Ahura Himself as their sovereign controller (taibyō?). And, as including all rural riches in herself, he asks for whom He had made the kine, not now wailing in her grief (Y. XXIX, 9), but 'delight-affording,' on account of the influence of Piety and Benevolence embodied in the Kingdom, inferring that God had made her for these same (the faithful masses). 7. And going yet further back ; he asks who made that paternal and filial Piety itself, together with the Realm which it should leaven ? Answering his own inquiries by an inference, he adds : I am pressing Thee with fulness in these questions, O Thou bountiful Spirit (compare mainyus, or mainyû in verse 2), the maker of all (sun, stars, and holy qualities). 8. Turning now to verbal revelations, he asks by what means his soul may prosper in moral goodness, praying that it may indeed thus advance as the expected answer would declare. 9. He prays that he may know how he may still further sanctify that Religion which the King of the Holy Realm (compare anghêus vahistahyâ pourvîm), the one like Ahura (see Khshamâvatô and thwâvâs, verse 1) would teach, dwelling in the same abode (in which Ahura is also elsewhere said to dwell) with the holy Order, and the Good Mind (see Y. XLVI, 16).

10. Expressing all in a single word, he asks Ahura to reveal to him the Daēna, the Insight, the substance of that Religion which was 'of all things best,' and which alone could 'advance the settlements' with the holy ritual and moral Order as its ally, which would also render all their moral and ceremonial actions, and moral principles just by means of the divine Piety, which was their realisation in practice ; and he closes with the exclamation that the wishes and desires of his soul, when most imbued with wisdom, will seek for God.

11. Following out the influence of Âramaiti (that personified Piety), he asks to know by what practical means she may approach, and be realised as the characteristic of those to whom the holy Insight should be preached, avowing that God knows how prominent he is in his devotion to the matter, and with what hatred seated 'in his spirit,' he views the opposing Gods. 12. Then casting a searching glance over the masses, and perhaps eyeing their several groups, each headed by its 'chieftainship' (sardenau sēnghahyā), he cries, addressing Ahura formally, but the people really (so also elsewhere frequently), and says: 'Who is the righteous believer as regards these my questions asked of God to express my belief in Him, and who is the sceptic? Which man does the Angra Mainyu govern; or which is as evil as that chief himself?' And, recalling the galling fact that some are tolerated who not only do not assist but oppose his efforts, and perhaps having some half-convinced sections in full sight, he cries with bitterness: 'Why is this sinner, that chief who opposes me as Angra Mainyu opposed Ahura (compare paiti-eretē with âat moi paiti-eretē in Vendîdād I), why is he not believed to be what in very truth he is? Why is he still countenanced?' 13. And then with a fierceness which reminds us of sâzdûm snaithishâ (Y. XXXI, 18), but which is deeper because proposing a less material remedy, he asks: 'Why must we abide the sight of these opposers, representing their Lie-demon as their Goddess? How can I drive her hence to Hell beneath, not to those who hesitate like these, pausing before they condemn the evil party, but to those who are already filled with their disobedience, and who, having no communion at all with us, receive no light, like these, from the reflected glory of the truth, and who have moreover neither sought nor shared like these, the counsels of Thy Good Mind. Yea, how,' he reiterates, 'can I deliver up that Lying Goddess, in the persons of her adherents, to the Holy Order, in the persons of the saints, into their hands, to slay her, not with the snaithis only, but to destroy her as a falsehood by the Māthras of Thy doctrine, not barely to withstand these wicked corrupters, as we now do, enduring the silence of these masses at their deeds (verse 12), their fear of them, or their connivance with their creeds, but to spread slaughter among them to their total overthrow?'

15. He then presses on the coming collision, and prays to know to which of the hosts (compare âsayau, Y. XXXI, 2) that claim the urvâtâ, Ahura will give the prize. 16. And who, he further asks, shall be the champion who shall lead the victors, the verethrem-gan (compare sargâ, Y. XXIX, 3) who will thus take up the snaithis and the Māthra (verse 14), and so at once contend for 'both the worlds.' And he wishes him not alone pointed out, but approached, as Zarathustra was approached (Y. XLIII), by an obedient will, and moved to his holy work by the inspiring Good

Mind of Ahura, be that champion Ratu whosoever the Lord might wish. Salvation in the shape of success in his great attempt should be his portion (Y. XLIII, 1). 17. Half intimating that he himself may be the coming man, he begs to know when he can have that conference in which, as in the desired həmparsti and darsti of Y. XXXIII, 6, he may communicate more closely with Ahura, and through the revelation which might be vouchsafed, may become a protecting leader to secure the ever-named 'abiding two,' 'Weal' and 'Immortality,' which were the 'better than the good,' the 'vahista' of the saints.

18. A preliminary wish arising, he asks that he may receive the honorary gift of mated mares and a camel, as material for sacrifice before a battle (?), the highest interests of the people even, their lasting Welfare, demanding that he should receive this help. 19. For the monarch, or leading chief, who may withhold this justly deserved and needed help, or honour, he declares by the terms of his following question, that some instant judgment will be forthcoming, for the threats of the future condemnation seem for the moment only trite.

20. As a peroration, he appeals to the reason of the wavering groups, among the masses who still delay to call evil evil (verse 12), and he asks whether the Daêvas, as represented by their adherents, had ever been good rulers, when they had the power. Were not robbery and violence then the law with them as now? And did not the Kine, as representing the sacred herds and people, lift up her wailing voice?

(The piece from verse 12 seems to constitute a religious war-song. These verses seem not to have been originally connected with the calm and thankful contemplations in verses 1-10, but later united with them. Verses 12-20 stand in the closest connection with Y. XLVI, which has, however, preserved more of the elements of sorrow and discouragement which influenced the leader and his followers at times. See also XLIII, 11.)

Translation.

1. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright; when praise is to be offered, how (shall I complete) the praise of the One like You ¹, O Mazda? Let the One like Thee declare it earnestly to the friend who is such as I, thus through Thy Righteousness (within us) to offer friendly help¹ to us, so that the One like Thee² may draw near³ us through Thy Good Mind (within the soul).

¹ Some who seldom cite the Pahlavi follow it here; nîyâysnô zak mûn aêtânô nîyâysnô î Lekûm [dînô]. Otherwise one might

2. This I ask Thee, O Ahura ! tell me aright, how, in pleasing Him, may we serve the supreme one of (Heaven) the better world⁴; yea, how to serve that chief who may grant us those (blessings of His grace, and) who will seek for (grateful requitals at our hands); for He, bountiful (as He is) through the Righteous Order, (will hold off) ruin⁵ from (us) all, guardian (as He is) for both the worlds, O Spirit⁶ Mazda ! and a friend.

read nemê with B.V.S. (variation) in Y. LVIII, 3, and render, 'how shall I bow myself in your worship?'

¹ The Pahl. hamkarðâr is likewise followed. The alteration to hâkôrenâ is very interesting, but, I think, hardly necessary.

² Observe the great difficulty in referring Khshmvâtô to a human subject. Here we have 'the homage of the One like You (of Yours(?))' some would say); in Y. XXXIII, 8 we have Yasnem Mazdâ (Ahurâ) Khshmvâtô; in Y. XXXIV, 2 Khshmvâtô vahmê; in Y. XLIX, 6 Tâm daênâm yâ Khshmvâtô Ahurâ. Khshmvâtô is sometimes merely a way of saying 'of Thyself,' as mavaitê=to me.

³ Observe also the emphasis on his 'drawing near'; otherwise 'let Your one declare it to my friend'(?).

⁴ See Roth, Y. XXXI, 8. See, however, also de Harlez's suggestion, perhaps after the hint of the Pahlavi: 'qu'elle a été l'origine?' Here we have another instance where an entire verse seems to allude to Ahura in the third person with an address to Him thrown in, or at the close. In connection with anghêus vahistahyâ Ahura must be the pourvya, as in Y. XXXI, 8, where Roth renders vornehmster. The guardian is also Ahura (see Y. XXXI, 13).

⁵ I cannot fully accept the hint of the Pahlavi here as others do who seldom heed it. I do not think that 'sin' is so much indicated as 'destruction.'

⁶ Mainyû is suspiciously expressive as a vocative; perhaps 'by spiritual power' would be safer.

3. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright: Who by generation¹ was the first father of the Righteous Order (within the world)? Who gave the (recurring) sun and stars² their (undeviating) way? Who established that whereby the moon waxes, and whereby she wanes³, save Thee⁴? These things, O Great Creator! would I know⁵, and others likewise still.

4. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright, who from beneath hath sustained the earth and the clouds⁶ above that they do not fall? Who made the waters and the plants? Who to the wind has yoked on the storm-clouds, the swift and fleetest two⁷? Who, O Great Creator! is the inspirer of the good thoughts (within our souls)?

¹ 'As a generator (?)'

² Bartholomae follows the Pahlavi here as rendered by Ner. putting hveng and starem (-ām) in the genitive, which is in itself far better than to regard dât as governing two accusatives. One would, however, rather expect hveng starām adhvânem dât.

³ All follow the Pahlavi here, which renders with allowable freedom. Nerefsaitî (=Pahl. nerefsêd; Ner. nimflati; Persian kâhad) might possibly be explained as a nasalised form of an Aryan correspondent to arbha, as nas=as.

⁴ Possibly from thine influence (?)

⁵ The infinitive viduyê (= vidvê) lies here in an unusual place, at the end of the sentence. It is because the word has no stress upon it. The emphasis rests on the objects which he desires to know about; the entire connection deals with 'knowing'; it has no prominence.

⁶ This rendering is not supported by the Pahlavi, which seems to report a rendering from some text with an a privative, and a form of dar. The 'unsupported' object might mean the 'air-space.' See the suggestion of Bartholomae 'the earth and the air-space,' comparing the later Sanskrit.

⁷ Or 'for velocity,' adverbially. Velocity, however, in the abstract as the object yoked-on, is rather too finely drawn. I should prefer

5. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright; who, as a skilful artisan, hath made the lights and the darkness¹? Who, as thus skilful, hath made sleep and the zest (of waking hours)? Who (spread) the Auroras, the noontides and midnight, monitors to discerning (man), duty's true (guides)²?

6. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright these things which I shall speak forth, if they are truly thus. Doth the Piety (which we cherish) in reality increase³ the sacred orderliness within our actions? To these Thy true saints hath she given the Realm through the Good Mind. For whom hast Thou made the Mother-kine, the producer of joy⁴?

7. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright; who fashioned Âramaiti (our piety) the beloved, together with Thy Sovereign Power? Who, through his guiding wisdom⁵, hath made the son revering the father? (Who made him beloved⁶?) With (questhe fleet ones, the lightnings. My rendering follows the indication of another, as a dual, but not as to full exegesis. One naturally supposes the yoking together of the winds and dark clouds to be meant.

¹ Recall svār yād āsman adhipā u āndho.—Rv. VII, 88, 2.

² Ner.: 'Who gave us the lights with his keen discrimination? And who the darkness? Who, in his keen discrimination, gave (us our) sleep and waking; [that is, our diligence and activity?] Who is he who gave us the time of husaina, and the time of rapithvana [], and the method and calculation of him who discerns by means of the just rule []?'

³ So also the Pahlavi indicates by 'stavar.'

⁴ So I prefer; but the indication of the Pahlavi deserves an alternative 'giver of bounty'; skar=kar.

'Geus azyau' was later a common expression for a mature animal, but possibly vulgarised from its older special use here.

⁵ Root nî (?).

⁶ I thus add as the Pahlavi translator indicates such an element in uzemem.

tions such as) these, so abundant ¹, O Mazda! I press Thee, O bountiful Spirit, (Thou) maker of all!

8. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright, that I may ponder ² these which are Thy revelations, O Mazda! and the words which were asked (of Thee) by Thy Good Mind (within us), and that whereby we may attain ³, through Thine Order, to this life's perfection. Yea, how may my soul with joyfulness ⁴ increase in goodness? Let it thus ⁵ be ⁶.

9. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright, how to myself shall I hallow ⁷ the Faith of Thy people,

¹ Frakhshnî=in abundance (Pahl. kabad; Ner. prakuram; Persian MS. bisyar). The thought refers back to anyâkâ vîduyê [-vê].

² Haug sagaciously renders as if mendâidyâi were a miswriting for pendâidyâi, which is in itself very possible, as an 'm' looks much like an inverted 'e' in MSS. So the Pahlavi records the irregularity also, from which Haug derived his idea. But Haug explains the word as an allusion to the five prayer-hours of the day. I doubt very greatly whether the five prayer-hours existed at the date of the composition of this passage. Such regulations grew up much later. The Pahlavi translator indicates elsewhere an accusative (meng=mām) with an infinitive 'that I should give forth,' which is in itself far from impossible. He was aware (!) that meng could also equal man; see Y. LIII, 5.

³ Vaēdyâi is infinitively used for vōizdyâi.

⁴ I do think that it is necessary on the whole to postulate two similar words here (although Geldner's suggestion is most keen and interesting). Urvākhsanguha and urvākhsukhti do not favour a comparison with vrag here. The Pahlavi is indifferent: Kīgûn denman ī li rūbânō zak ī sapīr hū-ravākh-manīh? So Ner. uttam-ānandaž. Barth. beglückend.

⁵ Kâ-tâ=kēna-tēna.

⁶ Or, 'let those things happen to me;' gam means 'come' more frequently than 'go,' here. Lit. 'let it thus advance.'

⁷ Kīgûn denman ī li dīnō yōs-dâsar ī avēgak yōs-dâsaryōm? Ner.: Katham idam aham yat dīnim pavitratarām pavitrayāmi*; [kila, dīnim katham pravartamānām karomi]? As Zarathustra is which the beneficent kingdom's lord hath taught me, even the admonitions which He called Thine equal, hath taught me through His lofty (and most righteous Sovereignty and) Power, as He dwells in like abode¹ with Thine Order and Thy Good Mind?

10. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright that holy Faith which is of all things best, and which, going on hand in hand with Thy people, shall further my lands in Asha, Thine order, and, through the words of Âramaiti (our piety), shall render actions just. The prayers of mine understanding will seek² for Thee, O Ahura!

11. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright; how to these your (worshippers) may (that Piety once again and evermore) approach, to them to whom O Lord, Thy Faith is uttered? Yea, I beseech of Thee to tell me this, I who am known to Thee as Thy foremost³ of (servants); all other (Gods, with their represented as sanctifying the Fire (in Y. IX, 1), so here he would doubly sanctify the Faith itself. He would 'hallow its name' and meaning.

¹ Pavanas-hamdemûnih-ketrûnêš [pavan hamkhadûkîh].

² I cannot regard the caesura in this verse as possessing ordinary importance, the maḥvyau (mahyau) ñistôis is especially dependent on the following words. The Pahlavi translator hints at an important solution, which is, that a pause should be made before usen; 'the wish of mine understanding wishes, and I wish (am wishing); Khûrsand hômanam=I am content. If we can accept a break (a possibility far too little recognised), the usen as representing a nom. sing. would refer back to the meaning in maḥvyau (mahyau). But reading ñstîs (as irregular for ñstayô on account of the metre) we might regard usen as a third pl. Or shall we take it as a quasi-third singular, usen being usâm (en=the nasal vowel; comp. ûšâm as a third sing. imper. after Barth.)? Let 'the wish (ñstîs) of my enlightened understanding wish for Thee.'

³ Compare 'aêšhâm tôi, Ahura! ehmâ pourutemâis dastê.'

polluted worshippers), I look upon with (my) spirit's¹ hate².

12. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright; who is the righteous one in that regard in which³ I ask Thee my question? And who is evil? For which is the wicked? Or which is himself the (foremost) wicked one? And the vile man who stands against me (in this gain of) Thy blessing, wherefore⁴ is he not held and believed to be the sinner that he is?

13. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright, how shall I banish this Demon-of-the-Lie from us hence to those beneath who are filled⁵ with rebellion? The friends of Righteousness (as it lives in Thy saints) gain no light (from their teachings), nor have they loved the questions which Thy Good Mind (asks in the soul⁶)!

Auserkoren is a fine but a bold rendering. Election is, however, included in all divine prescience.

¹ I have no doubt whatever, but that mainyaur and dvaêshanghâ belong together.

² The Pahlavi translation is as follows: 'That which I ask of Thee, tell me aright, O Aûharmazd! when shall the perfect mind come to those persons [that is, when does the mind of my disciples become perfect]? When shall it come to those who declare this Thy Religion, O Aûharmazd? Grant to me before these the proclamation of the truth. Against every other spirit which is malevolent I keep my guard.'

³ Yâis adverbially, or possibly, 'with whom I question.'

⁴ Kyanghat is, I think, simply the equivalent for kî (?) anghat = quî fit, how does it happen that? 'Stands' free for 'comes.'

⁵ The Pahlavi on the contrary takes perenaunghô in the sense of combating, pavan anyôkhshîdârih patkârênd = '(who) are opposing you through disobedience.' It is far from certain that he does not indicate some improvement in text, or rendering.

⁶ Or, 'the counsels of holy men.'

14. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright; how shall I deliver that Demon-of-the-Lie into the two hands of Thine Order¹ (as he lives in our hosts) to cast her down to death through Thy Māthras of doctrine, and to send mighty destruction² among her evil believers, to keep those deceitful and harsh oppressors from reaching their (fell) aims³?

15. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright. If through Thy Righteousness (within our souls) Thou hast the power over this for my⁴ protection, when the two hosts shall meet in hate⁵ (as they strive) for those vows which Thou dost desire to maintain, how, O Mazda! and to which of both wilt Thou give⁶ the day⁶?

16. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright,

¹ Ashâi with Geldner.

² The Pahlavi anticipates us in the correct general sense here. It has nas,hônisnō. The Persian MS. renders the Pahlavi, hamâ-vandî nîst dehand î darwand.

³ Anâshê seems regarded as an infinitive by the Pahlavi translator, anayâtûnisnō. 'For the destruction of those deceivers' is an obvious alternative to the rendering above (â nâshê?).

⁴ Geldner and Roth render ma/=Sanskrit mad; otherwise 'with complete protection.' Or is ma/ablative for genitive: If thou rulest over me to afford me protection? The Pahlavi affords no indication.

⁵ The Pahlavi translator erred widely in his attempt to render the word anaoṅghâ. As it is certain that his MSS. differed from ours often, they probably did so here. The verse alludes beyond a question to some expected battle in a religious war, and perhaps in a religious civil war. It is the most positive allusion to the 'strife of the two parties' (Y. XXXI, 2) which has come down to us. It was a struggle concerning the religious vows, or doctrines; avâis urvâtâis yâ tû Mazdâ didereghzô.

⁶ The Pahlavi renders vananām by 'good thing,' explaining 'the sovereign power.'

who smites with victory¹ in the protection (of all) who exist, and for the sake of, and by means of Thy doctrine? Yea, clearly reveal a lord having power² (to save us) for both lives. Then let (our) Obedience³ with Thy Good Mind draw near to that (leader), O Mazda! yea, to him to whomsoever⁴ Thou (shalt) wish that he should come.

17. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright; how, O Mazda! shall I proceed to that (great) conference⁵ with You, to that consummation of Your own, when my spoken wish⁶ shall be (effected) unto me, (the desire) to be in the chieftainship⁷ (and supported) by (the hope of) Weal and Immortality (those saving powers of Thy grace), and by that (holy) Māthra (Thy word of thought) which fully guides our way through Righteousness (within).

¹ Verethrem-gâ thwâ, following the Pahlavi with Westergaard, Geldner, and Bartholomae.

² Compare Y. XXIX, 2 and Y. XXVIII, 3; or it may mean 'promise to establish' (Barth.). Kiždî, however, hardly seems to need an infinitive with it; it may mean 'appoint.' Compare dāmsu (patnī) for a better sense than 'house-lord,' also for deng patōis.

³ This casts additional light on the 'one that should come' in Y. XLIII, 7, 9, 11, 13, 15.

⁴ This recalls ahmâi yahmâi ustâ kahmâikî.

⁵ The comparison with gar has long circulated among Zendists. Many adopt it. It agrees admirably with the Pahlavi as to sense: Aîmat, Aûharmazd! damânō kardārîh ī Lekûm, when is Your appointment of the time?

⁶ The Pahlavi va mûniš zak ī li gōbisnō hōmand khvâstar.

⁷ Va sardâr yehevûnisnîh madam Haurvadađ va Amerôdâd; Ner. Svâmino bhavishyanti upari Avirdâde Amirdâde; comp. also Y. XLIX, 8 fraēstaunghô aunghâmâ. Professor Jolly compares būzdyâi with φύεσθαι (Inf. s. 194). The long since circulated comparison with bhug seems to me hardly so probable. It may, however, deserve an alternative; 'to enjoy Weal and Immortality'; but accusatives

18. (And, having gained Thine audience and Thine Order's sacred chieftainship), then I ask of Thee, O Ahura! and tell me aright, how shall I acquire that Thy Righteous Order's prize, ten (costly) mares male-mated, and with them the camel¹ (those signs of honour and blessing for Thy chief. I ask Thee for these gifts for sacrifice). For it was told me for the sake of our Welfare (in our salvation), and of our Immortality, in what manner Thou² shalt give³ to these (Thy conquering hosts) both of these Thy (gifts⁴ of grace).

19. This I ask Thee, O Ahura! tell me aright; (in the case of the recreant, of him) who does not give this (honoured) gift to him who hath earned it; yea, who does not give it to this (veracious tiller of the earth, to him who in no respect shows favour to the Demon-of-the-Lie, even to the) correct speaker⁵ (of Thy sacrificial word), what shall be his sentence at do not fall so naturally to the end of the sentence in Gāthic or Vedic, without preceding related or qualifying words.

¹ Those suspected of no partisanship for the Pahlavi translation follow it here as against Haug, who translated the words ustremâ by et amplius! It means a camel; so the Pahlavi translator rendered many centuries ago before Europeans even knew what the Indian úsh/ra meant, which simple analogy Neryosangh first drew. Horses were material for sacrifice among the Persians according to Herodotus. The reasons for the prayer are not fully expressed.

² So better than as a first person aorist subjunctive, if taîbyô is to be read. The Pahlavi, however, read taibyô, which is not lightly to be passed over.

³ The rendering 'take' has long circulated. I do not, however, prefer it here.

⁴ Weal and Immortality, but hî might refer to the two objects, 'the mares' and the 'camel.'

⁵ The ideal Zarathustrian; comp. Y. XXXI, 15; XLIX, 9.

the first (now at this time, and because of this false dealing? I ask it), knowing well his doom at last¹.

20. (And how as to our deluded foes?) Have Daêva-(worshippers) e'er reigned as worthy kings? (This verily I ask of Thee, the Daêva-worshippers) who fight² for these (who act amiss? Have they well reigned) by whom the Karpan and the Usig(k) gave the (sacred) Kine to Rapine³, whence, too, the Kavian in persistent strength⁴ has flourished? (And these have also never given us tribal wealth nor blessings), nor for the Kine have they brought waters to the fields for the sake of the Righteous Order (in our hosts), to further on their growth (and welfare)!

¹ So also the Pahlavi followed by all. Kađâr valman pavan zak vinâsînô aîtô fratûm; [aigas pavan-vinâskârîh pâđafrâs fratûm maman]? Âkâs hômanam zak mûn valman aîtô afdûm [mamanas darvandîh]? Ner. (with regard to him) who does not give the reward which has come for the one fitted for, or deserving of, it [to Garathustra's equal], (the reward) which the truthful man; [that is, the good man] is giving to him, what is the first thing which happens through this sin of his? [that is, what is his first chastisement in consequence of this fault?] (For) I am aware of what his punishment shall be in the end [].

² The Pahlavi translator either had a text with some form of pâ, or was otherwise misled. He renders mûn netrûnd, but gives the word the adverse sense of 'hindering' in the gloss. Ner., however, has pratiskhalanti which points to peshyêntî, and also tends to show that other MSS. of the Pahlavi (and among them the one used by Ner.) read differently from our three, K₅, D. J., and the Persian transliteration. Kâm=Ved. kâm with dat.

³ See Y. XXIX, 1.

⁴ Professor Wilhelm 'vigour' (De Infin. p. 14).

YASNA XLV.

THE DOCTRINE OF DUALISM. HOMAGE TO AHURA.

This hymn bears fewer traces of a fragmentary condition than others. It recalls Y. XXX, and, like it, appears to belong to a period, or to an interval, of political repose and theological activity. It is smoother and more artificial than is usual, and it goes straight on its way from beginning to end. A powerful adversary had just been crushed. It was the dussasti of Y. XXXII, 9. This may well have been the result of the conflict alluded to in Y. XLIV, 15, 16, and possibly in Y. LI, 9, 10, also urged on by the fierce Y. XXXI, 18 probably often repeated in lost hymns.

An assembly is addressed as in Y. XXX, 1, but this time as coming 'from near and from far.' It may very possibly have been the winning side in a late struggle. The first verse sounds like a congratulation.

It might be said to be intended to be sung, if not shouted, to a multitude whose outskirts were by no means within easy reach with the voice. At all events attention is summoned with three differing expressions. 'Awake your ears to the sound,' literally 'sound ye,' in a receptive sense; ('let the sound peal in your ears'), then 'listen' (sraotâ); and then 'ponder' (māzdaunghôdâtṃ). 'The Antizarathustra, the evil teacher par eminence, has been defeated,' he declares, 'and he will never again destroy the peace of our lives (Y. XXXII, 9, 11). His evil creed has been silenced, and his tongue can no longer shout out its periods of persuasion or invective (Y. XXXI, 12) beside our preachers.'

2. He then reiterates the chief doctrine for which the parties had been at war, and which they should now see clearly in the light of their victory. 'The foul evils of society do not lie within the control of the holy Ahura in such a manner as that he either originates, or tolerates them. They are, on the contrary, the product of the personified Anger of the Daêvas, the Mainyu in its evil sense, the Angra (angry?) Spirit. Between this being, or personified abstraction, and Ahura, there is a gulf fixed. (Never do we see any aspersions upon Ahura's name, or a suspicion of His purity as shown by complicity with cruelty, or the toleration of evil passions.) It is also to be noted that the defeated dussasti may have possibly been a Daêva-worshipper chiefly as being a heretic from this Faith of Ahura, believing Him to be implicated in the creation, or permission of sin and suffering, or, if the burial or burning of the dead was forbidden at this time, then possibly a heretic on these questions also. But yet, as a recreant Mazda-worshipper he may have claimed a rightful allegiance to the urvâtâ, and the future blessings, as well as temporal advantages, involved in a correct discipleship; and so he may have used the name of the sacred tenets of the Religion itself to help on a nefarious warfare. In fact he may have been a self-styled Mazda-worshipper, but not of 'Zarathustra's order,' not owned at all in any degree by the genuine adherents, and met as a real, if not an open, Daêva-worshipper.

The ardent prophet therefore declares the utter severance between the good and the evil, the God and the Demon. It is a popular corollary to Y. XXX, 3-6. The two spirits came together indeed at first to make life, and its negation, and they co-operate, if such a term can be applied to an irreconcilable antagonism out of whose antitheses and friction sentient existence alone becomes possible. Their union consists in opposition, for if they blend, they each cease to be what they are. They are, while upholders of existence, yet separate for ever, and that as to every attribute and interest.

3. And the sage goes on to assert that in this he is proclaiming the first Mâthra of this life which the all-wise Mazda had revealed to him. And, whether sure of the victorious masses before him, or whether on the contrary perfectly aware that many a group among them had been more convinced by the snaith's than by reason, he presses at once upon them that one terrible doctrine which seems unfortunately too needful for all successful and sudden propagandism, and he declares that they who do not act in a manner accordant with what he speaks, and even thinks, (having formerly announced it), to such delinquents this life should end in woe.

4. Proceeding in a happier vein, he then dwells upon the fatherhood of God. He will declare this world's best being who is Mazda Himself. He is the father of the Good Mind within His people, when that Good Mind is active in good works. So our piety, when it is practical, is His daughter, for no pretended good intention can claim relationship with Him, nor can any idle sentiment. He needs the 'ready mind' within His servant, and He is not to be deceived (compare Y. XLIII, 6).

5. Returning once more to the Mâthra, and this time to hold out rewards rather than to utter threats, he declares that Happiness and Immortality would be the portion of those who listened to, and pondered his revelation, and that Ahura Himself would likewise approach them with the rewarding actions of His Good Mind, for Ahura was also in all good actions on the one hand, just as His Immortal Archangels on the other had their objective existence likewise in the believer's soul.

6. Turning from admonition to worship, he announces, not what he terms the 'first' (verse 3), nor the 'best' (verses 4 and 5), but the 'greatest,' element of all, implying that praise, which he now expresses, includes both prayer and doctrinal confessions, and he calls on Ahura both to listen and to teach. 7. It is the 'greatest' element indeed, for it concerns those spiritual blessings which not only the offerers who are now living will seek after, but those also who shall live in future; nay, even the spirits of the just desire them in the eternal Immortality. And these blessings are, according to a well-remembered law, woe to the wicked, and that, not only from outward discipline, but from inward grief. And Ahura had established, so he adds, the beneficent, but, as regards the wicked, still solemn regulations by the exercise of His Sovereign Power as the controller of all (Y. XXIX, 4). 8. Zarathustra (or his substitute) then professes his eagerness to serve the Lord with these words which he had called the 'greatest,' and because he had seen Him with his very eyes, which he explains as meaning that he had known Him through the Righteous Order in his soul, and therefore he prays and hopes to pronounce these greatest praises, not in the assembly (Y. LI, 3) alone, but in the 'Home of sublimity or song' (Y. I, 4).

9. And he desires all the more fervently to do homage to Ahura, because He approaches him with the Power of His divine Authority in weal or woe, blessing both men and herds so long as they multiplied under the influences of Piety. 10. As the praises were the 'greatest,' so he seeks to 'magnify' the Lord in the Yasnas of Âramaiti, Ahura being renowned by His unchanging purpose, for He will bestow the 'eternal two' in His holy Kingdom, when it shall have been made firm! 11. Yea, he would seek to magnify Him who contemns the Daêvas and their party as much as they, in their turn, profess to make little of Him and His religious Kingdom, contrasted as they were with Ahura's prophet, who honoured Him in the holy Insight, the Daêna of the Saoshyant. And this Saoshyant is declared to be the controlling master of every faithful worshipper, and he, or the faithful venerator of the reviled Ahura, is also as our friend, brother, nay, like Ahura Himself (verse 4), our very Father in the Faith.

Translation.

1. Yea, I will speak forth ; hear ye ; now listen, ye who from near, and ye who from afar have come seeking¹ (the knowledge). Now ponder² ye clearly all³ (that concerns) him⁴. Not for a second time shall the false teacher slay our life (of the mind, or the body). The wicked is hemmed in with his faith and his tongue!⁵

2. Yea, I will declare the world's two first⁶ spirits, of whom the more bountiful thus spake to the harmful⁷: Neither our thoughts, nor commands, nor our

¹ Ish means 'to come seeking.' The bavihûnêd/ of the Pahlavi, followed by many, is by no means incorrect.

² The reading mâzdaunghôdûm was suggested to me by Dr. Aurel Stein previously (as I believe) to its announcement elsewhere. Before this the indication of the Pahlavi (which always hesitates to change a MS. regarded at the time as sacred) had been followed by all with its necessary error.

³ The 'e' in kithre must represent a nasalised vowel, as in mehmaidî.

⁴ Îm may be merely a particle.

⁵ I would here strongly insist upon an alternative rendering in the sense of the Pahlavi. The rendering above is given on principle. A text should never be changed, if it is possible to render it as it is. Read, 'the wicked confessing (varetô, active sense) evil beliefs with his tongue.' The Pahlavi has zakas sarîtar kâmakô va zakas darvandîh pavan hûzvânô hêmnunêd/. Many, with this view, would at once read varetâ without MSS.

⁶ Observe the peculiar pouruyê (pourviyê, if not a locative), the two first things, principles, forces; so in Y. XXX, 3.

⁷ Notice that vahyô akemtâ (in Y. XXX, 3) necessarily apply to the mainyû, and not only because, as nominatives, the words fall to the end of the sentence. Here we have analogous adjectives applied unmistakably to the two. The neuters correspond with vahistem manô and akistem manô, and are of capital importance as understandings, nor our beliefs, nor our deeds, nor our consciences, nor our souls, are at one¹.

3. Thus I will declare this world's first² (teaching), that which the all-wise Mazda Ahura hath told me. And they among you who will not so fulfil and obey this Māthra, as I now shall conceive and declare it, to these shall the end of life (issue) in woe.

4. Thus I will declare forth this world's best (being). From (the insight of His) Righteousness Mazda, who hath appointed these (things)³, hath known (what He utters to be true; yea, I will declare) Him the father of the toiling Good Mind (within us). So is His expressing that abstract conception which renders the Gāthas so much more impressive as the earliest documents of their kind.

¹ The Pahlavi thus glosses: I do not think what thou thinkest, [for I think what is pious, and thou thinkest what is impious]; nor our teachings, [for I teach what is pious, and thou, what is impious] —nor our religions, for mine is the Gāthic, and thine that of the sorcerer; nor our souls, [for he who takes his stand on my religion, and he who takes his stand on thy religion, are apart; their souls do not occupy the same position]. Ner.: naṭa dīniḥ [yato me dīniḥ gāthabhavā teṭa rākshasī*].

² The 'first teaching' was a prominent idea with the Zarathustrians. Z. is called in the later Avesta the paoiryō/kaēsha (sic). He hardly plays the rôle of a reformer in the Avesta. He is mentioned after others chronologically, not as repudiating them. He might better be termed reviver. Yām is difficult; perhaps daēnām is to be understood, or yem (māthrem) read; see verse 4, anghaus ahyā vahistem. Neither pourvīm nor vahistem are adverbs.

³ Some change the text here to another which corresponds to some of the terms better. It should, however, first be rendered as it stands; the obscurities may well be owing to idiosyncrasy in the composer; possibly also to an affectation of obscurity (or 'dark speech'). How can Mazda be said to 'know Himself?' or how could any but Ahura be spoken of as 'the Father of Vohu Manah and Âramaiti?' He recognised Himself as having generated V. M. and Â. He was conscious of the completed relation.

daughter through good deeds (our) Piety. Not to be deceived is the all-viewing¹ Lord.

5. Yea, thus I will declare that which the most bountiful One told me, that word which is the best to be heeded by mortals. They who therein grant me obedient² attention, upon them cometh Weal to bless, and the Immortal being, and in the deeds of His Good Mind cometh the Lord.

6. Aye, thus I will declare forth Him who is³ of all the greatest, praising through my Righteousness, I who do aright, those who (dispose of all as well aright). Let Ahura Mazda hear with His bounteous spirit, in whose homage (what I asked) was asked⁴ with the Good Mind. Aye, let Him exhort me through His wisdom (which is ever) the best.

7. (Yea, I will declare Him) whose blessings the offerers will seek for, those who are living now, as well as those who have lived (aforetime), as will they

¹ Hishas looks irresistibly like a nom. sing., but may it not be a nom. actoris from the redup. root? Compare hīshasa (although the Pahlavi renders with a different cast of meaning). What Indian word to compare here is hard to say. I prefer Bartholomae's earlier view (as to the meaning) with the Pahlavi harvispō nīkīrīdār. By dropping the later glosses, the sense of the Pahlavi comes out as usual, much closer to the Gātha.

² Observe the vigour possessed by 'Sraosha.' It designates the angel of Obedience; and at the same time it is the only word which can here bring out the sense when it is understood in its actual meaning; so continually with the words Vohu Manah, Asha, &c.

³ Lit. 'Him who I, doing aright, (praising Him with His immortals) who (all likewise) are (beneficent).' Or it may be 'that which.'

⁴ So with many who hold the least to the hints of the Pahlavi. Otherwise I would render 'there is furtherance,' comparing afrašt-mantō.

also who are coming¹ (hereafter. Yea, even) the soul(s) of the righteous (will desire) them in the eternal² Immortality. (Those things they will desire which are blessings to the righteous) but woes to the wicked. And these hath Ahura Mazda (established) through His kingdom, He, the creator (of all).

8. Him in our hymns of homage and of praise would I faithfully serve, for now with (mine) eye, I see Him clearly, Lord of the good spirit³, of word, and action, I knowing through my Righteousness Him who is Ahura Mazda. And to Him (not here alone, but) in His home of song⁴, His praise we⁵ shall bear.

9. Yea, Him with our better Mind we seek to honour, who desiring (good), shall come to us (to bless) in weal and sorrow⁶. May He, Ahura Mazda, make us⁷ vigorous through Khshathra's royal power,

¹ Bvaititiâ (sic) seems, as elsewhere, to express 'those who are becoming.'

² The Pahlavi uniformly errs, or is strangely free, with this word. The sense 'continuous' is here admirably adapted.

³ This word seems evidently used almost in a modern sense of 'character,' 'disposition.' Elsewhere we are in doubt whether to refer it to the Spēnista Mainyu of Ahura, or to Ahura Himself.

⁴ Paradise; possibly 'home of sublimity.'

⁵ The change from singular to plural is frequent. Ner. varies from the Pahlavi in the last verse, improving upon it: Evam tasmai prazāmam antar Garothmāne nidadāmahe. This was probably an intentional improvement, as the Persian MS. follows our Pahlavi text. His MS. of the Pahlavi probably read barâ yehabûnd.

⁶ Or, 'who has created weal and sorrow for us with good intention, (and as our discipline);' but this is hardly probable. Ahura did not originate evil. Spēntâ, aspenkâ are used adverbially (see Y. XXXIV, 7).

⁷ I hardly agree to reading verezenyau (sic) here in the sense of 'homes.' The meaning is 'endow us with efficiency' in the pursuit of the objects mentioned in the context. Or 'the propitiation and our flocks and men in thrift to further, from the good support and bearing¹ of His Good Mind, (itself born in us) by His Righteousness.

10. Him in the Yasnas of our Piety we seek to praise with homage, who in His persistent energy² was famed to be (in truth) the Lord Ahura Mazda, for He hath appointed in His kingdom, through His holy Order and His Good Mind, both Weal and Immortality, to grant³ the eternal mighty pair to this our land (and the creation).

11. (Him would we magnify and praise) who hath despised the Daêva-gods and alien men, them who before held Him in their derision. Far different are (these) from him who gave Him honour. This latter one is through the Saoshyant's bounteous Faith, who likewise is the Lord of saving power⁴, reverential honour' may have been more directly in the composer's mind; 'may He endow our (worship) with efficiency that it may accomplish its desired result.' See the positions of the words.

The Pahlavi translation also bears witness to the rendering above, with its erroneous or free varzîdâr avô lanman.

¹ As it is impossible for those who have studied the subject to believe that the Pahlavi translator did not know the meaning of amavandîh in Zend, we must suppose him to have had some form like hazah before him instead of huzâ(thwâ/).

² The Pahlavi translator, rendering this word in the two other places by pavan astûbîh, had evidently some reason for seeing a form of nâman here. The natural conclusion is that his MS. read differently in this place. Ner. renders him appropriately.

³ Dân looks like an accusative infinitive here (Bartholomae); otherwise the two verbs must be regarded as having indefinite pronouns understood, 'one assigns,' and 'they grant.'

⁴ I cannot see the applicability of Agni's title 'house-lord' here; compare dâmsupatni as 'adj. referring to pāti.

a friend, brother, or a father to us, Mazda Lord¹!

YASNA XLVI.

PERSONAL SUFFERINGS, HOPES, AND APPEALS.

In treating this most valuable section, we can as usual presuppose that the several verses were not originally composed in the order in which they now appear. Verses 1-3 seem like a cry 'from the depths.' In verse 4 animosity appears; and an appeal to the energy of some of his warlike adherents seems to prove that, with verses 5 and 6, the composer addressed it to an assembly; 7-10 are questions and appeals to Ahura, but, as a matter of course, they are none the less really intended to impress the hearers, as well as to animate the mind of the reciter. Verses 11 and 12 were again intended to be delivered to adherents.

Verse 13 is addressed to them in terms. Verse 14 would be regarded by some as little suited to the connection, and the rest seem spoken to an assembly of chiefs. However different they may be as to the particular time or circumstances of their origin, they are in general so homogeneous even as to pitch of intensity, that, with a little exercise of the mind, we can as usual see the reasons why they were put together, or were consecutively composed; and in poetic diction sudden changes neither displease nor surprise us. 1. Beyond a doubt the leading prophet is the figure in the first and second verses; and those verses are so free from imagery that we hold them as describing beyond any reasonable question, together with many other passages in the Gâthas, the afflictions and discouragements of Zarathustra himself. He knows not whither to turn, although he speaks as a public person and in command of forces which are scanty indeed (verse 2), but yet still able to take the field (Y. XLIV, 15, 16); and his movements also concern large districts ('lands'). He is not driven from his house, but from his country. It is superfluous to say that religion, although blended with a natural ambition, is his leading motive. How he shall satisfy Ahura is the one problem which he aims to solve; but his case at this particular juncture shows every discouragement.

¹ He who despised the Daêvas, they returning the contempt is probably the same person expressed by the two hōi in the previous verse. It is therefore Ahura, but the words which mean friend, brother, father, are grammatically connected with ye—mainyâtâ, the one who revered Ahura. The expression 'father' gives a strong impression that Ahura is referred to, notwithstanding the vocative. Particularly as we have father in verse 4. The word 'brother,' however, inclines one to the more closely grammatical view.

2. Not supposing that his yâ=yéna is merely lost in the meaning 'that,' we see that in relieving his burdened mind he exclaims, not that he knows that he is poor in means and troops, but that he knows why it is thus. It is the dregvant's work, whom we may also well understand as the drugvant, the accursed enemy, who holds back (verse 4) the bearers of the Holy Order from all success in their efforts to gain a righteous livelihood from the favoured cattle culture (Y. XXIX, 2), and who, as he with grief long since foresaw, should he attain to power, would deliver up home, village, district, and province to ruin and death (Y. XXXI, 18). He therefore cries to Ahura in common with the Kine herself (Y. XXIX, 9), and his 'behold' is only a changed expression for her exclamations (Y. XXIX, 1).

As a friend, he would have the good Mazda to regard him as seeking an especial form of grace; and he would beseech Him to fill up his need (Y. XXVIII, 11) in his extremity, teaching him, not the value of flocks and followers alone, but of that îsti which lay deeper than the material wealth which he yet lamented, even the blessings of the Holy Order in every home. 3. And therefore he continues: Teach me and tell me of those great thoughts, the kh ratavô, the salvation-schemes of the Saviours, elsewhere also spoken of as the kh ratu of life (Y. XXXII, 9); for these saving helpers would, through a severe conflict and after many a reverse, at last bring on 'Completed Progress.'

4. But he must arouse himself from the relief and indulgence of his grief, he therefore springs to action, and with a cry which we hear elsewhere (Y. LIII, 9), and which was in all probability often uttered in hymns now lost to us, he urges the reward for the chief, who at the head of his retainers, shall expel the world-destroyer, the dussasti (Y. XLV, 1), from power and from life. And what is that reward? It seems to be merely the recognition and confirmation of merit among the faithful. The man who shall expel, or destroy, the heretical tyrant shall be eminent in the recognition of his services in the support of the people and their sacred agricultural civilisation.

That was to be reward enough, and even that prestige (pourvâtêṃ) was to be given back to God in offering for still further service (Y. XXXIII, 14).

5. And every righteous official is urged to repeat the proclamation as a warning to every polluted Daêva-worshipper whom he can discover, or to whom his voice can reach, as well as to those secret adherents who would seem to need encouragement. The charged official is to assail the destructive opponent (Y. XXXII, 6-8), only after careful discrimination. He is to approach the evil chief, the hostile hvaêtu (of the blood), as distinct from the inferior noble, or the peasant clansman, and he is to tell him fully of the price set on his head. 6. 'And the superintendent who has the power, and does not thus carry out these instructions, shall himself be delivered over to the bonds of that Lie-demon whom the evil "kinsman" serves. For there is no compromise in the dualistic moral creed. The man who favours the evil is as the evil, and the friend of the good is as the good himself; so had the Lord ordained.'

7. Then, as so often elsewhere, he turns his thoughts to the outward emblem as the sign of inward grace, the sacramental Fire without which the masses would have had no help to fix the eye, or draw prostrations, and he asks with the question of profound devotion: Whom have they (Thy Saoshyants, verse 3) set me, as strengthener in these storms, save Thee and Thy symbolic flames? Yet even here he names the Good Mind with them, and the Order.

8. 'But,' he continues, 'may he who would destroy my settlement find every influence and power combined to form his ruin; may all things keep him back from prosperity, and may nothing keep him back from harm.'

9. He calls, then, for a leading helper who may help him magnify Ahura, not merely in religious celebrations, but in that universal advance of the sacred 'cause,' which follows Ahura's 'conciliation' (verse 1).

10. As if to hinder the discouragement of those who hear his own unburdenings of grief, he declares that he will never leave the faithful few who follow him; he will go with them to the 'dread assize' itself, as if to help them pass the last of tests.

11. But the 'wicked,' open or concealed, should not share these hopes; their conscience, ever the remorseless executioner, shall curse them, as they try to pass the Judgment Bridge; and hurled from that narrow path (it becomes narrow to the faithless), they shall fall to 'eternal' Hell.

12. Their destruction is not, however, yet decided; there is not only hope for the tribesmen of Ahura, but for the pagan, and not for the 'alien' only, but for the Turanian enemy, whose very name had been a synonym for suffering. If these even shall repent, they may be blest; and some had already turned. The converted tribe Fryána offered many pious proselytes. These would help on the righteous order together with the holy people, and God would dwell with them as well.

13. Rhetorically referring to himself as in the third person, or else representing some second speaker who names his name, he can still offer his reward to any prince who will yet come up with his retainers to his cause, not kept back by the many refusals which he had met (verse 1), nor discouraged by the scant numbers of his bands; and that reward is one which might yet be efficacious to induce self-sacrificing succour, for in addition to what had been said (see verse 4) he could declare spiritual life from Ahura to be the portion of every faithful follower, and with it future temporal wealth. And he should declare this true recruit the 'good mate' in the service, the first helper (verse 9) of the tribes.

14. Here we have what seems a question conceived as uttered by some one in the throng, or else simply rhetorically thrown in: 'Who is that friend, that powerful coadjutor who is thus offered this reward, and for such a service?' Zarathustra names the king. But he diverts the minds of hearers from a pernicious trust in individuals.

He would appeal, so he implies, not to one man only, although that one be Vistâspa, the heroic, but to all whom Ahura would recognise in His assembly, through the inspired suffrage of the mass.

15. And first he addresses the group made up chiefly of his family, the Spitâmas; they were, as he implied, enlightened in the sacred lore, and among the foremost therefore of the Ar(e)dra.

16. He then calls on Frashaostra, with the Hvôgvas, exhorting all to continue in their righteous course, in harmony with those whom they wish for as Saviours for the land, assuring them that they will reach at last that sacred scene where the 'Immortals' dwell with God. 17. 'That scene,' he further adds, 'where the faithful sing their praises in perfection, using the true metres' (as sacred as the Vedic). And he declares that Ahura, who discerns the truth infallibly, will heed and answer; for the praises sung there will be those of obedient men who offer to the cause. 18. He once more holds out his spiritual rewards as the best gifts of the inspired revelation, threatening as usual commensurate visitation upon the oppressing clans, while both promises and threats are in harmony with Ahura's will, for that alone has been his guide in every statement. 19. After all complaints, and threats, and stern injunctions, he closes with the once more repeated word 'reward,' and that for every man who shall aid in 'his great affair' (Y. XXX, 2), and he appeals to God Himself, asserting His inspiration for all that he has said.

Translation.

1. To what land to turn¹; aye, whither turning shall I go? On the part of² a kinsman (prince), or allied peer, none, to conciliate, give³ (offerings) to me (to help my cause), nor yet the throngs of labour, (not) even such as these⁴, nor yet (still less) the evil

¹ The Pahlavi translator sees the usual meaning in nemôi and nemô. He also accepts kām zām adverbially after the constant Greek usage. 'In what land shall I establish my religion (as it is here rejected); whither with my praises (of the true God) shall I go?' The rendering is so much richer that I turn from it with great reluctance.

² It is to be regretted that able scholars should so hastily change the Gāthic text here without first trying to render it as it is. This is all the more necessary, as each independent writer disputes emendations. Pairi I think ought to stand. The hvaētu, airyaman, and vereznem are also elsewhere alluded to, as appertaining to the hostile party sometimes, and therefore not among those from among whom (parâ?) the prophet would be expelled.

³ Dadaiti as a third plural has long been suggested with the eagerness of discovery. Its subjects would then be khshnâus, and that implied in yâ vereznâ. But the construction is difficult thus, and it may be greatly doubted whether we had not better alter our discovery back into the singular with the Pahlavi. I am greatly confirmed in my view of the grammatical form of khshnâus by Bartholomae's decision for a nominal form. Otherwise it would be a third singular, with loss of the final dental.

⁴ Hekâ seems to be an irregular form (see Y. LVIII, 4). I can tyrants of the province. How then (establish well the Faith, and thus) conciliate Thy (grace), O Lord?

2. This know I, Mazda! wherefore I am thus unable to attain my wish¹, and why my flocks are so reduced in number, and why my following is likewise scant. Therefore I cry to Thee; behold it, Lord! desiring helpful grace for me, as friend bestows on friend. (Therefore to meet my spirit's need, and this as well) declare and teach² to me the Good Mind's wealth.

3. When come, Great Giver! they who are the day's enlighteners³, to hold the Righteous Order of the world upright, and forward pressing? When are only make an exclamatory isque=talisque of it. The Pahlavi renders freely as if some form of hi=to bind were before him (recall hôis?), or perhaps he read hakâ, rendering as=these all together, hamsâyakîk; Ner. ye svasrenayo.

¹ So the Kine complained of him in Y. XXIX, 9 as anaêsha; so also the Pahlavi, explaining akhvâstar [aîgham denman atû-bânîkîh maman râi khavîûnam]. He proceeds li amat kam ramak va amatiê kam-gabrâ hômanam, explaining anaêshô as not being an ishâ-khshathra. Mâ=smâ notwithstanding position (?).

² 'Nim wahr' has long since circulated as a rendering for âkhsô; and with îstîm in the sense of 'prayer,' it has afforded the admirable sense 'observe, take heed of the desire of the pious.' But we have a positive proof of the meaning 'teach,' 'declare' for khsa; see Y. LXV, 9 (Wg.). So also in Y. XXVIII, 5. That Ahura possessed an îsti is clear from Y. XXXIV, 5. And if the sage could ask, 'What is your îsti (wealth)? what is your kingdom (power over possessions)?' it is certainly not strained to suppose that he could say here; 'tell me concerning your wealth,' especially as he bewails his poverty. Îsti is in antithesis to the idea expressed in kamnafshvâ and kamnânâ. So also the Pahlavi as translated by the Persian 'hezânah.

³ Ukshâno would seem to be an ancient error for ushâno, as the Pahlavi translator renders as if reading ushâ in Y. L, 10, and the schemes of the saviour Saoshyants with (their) lofty revelations (to appear)? To whom for help does he (their chief) approach, who has Thy Good Mind (as his fellow-worker¹)? Thee, for mine exhorter and commander, Living Lord! I choose.

4. (But e'er these helpers come to me, all rests as yet in gloom.) The evil man is holding back² those who are the bearers of the Righteous Order from progress³ with the Kine, (from progress with the sacred cause) within the region, or the province⁴, he, the evil governor, endowed with evil might⁵, consuming⁶ life with evil deeds. Wherefore, whoever hurls him from his power, O Mazda! or from life, stores for the Kine in sacred wisdom shall he make⁷.

not ukhshâ. Otherwise 'increasers of the days' is a fine expression, but suspicious in view of the Pahlavi rendering in Y. L., 10. Ner.'s *vikâsayitryo (sic) is striking, but I cannot claim for it all that it seems to offer, as Ner. elsewhere renders forms of vakhsh by those of kas. The Persian follows the Pahlavi.

¹ Comp. Y. XLIV, 1.

² Pâ in the sense of 'keeping back from welfare' as well as in that of 'protection,' a sense first taught us by the Pahlavi writers, is now at last generally acknowledged. It now, like many other suggestions of the Pahlavi, actually casts light in the rendering of the analogous Vedic word.

³ So the mass of MSS. with the Pahl. min fravâmisnô; Persian az raftan. The expression might refer to the 'going of the kine,' as representing the people in her 'path.'

⁴ Comp. Y. XXXI, 18.

⁵ Pahl. zak î pavan dûs-stahamak; Ner. dush/o balât-kâri. The elements seem to be duz + hazô + bâo(=vâo).

⁶ Ush in Iranian seems to have the sense of destruction combined with it sometimes; hence aoshah, aoshisnô.

⁷ Kar can well mean 'attain to.' Pathmeng as=paths (so I formerly rendered) gives a far feeblar sense than that indicated by the first Zendist, the Pahlavi writer. The 'wisdom' of preparing stores for the kine, even if we suppose an animal only to be meant,

5. (Yea), he who, as ruler, treats no coming applicant with injury¹, as a good citizen (or nobly wise) in sacred vow and duty, and living righteously in every covenant, who, as an uncorrupted judge, discerns the wicked (that leader who, rejecting me, would keep back those who propagate the Faith), let him, (this righteous judge,) declare (the vengeance) to that (hostile²) lord, (my) kinsman. Yea, let him crush him when he sallies forth³ (to approach us for our harm)!

6. (And he who leaves him in his guilty error has my curse.) Yea, he who has the power⁴, and will not thus (with stern reproof⁵) approach him, shall go to is obvious. The Iranian winter was something very different from that in India. But the kine is not alluded to without a certain figurative meaning: she represents the people, and as such she cried aloud; and Zarathustra received the commission to relieve her sufferings as such. That the word hučistōis stands in the genitive should not disturb us. The 'care for the kine' was a matter of national importance, and 'wisdom' could not better be exercised than in this direction.

¹ Or we may render 'he who as ruler does not bestow favours upon him who approaches with injury.' The hint of the Pahlavi favours this.

² Hvaêtavê is here, as in Y. XXXIII, 4; Y. XXXII, 1, and the first verse of this chapter, the hostile chieftain called 'kinsman' in an aristocratic sense by Zarathustra and his group.

³ I compare uzûithyazuska which is used of the breaking forth of water. The Pahlavi translator seems to have had some such idea 'mûn lâla hengîdô', but with him the entire line, which divides all writers, favours the sense 'in saving him from his impiety.' Khrûnyâz is a verbal form (with Bartholomae).

⁴ The Pahlavi translator sees the root is=to wish in ismanô, 'who does not willingly approach him;' or 'who does not approach desiring (and seeking?) him.'

⁵ I am gratified to see that another takes nearly this view of this line. He has 'verfolgt.'

the abode of the Lie, (and) the enchainer¹. For he is evil who is the best one to the evil, and he is holy who is friendly to the righteous, as Thou didst fix the moral laws², O Lord!

7. Whom, then, as guard, O Mazda! hast Thou³ set me⁴ then when that wicked one still held⁵ me for his hate? Whom (had I) then but Thee, Thy Fire and Mind, Ahura! by deeds performed in which Thy Righteous rule is saved and nurtured? Therefore that spiritual power⁶ (vouchsafing me) for the (holy) Faith (its truths) declare.

8. And as to him who (now by evil power) delivers up my settlements to harm, let not his burning (wrath) in deeds attain⁷ me. But bearing back⁸ the (evil will and evil influence of such), let these things come (back) to him in anger. Let that to his body come which holds from⁹ welfare; but let no (help)

¹ Haêthahyâ, as a masculine, is awkward, as would be baêthahyâ, so the Pahl. (of the terrifier). A loc. of haithya may be correct, taking dâmân also as a loc. Otherwise 'to the creatures of the Lie, and the enchainer (or terrifier).'

² Or, 'as Thou didst make the souls at first.'

³ So with K6, K9 (Barth.).

⁴ Some render 'me' here, who seem elsewhere loath to translate thwâvazt as=like thee, thee. Khshmvâtô, thwâvâs, and mavaitê, in Y. XLIV, 1, may be rendered, 'of you,' 'thou,' and 'to me.'

⁵ So the Pahlavi indicates. I have, however, elsewhere, as against tradition, rendered as if the root were dar(e)s; 'has set his eye on me for vengeance.'

⁶ One might be tempted to read ta/ môi dâs tvəm; 'that granting me, do Thou speak forth for the faith.'

⁷ The Pahlavi translator indicates the root sâ by his rêsh; so read as alternative, 'let him not wound us.'

⁸ The meaning 'but contrariwise' has been ventured on. The indication of the Pahlavi is 'in opposing'; pavan pađrak yâm-tûnisnô.

⁹ The Pahlavi here misses the point, and taking pâyâs in its usual at all (approach him, which may) keep him back from misery. (And let this happen as I speak) from (vengeful) hate, O Lord!

9. But who is the freely helping one who will teach me foremost ¹ how we may adore Thee, Thou the well to be invoked ² as in Thy deeds, the holy³, bountiful Ahura? What (words) the Kine's creator ⁴ spake for Thee by aid of, and to aid, the Righteous ritual Order, these words of Thine, (Thy people coming) with Thy Good Mind, are seeking ⁵ now (to gain and learn from) me ⁶, O Mazda Lord!

sense, falls into confusion. The ancient scholars, like some of their successors, could not always believe that pâ could mean 'to hold back from good' as well as from evil. They recognised it sometimes, giving us our instruction on the subject, but not here.

¹ Did the composer appeal to some powerful coadjutor here, or does he rhetorically express his perplexity?

² Zevîstîm must equal forms of hû; but from the constant evidence of the Pahlavi to the meaning 'endearing,' one is much inclined to suggest a reading as if from zush.

³ Ashavanem is applied to Ahura, and cannot so well mean 'righteous' here. 'Holy' is the more proper term in this connection, while spentem is necessarily excluded from that meaning by its occurrence with ashavanem in immediate connection.

⁴ Notice that the word tashâ occurs here with no mention of wounding in the connection (see note 6 on page 6).

⁵ I am here recalled to the Pahlavi by some who rarely name it. I had rendered, 'these words are inciting me (in duty) through Thy Good Mind;' so ish often in the Veda. The Pahlavi translator, like his successors, scandalised at the difficult forms, also anticipated his successors (as elsewhere often) in getting free from the difficulty. He did what is exactly equivalent to what is now practised by scholars (sometimes too often). He rendered the text as if changed from what he could not understand to what he could understand, adhering to the right roots however, which I now follow. He knew that ishentî mâ did not mean, 'I am seeking,' but he could not credit the words before him.

⁶ We have now a suggestion which must often have presented itself to those who read the Rig-veda constantly, and that is (so

10. Whoever, man or woman, shall give to me those (gifts) of life which Thou hast known¹ as best, O Mazda! and as a holy blessing through (Thy) Righteous Order, a throne (established) with (Thy) Good Mind, (with these I shall go forth; yea, those) whom I shall (accompany and so) incite², to the homage of such as You³ (on earth), forth to the Judge's Bridge (itself) with all of them shall I lead on⁴ (at last).

11. (And they and I have every need for help, for now) the Karpan and the Kavi will join in governments⁵ to slay the life of man with evil deeds, they whom their own souls and their own conscience will betray⁶. And when they approach there where the Judge's Bridge (extends, unlike the believing ones of God, who go so firmly forth with me as guide and helper, these shall miss their path and fall⁷), and Bartholomae) that mâ may equal smâ here and often elsewhere. It is well possible, as the 's' often disappears.

¹ Notice once more the expression, 'Thou hast known;' so in Y. XXVIII, 11, the composer confides the very direction of his petitions to the discrimination of the Deity. We gain from this the true sense of peresâ nau yâ tôi zhmâ parstâ; Ahura's question and prayer are mighty when repeated by us, because He has known what is best, and what are the true dâtheng for which we should ask.

² This sense corresponds admirably with the connection; Ner. uthâpayâmi.

³ Such as you = you as in the plural of majesty, or as referring to Ahura and His Bountiful Immortals (so often).

⁴ 'Go forth.'

⁵ Or, 'with kings;' but the Pahlavi has, avô khudâyih ayûgênd mûn Kik va Karapô.

⁶ So the Pahlavi indicates. Otherwise 'will harden,' or, if khrao-dat is read, 'will rage (against).'

⁷ Inserted to shed light on the last line; so the later Parsism.

in the Lie's abode for ever shall their habitation¹ be.

12. (But for the penitent there is yet hope ; for all our former foes shall not thus fall, as from the K'invat Bridge to woe, for) when from among the tribes and kith of the Turanian, even among the more powerful ones of the Fryâna, those shall arise² who further on the settlements of Piety with energy and zeal, with these shall Ahura dwell together through His Good Mind (in them), and to them for joyful grace deliver His commands³.

13. Yea, he who will propitiate Zarathustra Spitâma⁴ with gifts midst men, this man is fitted for the proclamation, and to him Ahura Mazda will give the (prospered) life. And he will likewise cause the settlements to thrive in mental goodness. We think⁵ him, therefore, Your good companion to (further and maintain) Your Righteousness (and meet for Your approach).

¹ I am again brought back to the Pahlavi, having formerly rendered 'bodies,' which I would now put in the second place.

² The Pahlavi, although as usual free or erroneous as to forms, gives us the valuable hint of hengî-ait for uzgen (sic=gayen).

³ Here we have the clear evidence of the conversion of a border tribe. The Zarathustrians had saved some Turanian clan from plunder or annihilation, and so secured their friendship. These became known as the 'friendly people.' That true Zarathustrian piety may have arisen among them is of course possible.

⁴ It need hardly be said that this reference to Z. in the third person, does not prove that the composer was not Z. himself. One might even say that his authorship was even not less probable on this account.

⁵ Let it be noted that the Pahlavi translator gives us our first critical knowledge as to the true writing and meaning of mehmaidî ; or will scholars object that he renders in the singular? Valman pavan zak î Lekûm Aharâyîh hamîshak minâm khûp hamkhâk ; Ner. dhyâyâmi suddha-sakhâyam.

(A voice from among the Chiefs.)

14. (But where is such an one ?) Whom hast thou Zarathustra¹ ! thus a holy friend for the great (effort of the) cause ? Who is it who thus desires to speak it forth ? (Zarathustra answers. Aye, such an one I have.) It is our Kavi Vistâspa², the heroic ; (and not he alone, but all) whom thou shalt (as in Thy prophet) meet³ in the assembly, O Ahura Mazda ! these likewise will I call (to my attempt), and with Thy Good Mind's words.

15. O ye Haêkat-aspas, Spitâmas ! to you will I now address my words, since ye discern the things unlawful, and the lawful, for these your actions to establish⁴ (firmly on its base) for you the Righteous Order through those which are the Lord's primeval laws.

16. (And to the Hvôgvas would I likewise speak.) Thou Frashaostra Hvôgva (whom I see)⁵; go thou

¹ Shall we regard this verse as misplaced because the subject is in the second person ? It is probable (as of very many verses) that it was often recited by the composer, or others, in a different connection, and perhaps originally so ; but it was a happy thought for the effect to introduce it here. Let it be supposed that this and the previous verse were arranged to be spoken by another voice during the public recital. We see that the interest is much increased by the intruding strophe.

² This passage may be regarded as recording the call of Vistâspa to the holy work. Zu=hû need not always express the invocation of the gods.

³ Others, 'unite.'

⁴ Or, 'ye take to you the righteous character to yourselves,' as the infinitive is difficult ; but in that case Khshmaibyâ becomes awkward. The translation of dâ as 'take' has long been familiar.

⁵ Obviously composed for an occasion when the several parties would be present.

(forth) with the generous helpers¹, with those whom we are praying for as for salvation to the land. Go thou where Piety joins hand in hand with the Righteous Order, where are the wished-for Realms of Good Mind, where Mazda in His most honoured² home abides,

17. Where in your measured verse³ I will declare aloud (the praises), not in unmeasured lines, Gâmâspa Hvôgva! but songs of homage (will I weave) with ever gained Obedience in offering. (And unto Mazda) will I chant them, yea, to Him who will discern aright what things are lawful (or) unlawful⁴ (which I thus do, or utter), and with His wonder-working thoughts⁵ of Righteousness (attend).

18. (For) whosoever (offers) sanctity⁶ to me, to him shall be the best gifts whatsoever. Yea, of my

¹ Ar(e)dra seems to be especially applied, and might be left un-rendered.

² I see no impossibility whatever in such a rendering, literally in 'his choice-abode'; so also the Pahlavi indicates: tamman afgh Aôharmazd pavan kâmak dên demânô ketrônêd. The question is of 'going' and 'dwelling,' and the meaning 'abode' is quite in point. As to var, see îstâ khshathrâ; and compare mazdâvarâ. Aside from this, vardmām=in blessing.

³ The Pahlavi again, with its followers, gives us our first hint at the general meaning here. What else can his padmân and apadmânîk mean, but the regularity, that is, the rhythm and cadence of the words?

⁴ Dâthemkâ adâthemkâ would be 'the truth and the heresy' in general.

⁵ If mantû is taken as an instrumental, (can it be an act. imper.?) vistâ might occupy the place of a preterit, but it looks far more like a participle, and might be regarded as forming a compositum with vahmeng. Supply the dat. (?) pers. pron. understood before ya.

⁶ The alteration to yaur, considered as an aorist, has long circulated, but seems now, like so many of the bolder conceptions, to be given up. Yaos is the sister word of the Vedic yós, and shows us that some shade of sanctity may inhere in that word. The Pahlavi renders more indefinitely by 'yân' = a helpful blessing.

(spirit's) wealth will I bestow on him through Thy Good Mind (which I give), but oppressions will I send on him who as oppressor will deliver us to anguish, O Mazda! desiring, as I do, to satisfy Your choice by righteous (vengeance). This is the decision of mine understanding and my will.

19. (Yea, this I earnestly announce.) He who from Righteousness (in mind and life) shall verily perform for me, for Zarathustra, that which is thus most helpful (for my cause) according to my earnest wish (and through my words of urgent zeal) on him shall they bestow reward(s) beyond this earth, with all the mental¹ blessings gained through the sacred mother-kine². And these things (all) did'st Thou (Thyself) command to me, O Mazda, Thou most wise³!

¹ The Pahlavi translator, however, saw menâ, rendering avô li. His text may well have justified him.

² Bearing; or is it 'fit to drive?'

³ The Pahlavi here reports another text.

(SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES. Askî, in verse 18, may equal 'verily indeed.' Vahistâ, &c. = 'the best things of my wealth will I assign to him through the Good Mind.' The meaning 'wealth' seems much called for here, and if here, then in verse 2. Vasnâ in verse 19 may mean 'through grace'.)

THE GĀTHA(Ā) SPENTĀ MAINYŪ (SPENTĀMAINYU(Ū)).

This Gātha, consisting of Yasna XLVII-L, takes its name from its commencing words. Like the other Gāthas it owes its existence as a collection to the nature of its metre, as its matter is homogeneous with that of the others. Its metre may be said to be Trishŭp, as its lines have each eleven syllables, and are arranged in stanzas of four.

A general view precedes each chapter. The grouping of hymns in this Gātha has, as usual, little or nothing to do with the question of their relative age.

YASNA XLVII.

THE BOUNTIFULNESS OF AHURA.

As in every instance, we may have here only the fragments of a more extended piece; but also, as ever, the circumstance does not diminish the value of what remains. Although some signs of authorship apart from Zarathustra are present, the later verses are not at all remote, so far as the period of time which they indicate is concerned, from the Zarathustrian verses, and are therefore of nearly equal interest, possessing the advantage moreover of affording data for estimating the progress of change.

1. The Spentā mainyū here is not identical with Ahura, but is, as so often, His spirit. It is more than possible that the memorable application of the word spenta to the seven, giving us the Ameshōspends, the Amshasponds of literature, derives its origin from the first verse here before us, or from lost verses of a similar character. All the seven seem purposely and artificially grouped here, although 'His Spirit' is of course not one of them. The commencing word spenta further attracted attention in so far as to form the theme for a sort of play upon words in the later epilogue of Visparad XIX. By means of this His indwelling Spirit (which idea, or expression, has probably no direct connection with the 'Holy Spirit' of the Old and New Testaments, but which, as giving the designation 'spirit' to the Ameshōspends, may well have been the original of the 'seven spirits which are before the throne of God'), by means of this blessed spirit, that is, in accordance with his inmost thoughts, Ahura bestows a gift upon the ideal saint (verses 4, 5), upon him who works the best results for Zarathustra (Y. XLVI, 19), the Ratu, and the prophet (Y. XXIX, 6, 8). And this gift is declared to be the inseparable two, Happiness in every particular, and then both the prospect and realisation of the continuance of that Happiness in Immortality. And these He bestows, not through His immediate action, which no human intellect, or susceptibility, could take in unaided, but by His especially revealed Benevolence, His Best Mind, as His representative, in accordance with His plan of Order and Purity, pervading every moral as well as every spiritual regulation, and by the exercise of His Royal Power, sent forth as the 'archangel' Khshathra, and embodied in the polity of the sacred Zarathustrian state, and this as influenced in all its relations, public and domestic, by practical piety called Âramaiti, Ahura's daughter (the ready mind). Such a revelation of the component parts of the mind and will of the Deity, the simplest labouring class could understand for the moment, and for some decades; but all was, as a matter of course, soon to be overgrown with the old weeds of superstition and of myth.

2. Falling into detail and varying expressions, the composer prays that Ahura may carry out His holy scheme into action by the busy hands and fingers of domestic piety, and by the preached and recited words of the Good Mind from the mouth and tongue of faithful priests. So, and so only, would He become the Father of Asha, the divine Order, and of moral and ritual regularity among men.

3. From discourse concerning God, he arises, as so often, to an address to Him. That Spirit (referred to in the verses 1, 2) is Ahura's own, for He is the One who makes it bounteous; He is the bountiful One who has created the sacred symbolic Kine, the emblem and the substance of 'joy,' representing at once the possessions of the holy people, and those people themselves. And He it is who, in answer to her wail (Y. XXIX, 1, 9), has spread for her the meadows 'of Piety' as arranged in the consultations (Y. XXXIII, 6) made on her behalf.

4. And this 'Spirit,' as might be expected, does not confine its attention to the inspiration of Piety alone. The justice of Mazda is vindicated. The wicked are afflicted under its influence with a long wounding (Y. XXX, 11) for their sins, and for their cynical preference for prosperous men of bad and dishonest character as well as of heretical faith.

5. But he expresses his confidence that Ahura Mazda will, in the end, set all aright. He will, unlike the persons just mentioned, give unto the ashavan, not kasu alone, but paru, (not a meagre share, but fulness) of whatever is the best, while the dregvant and the aka (verse 4), the faithless and the wicked, although they may be isvanô, prosperous, will only taste the enjoyment of their wealth aside from God, and therefore marred. So long as they pursue their usual course, they live in actions inspired not by the bountiful spirit, but by the Evil Mind, a mind as aka as the person alluded to in the words paraos (kâthê) akô dregvaitê in the previous verse.

6. But, as ever, the moral appeals, and ascriptions of praise, lofty as they are, are not left without the support and service of the ritual. God will give these gifts, and all which are the best, but in connection with His Fire imparted to these struggling sides (Y. XXXI, 2), the believing and the faithless (verses 4, 5), through the increase of His Piety and Order; for that piety, as ever the instructress, will convert all those who come to her, and seek her light (Y. XXX, 1; Y. XLV, 1). Nay, she will cause all the living to choose and believe in God (Y. XXXI, 3).

(If the first two verses here are more like the work of a disciple, the last four show again the original tone. It must never be forgotten, however, that later and even interpolated portions are, in their sense, also original, and differ but slightly in their great age from pieces more directly from the first composer.)

Translation.

1. And to this¹ (man, His chosen saint), Ahura Mazda will give² both the two (greatest gifts, His)

¹ Or, 'to us;' but in that case it would be the Kine who 'took counsel' as mentioned in the third verse. This is, however, far from impossible, as she is mentioned as uttering her wail, and being answered by her maker in Y. XXIX, 1, 2. So understanding, 'to us' becomes an admirable rendering for verse 1; but in verse 3, it is strained, as the Kine for whom (Y. XXIX, 9) Zarathustra was appointed, could not so readily be declared to be the one which was given to 'us,' she representing 'us' in that place to a great extent. There is a certain plausibility about the rendering 'to us,' but I think ahmâi refers to ashaonê understood (see verses 4 and 5). The Pahlavi, moreover, is against a first person.

² Dān (Geldn.) seems to be a 3rd plural aorist subjunctive; the Universal Weal and Immortality, by means of His bountiful Spirit, and with His Best Mind, from (the desire to maintain His) Righteous moral Order in word and deed, and by the (strength and wisdom) of His Sovereign Power, (established) in Piety (among His folk).

2. Aye, (that blessedness, which is the) best¹ (creation) of this most bounteous spirit, Ahura Mazda will bring forth in action with words from the mouth and tongue of His Good Mind (within His seers), and by the two hands² of Âramaiti (His Piety as she lives within the soul). And by such³ wise (beneficence is) He the father of the righteous Order (within our worship and our lives).

3. And Thou art therein, O Ahura Mazda! the bountiful One who appertains to, and who possesses, that (most bounteous) spirit in that Thou art He who for this⁴ (man, in whom this spirit works) hath made the joy-creating Kine. (And as to her), for her, as plural being owing to the fact that Ahura gives with the other Ameshôspends. Dã might also be the relic of the proper word which represents the participle; comp. dās (sic).

¹ The idea of the summum bonum seems to have early developed itself, and from this constant use of this word in the neut. singular and plural, and also with anghu.

² Notice once more the pronounced personification of both Vohu Manah and Âramaiti; see Y. XXX, 8, and Y. XLIV, 14, &c. The Pahlavi translation notices the dual form pavan kolâ II yadman.

³ The Pahlavi seems to lead those who regard ôyâ as=a form of ava; it has zak î.

⁴ This is the ahmâi of the first verse, (but always possibly='to us,' if the verses are not to be brought into any kind of connection.) Otherwise it obviously refers to ashâunê* in 4 and 5; so the Pahlavi throughout. See ahmâi and hoi in LI, 6.

joyful meadows¹ of her peace, wilt Thou bestow (Thine) Âramaiti (who is our Piety as earth considered), since he² (for her) hath taken counsel with Thy Good Mind, Lord !

4. (But this Thy bounteous spirit doth not alone bestow rewards and blessings on the good.) The wicked (foemen of the Faith) are harmed, and from (the motives which move) that bounteous spirit (of Thine own), O Mazda³ ! but not thus the saints. (And yet the ruler's pride would ever slight the righteous.) The feeble man alone stands free to give in kindly obligation⁴ to Thy saint, but having wealth and ruling power, the evil (man) is (at the service) of the wicked, and for much⁵.

¹ Many would say that we have here an instance in which the identity of Âramaiti with the earth is recognised in the Gâthas. I would say, on the contrary, that here we have an instance in which a poetical conception gave rise to a later error or fantastical association. Piety, with frugal virtue, induced a thorough husbandry ; and secured the hushiti, peaceful home-life. She gave meadows to the Kine ; at the next step she poetically represents the meadows, and then the earth. If vâstrâi, it would be for 'nurture.'

² Or 'she,' as she once bewailed in a colloquy. Otherwise the person who was appointed to care for her interests is meant. Compare Y. XXXIII, 6, where the righteous Zaoatar speaks as desiring counsels (həmparstôis) in the interest of the pastures, and the laws of the sacred agriculture. Cp. also the later reproduction of the idea in an extended form in the Vendidad. The zaoatar of Y. XXXIII, 6, may have been the ashavan of verses 4 and 5.

³ Voc. with K₅ (Barth.).

⁴ The Pahlavi gives us, as usual, our first surmise as to the meaning of 'kâthê ;' I follow Geldner with regard to it as against Haug. The expressions here are not literal.

⁵ Isvâkîi connects only indirectly with kasəuski, as kâthê intervenes. I regard paraos akô dregvâitê as presenting the true antithesis to kasəuski/nâ ashâunê. The isvâ may have kîi merely from the influence of jingle, being at the head of the line like kasəus ; isvâ means

5. But Thou wilt give these gifts, and through Thy (most blessed and most) bounteous spirit, O Ahura Mazda! to this¹ Thy holy saint, for they are whatsoever is the best; but far² from Thy love the wicked has his portion, abiding in the actions of the Evil Mind.

6. Aye, these things wilt Thou give (to him), O Thou Ahura Mazda! and through Thy bounteous spirit, (and) by Thy Fire as in a good bestowal to of itself 'possessing means.' Paraos may depend on kâthê understood, as kasêus depends on it expressed. Moreover, hās in all the instances in which it is used ends the sense, and here is separated by the caesura from paraos, which, however, is of no great importance. The discourse is of the wicked; the holy are incidentally mentioned, and here their ill-treatment is signalised. Akô cannot well mean 'hostile' here; see also akâ/ in the following verse. Isvâkî/, if understood with nâ, alters nothing. 'A man was desirous of little for the service of the saint, but even when he himself was rich, (in the desire) of much was the evil for the evil.' Or, taking kasêuskî/ as governed by isvâkî/ understood with kâthê as before understood in the last line: 'Only a man (men) (possessed) of little was at the service of the righteous, while an evil man (men) possessed of much (was at the service) of the wicked.' The other translation is: 'Even a man of little means stands to the willing service of the saint, but a man even of large means is hostile (?) to the wicked.' This is very glib and so attractive, but I cannot accept it in view of the context. Gâthic expression is often unfortunately far from glib; but cramped, awkward, and apt to contain more thought than could be conveniently expressed within the counted number of syllables. The glib rendering needs other language than that in the MSS. See the following verse, which directly contrasts the treatment of the good and evil by Ahura Himself.

¹ See ahmâi in verse 1, and ashaunê in verse 4. Ahura treats the saint in a manner the reverse from that practised by the nâ kasêus* and akô, not giving sparingly to the good, nor much to the wicked.

² The Pahlavi gives us our first surmise here, as usual, by gavið min hanâ î lak dôshisnih.

the two striving¹ (throngs) through the prosperous increase of our Piety, and of the Righteous ritual and moral Truth; for that (Piety of ours instructing) doth teach² the many coming ones who seek her (face)!

YASNA XLVIII.

ANTICIPATED STRUGGLES AND PRAYERS FOR CHAMPIONS AND DEFENDERS.

This chapter divides itself quite naturally into sections. 1-4 belong together, then 5 and 6, 7 seems less closely connected; then follows 8-12.

1. A struggle is evidently at hand, whether the same as that to which allusion is more than once made, by incitation, as in Y. XXXI, 18; with anxious expectation, as in Y. XLIV, 15, 16; or as if in a sense of victory, as in Y. XLV, 1; or of defeat, as in Y. XLIX, is difficult, or rather impossible to determine. But with the verses 10, 11, 12 in view, together with the dispirited, Y. XLIX, 1, we shall say at once that, if this verse was intended to connect with them, an armed struggle had been expected, whether the decisive one or not, we need not say.

The saint, that is, the pious adherent to the Holy Order, whatever may be the result of the preliminary struggles, is encouraged by a view of the end. 2. But the burdened worshipper craves still further reassurance before the storms of battle came once more upon him. 3. For little as the assurances of Ahura are valued by the heretic, to the man who understands the true relations, what Ahura declares by means of His inspired prophets, the secret-announcers, this is, of all things, best; (he need not ask as elsewhere, Y. XXXI, 17). 4. And whoever would hope for spiritual growth and purity must turn his mind to that word of the Deity, and pursue its teachings faithfully, and so at last his fears will vanish, for his doubts will disappear. He will understand as the Lord has taught.

¹ Or, 'by the two aráni; ' but compare the āsayau in Y. XXXI, 2 just preceding ranôibyâ; so here the ashavan and dregvant are mentioned in a preceding verse. The Pahlavi is unvarying with patkardârânô. I will not positively decide as to this point; generally, however, the preferred rendering is in the text, while on very many questions there is nearly an even balance of probabilities.

² Or, 'chooses to herself; ' but a causative sense may be expressed by an intensive form; the Pahlavi also here bears evidence in the same sense to a causative by hēmnunêd, itself, however, meaning only the object caused; namely, the belief.

5. This verse seems a prayer to Âramaiti; when the long struggles shall have found their issues, and the one party or the other wins the day, let not that party be the evil alliance with its monarch. For, if the government is set up, and carried on with all the prescribed ceremonial and moral exactness of the wise Kisti; if men who toil for the sacred Kine, and with the virtue of those who cultivate her, hold the reins of power, and can so suppress the predatory raids on defenceless, as well as unoffending victims, then no gift of Ahura, since the tribes became a nation, could be looked upon as a greater, or as so great a blessing, as the correct Authority, and the Order of the Faith.

6. For that sacred Kine, as so often already implied or stated, was all in all to the pious worshipper. It was she, representing, as she did, all wealth in herds, who alone could sustain the home-life of happy industry. And this is the reason why Ahura had originally caused the herbage to grow for her support.

7. Urging the overthrow of the spirit of Rapine in accordance with the Kine's complaint, he exhorts the armed masses to energetic and offensive valour.

8. He then vehemently, although only rhetorically, asks how he may use the proper prayers to rally the needed coadjutors among the chiefs (Y. XLVI, 9) to carry on the struggle. 9. Again he utters a cry for relief in his suspense, and of entreaty for light as to the rewards, which did not concern this life for its own sake (verse 1) merely or chiefly; but which were spiritual blessings received here in preparation for the spiritual world.

10. 'When,' he repeats as one among similar questions four times repeated, 'when shall the ideal men appear whose thoughtful plans (Y. XLVI, 3) shall drive hence the polluted schemes of the false priests and of the tyrants (Y. XLVI, 1)?' 11. And when shall Âramaiti, the kindly piety of home, appear, she who, like the earth, spreads pastures for the peaceful kine, when shall she appear with holy Khshathra (later well called an angel, or archangel) the personified Authority of God over home and state, without which an anarchy as bad as that of the Evil Authority (verse 5) might continue or recur; and who was the champion-chief who would give them peace through blood (Y. XLVI, 4; LIII, 9)? In a word, to whom, as to the coadjutors of such a leader, would the light of reason, and the true faith come to inspire and to guide them? 12. There is but one only class of human combatants whom he would thus match against that Demon of furious Rapine (v. 6), toward whom the evil on their part at their first creation rushed as to their leader (Y. XXX, 6), and these are the saving Saoshyānts, the vicegerents of the Immortals upon earth, the religious princes Vistāspa, Gāmāspa, Frashaostra, and with them, as the greatest among all, he who was, with much probability, the speaker in the passage, that is, the Ratu appointed by Ahura for the kine and for men, Zarathustra Spitāma elsewhere and later called, with hyperbole, the first tiller, warrior, and priest.

Translation.

1. If through his action ¹ in the offering of gifts in accordance with the Righteous Order, (Thy saint ²) shall smite the Demon-of-the-Lie (the inspiring spirit of our foes), when that in very truth shall come ³, which has been (and is still yet) proclaimed as a deceit ⁴, (when it shall come) in the Immortal life, regarding (as it does both) men (to bless), and Daēvas ⁵ (to afflict them), then shall (Thy faithful worshipper) increase thereby the celebration of Thy praise, O Lord! and with it blessings ⁶ (for Thy folk).

2. Tell me then, Lord! (the end), for Thou dost

¹ The Pahlavi has also pavan zak dahisnō; but a false gloss gives an erroneous concrete [pavan tanū ī pasinō]. Recall âdâi paitî.

² See ashaônō, ashâunê (sic) (Y. XLVII, 4, 5).

³ Read 'as âshûtâ' = has been pushed on, enacted. I correct here as seems so evidently necessary; but the Pahlavi anticipates with its amat zak yâmtûnê.

⁴ Pavan friftârih.

⁵ See Y. XXIX, 4.

⁶ See Y. XXX, 11, savaṭâ ashavabyô.

know it. (Tell me to grant me strength and courage) before those conflicts come which shall encounter me ¹ (as leader of Thy tribes); shall the champion of Thy holy Order, O Ahura! smite (at last) the evil heretic, and when? (I ask Thee this); for this if it be gained (is known) to be the (one) good consummation ² of (our) life.

3. (Yea, tell me then this), for to the enlightened ³ man is that the best of teachings which the beneficent Ahura doth proclaim, and through (the revelations of) His holy Order, bounteous as he and wise with His intelligence, as well as they ⁴ who declare to us (still other) secret sayings (in His name). The one like Thee (their chieftain ⁵) is, O Mazda! endowed with Thy Good Mind's understanding thoughts.

¹ Meng=mām or man; -eng is the nasalised vowel. Man is suspiciously significant here; 'mental battles' is rather advanced for the circumstances. It is, however, not impossible. The Pahlavi favours mām(?) here; it has avō li. We might even read menā on its evidence. The Pahlavi indicates the meaning 'crises' under the figure of the 'Bridge,' which was the last great crisis to every man in the eye of the earlier, as well as of the later, Faith; so also in Y. LI, 12. The 'straits of life' would be an admirable meaning; I differ with hesitation.

² Pahlavi karḍārīh.

³ See Y. XLIII, 14.

⁴ Yaêkī/ gūzrā-senghaunghô. Or, 'knowing also those who are the teachers of secret doctrines.'

⁵ We may, with some effort, connect thwāvās with vaêdemnāi. Spentō vīdvau, however, must refer to the immediately foregoing Ahurō, especially in view of the tvem vīdvau, Ahurā, of verse 2. 'The one like Thee' might even, as in other cases, be only an oblique way of rendering 'Thyself;' but the expression 'with the understanding of Vohu Manah' induces me to refer the word Thwāvās to the servant of Ahura; in this case, however, this last line must of course be drawn to verse 4, although not mechanically separated from verse 3.

4. (Yea, tell me the secret of the future struggle¹; for that enlightened man) must² follow close³ the holy Faith (for which that struggle had its toil and effort). Yea, O Mazda! he who would bend his mind (till it attains to) that which is the better and more holy, must pursue the Daëna close in word and action. His will and wish must be consistent with his chosen creed and fealty, and in Thine Understanding (which discerneth all) shall he in many ways⁴ be (versed) at last!

5.

5. (But while I as yet know not the issue, I can yet hope and pray.) Let the good kings obtain the rule. Let not the evil monarchs govern us⁵, (but let the righteous gain the day and rule us), with deeds done in a good discernment, O thou pious wisdom, Âramaiti! sanctifying to men's minds the best of blessings for (their) offspring⁷. Yea, for the Kine, (O Âramaiti⁶!)

¹ See verse 2.

² Present for imperative, as sometimes in modern languages in giving directions.

³ The words are anticipated from the third line.

⁴ I follow the Indian sense here with great reluctance. Nanâ may well be, in Iranian, equivalent to 'each several one,' and in fact may not impossibly teach us the origin of the word ('man, man: comp. nareṃ, * nareṃ*). The Pahl. trlr. is so decided for a personal sense, that he renders gabrâ nêrman=man and woman. Did he suppose 'woman' to be literally (!) expressed in the text?

⁵ Âramaiti is addressed, unless indeed an instrumental is read without MSS. An instrumental is of course preferable.

⁶ The Pahlavi has, with admirable freedom, zakatō hû-khûzâi pâdakhshâyinîm, va al lanman zak î dûs-khûzâi salitâ yehavûnâdō. I read hukhshathrâ khshayentām, mâ ne dûs-khshathrâ, to bring the metre somewhat into order, as some gross irregularity is present; the caesura only, not the sense, is affected by the change.

⁷ Or, 'from the birth-hour on; so the Pahlavi. Its gloss reads [akhar min zerkhûnisnō avinâsîh pâhlûm].

let (Thy) toil be given ¹, and may'st Thou cause her to prosper for our life.

6. For she will grant us pleasing homes², and, (while we live) in this Thy Good Mind's longing³ prayer (to gain her welfare), she grants us likewise lasting strength (for every deed which that Thy Good Mind moves us to perform), and therefore hath Mazda caused the plants⁴ to flourish for her (nurture), He, Ahura, in the generation of primeval life.

7. (Then in our coming strife⁵ let both her mortal foes be slain.) Let the Wrath-demon of rapine be cast down. Smite ye against the envy (which would plot against our Throne⁶), O ye who, abiding by the Good Mind, and in accordance with our holy Order, desire to hold that refuge⁷ fast, to whose sacred bond the bounteous man belongs. And therefore,

¹ So Bartholomae, who now holds to a third singular here, leaving the text undisturbed, and explaining as an optative.

² The Pahlavi seems to render 'comfort' here, using khvârîh in that sense.

³ So the Pahlavi correctly indicates by its arzûk; Ner. priyataram.

⁴ Compare Y. LI, 7. Are the plants here mentioned as in connection with Âramaiti in her figurative association with the earth?

⁵ See verses 1, 2.

⁶ Or, 'against the blow,' Y. XXIX, 1. The Pahlavi translator here renders padîrak † arêshak, while in Y. XXIX, 1 he renders † rêshkûn. The variations are probably not real; the renderings referring to some forgotten differences of text; or, as often, he may have anticipated modern freedom, and 'changed his text;' that is, rendered it as if changed to a seemingly more intelligible form; so in a throng of similar cases. This is the only rational explanation of some of his errors. (He was able to render, and has rendered, most grammatical forms in different places.)

⁷ The Pahlavi has, however, navîdîh. Did he read vidhyām, in itself a very possible text?

O Ahura ! (to save Thy struggling saint who toils with changing lot) will I place (that refuge) for him in Thy world.

8. (And how shall I beseech Thee for this victory and gift ?) What is the (potent ¹) prayer to bring on that Thy holy Reign ²? What for Thy sacred reward and blessing for my (soul) ? How shall I seek the open helpers for (the spread and maintenance of) Thy (great) Order ³, while I myself live ⁴ on in Thy Good Spirit's deeds ?

9. (Aye, when shall faith be changed to sight ⁵); and when shall I in verity discern if Ye indeed have power over aught, O Lord ! and through Thy Righteous Order (guarding here on earth), O Thou within whose (power lie) my griefs ⁶ and doubts? Let then Thy saving prophet find and gain aright (for) my delight ⁷ Thy Good Mind's wonder-

¹ Compare emavantem aêshem, also peresâ nau yâ tôi zhmâ parstâ. Observe that the Pahlavi translator distinguishes the two senses of îsti. In Y. XLVI, 2 he transcribes the Gâthic word, the Persian rendering hezânah; Ner. puṇyalakshmîm; here, however, he has: Kaḏâr lak, Aûharmazd, zak î sapîr khvahîsn î khûdâiyh.

² Compare verse 5.

³ Ashâ might certainly equal âkâ here (so Bartholomae) if the constant and intentional repetition of the name and idea of Asha, = the personified Order, would not have caused confusion.

⁴ The Pahlavi translator renders a word which occupied the place of gavarô by yakhsenunîdârîh; Ner. following as to root (freely as to form). As he, however, renders related forms elsewhere by 'living,' 'live,' our only safe conclusion is that he had a different word from gavarô (givarô) before him in his MS.

⁵ Compare Y. XXVIII, 6.

⁶ I am very far from certain that we do not seriously blunder in not following the indication of the Pahlavi here. See remarks Y. XXXII, 16.

⁷ Or, 'let me enjoy as my own;' but môi is difficult. Ûām might otherwise be a first personal form in the sense of the Vedic uā.

working grace¹; yea, let Thy Saoshyant see how gifts of recompense may be his own.

10. When, Mazda! shall the men of mind's perfection come²? And when shall they drive³ from hence, the soil of this (polluted) drunken joy⁴, whereby the Karpans with (their) angry zeal would crush us⁵, and by whose inspiration the tyrants of the provinces (hold on) their evil rule⁶?

11. Yea, when shall our perfected Piety appear

Bartholomae's third sing. imper. is also of course well possible; but were not the originally abnormal third singulars in -âm, duhâm sayâm, vidâm, taken over from third pl. subj. '-âm' really equalling the nasal vowel merely*? Comp. also Indian ádr̥śram, ábudhram, ásr̥igram, Zend vavazirem, -am=an. 'Tradition' has, Pahl. zivisn̥h; Ner. g̥ivitam; Pers. zīstan, for ūkām, as if rendering 'enjoyment,' 'experience of life.' * (âm=tâm is more difficult.)

¹ Comparing vápus; otherwise, with the Pahlavi, 'knowing the destruction (of the evil) which Vohūman works;' see Y. XXIX, 6, where the rendering of the Pahlavi is supported by the previous verse.

² Comp. Y. XLVI, 3. Kadâ Mazdâ fr̥arentê*—saoshyantâm khratavô?

³ Compare Y. XXXII, 15.

⁴ Is Soma-intoxication here referred to? And was the Haoma-worship in abeyance at the time? The Pahlavi seems to have understood 'magic' here, and in the evil sense, that is, judging from the perhaps later gloss. Aside from the gloss, however, the Pahlavi may well have been, nay, more probably was, intended to be read madih as=madahyâ.

⁵ As to this word, we cannot do better than follow Justi (although his work is now a score of years old). The Indian vârpas, in the sense of deceit, has also been compared. The last Pahlavi translator was probably confused by finding this word, as so often, divided in his MS. He rendered as best he could, or rather he handed down the shattered documents, or oral teachings, of his predecessors with his own too often lame additions, the whole mass being rich in the relics of the truth.

⁶ See verse 5.

together with ¹ Thy Righteousness. When shall she come, as having the amenities of home for us, and provided (like our land) with pastures ² (for the kine)? And who shall give us quiet ³ from the cruel (men) of evil life and faith? To whom shall Thy Good Mind's sacred wisdom come (to guide them in their toil to rescue and avenge us)?

12. (To whom? The answer lieth near.) Such shall be the Saviours of the Provinces, and they who, through Thy Good Mind's grace, shall go on hand in hand with mental keenness ⁴ (as it spreads among Thy saints) by the doing every deed of Thy commandment, O Ahura! through the help of, and in accordance with, Thy Holy Order; for such as these are set (for us), as steadfast foes of hate!

YASNA XLIX.

REVERSES AND HOPES. HONOUR TO FRASHAOSTRA AND OTHER CHIEFS.

The chapter divides itself naturally into sections 1-5, 6-11. Verse 12 belongs with chapter L. One of the struggles in the holy cause seems to have gone against the party of Asha. I say 'one ¹ Ma/ following Ashâ shows that we may also have the preposition in pôi ma/.

² As Âramaiti is here spoken of as 'having pasture,' that is, as inspiring the thrifty husbandmen who cultivate the meadows by irrigation, or drainage, she became associated herself with those meadows, and so later with the earth; see Y. XLVII, 2.

³ The Pahlavi sees in râmâm enforced quiet not 'from' but 'to' the wicked; 'who shall deal the finishing blow to the wicked?'

⁴ So also the Pahlavi, shnâsinîdârîh.

of the struggles,' for from the account of a reverse which we have here, and from that of a success which meets us in chapter XLV, 1, and again from reverses in XLVI, 1, 2, &c., we naturally conclude that 'the cause' saw many vicissitudes, in which the last Gātha still leaves us. Whether Y. XLV, 1 records a victory which was subsequent to the reverse before us, referring to a battle alluded to in Y. XLIV, 14, 15, also possibly anticipated in Y. XXXI, can never be decided; the order of the statements in the sequence of our present MSS. has little or nothing to do with the possible order of the events.

1. A border chief, Bendva by name, had proved himself too formidable (mazistō) for the moment, and the holy Faith knows how to beg for vengeance on the armed Drūg-worshipper. The weapons of Ahura were not spiritual only, any more than those of Israel were, or those of Mohammed. The death of an armed religious enemy was devoutly to be desired for every moral and political, as well as for every personal reason. 2. For judicial as well as priestly decisions hung on the issue. And this Bendva had his functionaries and a system, and they were in full and active operation. And this was, beyond a doubt, a rival and settled system, and not merely an upstart and insurrectionary one. It had caused the true prophet many an hour of thought as well as anger. Its functionaries gave him pause (mānayēiti). Falsity in religion was as ever his opportunity; and invective follows. 'The priestly judge himself who served the Drūg-worshippers was a cheat.' 'The holy Order was his foe, and not his helper.' And he did not contribute at all to the spread of Piety as the Zarathustrians conceived of it, nor indeed really in another sense for the reason that he even repudiated the source of pious wisdom, which is holy counsel. 3. But, however, the evil functionaries might resort to subterfuge and strategy, the opposing powers themselves, the Righteous Order on the one side, and the power of the Lie-demon on the other, were planted in the opposing systems with dualistic clearness, to benefit or injure. There was no compromise, as doubtless the Drūg-party may have wished.

And so the poet cries once more for the divine Benevolence to be his guardian; or perhaps he may have intended a particular chief who represented the Good Mind, while at the same time he swept the entire throng and company who adhered to the Lie-demon, with his interdict, away from his consideration. 4. He declares them closely allied to the Daēva-worshippers, or else he puts their worship of the Daēvas in the place of climax as their highest offence, not failing to point out what should conciliate sympathy with him always ; that is, that those who brought the Daêvas, and opposed Asha, were the devotees of Rapine (aêshmem vareden); for murderous rapine seems to have been, apart from Asha, the universal sin. By this these Daêva-worshippers gained a stolen livelihood, and spent their ill-gotten means in idle waste (fshuyasû afshuyantô). 5. But he who defended the holy Daêna was as meat and drink to the people, wise and faithful, as a settled citizen, and trained in the habits of the holy State.

6. He therefore prays once more for right discernment as to how he may propagate the Faith. 7. And he calls on the steady citizen to listen, beseeching God Himself to give an ear, and to tell him who the faithful prince, or peer, or villager, may be, who may take the lead (see sarē) in giving forth (see srāvayaēmā) that holy Daêna, with its frasasti, to the masses who await it. 8. But he asks the question as if only to give emphasis to his naming a chief and venerated friend. Frashaostra is the man. He is the one fitted for the hearing, apt to proclaim the truth (frasrûidyâi erethwô). And he begs that they both (compare Y. XXVIII, 9) may be lastingly prominent in that holy Realm which was to counteract the depraved polity whose chief had for the moment gained the upper hand (verses 1, 2). 9. But the case is in so far uncertain and undecided, that he cries for help once more to the ideal citizen himself, fearing that he may yet be induced to share the power with the heretic, and still declares that men's souls may reach the reward of priority only through the holy System of Ahura, and under the rulers of His choice.

10. He therefore confides the result to Ahura, and with it, his dependents, those living and those dead. And his thoughts, being turned to heaven (11), they also revert as if by antithesis (the key-note of the Daêna) to future retribution. Those who may be wavering, half-inclined to adhere to the opposing party (verse 9), are warned in words of peculiar meaning. Those that choose the evil sovereign, a dussasti, as in Y. XXXII, 9, or as the sastars of Y. XLVI, 1, will not go forward with the saints to the Kinva (Y. XLVI, 10), nor will they be met by their consciences under pleasing images, and later by the souls of saints who had gone before, but the wicked dead shall meet them in the home of Lies, with poisoned food, and sneering words. And this shall be a self-inflicted vengeance.

Translation.

1. *Bendva*¹ has ever fought with me; (yea, since he first appeared at hand to threaten, and alas to his advantage in the strife). He is the most powerful (in brutal might), and (in his predominance) would crush my strength as I seek to win back the disaffected (in my host) through Righteous² (zeal), O Mazda! Come then with gifts of (vengeful³) good to (meet) my sorrow⁴. Through (Thine inspiring) Good Mind obtain (for me⁵) that (Bendva's) death⁶!

2. (Aye, he is indeed the greatest⁷), for that

¹ If this word does not simply mean 'a band,' one might suspect a relation of root with bānayan. The Pahlavi has expressively and freely badtūm here, and vīmarīh in the next verse, with a like word in Y. XXX, 6. This enemy may have been roughly dubbed 'the polluted,' or even 'diseased one;' analogous occurrences are not wanting.

² I cannot agree to rendering ashâ 'really,' when applied in an evil sense. The sacred word may mean 'really' when applied to the righteous, but then, in that case, the reality indicated has an element of sanctity in it, and that of no low order. I am also not aware that riténa is applied in an evil sense in the Rig-veda. The use of Asha, like that of Vohu Manah and Khshathra, &c., is obvious in the Gâtha; the six sacred words were, like the theme of a symphony, brought in at every opportunity, with all shades of meaning from those of proper names to those of adverbs. With slight change of text to a nom., we might render, 'He who seeks to please the evil-minded, O Thou A.!'

³ Comp. Y. XXXIII, 2.

⁴ I cannot agree that arapâ should be read rapâ for the sake of a syllable in the metre. The line has more than eleven syllables here, as the Vedic Trishūp often has. Moreover the ancient writing before the Pahlavi translator read likewise arapâ, and the sense demands it.

⁵ Or, 'may I obtain.'

⁶ See Y. LIII, 9.

⁷ See the first verse.

Bendva's evil judge doth cause me to hesitate and ponder (in my earnest course of propagation and reform), a deceiver as he is, (estranged) from the Righteous Order, and receiving¹ from it (not happiness) but many a wound. The bountiful and perfect Piety he has not maintained nor strengthened for this² land, nor questions with Thy Good Mind hath he asked³ (to gain him light), O Lord!

3. But (all is not yet lost!); for this religious choice⁴ (our holy creed, for which our last lost⁵ battle has been fought), O Mazda! Thy blessed Order (our guardian help) has yet been set to save and bless us. (But) for (that evil) Judge, the Demon-of-the-Lie, (is set) to deal (for him) her wounds⁶. Therefore do I pray (the more) for the sheltering leadership of Thy Good Mind (within our folk and our commanders). And all the allies of the wicked I abjure⁷.

4. They who with evil scheme and will shall cherish and help on the Wrath of Rapine, and with her Râma⁸, and (not by silent favour, but) with their

¹ I would gladly accede to a subjunctive 2nd singular intensive here in a causative sense, but a 3rd singular precedes, and a 3rd singular follows. I cannot therefore recognise a subjunctive in a precativ, or imperative, sense here. I think the word is a nominative, as its position in the verse corresponds well to that form. It may mean 'delivering against us many a wound.'

² Possibly 'for us in (this) land.'

³ Comp. Y. XLIV, 13.

⁴ Comp. Y. XXX, 2.

⁵ See mazistô in the first verse.

⁶ The Pahlavi mûn rêshînêd pavan Drûg.

⁷ The Pahlavi translator gave as our first rendering here: Andarg harvišp-gûnô darvandânô min hamkhâkih andarg yemale-lûnam; [aigh, min dôstih î levatman valmansân gavidâk yehevûnam].

⁸ The Pahlavi has arêshkô = envy.

very tongues, whose will and wish ¹ (run) not with good but evil deeds. These settle and support the Daêvas (in their power, not the Lord). It is ² the wicked's Faith and Insight (so to do. Their faith is the perverted).

5. But he, O Mazda! is our abundance and our fatness³, who (will yet dare these unbelieving foes) and guard the Faith (against that envious Wrath⁴), and with the Good Mind's power. For every man of Piety is a wise citizen⁵ in accordance with the holy Order, and so are all who are (in truth) within Thy Realm, O Lord!

6. And now, will I beseech of You, O Mazda, and Righteousness (within Thy Māthra) speaks⁶ (to tell me) what lies within Your will's intention, that (having discerned Your Insight as the enlightened

¹ The Pahlavi gave us our first surmise as to the general meaning of vās; it renders kāmāk.

² Or, 'by that which is the evil's Faith.'

³ The Pahlavi translator gave us our first general indication here as elsewhere; he has shîrînîh and karpîh. Reading 'Mazdau,' we have 'Mazda (is our source of) abundance and refreshment.'

⁴ See the fourth verse.

⁵ The Pahlavi has, however, khûp shinâsakîh. I differ with hesitation; possibly views may be harmonised.

⁶ Compare Y. XXIX, 3, where Asha answers. I cannot well accept mrûitê as an infinitive. Geldner has keenly pointed out that fraêshyâ is inclined to unite with an infinitive, but so are other forms of ish and vas. Moreover the infinitive does not so naturally fall to the end of the sentence in Gāthic or Vedic. (See above, note on Y. XXXIV, 1.) If an infinitive is insisted upon (so long since) let us at least bring the word into more usual shape, using the Pahlavi translator, as in one of his most valuable offices, as an indirect evidence, where his translation is at fault as a rendering. He has: Frázō avō zak î Lekûm farmâyēm, Aûharmazd, va Ashavahistōkê râî yemalelûnam. He had 'mrûvê' before him, which might be an infinitive.

ever must), I may as well discern aright how we can herald forth those (truths), and that pure Daëna (with them) which is the Faith of Him who is Thyself¹, O Lord.

7. And (as we speak it forth as taught by Asha) then let the (zealous² citizen) give heed, and with Thy Good Mind, O Ahura Mazda! Yea, let him give ear in accordance with (the dictate of) the Holy Order, and do Thou hear alike as well³. Who shall be the ally; and who the kinsman-lord himself, who, with his gifts and (legal rules), shall institute and settle for the serving mass a worthy praise (for God⁴)?

8. (And I do not ask in vain, for such an one is found for us, and near at hand.) To Frashaostra hast Thou given that most favouring guardian power, the headship⁵ of the Holy Order (for us), O

¹ I think that khshmvâtô equals simply 'yourself' here, as often (so mavant=me); otherwise 'of your disciple,' which would be feeble. Professor Jolly has, V. S., s. 97, 'damit wir ihn verkündigen möchten den Glauben, welcher der eure ist, o Ahura.'

² See the ninth verse.

³ Ahura is elsewhere addressed in close connection with human beings; here the human subject is half lost in Vohûman and Asha. I hardly think that it is wise to change the text without MSS. A lost verse may have relieved all difficulty.

⁴ Others 'the good doctrine,' or again 'the good repute;' but as to the latter, frasasti is coupled so constantly in the later Avesta with yasna, and vahma, &c., that I do not feel at liberty to depart from that sense. The Pahlavi has also vâfrîgânih, quite in harmony with the connection.

⁵ This verse is clearly an answer to the questions contained in verse 7. It is a half answer, even if we render dau (dâo) as a subjunctive. As the question in verse 7 certainly concerns a chief of some kind, I cannot see how we can avoid rendering sarəm analogously. We need one who gives a refuge rather than one who receives it. Compare the Pahlavi, and also the Persian, sar. The Pahlavi

Ahura! This therefore would I pray of Thee (to confirm to him that gracious gift), and for myself likewise, would I now seek as well that sheltering headship which is within Thy Realm; yea, most blest and foremost¹ may we both for ever be within it.

9. Aye, let the zealous and thrifty husbandman, so formed for giving help and blessings², give heed and listen when I call, (O Mazda!) Let not the truthful (tiller, he who hears and speaks Thy word³), be he who takes⁴ that sheltering chieftainship together with the wicked. Let the believing natures (only) join in that best recompense. And thus in the course of the holy Order are in the fact so joined those two, Gāmâspa and the 'hero'⁵.

10. (And since these champions thus join in that reward), then therefore will I place as well in Thy translation gives its evidence without intermission for this meaning, a fact largely overlooked.

¹ I think that the connection fairly proves this meaning; and it has likewise the powerful support of the Pahlavi translation: Hamâi vad avō vîspō farmânpatō hōmanânî [aîgh, Frashostar [] vad tanû î pasîno hamâi salîtâih yehabûn].

² It is not to be forgotten that su is the root of Saoshyant.

³ Comp. Y. XXXI, 15.

⁴ Or 'gives;' compare peresâ avas yâ mainis ye dregvâitê khshathrem hunâitî. Professor Jolly, V. S., s. 36: 'Nicht soll wer das Rechte redet, die Herrschaft dem Lügner überlassen.'

⁵ Yâhî remains a singular, whereas we should expect a dual; (can it be such, the form being altered, as so often by later reciters, to accommodate the metre?) For Gāmâspâ and yukhtâ as duals compare utayûitî tevîshî. Yâhî probably refers to Vîstâspa (Y. XLVI, 14). Was it an especial epithet for the kings? The later Persian kings took prominent places in battle. If the duals are not admitted, my rendering would be, 'the souls are united with the reward through the (influence and example of the) valiant Gāmâspa.' Perhaps Gāmâspô is to be read.

protection (Thy) Good Mind¹ (in the living) and the spirits (of the dead. Yea, I confide our very) self-humbling praises, (which we offer, unto Thee), by which (Thine) Âramaiti (who is our Piety, exists), and likewise sacrificing zeal. And this would we do to further Thy great Sovereign Power (among Thy folk), and with undying² (?) strength.

11. (But as to faithless reprobates); the souls (of the evil dead) shall meet those evil men who serve their evil rulers, who speak with evil words, and harbour evil consciences, these souls (in Hell) shall come with evil food³ (to welcome them), and in the Lie's abode their dwelling⁴ verily shall be⁵!

YASNA XLIX, 12 — L.

The most striking circumstance here, after the rhetorical and moral-religious peculiarities have been observed, is the sixth verse; and as to the question of Zarathustrian authorship, it is the most striking in the Gâthas or the Avesta. In that verse we have Zarathustra, not named alone, which might easily be harmonised

¹ This is probably the foundation for the later identification of Vohû Manah and the faithful disciple.

² Here all is conjectural. The Pahlavi reports an adjective from a form of man (or a participle). They who think upon the throne (to seize it) do so with dying power. Wilder conjectures have been made; but the Pahlavi translators seldom wilfully guessed. They took the shattered results of their predecessors, and worked them feebly over; hence their great value, and the unimportance of their errors. They used what intelligence they possessed in re-delivering what they heard and read. Vazdanghâ cannot well be taken in an evil sense, as it is used in a good sense elsewhere. The connection mǎzâ with râ has long circulated; mǎzâ avêmî râ (?). As the souls of the departed are thought of, perhaps 'undying' is the meaning; compare avêmîra (for form) with the Zend avimithris.

³ See Yast XXII by Darmesteter, as supplemented.

⁴ So the Pahlavi; otherwise 'their bodies shall so lie.'

⁵ Verse 12 belongs to the next chapter.

with his personal authorship, nor have we only such expressions as 'to Zarathustra and to us' (Y. XXVIII, 7), but we have Zarathustra named as 'mahyâ râzeng sâhîr,' 'may he declare my regulations, which could only be said, without figure of speech, by some superior, if not by the prime mover himself. Were these verses then written by the prime mover? And was he other than Zarathustra? If so, the entire mass of the Gâthas was of course written by him, or else their style and character may be regarded as of such a character that they could have been composed by four or five closely connected individuals. But while verses here and there are doubtless the productions of secondary persons, the mass of the Gâthas cannot be regarded as the work of several different composers. They are one man's work, directly or indirectly. If then the present section, which is especially original in its tone, was not from Zarathustra, the man whose heart and soul, and, we may add, whose power were in Zarathustrianism, was not Zarathustra, but some unnamed individual far more important. (See note on Y. XXVIII, 7.) The prominence of the name of Zarathustra was in that case solely owing to the personal activity of Zarathustra supported by the social rank of the Spitâmas. Zarathustra was a princely disciple, on the hypothesis mentioned, and nothing more. The real author of Zarathustrianism was, in that case, in no sense Zarathustra; compare 'to Zarathustra and to us:' nor yet Vîstâspa; compare 'to Vîstâspa and to me:' nor Frashaostra; compare 'to Frashaostra and to us;' and, we may also say, not Gâmâspa, for he is addressed in the vocative. He was mentally and personally the superior of all of them. In fact he was the power behind both throne and home, and yet without a name! But, in that case, what becomes of Y. XXIX, 6, 8? Is it probable that the founder of a religion (or of a new departure in a religion) would describe another as the chosen of God, if he were not in fact supposed to be thus eminent? Or, if a popular and sincerely enthusiastic religious composer were about to chant a hymn at a meeting of the religious masses, would he be likely to name a person to the animated throngs, whom they themselves did not feel to be the life of their religious faith? especially, if that person were not prominent from the arbitrary circumstance that he was the reigning prince? I do not think that this is at all probable. But if Zarathustra had, as described, the leading name, and composed a portion of the hymns with their lost companions, is it probable that he possessed no decided prominence in this matter above Vîstâspa, Frashaostra, and Gâmâspa? Was there no central poet, who composed the mass of the metrical lore, dominating by his influence those who added portions here and there, or was there a quaternion of seers, four Zarathustras, as one might say? As we have said, the hymns decide it. One man's soul is in them, as a composer's feelings are in his compositions, or a master's feelings are in the lines of his disciples. But if there was one central figure instead of four, and he is mentioned as Zarathustra, and as the spokesman in many portions of the Gâthas, being likewise known by inference to be the composer of nearly all of them, how can we account for the words, 'let him, Zarathustra, teach or proclaim my regulations?' Can the verse be regarded as put into the mouth of Ahura, as elsewhere? Hardly, for Ahura is addressed in it. I can therefore only repeat of this verse, as of the others which present analogous questions in Y. XXVIII (with which this chapter L stands in the closest connection), that this thoroughly original piece was composed by Zarathustra as by far the most prominent individual in the religious struggle, dominating his party essentially and positively, and that these verses (6-11) were simply rhetorically put into the mouth of the monarch from the exigency of the style of composition. And I conclude that Vistâspa was supposed to speak them, because in the presence of Zarathustra, it is extremely improbable that any one but the titular head of the State should have been represented as saying of Zarathustra, 'mahyâ râzeng sâhî!'

1. The piece from Y. XLIX, 12 to Y. L, 1-5 joins well on with Y. XLIX, although the tone is brighter. As he begins with questions in Y. XLVIII, 8-11, after the prospective prayers of Y. XLVIII, 1-7, in which he looks forward to a crisis in the armed struggle, so now after the hostile chief has got the upper hand, he cries out once more with interrogatives, uttering the questions, not of curiosity, but of mournful devotion.

'The storm has broken over us,' so he would seem to say, 'and I have prayed for grace to know how we may administer (Y. XLIV, 9) the all-powerful means of help, the Daëna, in which Thy Righteous Order is set (Y. XLIX, 3). I have cried to Thee for chief and peer (verse 7), naming Frashaostra, Gâmâspa, and the Yâhin, and now, while I invoke you, praying for what in your selection is the best (Y. XXVIII, 11; Y. XLIV, 10), I would more than ever declare that I have none other help than Thee and Thy saving Order.'

2. And he asks once more to know how he who seeks to further the sacred herds, as the emblem of the moral thrift of the provinces, should proceed in his allotted work. 3. Answering his own question, he says that it is by advance upon the enemy; he declares that the heroic settler who pushes the holy system to the utmost verge of the sacred territory or still further, was the man 'to gain the Kine' for the seeking prophet. 4. But in the midst of struggles, he anticipates Garôdman with its praises. 5. For they were all prepared for both worship and work, since God had approached to aid His prophet, encouraging His discouraged spirit. 6. Here Vîstâspa is represented as intervening; and he addresses Ahura literally, but Zarathustra really, exhorting him indirectly to continue on in his work of propagation, undismayed by present circumstances. 7. And with Zarathustra, he would re-engage the other powerful helpers, whom he would yoke on as steeds to gain God's praise in Heaven by passing over every bridge of trial safely. 8. Having heard from Zarathustra his metric words, he will approach with them to pray, and, as in Y. XXVIII, 2, 3, 'with hands stretched out' with homage, and with vigour. 9. And he looks to attain the object of his prayers by religious self-control, and faithful action. 10. His efforts vie with the heavenly bodies in their praise of God. 11. Therefore he will persevere, and as a praiser-king (so the Pahlavi in one place); and he beseeches that Ahura, the life-giver, may help on the all-engrossing cause.

Translation.

Y. XLIX, 12¹. What aids of grace hast Thou for Thine invoking Zarathustra, (O Ahura Mazda!) to grant him through Thy Righteous Order? Yea, what (aids of² grace hast thou for me as) through Thy Good Mind given (within my soul), for me who will (still) pray to Thee with praises, O Great Creator! beseeching what in accordance with Your wished-for aim is best?

Y. L, 1. Aye, doth my soul indeed obtain assisting

¹ This verse is placed here as obviously more closely related to chapter L than to chapter XLIX. Lost verses may, however, have intervened between it and Y. L, 1.

² Another rendering, regarding ka as a purely interrogative participle, would be, 'Are they (tôî) helpful to the invoking Zarathustra?' But ka tôî is a familiar form; see Y. XXXIV, 12, where it must mean quid tibi.

grace, and which of Thy blessings is that gift to me, O Lord? What saving champion is found to save both flocks and herds? And who for myself other than Thy Righteous Order, and Thyself, Ahura? Tell me¹, O (ye) invoked ones! Or what of grace is there for me save Thy Best Mind (itself)?

2. (And if Thy guardian is verily to save our wealth) how shall he (obtain, and by what means shall he) seek after² that joy-creating Kine (who is the living symbol of our peace³)? (How shall that man obtain his wish) who shall desire to see her provided with pastures for (the welfare of) this land? (That only way is righteousness.) Do Thou then grant me lands (so would I ask of Thee) which live in justice in the many⁴ splendours of the sun, and lands which openly⁵ thus live, and which are to be ¹ I should be far from denying that azdâ may equal addhâ, but a strengthening adverb seems to me of no particular force here. I formerly rested at the simple explanation az + dâ = dhâ = desire-exciting, much desired one. But the Pahlavi translator affords an explanation which may surpass that of his successors. He sees the meaning: 'When I shall call upon You,' (that is, freely, 'being invoked,') 'cause Thou (sic) me to understand fully.' This is the remnant of some predecessor's work, who rendered 'tell ye me;' az = ah, otherwise lost in Zend. The plural follows the singular too often to excite much doubt; azdâ = tell ye; so zdf is from az, as syôdûm is from as (recall the well-known Indian analogies). See also the explanation of the Pahlavi at Y. XXXI, 17. If a plural cannot be admitted, then consider a form extended by d.

² The Pahlavi translates freely, bavîhûnam.

³ The Kine must represent the people as well as their live-stock. The raids concerned the owners more than their cattle. In answer to the cry of the Kine, Zarathustra was sent to the people.

⁴ I can hardly agree to the rendering 'among people who see the sun' without a needless reconstruction of the text. The Pahlavi likewise has pavan khvârîh; for general meaning, compare Khshathrôî hueng daresôî, not as equivalent however.

⁵ Âskârag stî.

sought and gained by me (as conquests for the cause).
Give Thou this gift!

3. (Yea, let that joy-creating one) be his possession through the Righteous Order (which he helps to bring, that living sign) which (the most valiant citizen) may give to him (at once reward and charge), and in accordance with Thy Sovereign Authority. (May that heroic settler grant him this gift) he who may make the (last imperilled) farm to flourish in the vigour of Thy blest prosperity, the tract which lies the nearest (to the fields) which our foeman holds as his¹.

4. (And therefore both in thankfulness and hope) will I give sacrifice to You with praises, O Ahura Mazda! together with Thine Order and Thy Best Mind (in Thy saints), and in accordance with Thy sacred Sovereign Power, by whose help the wisher (heaven-bound) may stand upon the (certain) pathway², and in Thine Home-of-song shall I (by means of these my Yasnas offered here) there hear the praises of Thine offering saints who see Thy face³.

5. And we⁴ are in readiness as well (to fulfil Your praises and declare your words), O Ahura Mazda! through Your (grace, and) in accordance with Your Holy Order, since Ye advance with friendliness⁵ to cheer the speaker of Your Māthra-word with open acts of visible relief, as if with hand sent forth,

¹ The Pahlavi translation, as usual, not literally exact, still furnishes the correct clue, Zak ī nazdistō (?) gēhānō min valman ī darvand bakhshēd [aīgar zak dēn dārisn barā yansegūnyēn].

² Frō tāis vispāis Kīnvatō frā peretūm.

³ Ākau (compare the Indian ākē); 'who approach, and are therefore evident (āshkarak) to God, and seeing Him.' Comp. ākau in Y. LI, 13, which has been thought a loc.

⁴ See nau.

⁵ To vrag.

whereby that Māthra-speaker of Your truth may bring us on, and settle us, in weal and bliss ¹.

6. (Therefore will I incite him to his task the more. Let him indeed proclaim the righteous way ²) he who already lifts his voice in Māthras, O Ahura Mazda! he, Zarathustra ³, the faithful friend in accordance with the Holy Order, and with self-abasing worship, giver of understanding for this land, voice-guider (of the way to glory ⁴), let him indeed proclaim and teach my regulations, and in accordance with Thy Good Mind (as his law).

7. (And together with that chief speaker of your word I would engage yet others in the cause). Your well-incited ⁵ and swift ⁶ (servants), O Ahura! would I yoke ⁷ on (as steeds to take their holy course toward heaven), gaining ⁷ thereby (at last) the Bridges ⁸ where

¹ See the previous verse, where the wisher stands on the path, seeking to reach Garōdman. It seems therefore probable that hvâthrê refers to demânê garô.

² Compare Y. LIII, 2, daunghô erezûs pathô.

³ As remarked, this entire piece recalls Y. XXVIII. Here the monarch is represented as speaking precisely as spokesmen are introduced in any other composition. We have no reason to suppose the piece to be the composition of some leading person other than Zarathustra, because of the words 'let Zarathustra speak forth my regulations.' (See page 169.)

⁴ Īshô staunghaŕ â paithî.

⁵ Consider a suffix ishfi.

⁶ Here the Pahlavi translator gives us both text and translation, aurvatô=arvand.

⁷ Or, 'yoke Thou, may'st Thou gain.'

⁸ The Kinvaŕ Bridge, either literally or figuratively. Compare 'the bridge of the earth' (Y. LI, 12). The crises of effort, or temptation, are meant, as the Kinvaŕ Bridge was the last crisis before salvation or perdition. The souls of the good and of the evil were met by their own consciences on the Bridge, and encouraged or reviled.

'When the soul of the pious passes over that Bridge, the width of Your adoration (rules and is complete). Yea, I (?) yoke on your mighty ones, and with Thy Holy Order, and Thy Good Mind. And with these may Ye drive on; aye, be Ye for my help!

8. (And as I yoke on Your Māthra-speakers for their course, then) would I (myself) approach You in the (highest) deed of worship¹, and with these sacred metric feet (of Zarathustra and his peers²), those which are heard and famed afar, as the metric feet of zealous worship, and with my hands stretched³ out (in supplicating prayer). Yea, You (would I approach), O Mazda! in union with Your sacred ritual Truth, and with the homage of a freely-giving helper⁴, and with the good virtue of (Your) Good Mind (in my soul).

9. Yea, with these Yasnas of Your sacrifice would I approach You, praising back to You (in answer to Your mercies), O Ahura! and Thou, O Righteousness! in (the holy) actions of Your Good Mind, (as he moves within us), so long indeed as I shall have the power, commanding at my will o'er this my sacred (privilege) and gift. (And doing as) the wise man (thus), may I (like him) become a suppliant who gains⁵ his ends.

10. (Mine every wish and prayer is this), then therefore whatsoever I shall do, and whatsoever deeds that Bridge becomes about one league' (West, Mainyô-î Khard,* p. 134). Possibly the extension of the Bridge for the pious arose from the plural use here.

¹ Compare Y. XXVIII, 3.

² See Y. XXVIII, 9.

³ See Y. XXVIII, 2.

⁴ See Y. XLVI, 9.

⁵ The Pahlavi translator accepts a sense of acquisition here as well as of desire: Aêtûnō zak î valman î avō hû-dânâk pavan khvahîsnō griftâr hōmanânî [mozd]. I accede to its indication, holding that gardh certainly has such an element in its meaning.

(of ritual and truth I shall yet further do) on account of, (and to make full¹) these (prior deeds of worship), yea, whatsoever (holy works) shine bright² as having worth in (all) men's eyes through Thy Good Mind (whose character they share; these as) the stars, suns, and the Aurora which brings on the light³ of days, are all, through their Righteous Order, (the speakers) of Thy⁴ praise, O Thou Great Giver, Lord!

11. Your praiser then (by eminence) would I be named, and (more), would be it, so long as by (Thine inspiring) Righteousness I am thus able and may have the power. And may the maker of the world give help through (His implanted) Good Mind (in my fellow-servants). And may that (all) be done⁵ (to further us) which through His veritable grace is most promotive (for the cause)!

¹ I can here only follow the words as they are written; the meaning is clear enough although rather advanced. Reconstructions on a large scale are seldom of value.

² Judging from the context, we may render argat thus.

³ The Pahlavi translator here renders as if he read ushâ. In Y. XLVI, 3 he translates ukhshânô. Professor Wilhelm, preferring as above, still recalls the Homeric usage favouring 'increaser.' The Pahlavi has vakhshînîdâr in Y. XLVI, 3. Here hôsh zak î arûs dên bâm I. Ner. alone understood arûs.

⁴ 'Your.'

⁵ An imperative has long been recognised in varstām; or read: 'Let him cause that which is the most furthering of deeds to grow influential through veritable grace.' So perhaps better.

THE GÂTHA(Â) VOHÛ KSHATHREM (VOHUKHSHATHRA(Â)).

This Gâtha consists of the single chapter Y. LI. It has lines of fourteen syllables with caesura in the middle.

YASNA LI.

INSTRUCTIONS AND APPEALS TO AN ASSEMBLY OF THE FAITHFUL.

It is hardly possible that we have here a continuous whole. The thoughts, however, harmonise well enough, and the changes give little trouble. 1. As so often the Sovereign Authority of Ahura, His reign over the hearts and in the minds of His faithful worshippers, is the leading theme. That sovereign Power, when it is established, will produce every good thing with it, and repress every evil, and the composer prays that he may never pause at any moment in his efforts to bring that kingdom on. 2. Accordingly, as the foremost of objects, he beseeches for both its blessings and its protection, and names Âramaiti as the especial representative of Ahura in this case to grant the Kingdom as a Realm established in spiritual wealth, and whose first effect should be the glory of God through the agency of holy dispositions in men.

3. The spirit of the Daêna is public and prophetic rather than occult and mysterious. The people therefore gather to hear Gâthas recited, and religious harangues delivered as on political occasions, and all the more because the Mâthras are declared to be the results of direct inspiration from Ahura. 4. The present recitations are invocations calling for the four energising Immortals, the guiding Order, the active Piety, the inspiring Benevolence, and the Power-wielding Kingdom, and, in using these names, the multitude are also beseeching, by the voice of their spokesman, for the Ratu, the Saoshyant cried for by the Kine, looked for by Asha himself, and promised by Ahura.

5. And the men who press this prayer are, each of them, for the moment (nûîr), as the Ratu himself. Wise in his homage, he seeks to gain the kine, like the ideal husbandman, both as property and as emblem, and he desires to establish the Ratu, understood as a person, or as the law, which may judge between the two sides (Y. XXXI, 2), and, by the expulsion of the evil, give quiet to the land (Y. XLVI, 4; Y. LIII, 9). 6. Declaring Ahura to be the awarder of the highest good and deepest evil, (7) he calls on Him to grant the 'eternal two,' the rewarding Immortals (not named in the former verse), but only by means of the inspired teachings. 8. And as these inculcations are effective for himself, he will declare forth their threats and promises to others, being repaid for his zealous fidelity in the very act. 9. Recalling the hopes of vengeance, he beseeches Ahura to give forth a sign, or instrument, from the holy Fire, which may settle the disputes by the forged blade of justice. 10. For he declares that the man who murderously assaults his adherents in the opposing interest (see Y. XXXII, 10, &c.) is inherently and originally perverted in his motives, a very son of the Lie, and of the seed of Akôman.

11. While in terms he addresses Ahura, he in reality challenges the devotion of the chieftains, as he calls aloud to the Deity.

12. Here a temptation of Zarathustra is narrated, as in the Vendîdâd, here dwelling on his youth, there on his maturer manhood. But the verse shows marked signs of later age.

13. And the soul of the righteous is encouraged by the recorded example; he shall come off the conqueror, as Zarathustra did.

14. But the Karpans (priestly chiefs?) of the opposing party, following the typical destroyer (as in Y. XXXII), would bring the world to ruin, and the creatures to Hell.

15. The true disciples will however infallibly receive the promised recompense.

16. And as for that Kîsti, conceived by Mazda to give the saving knowledge in the sacred verse, the King of the Realm had acquired it. It will be stored in the memory of faithful priests under his care and rule; and he will give his subjects a good worship (Y. XLIX, 7) in accordance with it. 17. A female saint, also illustrious in rank, is celebrated with honourable mention; she is, as it were, the Kîsti in her person, as she is named in this connection.

18. Another devoted friend arrests the speaker's eye, as he stands in the assembly; (19) and still another. 20. Then, as if taking in all with his view, and with an expression which shows his identification with the people, he declares that the 'Archangels' are of one mind with Mazda in bestowing spiritual blessings, the chief of which are inspired words, the source of their discipline, and the guide of their hopes.

21. And with assurances as to the greatness of the spiritual blessings implied in all that he has said, he prays Ahura all the more earnestly to grant them to His elect. 22. And he declares that Ahura knows and observes the man who fulfils every command that he has uttered, as well as believes every doctrine which he has divulged, and that, knowing Him, He also marks Him as the object of His grace. And he ends by expressing once more his desire to approach the Bountiful Immortals, not as naming them alone, but naming them, as we may well suppose, with a full appreciation of all that is meant by the sacred words which belong to them as names.

Translation.

1. The good Government (of Ahura¹) is to be chosen (among all wished-for things²) as that lot which most of all brings on (our happiness). Actions that oppress us it opposes³, through the holy Order (which pervades it), and with the pious zeal (of its true servants). Therefore, O Great Creator! let me

¹ It is far better to take Khshathra in its usual and often necessary sense. And it is especially desirable not to confound it with shôithra=kshétra.

² The choice one.

³ One is somewhat inclined to regard vidushemnâis as a monstrous form of vid, which has crept into the text under the influence of the two words vidushê in verse 8, and owing to an attempt to fill out the metre, the original word having been videm-nâis. The Pahlavi gives no indication except for a form of dû=to give. Leaving the MSS. intact, I compare dush+vi.

I render as above on the principle that the text in the MSS. should not be violated where it is possible to translate it at all. Reading videmnâis we might render, 'that kingdom's privileges are shared (it is entered and penetrated) by men who act (by actions) in a manner to further its security, (by actions gaining it).'

produce, and help bring on (that Sovereign Power) which is the best for us at every present hour.

2. And first I will ask for¹ these two blessings of Your own, O Thou Great Creator, and thou His Righteous Order! and I also ask of thee, Our Piety (personified, as well); and grant me this Your Sovereign Rule over our desired wealth (to give and to preserve it; and likewise) those spiritual blessings which are advantageous for our worship (of Ahura) through (the inspiration of His) Good Mind (within the soul).

3. (And it is not I alone who thus appeal to You; I speak for all) who are guarded in the (ceremonial and moral) actions of Your (law), and by those (inspired) words (which proceed) from the tongue of Thy Good Mind (as he speaks within Thy Māthra). Yea, these are all assembling (each) to hear You, of whom Thou, O Ahura Mazda! art the foremost guide² and light.

4. (And they cry aloud to Thee, O Mazda! I speaking with them, and in their name): Where is the (promised³) lord of our thrift (the embodied law, saving us from the most dreaded dangers that we fear⁴, the thrift-lord) of (our) ready zeal? Where

¹ I have rather reluctantly read yêkâ with long ê. Having in mind Y. XXX, 1, where Sp.'s B. reads yaêkâ, and reading yaêkâ here, we might regain the lost dual neuter of the pronoun here as in Y. XXX, 1, and so render, 'and which two things belong to thee, the possession (rule) of wealth and the blessings.'

Roth, cited by Geldner, changes to ashayaêkâ here and in Y. XXX, 1; and it is certainly striking that ashâ yêkâ should occur twice. I render as above, first, as nearer our MSS., and as affording a good sense.

² See Y. XXXI, 17.

³ See verse 5.

⁴ See Y. XXIX, 1; Y. XXXII.

does he stand to (show us) mercy? Whither are (Thy) Righteousness and the Bountiful Âramaiti (our Piety) approaching? From what direction comes Thy Best Mind (to inspire and to guide)? And whence (again), O Great Creator! Thy Sovereign Power (to be our ruler and defence¹)?

5. And it is the tiller of the earth who asks this of Thee, O Ahura! (Thy chosen saint himself); he has asked this all of Thee, striving to discover how he may gain to himself the sacred Kine (and with all wealth in herds beside. And he would seek this) moved by the motives which flow from Thy Righteous Order (and Thy cause), upright as he is in actions, and wise in his self-humbling worship (of that² One) who, as a righteous ruler, has appointed a just controlling guide for those whom He has made.

6. (And in partial answer to his question, and to solve his doubt, I now declare the truth): He who gives to this (good citizen) that which is better than the good³; yea, He who bestows on him in accordance with his religious choice is (our) Ahura Mazda (and not a false god of the Daêvas¹). And this will He bestow through His divine Authority (established in preparation here), while on the withholder of the sacrifice, who offers nothing to His (cause), He will send worse than the evil (and that not here alone, but) in the last turning of the creation in its course !

¹ It is hardly necessary to call attention to the fact that these abstracts are personified here, as in so many other places in the Gâthas. We may indeed doubt whether the idea of personification was ever wholly absent, the original meaning being likewise never lost. Professor Wilhelm prefers taking Ashem as an accusative, 'how does one (do they) come to Asha?' This is admirable; but I am, on the whole, inclined to regard Ashem as a nominative with fseratus, Âr(a)maitis, &c., taking the plurals yasô hyen (hyen) as irregularly extending to the other subjects.

² So Wilhelm (by letter), taking a form of the pronoun as understood. It is difficult to suppose that the vâstrya could be referred to as appointing the Ratu through the influence of his devotion and pious supplications; as Wilhelm justly says, the third line must apply to Ahura.

³ See Y. XLIII, 3; notice ahmâi as referring to hôi.

7. (And as Thou wilt bestow thus graciously on him), so grant me also, O Thou most bountiful Spirit Mazda, Thou who hast made both the Kine and the waters and the plants² (for her support) ! both Immortality and Welfare, those two eternal powers, and through Thy Good Mind in the doctrine (which is revealed through his inspired words³).

8. (Yea, grant me these two inseparable gifts, for having them in store) I will speak for Thee, O Mazda ! because to the man of understanding⁴ one should declare for Thee that which is woe to the wicked, but salvation to him who has maintained the holy Order (in Thy folk and in his soul). For he is (repaid in his deed, and) rejoiced by the Māthra who declares it to the wise.

9. (And when I shall speak, I will declare for You that mental) keenness (which reaches the decision), and which Thou hast bestowed upon the two striving sides⁵, (in Thy satisfying word). And this

¹ See Y. XXXI, 17 where the faith of the dregvant is sufficiently recognised to form the basis for a question, rhetorical indeed, but still a question.

² From this and similar occurrences of the 'water and the plants' beside 'Immortality and Welfare' probably arose the later peculiar identification of those names with water and plants.

³ Compare perhaps verse 20.

⁴ Otherwise ; 'I will speak for Thee, O Lord ! for the (all)-wise one should speak.'

⁵ Or, 'from the two arami;' see notes on Y. XXXI, 3 and Y. XLIII, 12.

I will announce by means of Thy flaming Fire; yea, I will declare it for the bestowal of that sword of justice which is forged from steel¹, and wrought for both the worlds². And for the wounding of the wicked (with its blade) may'st Thou³, O Ahura Mazda! bless and prosper Thine (avenging) saint⁴!

10. (Yea, let Thy believer wound the wicked to the quick), for he, who totally estranged from this (our holy rule⁵), O Mazda! seeks to destroy my life, is a son⁶ of the Lie's creation, and belongs to the miscreants; (but as for me), I call on Asha (Thy Righteous Order to be my help); and may he come with Thy good blessing.

11. (And ye who throng the great assembly⁷, it is of you I speak while, with my lips, I now address the Lord): Who, O Ahura! is a loyal friend to the Spitâma⁸, to Zarathustra? Who has asked his question of the divine Righteousness, (as he approached⁹)?

¹ Compare Y. XXXII, 7, hvaênâ ayanghâ (lit. iron).

Others see the ordeal of fire here, and the bath of melted metal from which the righteous suffers nothing, but in which the sinner is consumed, but râshayanghê seems to point to injury produced otherwise than by dipping, and dakhshta certainly designates a metallic instrument elsewhere; 'sign' is, however, the original meaning.

² So several times; comp. Y. XXVIII, 3, where the depth is unmistakable; see also Y. XXXI, 18 with ahûbîs in the next verse.

³ The Pahlavi while not strictly correct, affords the indication of a causative, sûdînêd.

⁴ From this verse probably arose the later association of khshathra-vairya and metal founding and forging.

⁵ As invoking Asha is in the antithesis, I regard ashâ as understood here. Gât seems a particle, but also not impossible = gât. As it is twice followed by tê (tôi), the interesting change is suggested to gatê, infin.

⁶ Or a proper name.

⁸ See Y. XLVI, 9, 14.

⁷ See the third verse.

⁹ See the fourth verse.

By whom is the bounteous Piety (received and cherished)? Or who has been regarded as upright and fitted for the great cause of Thy Good Mind?

12. ('Who is worthy?' would I ask, for Zarathustra was ever such, and from earliest days. He was no polluted wretch.) Paederast never gained his ear, nor Kavi-follower on this (temptation-)bridge of earth, when his body was (maturely) grown, when they both hasten(ed) to him with the bosom's¹ impure power².

13. (And he will be likewise victorious on the veritable Judgment Bridge, for) the righteous man's conscience will truly³ crush the wicked man's (spirit) while his soul rages⁴ fiercely on the open Kinvaŕ Bridge⁵, as he strives by his actions, and his tongue's

¹ Some other portion of the human body, suggested by the context, may be meant by aodares. The word looks like a verbal form, 3rd pl., but see the preceding dual.

² I render the Pahlavi of this most difficult verse as follows: Far from satisfying me is the Kik, the paederast, in regard to both of the two particulars [food and clothing] on the path of winter; (far from satisfying me) who am Zartûsht, the Spîtâman, with whom he is; that is, (or 'where') he incites me with his incitation in my bodily (?) (sensations; reading astak (?)); [that is, a person comes, and thus also they, or he, would do it to me]; and this one who (is doing) [that to us] is also leading us on, even in our progress in the cold [of a winter] of accustomed sin, (or in the cold iniquitous winter). This verse seems a very ancient interpolation.

³ Haithîm is an adverb; its position also does not so much favour an accusative substantive.

⁴ So our texts; but the Pahlavi translator saw khraozhdaitf (see Y. XLVI, 11) in his MSS., rendering khŕûsirnô yehabûnd=utter cries: 'while his soul cries fiercely.'

⁵ The occurrence of peretau(âo) in this verse sheds light upon the peretô in the previous one. Âkzu(âo) seems to be an attracted form for a loc. as elsewhere. Perhaps it is miswritten.

(cursing speech) to reach¹ (and to pollute) Asha's paths (where the faithful souls come).

14. (And as are those lost spirits, so are our foes.) No friends to the creatures² are the Karpans, (not granting) complete (harvests) from the fields with complete (pasture) for the Kine (chief objects for our prayer), bringing woe³ by their deeds and their teachings. And they⁴ will deliver these (beings⁵ whom they lead) at the last (?) by their doctrine(s) in the Home of the Lie.

15. But this is the reward which Zarathustra declared before (to his friends who counsel with Asha), and are fitted for the cause⁶; Ahura Mazda will come the first⁷ into His Song Home, Garôdman,

¹ Nāsvau(áo) would naturally mean 'reaching'; but the word is also elsewhere used in an evil sense, 'reaching to harm.' Y. LIII, 7. The Pahlavi, however, indicates the reading nasvau by its nasînênd. Does the Avesta show an original evil sense to nas=to reach? May the two nas possibly have some original connection? That hwâis skyaothnâis means here 'by means of' rather than 'because of' is the more probable from the same words in the next verse, and this notwithstanding Y. XXXI, 20.

² So general a term as 'creatures' should be avoided where possible; but see ye dâthaëibyô eres ratûm khshayâs ashavau kistâ (verse 5).

³ As to the grammatical structure, all depends on sendâ. Shall we bring down nôit from the verse above; or shall we regard sendâ as in an evil sense from sad as in sadrâ? The Pahlavi favours the former, as also in Y. XXXVIII, 5 (Sp. 15). The general result is not, however, affected. Read as alternative: No friends to the creatures are the Karpans as to perfect (harvests) from the fields, (not) blessing us in the matter of perfect (care and fodder) for the cattle, &c.; (sad in the sense of blessing with nôit).

⁴ Free.

⁵ Or, 'doctrines.'

⁶ See the eleventh verse.

⁷ Alternatives would be, 'Ahura will meet these engagements (?) made when the reward was promised;' or, 'the reward which Zarathustra promised before Ahura came into Garôdman.' Ac-and then these gifts will be given you by the Good Mind (within you), and with blessings for the cause of the Righteous Order (in His hosts).

16. (And one of you, the greatest, has indeed attained to that wisdom which is thus blessed with a promise), Kavi Vîstâspa has reached it in the Realm of our great cause (of devotion ¹), and moved in his toil by the chants of the Good Mind (who speaks in the Mâthra ²); yea, he hath attained to that wisdom which the bountiful Ahura conceived in accordance with Asha, thus to teach us salvation.

17. (And not alone amidst our princes hath sanctity been marked), Frashaostra, the Hvôgva, hath presented a blest and an endeared form (his child ³); and may Ahura Mazda, who has the Sovereign Power, grant her (to us), who is so much to be beloved. And for the (progress of the) good Religion ⁴ do ye, O ye people! receive her with desire ⁵, and for the gaining of Asha; (she will help the great cause).

18. Yea, that (holy) wisdom, O Gâmâspa the Hvôgva ⁶! these (pious throngs) are choosing through cordova to the general form of the Gâthic sentence, lôist parâ go more naturally together than if the force of the parâ was extended to gasa. The coming of Ahura is elsewhere mentioned; here He enters His audience-chamber before His approaching saints.

¹ Maga may have some such cast of meaning. I have, moreover, more than once suspected that the origin of 'magian' may, notwithstanding the môghu of the later Avesta, be simply this maga so often used in the Gâthas to designate 'the cause.'

² See verse 20.

³ So also the Pahlavi translator in his gloss; aîgham bartman pavan nêrmanîh barâ yehabûnêzô.

⁴ So also of Zarathustra's daughter, Y. LIII, 4.

⁵ Or, 'cry ye for the gaining of Asha,' as in Y. XXIX, 1.

⁶ Or, reading a nominative, 'Gâmâspa is choosing,' which is itself their Righteousness as the (true) splendours of riches (these pious men who are) gaining the kingdom where the Good Mind (doth govern). And grant me also, O Mazda! that which these with glad wishes¹ receive from Thy grace².

19. (And this prayer is already and beforehand heard.) This established Sovereign Power the heroic (Kavi Vîstâspa has given), O Maidhyô-mâh the Spitâma. He who is wise through the Religion, and who seeks (the true) life, he is granting it to us³; yea, he has pronounced the laws of Ahura our Maker, and declared that which is for (our) life's actions (beyond all other things) best.

20. And, that gift of blessedness for you, all (the Bountiful Immortals) with one consent in sympathy to help us (are disposed⁴) to grant; (and may they likewise make) the Holy Order (firm) for us through the Good Mind (in our folk); and may they reveal to us the words with which Piety likewise (speaks her truths). And receiving sacrifice with homage (from our praises), may they seek⁵ for us Ahura Mazda's grace.

21. (Yea, this Kavi Vîstâspa) the man of Âramaiti is bounteous, and with understanding in his words and his actions. (And as a reward) may Ahura give well possible, as var is also conjugated with n; but rapæn seems a plural, and vidô likewise.

¹ I concede this shade of meaning to the indications of the Pahlavi.

² The Pahlavi gives us our first indication here.

³ If Gâmâspô (nom.) is read in verse 18, ahmâi might here refer to him; 'to this one.'

⁴ Or, 'let them grant;' infinitive as imperative.

⁵ Seeking; a dual is here disapproved by the source from which the suggestion originated.

him that Righteousness which is blest, (but) with the Religion (alone), and that Sovereign Power which is established through the Good Mind (in His folk). And this same blessing would I pray from His grace¹.

22. For Ahura Mazda knoweth the man whose best gift for the sacrifice is given unto me, and from the motive of Righteousness; (and in thankfulness for all, and in prayer for yet still further grace), I will worship (the eternal ones); yea, I will worship those who have ever lived, and who still live, and by their own (holy) names, and to their (thrones²) will I draw near with my praise!

THE GÂTHA(Â) VAHISTÂ ÎSTIS (VAHIS- TÔISTI(Î)).

This Gâtha, named from its first words, consists of chapter LIIL of the Yasna. While its matter is homogeneous with that of the other Gâthas, it bears some evidence of having been composed in the latter portion of Zarathustra's life. It is, as usual, separated from the other Gâthas by its metre, which shows four lines with two half lines. The first two have eleven or twelve syllables; the third seems to have fourteen plus a half line with five, so also the last. Irregularities seem frequent. The composition has for its substance a marriage song, but one of a politically religious character.

The piece â-airyemâ-ishyô, Y. LIV, 1, has been considered by some as susceptible of a similar metrical arrangement, and it certainly looks as if it originally belonged to Y. LIIL. It is, however, otherwise divided by Bartholomae (see Arische Forschungen, 2^{ter} heft, s. 23). From the past form of srâvi, some have thought that Zarathustra was no longer living when this hymn was composed, but the word may only mean '(his prayer) has been, or is heard.' If we must, however, render 'was heard,' this does not determine the certainty of Zarathustra's death. The expression Zarathustris Spitâmô also gives the impression that some heir to Zarathustra's office and prestige existed, but even this is not decisive, for a future successor may be for a time a contemporary, while, on the contrary, the nuptials of Zarathustra's daughter, with the mention of his name, and the reference to her 'father' as the one from whom her bridegroom obtained her, indicate that Zarathustra may well have been still living. The later forms Zarathustrahê and fedhrô remain as the indications of a later origin than the actual period of Zarathustra's lifetime; but these circumstances may be owing to accidental causes.

¹ I refer tem to Ahura, supposing it to stand; reading tām, I would refer it to ashi.

² Compare Vend. XIX, 31.

The style has freshness and vigour throughout, and would indicate Zarathustrian influence, if not authorship. That Zarathustra does not speak in the first person, has no importance whatever in the question. The piece is not of course a whole; but it may well be a whole out of which parts have fallen. That the subject passes on to the old polemical vehemence in the last verses, is far from unnatural. The marriage festival of Zarathustra's child must have been, if without intention, a semi-political occasion, and the bard would express himself, as naturally, with regard to the struggle which was still going on. This latter fact also shows an early date; the passages referring to the struggle are strongly kindred with some in Y. XLVI, and elsewhere.

Verses 1 and 2 form an admirable introduction; the transition to the marriage occasion was, however, contained in lost verses. Verses 3, 4, and 5 hang well together; and 6 and 7 are not at all remote from them; the warlike close, although far from surprising us, must have been introduced by one or more now missing stanzas.

1. As the object of the 'great cause,' next to the preservation of its adherents, was the extension of its influence, first over hesitating parties (Y. XLIV, 12), and then over all the living (Y. XXXI, 3), it is not surprising that the central prayer of Zarathustra should have culminated in a desire for the conversion of opponents. Even Turanians had been known to come over to the holy creed, and help prosper the settlements which their kith had so often plundered (Y. XLVI, 12); he had therefore prayed that those who had heretofore injured the holy Daëna might become its disciples by a genuine conversion. 2. Having observed the fidelity of converts and original disciples, the king and his chief nobles would celebrate their devotion by hymns, ceremonies, and sacrifices, as the symbols of every moral virtue, laying down for the people the moral law of the Saviour. 3. As it would be pushing rather far to suppose the Saoshyant to be referred to in tamkâ, and as moreover, according to Geldner's admirable suggestion, that title may here well refer to Zarathustra, it is better to accept a loss of verses, and to suppose a person alluded to as the bridegroom, who, if not one so eminent as to merit the imposing name of Saoshyant, was still at least one of his more prominent satellites, for the ancient poet goes on to address a daughter of Zarathustra as a bride. She is the youngest, and her name is as pious as that of a maid of ancient Israel, for she is called 'full of the religious knowledge.' Her husband is to be a support in holiness, and she is to take counsel with piety. 4. Her response is appropriate; she will vie with her husband in every sacred affection, as well as in every domestic virtue. 5. The priestly thaliarch then addresses the bridesmaids and the pair with suitable admonitions to piety and affection. 6. Turning now to the assembly, possibly after the recital of some stanzas long since vanished, he proceeds with warnings and encouragements. He will exorcise the Demon who was especially the slave of the Daëvas; but he warns all men and women against the evil Vayu, the spirit of the air. 7. Charitably concluding that they would come forth as conquerors from the trials which still awaited them, he next warns them against all solicitations to vice. 8. Having named profane Demons, his polemical zeal becomes fully inflamed. Anticipating with fierce delight the sufferings of the wicked, he calls vehemently for the champion, who may, in alliance with neighbouring potentates, deliver up the murderous false-leader, giving peace to the masses; and he entreats that all haste may be used. 9. To arouse the great chiefs to their duty, he recalls (as in Y. XXXII) the successes of the foe; and he calls for the prince who may overthrow and expel him, but, as if well aware that the human arm could not alone bring salvation, he attributes to Ahura the Sovereign Power, which alone can guard helpless innocence against lawless plunder and oppression.

Translation.

1. That best prayer has been answered¹, the prayer of Zarathustra Spitâma, that Ahura Mazda might² grant him those boons, (the most wished-for) which flow from the good Order, even a life that is prospered³ for eternal duration, and also those who deceived⁴ him (may He likewise thus grant him) as the good Faith's disciples in word and in deed⁵.

2. And may Kavi Vîstâspa, and the Zarathustrian Spitâma⁶, and Frashaostra too with them, offer propitiation to Mazda in thought, word, and deed, and

¹ Some lay stress upon the literal form 'was heard,' and regard the expression as indicating the fact that Zarathustra was no longer living (see the remarks in the summary).

² Free.

³ I follow the Pahlavi with all; it has hû-âhûînâd.

⁴ I follow the friftâr of the Pahlavi, as the conversion of those formerly hostile is suggested by vaurayâ and Fryâna, not to speak of the primary rendering of duserethrîs êikhshnushâ. The Pahlavi also has, 'even he who is the deceiver is to be instructed in the word and deed of the good religion.' The MSS. should not hastily be abandoned.

⁵ That more than a ritualistic sanctity is meant is certain (see Y. XXX, 3); but that no sanctity could be recognised apart from worship is equally undeniable.

⁶ Who was the Zarathustrian Spitâma? Some change the text after the Pahlavi translator, reading Zarathustra Spitâma; but I would not follow this evil example in a first translation of a translatable text. Why should a Spitâma, who was not Zarathustra, be called Zarathustrian? Were some of the Spitâmas not in sympathy with their great kinsman, Spitâmas who were Mazda-yasnians, but not 'of Zarathustra's order?' One would however suppose that some one of Zarathustra's family was meant who occupied the position of his especial representative and natural successor.

Yasna confessions¹ as they render Him praise, making straight paths² (for our going), even that Faith of the Saoshyant which Ahura will found³.

(The master of the feast.)

3⁴. And him will they give Thee, O Pouruêista, Haêkat-aspid and Spitâmi! young⁵ (as thou art) of the daughters of Zarathustra, him will they⁶ give thee as a help in the Good Mind's true service, of Asha's and Mazda's, as a chief and a guardian⁷. Counsel well then (together⁸), with the mind of Ârmaiti, most bounteous and pious; and act with just action.

(She answers.)

4. I will love⁹ and vie with him, since from (my) father¹⁰ he gained (me). For the master and toilers, and for the lord-kinsman (be) the Good Mind's bright

¹ Free.

² Recall the 'path made for the Kine,' and 'the way' which 'Thou declarest to be that of the Good Mind.'

³ That is, will permanently found, establish.

⁴ Verses have here fallen out, as some allusion must have been made to the bridegroom.

⁵ So more according to the hint of the Pahlavi and the statement of the Bundahis; West, XXXII, 5. So Geldner, K. Z. 28, 195.

⁶ Or, 'will he, the Saoshyant, the bride's father.'

⁷ A chieftain, a protecting head.

⁸ It is, perhaps, safer to refer this 'questioning' to the pair; but forms of ham with pares are also used of consultations with the Deity (see Y. XXXIII, 6). Y. XLIV, 13 nearly necessitates the wider and less concrete view here.

⁹ Varânî looks somewhat like a gloss, but the metre seems to demand it.

¹⁰ Her father's sanction was a reason for devotion to the man to whom he had given her.

blessing¹, the pure for the pure ones, and to me (be²) the insight (which I gain from his counsel³). Mazda grant it, Ahura for good conscience for ever.

(The priestly master of the feast.)

5. Monitions for the marrying I speak to (you) maidens, to you, I who know them; and heed ye my (sayings): By these⁴ laws of the Faith which I utter obtain ye the life of the Good Mind (on earth and in heaven). (And to you, bride and bridegroom⁵), let each one the other in Righteousness cherish; thus alone unto each shall the home-life be happy.

6. [Thus real are these things, ye men and ye women⁶!] from the Lie-demon protecting, I guard o'er my (faithful), and so (I) grant progress (in weal and in goodness). And the hate of the Lie (with the hate of her) bondsmen (?) I pray from the body, (and so would expel it⁷). For to those who bear Vayu⁸, (and bring him to power), his shame⁹ mars the glory. To these evil truth-harmers by these means he reaches. Ye thus slay the life mental (if ye follow his courses¹⁰).

¹ The Pahlavi translator has sīrīh here.

² Be = bád lies certainly nearer than bee = bava!

³ See the previous verse. ⁴ Or, 'being zealous.'

⁵ These words do not seem adapted to the bridesmaids.

⁶ Gaini is elsewhere used in an evil sense.

⁷ I can only render thus literally: From the Drûg as a generous guide (I) who (compare ye in Y. XXVIII) (for) mine, (mê) a watching guardian (I guide as a râthema; nom. sing. with verbal force) increasing prosperity, i.e. progress, of the Drûg I pray (forth*; I exorcise) of the bond(?) (of the Drûg) the malicious injuries* from the body or person. * yêšê-parâ. * to 3rd pî.

⁸ 'If ye bear, or promote, the interests of Vayu.'

⁹ Or, 'evil food.'

¹⁰ Some line here is gloss; the first thought would be to eliminate

7. But yours be the recompense, (O ye righteous women!) of this great cause. For while lustful desire heart-inflamed from the body¹ there beyond goeth down where the spirit of evil reaches (to ruin, still) ye bring forth the champion² to help on the cause, (and thus conquer temptation). So your last word is 'Vayu'; (ye cry it in triumph³).

8. And thus let the sinners by these means be foiled⁴; and consumed⁵ be they likewise. Let them shriek in their anger. With good kings let (our champion⁶) deliver⁷ the smiter⁸ (as a captive in the difficult second line; but the third line might be an effort (by the poet himself, or an associate, see the metrical form) to explain, or relieve, the awkward second line. Reading yemâ and râthemâ, and taking genayô as in an evil sense, with spasuthâ as a second plural, we might render as a question: 'Do ye, O ye twain, ye helpers of the Drûg; do ye regard promotion (as thus to be gained)?' But in that case verses 6 and 7 should be regarded as separated by many lost verses from the fifth verse. But is not the first line the gloss? It is merely an address.

¹ Free.

² Lit. 'the greatness.'

³ The difficulty here lies in the first line which seems to declare a reward in a good sense. Mîzdem is hardly used of retribution. It must therefore be taken in a good sense. The following evil results must be supposed to have been avoided; and 'Vayu' to be uttered in triumph. Vayu is used in an evil sense in verse 6.

If mîzdem could be supposed to express retribution, then evil men and women would be threatened, and Vayu would be a cry uttered in woe. As to Vayu with his two natures, see part ii as per index.

⁴ The foiling of the evil here recalls âdebaomâ.

⁵ The Pahlavi translator seems to me too free in rendering zahvyâkâ (zahyâkâ), zanisn-hômand. It also makes a curious imitation of letters in gêh va mar for genarâm. It is of course far from certain that he had our present text.

⁶ See verse 9; also Y. XLVI, 4.

⁷ Recall the delivering of the evil into the two hands of Asha (Y. XXX, 8, and Y. XLIV, 14).

⁸ Khrûnerâmâ must be a gloss.

battle), giving peace to our dwellings, and peace to our hamlets. Let him charge¹ those deceivers, chaining death as the strongest²; and swift be (the issue).

9. Through false believers the tormentor makes Thy helpers³ refusers⁴; (those who once helped our heroes shall no longer give succour). The estranged thus desires, and the reprobate⁵ wills it, with the will that he harbours to conquer our honour⁶. Where is then the Lord righteous who will smite them from life⁷, and (beguile) them of license? Mazda! Thine is that power, (which will banish and conquer). And Thine is the Kingdom⁸; and by it Thou bestowest the highest (of blessings) on the right-living poor⁹!

¹ 'Let him "rout" or "stir" them.'

² Comp. mazista=the strongest in Y. XLIX, 1, 'the prevailer.' Lit. 'with the chaining of death the greatest.'

³ For narps I can only suggest the suspiciously simple nar=hero (comp. the frequent nâ) and pî=nourish, support. The Pahlavi translator seems likewise to have had some such rendering in mind, for he translates dastôbar.

⁴ As to rigîs, the Pahlavi translation, which is here more than usually difficult, hints in the direction above followed, by a word which I would restore as rêgînênd.

⁵ The Pahlavi translator erroneously sees 'bridge' in peshô, or is free with his tanâpûharkânô hômand. See Geldner, Stud. 3.

⁶ See Geldner, Stud. 54.

⁷ See Y. XLVI, 4.

⁸ Comp. the Ahuna-vairya which takes its last line from this place, and Y. XXXIV, 5. Vahyô is a variation for vanghêus vahyô.

⁹ Here I have endeavoured to imitate the swing of the rhythm by breaking up the sentences, especially in the second line. Literally it would be, 'with the desire, with the virtue-conquering (desire) of the reprobate.' Such freedom as the above is often a critical necessity in the attempts to reproduce the warmth of the original.

THE YASNA.

IT is now hardly necessary to say that the Yasna is the chief liturgy of the Zarathustrians, in which confession, invocation, prayer, exhortation, and praise are all combined as in other liturgies. Like other compositions of the kind, it is made up of more or less mutually adapted fragments of different ages, and modes of composition. The Gâthas are sung in the middle of it, and in the Vendîdâd Sâdah, the Visparad is interpolated within it for the most part at the ends of chapters.

We have no reason to suppose that the Yasna existed in its present form in the earlier periods of Zarathustrianism, but we have also no reason to doubt that its present arrangement is, as regards us, very ancient. The word Yasna means worship including sacrifice. Introductory excerpts occur in several MSS., and are now printed by Geldner. They are to be found in Y. I, 23; Y. III, 25; Y. XI, 17, 18; Y. XXII, 23-27; Y. XXVII, 13, 14; Ny. I, 2.

YASNA I.

THE SACRIFICE COMMENCES.

1. I announce¹ and I (will) complete (my Yasna) to Ahura Mazda, the Creator, the radiant and glorious, the greatest and the best, the most beautiful (?) (to our conceptions), the most firm, the wisest, and the one of all whose body² is the most perfect, who

¹ Or, 'I invite;' but the word seems equal to âvaêdhayêma; compare the Vedic vid + ni. Comp. also nî tê vaêdhayêmi and nî vô vaêdhayêmi in Y. I, 21, 22. The Pahlavi favours 'I invite.'

² Not that Ahura was conceived of as having a body proper. The stars are elsewhere poetically described as his body, as other attains His ends the most infallibly, because of His Righteous Order, to Him who disposes our minds aright¹, who sends His joy-creating grace afar; who made us, and has fashioned us, and who has nourished and protected us², who is the most bounteous Spirit³!

2. I announce and I (will) complete (my Yasna) to the Good Mind, and to Righteousness the Best, and to the Sovereignty which is to be desired, and to Piety the Bountiful, and to the two, the Universal Weal and Immortality, to the body of the Kine, and to the Kine's Soul, and to the Fire of Ahura Mazda, that one who more than ⁴ (all) the Bountiful Immortals has made most effort (for our succour)!

3. And I announce and I (will) complete (my Yasna) to the Asnya, the day-lords of the ritual order, to Hâvani the holy, the lord ⁵ of the ritual order; and I celebrate, and I (will) complete (my Yasna) to Sâvanghi and to Vîsya, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order. And I announce and (will) complete (my Yasna) to Mithra of the wide pastures, of the thousand ears, and of the myriad eyes, the Yazad of the spoken ⁶ name, and to Râman Hvâstra.

divinities are said to be tanu-mâthra, having the Mâthra as their body; that is, incarnate in the Mâthra.

¹ 'Disposing aright as to mind.'

² Pahlavi parvard.

³ Elsewhere the Spenta Mainyu is spoken of as His possession.

⁴ The Fire seems almost spoken of as one of the Amesha Spenta.

⁵ Lords of the ritual because ruling as chief at the time of their mention, and in this sense regarded as genii protecting all ritual seasons and times of their class. Vîsya presides over the Vîs; Sâvanghi, over cattle.

⁶ Having an especial Yast.

4. I announce and (will) complete (my Yasna) to Rapithwina, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Frâdatfshu, and to Zantuma, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order; and I celebrate and complete (my Yasna) to Righteousness¹ the Best, and to Ahura Mazda's Fire¹.

5. I announce and complete (my Yasna) to Uzayêirina the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Frâdat-vîtra and to Dahvyuma², the holy lord(s) of the ritual order, and to that lofty Ahura Napât-apâm (the son of waters), and to the waters which Ahura Mazda³ made.

6. I announce and complete (my Yasna) to Aiwisrûthrima (and) Aibigaya⁴, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order, and to Zarathustrôtema, and to him who possesses and who gives that prosperity in life which furthers all. And I celebrate and complete (my Yasna) to the Fravashis of the saints, and to those of the women who have many sons⁵, and to a prosperous home-life which continues without reverse throughout the year, and to that Might which is well-shaped and stately⁶, which strikes victoriously, Ahura-made, and to that Victorious Ascendency (which it secures).

7. I announce and I complete (my Yasna) to Ushahina, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Beregya (and) Nmânya, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order, and to Sraosha (who is Obedience) the blessed, endowed with blessed recompense (as a thing com-

¹ Constantly associated together in the later Avesta.

² hv=h before y.

³ As opposed to those which might belong to Angra Mainyu.

⁴ Or, 'who furthers life.' ⁵ 'Men and herds?'

⁶ 'Well-grown.'

pleted¹), who smites with victory, and furthers the settlements, and to Rashnu², the most just, and to Arstât³, who advances the settlements, and causes them to increase.

8. And I announce and I complete (my Yasna) to the Mâhya, the monthly festivals, lords of the ritual order, to the new and the later⁴ moon, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to the full moon which scatters night.

9. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to the Yâirya, yearly feasts, the holy lords of the ritual order. I celebrate and complete (my Yasna) to Maidyô-zaremya⁵, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Maidyô-shema, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Paitishahya, and to Ayâthrima the advancer, and the spender of the strength of males⁶, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Maidhyâirya, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Hamaspathmaêdhaya, the holy lord of the ritual order; yea, I celebrate and complete my Yasna to the seasons, lords of the ritual order.

10. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to all those who are the thirty and three⁷ lords of the ritual order, which, coming the nearest, are around about Hâvani, and which (as in their festivals) were

¹ I should say that the suffix has this force here as in close connection with ashyô.

² Genius of rectitude.

³ Rectitude in another form.

⁴ Literally, 'to the moon within,' showing little light.

⁵ See the Âfrinagân.

⁶ The rutting season.

⁷ Haug first called attention to the striking coincidence with the Indian. In the Aitareya and Satapatha Brâhmanas, in the Atharvaveda, and in the Râmâyana, the gods are brought up to the number thirty-three. The names differ somewhat however. (See Essays, ed. West, 2nd edition, p. 276; see also Rv. 240, 9; 250, 2.)

inculcated by Ahura Mazda, and were promulgated by Zarathustra, as the lords of Asha Vahista, who is Righteousness the Best.

11. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to the two, to Ahura¹ and to Mithra, the lofty, and the everlasting, and the holy, and to all the stars which are Spenta Mainyu's creatures, and to the star Tistrya, the resplendent and glorious, and to the Moon which contains the seed of the Kine, and to the resplendent Sun, him of the rapid steeds, the eye² of Ahura Mazda, and to Mithra the province-ruler. And I celebrate and complete my Yasna to Ahura Mazda (once again, and as to him who rules the month³), the radiant, the glorious, and to the Fravashis⁴ of the saints.

12. And I announce and complete my Yasna to thee, the Fire, O Ahura Mazda's son! together with all the fires, and to the good waters, even to all the waters made by Mazda, and to all the plants which Mazda made.

13. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to the Bounteous Māthra, the holy and effective, the revelation given against the Daêvas⁵; the Zarathus-

¹ The star Jupiter has been called Ormuzd by the Persians and Armenians, and it may be intended here, as stars are next mentioned, but who can fail to be struck with the resemblance to the Mitra-Varuna of the Rîg-veda. Possibly both ideas were present to the composer.

² Recall Kakshur Mitrasya Varunasya Agneḥ.

³ The first day of the month is called Ahura Mazda.

⁴ The first month is called Fravashi. These are put for the particular day of celebration.

⁵ This was the Vendidad, the name being a contraction of vidaêvâ-dâta. It will not be forgotten that the Vendidad, although later put together, contains old Aryan myths which antedate trian revelation, and to the long descent ¹ of the good Mazdayasnian Faith.

14. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to the mountain Ushi-darena ², the Mazda-made, with its sacred brilliance, and to all the mountains glorious with sanctity ³, with their abundant Glory Mazda-made, and to that majestic Glory Mazda-made, the unconsumed ⁴ Glory which Mazda made. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to Ashi the good, the blessedness (of the reward), and to Kisti, the good religious Knowledge, to the good Erethe (Rectitude ⁵?), and to the good Rasāstāt (persisting zeal ⁶?), and to the Glory and the Benefit which are Mazda-made.

15. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to the pious and good Blessing of the religious man ⁷, the holy, and to the curse of wisdom, the swift and redoubted Yazad of potency (to blight).

16. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to these places and these lands, and to these pastures, and these abodes with their springs of water (?) ⁸, and Zarathustra, although in its present greatly later form, Zarathustra is a demi-god in it, and his name is involved in myth.

¹ 'The long tradition;' so Spiegel.

² From this mountain the Iranian kings were later supposed to have descended; hence the mention of the 'glory.'

³ Observe the impossibility of the meaning 'comfort,' or mere 'well-being' here.

⁴ Or possibly 'the unseized,' the Pahlavi agrift(?); Ner. agrīhītām; hvar, to eat, may have meant 'seize' originally.

⁵ Erethe (riti?) seems without inflection.

⁶ The state of activity (?).

⁷ Shall we say, 'of the departed saint' here?

⁸ The Pahlavi with its afkhvâr points here perhaps to a better text. Recall awzhdâtemka, awzhdaunghô, awrem.

to the waters, land, and plants, and to this earth and to yon heaven, and to the holy wind, and to the stars, moon, and sun, and to the eternal stars without beginning¹, and self-disposing², and to all the holy creatures of Spenta-Mainyu, male and female, the regulators of the ritual order.

17. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to that lofty lord who is the ritual Righteousness³ (itself), and to the lords of the days in their duration, and of the days during daylight, to the moons, the years, and the seasons which are lords of the ritual order at the time of Hâvani⁴.

18. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to the Fravashis of the saints, the redoubted, which overwhelm (the evil), to those of the saints of the ancient lore, to those of the next of kin, and to the Fravashi of (mine) own⁵ soul!

19. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to all the lords of the ritual order, and to all the Yazads, the beneficent, who dispose (of all) aright, to those both heavenly and earthly, who are (meet) for our sacrifice and homage because of Asha Vahista, (of the ritual Order which is 'the best').

20. O (thou) Hâvani, holy lord of the ritual order, and Sâvanghi, Rapithwina, and Uzayêrina, and Aiwisrûthrima, (and) Aibigaya, (thou that aidest

¹ Meaning 'without beginning to their course,' and so 'fixed' (?).

² Self-determining, not satellites, having the laws of their own motion in themselves.

³ The divine Order par eminence, expressed in the ritual and the faith.

⁴ Not 'to the chief of Hâvani,' possibly 'in the lordship,' the time when it is especially the object of worship. Thus each object of worship becomes in its turn a 'lord or chief' of 'the ritual order.'

⁵ The soul of the celebrant or his client is intended.

life !) if I have offended you, and thou, O Ushahina, holy lord of the ritual order !

21. If I have offended thee¹, whether by thought, or word, or deed, whether by act of will, or without intent or wish, I earnestly make up the deficiency of this in praise to thee. If I have caused decrease² in that which is Thy Yasna, and Thy homage, I announce (and celebrate³) to thee (the more for this) !

22. Yea, all ye lords, the greatest ones, holy lords of the ritual order, if I have offended you by thought, or word, or deed, whether with my will, or without intending error⁴, I praise you (now the more) for this. I announce to you (the more) if I have caused decrease in this which is your Yasna, and your praise.

23. I would confess myself a Mazda-worshipper, of Zarathustra's order, a foe to the Daêvas, devoted to the lore of the Lord, for Hâvani, the holy lord of the ritual order, for (his) sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise, for Sâvanghi, and for Vîsya, the holy lord of the ritual order, for (his) sacrifice, homage, propitiation and praise, and for the sacrifice, homage, propitiation and praise of the lords of the days in their duration, and of the days during daylight, for

¹ Compare Rv. VII, 86, 3-6.

² Practised, or induced neglect, or omitted portions of it.

³ 'I invite for Thee' (?).

⁴ That the thought, word, and deed here were more than the mere semi-mechanical use of faculties in reciting the liturgy, is clear. At the same time all morality was supposed to be represented in the liturgy. The evil man would offend in thought, word, and deed, if he recited it carelessly, or with bad conscience, and as guilty of any known and unrepented sins. The moral and ceremonial laws went hand in hand.

those of the monthly festivals, and for those of the yearly ones, and for those of the seasons!

YASNA II.

THE SACRIFICE CONTINUES.

1. I desire to approach¹ the Zaothras² with my worship. I desire to approach the Baresman with my worship. I desire to approach the Zaothra conjointly with the Baresman in my worship, and the Baresman conjointly with the Zaothra. Yea, I desire to approach this Zaothra (here), and with this (present) Baresman, and I desire to approach this Baresman conjoined with this Zaothra with my praise³; and I desire to approach this Baresman with praise provided with its Zaothra with its girdle, and spread with sanctity.

2. And in this Zaothra³ and the Baresman I desire to approach Ahura Mazda with my praise, the holy lord of the ritual order, and the Bountiful Immortals, (all) those who rule aright, and who dispose of all aright, these also I desire to approach and with my praise.

¹ Referring yâs to its more original sense. Or read, 'I desire the approach of' the various objects of worship, which may be correct, as we understand the genius of each several object to be invoked. Aside from this, a desire 'to approach' seems quite necessary to fill out the sense here. Many of the objects referred to were already present, although some, like 'the mountains,' needed to be spiritually approached, or indeed invoked.

² Zaothra seems to me hardly a vocative here. If declined as other nouns, it would seem to be exceptionally a masculine; compare ahmya zaothrê below. I should feel constrained to regard it here as a masc. plural accusative (comp. haoma).

³ If zaothrê is not a loc. masc. it may be used with the loc. masc. pronoun irregularly. It would then equal Zaothraya. The letter yo is often simply the Pahlavi yo a little lengthened and equivalent to ya (aya). yo does not merely stand for ya (aya), but it is sometimes the correct writing for those letters. (Useless repetitions are curtailed.)

3. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the Asnya with my praise. I desire to approach the Hâvani with my praise, the holy lord of the ritual order, and Sâvanghi and Vtsya, the holy lords of the ritual order. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach Mithra with my praise, of the wide pastures, of the thousand ears, and of the myriad eyes, the Yazad of the spoken name, and Râman Hvâstra with him, the holy lord of the ritual order.

4. And in this Zaothra and with the Baresman I desire to approach Rapithwina with my praise, the holy lord of the ritual order; and Frâdat-fshu and Zantuma, the holy lords of the ritual order; and in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach toward Righteousness the Best with my praise, and with him the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son.

5. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach Uzayêirina with my praise, and Frâdat-vira and Da^hvyuma¹, the holy lords of the ritual order; and with them that lofty lord, the kingly and brilliant Apâm-napât², of the fleet horses, and likewise the water Mazda-made and holy,

6. And Aiwisrûthrima, (and) Aibigaya, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order, and Frâdat-vîspâm-hugâiti, and Zarathustrôtema, the holy lord, and the good, heroic, and bountiful Fravashis of the saints, and the women who have many sons, and a peaceful and prosperous home-life that continues without reverse throughout the year, and Force well-shaped and stately, and the Victorious-blow Ahura-given, and the Victorious Ascendency (which it secures), and (7) Ushahina, the holy lord of the ritual order, Beregya and Nmánya, the holy lords of the ritual order, and Sraosha, Obedience, the blessed and the stately, who smites with the blow of victory, furthering the settlements, the holy lord of the ritual order, and Rashnu, the most just, and Arstâz, who furthers the settlements, and causes them to increase.

¹ hv=h before y.

² Sometimes Napât-apâm.

8. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the Mâhya, the monthly festivals with my praise, the new moon and the waning moon (the moon within), the holy lords of the ritual order, and the full moon which scatters night, (9) and the Yearly festivals, Maidhyô-zaremaya, the holy lord of the ritual order, and Maidhyô-shema, and Paitishahya, and Ayâthrima, the promoter, who spends the strength of males, and Maidhyâirya and Hamaspathmaêdhaya, and the seasons, the holy lords of the ritual order.

10. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach all the lords of the ritual order with my praise, the three and thirty who come the nearest round about our Hâvanis, who are those lords (and seasons) of Righteousness the Best, which were inculcated by Mazda, and spoken forth by Zarathustra.

11. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach Ahura and Mithra with my praise, the lofty, eternal, and the holy two; and I desire to approach the stars, moon, and sun with the Baresman plants, and with my praise, and with them Mithra the governor of all the provinces, and Ahura Mazda the radiant and glorious, and the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the saints, (12) and thee, the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son, the holy lord of the ritual order, with all the fires! And I desire to approach the good waters in this Zaothra with this Baresman with my praise, all best waters, Mazda-made and holy, and all the plants which are Mazda-made and holy.

13. And I desire to approach the bounteous Māthra in this Zaothra with this Baresman, and with my praise, the most glorious as it is, and with it the law instituted against the Daêvas; yea, I desire to approach the Zarathustrian law with my praise, and (with it) its long descent, and the good Mazdayasnian Religion (as complete).

14. And I desire to approach Mount Ushi-darena in this Zaothra, with this Baresman with my praise, Mazda-made, and glorious with sanctity, the Yazad-(mount). And I desire to approach all the mountains with my praise, glorious with sanctity as they are, and with abundant glory, Mazda-made, and holy lords of the ritual order; and I desire to approach the mighty kingly Glory Mazda-made and unconsumed; yea, (even) the mighty unconsumed Glory Mazda-made. And I desire to approach Ashi Vanguhi (the good blessedness) in my praise, the brilliant, lofty, powerful, and stately, saving by inherent power. Yea, I desire to approach the Glory Mazda-made with my praise; and I desire to approach the Benefit conferred by Mazda.

15. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the Blessing, pious and good, and the pious and holy man who utters it, and the mighty and redoubted Curse of the wise, the Yazad.

16. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach these waters with my praise, and these lands and plants, and these places, districts, and pastures, and these dwellings with their springs of water ¹, and this land-ruler, who is Ahura Mazda.

17. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach all the greatest lords with my praise, the day-lords, and the month-lords, those of the years, and of the seasons, and the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the saints.

18. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach all the holy Yazads with my praise; yea, even all the lords of the ritual order, Hâvani at his time, and Sâvanghi at his time, and all the greatest lords of the ritual at their proper times.

YASNA III.

THE YASNA ADVANCES TO THE NAMING OF THE OBJECTS OF PROPITIATION.

1. With a Baresman brought to its appointed place accompanied with the Zaothra at the time of Hâvani, I desire to approach the Myazda-offering with my praise, as it is consumed, and likewise Ameretâtâ ² (as the guardian of plants and wood) and Haurvatât (who guards the water), with the (fresh) meat ³, for the propitiation of Ahura Mazda, and of the Bountiful

¹ See note on Y. I, 16.

² Spiegel has observed with truth that Ameretâtâ and Haurvatât may represent severally all the fruits and the liquids offered.

³ The modern Parsis, Haug following, render 'butter'; but Spiegel is inclined to discredit this later tradition, holding that 'flesh' was originally intended; but on its becoming disused in India, milk was substituted, hence the error.

Gaus hudhæu, in its primary sense, meant of course 'the Kine of blessed endowment.' (Repetitions are again curtailed.)

Immortals, and for the propitiation of Sraosha (who is Obedience) the blessed, who is endowed with sanctity, and who smites with the blow of victory, and causes the settlements to advance.

2. And I desire to approach Haoma and Parahaoma¹ with my praise for the propitiation of the Fravashi of Spitâma Zarathustra, the saint. And I desire to approach the (sacred) wood with my praise, with the perfume, for the propitiation of thee, the Fire, O Ahura Mazda's son!

3. And I desire to approach the Haomas with my praise for the propitiation of the good waters which Mazda created; and I desire to approach the Haomawater, and the fresh milk² with my praise, and the plant Hadhânaêpata, offered with sanctity for the propitiation of the waters which are Mazda-made.

4. And I desire to approach this Baresman with the Zaothra with my praise, with its binding³ and spread with sanctity for the propitiation of the Bountiful Immortals. And I desire with (?) my voice the thoughts well thought, and the words well spoken, and the deeds well done, and the recital of the Gâthas as they are heard. And I desire to approach the well-said Mâthras with my praise, and this (higher) lordship with this sanctity, and this exact regulation⁴ (of the Ratu), and the reverential prayer for blessings (spoken at the fitting hour); and I desire to approach them for the contentment and propitiation

¹ The Haoma-juice.

² So better than 'fresh meat.' Fluids are the chief objects of attention here.

³ With its girdle.

⁴ Anghuyãm—rathwãm stand related as ahû and ratu; so also the Pahlavi ahûôih and radîh, and Ner. svâmitâmkâ gurutâmkâ.

of the holy Yazads, heavenly and earthly, and for the contentment of each man's soul.

5. And I desire to approach the Asnya with my praise, the lords of the ritual order, and the Hâvani and Sâvanghi and Vîsya, the holy lords of the ritual order. And I desire to approach with the Yast¹ of Mithra of the wide pastures, of the thousand ears, of the myriad eyes, the Yazad of the spoken name, and with him Râman Hvâstra.

6. And I desire to approach Rapithwina with my praise, the holy lord of the ritual order, and Frâdat-fshu and Zantuma, and Righteousness the Best, and Ahura Mazda's Fire.

7. And I desire to approach Uzayêrina, and Frâdat-vîra and Daivyuma* with my praise, with that lofty Ahura Napât-apâm, and the waters Mazda-made,

8. And Aiwisrûthrima, and Aibigaya, and Frâdat-vîspâm-hugaiti, and Zarathustrôtema with the Yast of the Fravashis of the saints², and of the women who have many sons, and the year long unchanged prosperity, and of Might, the well-shaped and stately, smiting victoriously, Ahura-made and of the Victorious Ascendency (which it secures).

9. And I desire to approach Ushahina, Beregya, and Nmânya with the Yast of Sraosha (Obedience) the sacred, the holy, who smites with the blow of victory, and makes the settlements advance, and with that of Rashnu, the most just, and Arstât who furthers the settlements, and causes them to increase.

¹ Yestî seems used of an especial Yast here, and subsequently, as genitives intrude among datives, the form possibly taking the place of the words 'for the propitiation of'; here Yast X may be referred to.

² Yast XIII.

10. And I desire to approach the monthly festivals, the lords of the ritual order, and the new moon and the waning moon, and the full moon which scatters night,

11. And the yearly festivals, Maidhyô-zaremaya, Maidhyô-shema, Paitishahya, and Ayâthrima the breeder who spends the strength of males, and Maidhyâirya, and Hamaspathmaêdhaya, and the seasons, lords of the ritual order, (12) and all those lords who are the three and thirty, who approach the nearest at the time of Hâvani, who are the Lords of Asha called Vahishta (and whose services were) inculcated by Mazda, and pronounced by Zarathustra, as the feasts of Righteousness, the Best.

13. And I desire to approach Ahura and Mithra, the lofty and imperishable two, the holy, and with the Yast of those stars which are the creatures of Spenta Mainyu, and with the Yast of the star Tistrya, the radiant, the glorious, and with that of the moon which contains the seed of cattle, and with that of the resplendent sun, the eye of Ahura Mazda, and of Mithra, province-lord of the provinces, and with that of Ahura Mazda (as He rules this day) the radiant, the glorious, and with that of the Fravashis of the saints, (who rule this month),

14. And with thy Yast, the Fire's, O Ahura Mazda's son! with all the fires, and to the good waters with the Yast of all the waters which are Mazda-made, and with that of all the plants which Mazda made.

15. And I desire to approach with the Yast of the Māthra Spenta, the holy, the effective, the law composed against the Daêvas, the Zarathustrian, and with that of the long descent of the Religion which Mazda gave.

16. And I desire to approach with the Yast of Mount Ushi-darena, Mazda-made, and of all, glorious with sanctity, and abundant in brilliance, and with that of the Kingly Glory, Mazda-made; yea, with that of the unconsumed glory which Mazda made, and with that of Ashi Vanguhi, and Kisti Vanguhi, and with that of the good Erethê, and the good Rasāstāt, and the good Glory, and of the Benefit which Mazda gave.

17. And I desire to approach with the Yast of the good and pious Blessing of the pious man and of the saint, and with that of the awful and swift Curse of the wise, the Yazad-curse, (18) and to these places, regions, pastures, and abodes, with their water-springs, and with that of the waters, and the lands, and the plants, and with that of this earth and yon heaven, and with that of the holy wind and of the stars, moon, and sun, and with that of the stars without beginning, self-determined and self-moved, and with that of all the holy creatures which are those of Spenta Mainyu, male and female, regulators of the ritual order, (19) and with that of the lofty lord who is Righteousness (himself, the essence of the ritual), and with that of the days in their duration, and of the days during daylight, and with that of the monthly festivals, and the yearly festivals, and with those of the several seasons which are lords of the ritual at the time of Hâvani.

20. And I desire to approach the meat-offering with a Yast, and Haurvatāt (who guards the water), and Ameretatāt (who guards the plants and wood), with the Yast of the sacred flesh for the propitiation of Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed and the mighty, whose body is the Māthra, of him of the daring spear, the lordly, the Yazad of the spoken name.

21. And I desire to approach both Haoma and the Haoma-juice with a Yast for the propitiation of the Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitāma, the saint, the Yazad of the spoken name. And I desire to approach the wood-billets with a Yast, with the perfume for the propitiation of thee, the Fire, O Ahura Mazda's son! the Yazad of the spoken name.

22. And I desire to approach with a Yast for the mighty Fravashis of the saints, the overwhelming, the Fravashis of those who held to the ancient lore, and of those of the next of kin.

23. And I desire to approach toward all the lords of the ritual order with a Yast, toward all the good Yazads, heavenly and earthly, who are (set) for worship and for praise because of Asha Vahista (of Righteousness the Best).

24. I will confess myself a Mazdayasnian, of Zarathustra's order, a foe to the Daêvas, devoted to the lore of the Lord for Hâvani, the holy lord of the ritual order, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and for praise, and for Sâvanghi and Vîsya, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order, and for the sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise of the day-lords of the days in their duration, and of the days during daylight, and for the month-regulators, and the year-regulators, and for those of the (several) seasons, for their sacrifice, and homage, their propitiation, and their praise.

(The Zaothar speaks¹): As the Ahû to be

¹ So at least the rubric. One would think that the sentence was intended to be dictated to the Ratu to be repeated; that is, if the (revered and) chosen, let the priest speak¹ forth to me.

- (The Ratu responds): As the Ahû to be (revered and) chosen, let him who is the Zaoatar speak¹ forth to me.

(The Zaoatar again): So let the Ratu from his Righteousness, holy and learned, speak forth!

YASNA IV.

THE OFFERING TAKES PLACE.

1. These good thoughts, good words, and good deeds², these Haomas, meat-offerings, and Zaothras, this Baresman spread with sanctity, this flesh, and the two, Haurvatât (who guards the water) and Ameretatât (who guards the plants and wood), even the flesh, the Haoma and Haoma-juice, the wood-billets, and their perfume, this sacred lordship³ and chieftainship³, and the timely prayer with blessing, and the heard recital of the Gâthas, and the well-said Mâthras, these all we offer, and make known with celebrations (here).

2. Yea, these do we announce with celebrations, and we present them to Ahura Mazda, and to Sraosha rubric is correct. The sentence as uttered by the priest seems difficult.

¹ Present, or infin. for imperative (?).

² The fact that somewhat of a more technical sumatî, sûktâ, sukrîtâ adheres to these expressions in this place must not for a moment induce us to suppose that their deeper meaning was lost. All good thoughts, words, and deeds culminated in the ritual, as in an enlightened high ecclesiasticism. They were nourished by it, and not lost in it. (Expressions are here varied.)

³ The prominence and supremacy of each deity, or genius, while he is especially the object of worship in the ritual order, the expressions being taken from the Ahuna-vairya.

(Obedience) the blessed, and to the Bountiful Immortals, and to the Fravashis of the saints, and to their souls, and to the Fire of Ahura Mazda, the lofty lord of the entire creation of the holy, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise.

3. Yea, further, we present (them to the Bountiful Immortals with an especial gift) these thoughts well thought, these words well spoken, these deeds well done, these Haomas, Myazdas, Zaothras, and this Baresman spread with sanctity, the flesh, and Haurvatât (who guards the water), and Ameretatât (who guards the plants and wood), even the flesh, Haoma and Parahaoma, the wood-billets, the perfume, and this their lordship and their sanctity, and this chieftainship, this prayer for blessing, the heard recital of the Gâthas, and the well-said Mâthras.

4. We offer with our celebrations, and we announce them (of a verity) to the Bountiful Immortals, those who exercise their rule aright, and who dispose (of all) aright, the ever-living, ever-helpful, the male divinities among their number who dwell with the Good Mind¹, [and the female² ones as well].

5. And we announce them in our celebrations as more propitious for this house³, and for the furtherance of this house, of its herds, and of its men, of those now born, and of those yet to be born, the holy, yea, for the furtherance of that house of which these (men) are thus.

6. And we present these offerings to the good

¹ Vohu Manah, Asha, and Khshathra.

² Âramaiti, Haurvatât, and Ameretatât.

³ It would seem that the Yasna must have been at the time celebrated in the houses of the worshippers. Hence perhaps some of the priests were pairigathans.

Fravashis of the saints who are mighty and overwhelming for the succour of the saints.

7. Yea, we present these hereby to the Creator Ahura Mazda, the radiant, the glorious, and the heavenly spirit, for the sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise of the Bountiful Immortals (all).

8. And we present these hereby to the Day-lords of the ritual order, to Hâvani, to Sâvanghi, and to Vîsya, the holy lords of the ritual order, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and for praise, and to Mithra of the wide pastures, and the thousand ears, and the myriad eyes, the Yazad of the spoken name,

9. And to Rapithwina, Frâdat-fshu, and Zantuma, the holy lords of the ritual order, and to Righteousness the Best, and to Ahura Mazda's Fire,

10. And to Uzayêirina, Frâdat-vîra, and Dahv-yuma¹, the holy lords of the ritual order, and to that lofty lord Napât-apâm, and to the water Mazda-made,

11. And to Aiwisrûthrima, the life-furtherer², and to Frâdat-vîspâm-hugyâiti and Zarathustrôtema, the holy lords of the ritual order, and to the Fravashis of the saints, and to the women who bring forth many sons, and to the Prosperous home-life which endures without reverse throughout the year, and to Force, well-shaped and stately, and to the Blow of victory which Mazda gives, and to the Victorious Ascendency which it secures, for their sacrifice, homage, their propitiation, and their praise,

12. And to Ushahina, with Beregya and Nmânya, and Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, smiting with the blow of victory and furthering the settlements, and to Rashnu, the most just, and to Arstât, furthering the settlements, and causing them to increase.

¹ Dahyuma.

² Aibigaya.

13. And these we announce and we present hereby to the Month-lords of the ritual order, to the new moon and the waning moon (the moon within), and to the full moon which scatters night, the holy lord of the ritual order, for (their) sacrifice, homage, their propitiation, and their praise.

14. And these we announce hereby and we present to the Yearly festivals, to Maidhyô-zaremaya, Maidhyô-shema, Patishahya, and to Ayâthrima, to Maidhyâirya, Hamaspathmaêdhaya, and to the Seasons as holy lords of the ritual order, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and for praise.

15. And these we announce and we present hereby to all those lords who are the three and thirty lords of the ritual order, who approach the nearest around about our Hâvani, and which are the festivals of Righteousness the Best, inculcated by Mazda, and uttered forth by Zarathustra for their sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise.

16. And these we announce and we present to Ahura and to Mithra, the lofty, and imperishable, and holy two, to the stars, the creatures of Spenta Mainyu, and to the star Tistrya, the radiant, the glorious, and to the Moon which contains the seed of cattle, and to the resplendent Sun, of the swift horses, Ahura Mazda's eye, and to Mithra, the lord of provinces, for their sacrifice, homage, their propitiation and their praise; yea, these we present hereby to Ahura Mazda (as he rules this day) and to the Fravashis of the saints (as they rule this month), for their sacrifice, homage, their propitiation and their praise.

17. And these we announce hereby to thee, the Fire, O Ahura Mazda's son! with all the fires for thy sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise, and to the good waters for the sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise of all the waters Mazda-made, and to all the plants which Mazda made,

18. And to the Māthra Spenta, the holy, the effective, the law against the Daêvas, the Zarathustrian statute, and to the long descent of the good Mazdayasnian religion.

19. And these we announce and we present hereby to Mount Ushi-darena, Mazda-made, brilliant with sanctity, and to all the mountains shining with their holiness, abundantly luminous, and Mazda-made, and to the Kingly glory, the unconsumed¹ glory Mazda-made, and to the good Blessedness, and the good Religious-knowledge, and the good Rectitude, and to the good Rasāstāt, and to the Glory and the Benefit which Mazda created.)

20. And these we offer and present to the pious and good Blessing of the pious, and to the swift and dreadful Yazad, the Curse of wisdom.

21. And to these places, pastures, and dwellings with their springs of water, their rivers, to the lands and to the plants, to this earth and yon heaven, to the holy wind, to the stars, moon, and sun, to the stars without beginning, self-disposed, and to all the holy creatures of the Spenta Mainyu, male and female (the rulers as they are of the ritual order).

22. And these we announce and we present hereby to that lofty lord who is Asha, the ritual righteousness itself, to the Day-lords, and the Month-lords, the Year-lords, and the Seasons who are the lords of the ritual at the time of Hāvani, and for their sacrifice, homage, their propitiation and their praise.

¹ Unseized (?).

23. Yea, these we announce and we present to Sraosha, the blessed and mighty, whose body is the Māthra, him of the daring spear, the lordly one, and to the holy Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitāma, the saint.

And these we announce and we present to thee, the Fire, O Ahura Mazda's son! for thy sacrifice, homage, thy propitiation, and thy praise.

24. And these we announce and we present to the Fravashis of the saints, the mighty and overwhelming, of the saints of the ancient lore, and of the next of kin.

25. And these we announce and we present hereby to all the good Yazads, earthly and heavenly, who are (meet) for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and for praise, because of Asha Vahista (who is Righteousness the Best).

We worship the Bountiful Immortals who rule aright, and who dispose of all aright.

26. And that one of beings (do we worship) whose superior (service) in the sacrifice Ahura Mazda knows, and from his righteousness (which he maintains, and those of all female beings do we worship) whose (higher service is thus likewise known; yea, all male and female beings do we worship (who are such))¹!

YASNA V.

This chapter is identical with Yasna XXXVII.

¹ Elsewhere with slight verbal change.

YASNA VI¹.

THE SACRIFICE CONTINUES WITH FULLER EXPRESSION.

1. We worship the Creator Ahura Mazda with our sacrifice, and the Bountiful Immortals who rule aright, and who dispose of all aright.

2. And we worship the Asnya with our sacrifice, and Hâvani, Sâvanghi and Vîsya, the holy lords of the ritual order, and Mithra of the wide pastures, of the thousand ears, and myriad eyes, the Yazad of the spoken name, and we worship Râman Hvâstra.

3. And we worship Rapithwina with our sacrifice, and Frâdat-fshu, and the Zantuma, and Righteousness the Best, and the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son, holy lords of the ritual order.

4. And we worship Uzayêirina, and Frâdat-vîtra, and *Dahvyuma, the holy lord of the ritual order, and that kingly Ahura, the radiant Napât-apâm, of the fleet horses, and the water holy, and Mazda-made.

5. And we worship Aiwisrûthrima and Aibigaya in our sacrifice, the holy lord of the ritual order, and Frâdat-vîspâm-hugyâiti and the Zarathustrôtema, the holy lord of the ritual order, and the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the saints, and the women who bring forth many sons, and the Prosperous home-life which endures without reverse throughout the year, and Force which is well-shaped and stately, and the Blow which brings the victory, which is Ahura-given, and the Victorious Ascendency (which it secures).

6. And we worship Ushahina with our sacrifice, and

¹ This chapter differs from Y. II only in having yazamaidê instead of the formula ahmya zaotrê baresmanaêka—âyêê yêsti. Expressions for the same Zend words are purposely varied.

Beregya, and Nmânya, and Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed and the stately who smites with victory, and makes the settlements advance, and Rashnu, the most just, and Arstât who makes the settlements advance and causes them to increase, the holy lords of the ritual order.

7. And we worship the Mâhya in our sacrifice, the new moon and the waning moon (the moon within) and the full moon which scatters night, the holy lord of the ritual order.

8. And we worship the Yearly festivals in our sacrifice, Maidhyô-zaremaya, Maidhyô-shema, Paitishahya, and Ayâthrima, the furtherer (or breeder), the spender of virile strength, and Maidhyâirya, the holy lord of the ritual order, and Hamaspathmaêdhaya, and the Seasons (in which they are).

9. And we worship with our sacrifice all the lords of the ritual order, who are the thirty and three who approach the nearest around about us at Hâvani, who are the lords of Righteousness the Best, and whose observances were inculcated by Ahura Mazda, and uttered forth by Zarathustra.

10. And we worship Ahura and Mithra with our sacrifice, the lofty, and imperishable, and holy two, and the stars, moon, and sun, among the plants of the Baresman, and Mithra, the province-lord of all the provinces, even Ahura Mazda, the radiant, the glorious, and the good, valiant, and bountiful Fravashis of the saints.

11. And we worship thee, the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son, together with all the fires, and the good waters, the best and Mazda-made, and holy, even all the waters which are Mazda-made and holy, and all the plants which Mazda made.

12. And we worship the Māthra Spenta with our sacrifice, the glorious and of a truth, the law revealed against the Daêvas, the Zarathustrian law, and we worship with our sacrifice its long descent, and the good Mazdayasnian Religion.

13. And we worship Mount Ushi-darena, the Mazda-made, the glorious Yazad, shining with holiness, and all the mountains that shine with holiness, with abundant brilliance, Mazda-made, the holy lords of the ritual order. And we worship the mighty Kingly glory Mazda-made, the mighty glory, unconsumed and Mazda-made, and the good Sanctity, the brilliant, the lofty, the powerful and the stately, delivering (men) with its inherent power. Yea, we worship the Glory, and the Benefit which are Mazda-made.

14. And we worship the pious and good Blessing with our sacrifice, and the pious man, the saint, and that Yazad, the mighty Curse of wisdom.

15. And we worship these waters, lands, and plants, these places, districts, pastures, and abodes with their springs of water, and we worship this lord of the district with our sacrifice, who is Ahura Mazda (Himself).

16. And we worship all the greatest lords, the Day-lords in the day's duration, and the Day-lords during daylight, and the Month-lords, and the Year-lords.

17. And we worship Haurvatât (who guards the water) and Ameretatât (who guards the plants and the wood), and Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed and the stately, who smites with the blow of victory, and makes the settlements advance, the holy lord of the ritual order.

18. And we worship Haoma with our sacrifice and the Haoma-juice. And we worship the sacred Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitâma the saint.

And we worship the wood-billets, and the perfume and thee, the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son, the holy lord of the ritual order.

19. And we worship the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the saints.

20. And we worship all the holy Yazads, and all the lords of the ritual order at the time of Hâvani, and Sâvanghi, and all the greatest lords at their (proper) time. (The Yênhê hâtâm follows.)

21. The Ratu. As an Ahû (revered and) to be chosen, the priest speaks forth to me.

The Zaoatar. So let the Ratu from his Righteousness, holy and learned, speak forth!

YASNA VII.

PRESENTATION OF OFFERINGS BY THE PRIEST WITH THE OBJECT OF PROPITIATION NAMED.

1. With a complete and sacred offering¹ I offer and I give this meat-offering, and (with it) Haurvatât (who guards the water), and Ameretatât (who guards the plants and the wood), and the flesh of the Kine of blessed gift, for the propitiation of Ahura Mazda, and of the Bountiful Immortals (all, and) for the propitiation of Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, endowed with sanctity, who smites with the blow of victory, and who causes the settlements to advance.

¹ With Ashi; possibly 'for a blessing,' as Ashi often has the sense of 'reward,' but scrupulous sanctity and completeness seem to be the sense here. (Expressions here are as usual varied.)

2. And I offer the Haoma and Haoma-juice with a complete and sacred offering for the propitiation of the Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitâma the saint, and I offer the wood-billets with the perfume for Thy propitiation, the Fire's, O Ahura Mazda's son!

3. And I offer the Haomas with a complete and sacred offering for propitiation [to the good waters] for the good waters Mazda-made. And I offer this Haoma-water with scrupulous exactness and with sanctity, and this fresh milk, and the plant Hadhânaêpata uplifted with a complete and sacred offering for the propitiation of the waters which are Mazda-made.

4. And I offer this Baresman with its Zaothra (and with its binding) for a girdle spread with complete sanctity and order for the propitiation of the Bountiful Immortals, and I offer with my voice the thoughts well-thought, the words well-spoken, and the deeds well-done, and the heard recital of the Gâthas, the Mâthras well-composed and well-delivered, and this Lordship, and this Sanctity, and this ritual mastership, and the timely Prayer for blessings, with a complete and sacred offering for the propitiation of the holy Yazads, heavenly and earthly, and for the contentment of the individual soul!

5. And I offer to the Asnya with a complete and sacred offering, as lords of the ritual order, and to Hâvani, and to Sâvanghi and Vîsya, holy lords of the ritual order, and to Mithra of the wide pastures, of the thousand ears, and myriad eyes, the Yazad of the spoken name, and to Râman Hvâstra.

6. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to Rapithwina, the holy lord of the ritual order; and I offer to Frâdat-fshu and to the Zantuma, and to Asha Vahista (who is Righteousness the Best) and to Ahura Mazda's Fire.

7. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to Uzayêirina, Frâdať-vîra, and to the *Dahvyuma, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to that lofty Ahura Napât-apâm, and to the waters which Mazda created.

8. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to Aiwisrûthrima, the life-furtherer, and to Frâdať-vîspâm-hugyâiti, and to the Zarathustrôtema, and to the Fravashis of the saints, and to the women who have many sons, and to the Prosperous home-life which endures (without reverse) throughout the year, and to Force, the well-shaped and stately, and to the Blow which smites with victory Ahura-given, and to the Victorious Ascendency (which it secures).

9. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to Ushahina, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Beregya, and Nmânya, and to Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, endowed with sanctity, who smites with the blow of victory, and makes the settlements advance, and to Rashnu the most just, and to Arstât who furthers the settlements and causes them to increase.

10. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to the Mâhya, lords of the ritual order, to the new and the waning moon (the moon within), and to the full moon which scatters night, holy lords of the ritual order.

11. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to the Yearly festivals, the lords of the ritual order, to Maidhyô-zaremaya, and Maidhyô-shema, to Paitishahya, and to Ayâthrima the furtherer (the breeder), the spender of the strength of males, and to Maidhyâirya and Hamaspathmaêdhaya, holy lords of the ritual order, and I offer with sanctity to the several seasons, the lords of the ritual order.

12. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to all those lords who are the thirty and three, who approach the nearest round about our Hâvani, and who are the lords of Asha (the ritual by-eminence), of Righteousness who is (the Best), whose observances are inculcated as precepts by Mazda, and uttered forth by Zarathustra.

13. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to Ahura and Mithra, the lofty and imperishable, and holy two, and to the stars which are the creatures of Spenta Mainyu, and to the star Tistrya, the radiant, the glorious, and to the Moon which contains the seed of cattle in its beams, and to the resplendent Sun of the fleet horses, the eye of Ahura Mazda, and to Mithra, the lord of the provinces. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to Ahura Mazda, the resplendent, the glorious, (who rules this day), and to the Fravashis of the saints (who name the month).

14. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to thee, the Fire, O Ahura Mazda's son! together with all the fires, and to the good waters, even to the waters which are Mazda-made, and to all the plants which Mazda made.

15. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to the Mâthra Spenta, the holy, the effective, revealed against the Daêvas, the Zarathustrian law, and to the long descent of the good Religion, of the Mazdayasnian faith.

16. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to Mount Ushi-darena, the Mazda-made, brilliant with holiness, and to all the mountains shining with holiness, of abundant brightness, and which Mazda made, and to the Royal glory unconsumed and Mazda-made. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to Ashi Vanguhi, and to Kisti Vanguhi, and to Erethe, and to Rasāstāt, and to the Glory (and the) Benefit which Mazda made.

17. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to the good and pious Prayer for blessings of the pious man, and to that Yazad, the swift and dreadful Curse of the wise.

18. And I offer with a complete and sacred blessing to these places, districts, pastures, and abodes with their springs of water, and to the waters and the lands, and the plants, and to this earth and yon heaven, and to the holy wind, and to the stars, and the moon, even to the stars without beginning (to their course), the self-appointed, and to all the holy creatures of Spenta Mainyu, be they male or female, regulators (as they are) of the ritual order.

19. And I offer with a complete and sacred blessing to that lofty lord who is Righteousness (the Best), and the Day-lords, the lords of the days during their duration, and to those of the days during daylight, and to the Month-lords, and the Year-lords, and to those of the seasons, the lords who are lords of the ritual, and at the time of Hâvani.

20. And I offer the Myazda meat-offering with a complete and sacred offering, and Haurvatât (who guards the water), and Ameretatât (who guards the wood), and the flesh of the Kine of blessed gift, for the propitiation of Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, whose body is the Māthra, him of the daring spear, the lordly, the Yazad of the spoken name.

21. And I offer the Haoma and the Haoma-juice for the propitiation of the Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitâma the saint, the Yazad of the spoken name.

And I offer the wood-billets with the perfume for Thy propitiation, the Fire's, Ahura Mazda's son, the Yazad of the spoken name.

22. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to the Fravashis of the saints, the mighty and overwhelming, to those of the saints of the ancient lore, and to those of the next of kin.

23. And I offer with a complete and sacred offering to all the lords of the ritual order, and to all the good Yazads heavenly and earthly who are (meet) for sacrifice and homage because of Asha who is Vahista (of Righteousness who is the Best).

24. May that approach to us, and with a sacred blessing (O Lord!) whose benefits the offerers are seeking for. Thy praisers and Māthra-speakers, O Ahura Mazda! may we be named; we desire it, and such may we be. What reward, O Ahura Mazda! adapted to myself Thou hast appointed unto souls,

25. Of this do Thou Thyself bestow upon us for this world and for that of mind; (yea, do Thou bestow) so much of this as that we may attain to Thy ruling protection and to that of Righteousness for ever.

26. We sacrifice to the Ahuna-vairya, and to the veracious word correctly uttered, and to the good and pious prayer for blessings, and to the dreadful curse of the wise, the Yazad, and to Haurvatâ/ and Ameretatâ/, and to the flesh of the Kine of blessed gift, and to the Haoma and Haoma-juice, and to the wood-billets, and the perfume, for the praise of the pious and good prayer for blessings.

The Yênhê hâtâm.

27. (To that one) of beings do we sacrifice whose superior (fidelity) in the sacrifice Ahura Mazda knows through his Righteousness (within him, yea, even to those female saints do we sacrifice) whose (superior sanctity is thus known. We sacrifice to all) both males and females whose (superiority is such). (The Ratu speaks.) As an Ahû (revered and) to be chosen, he who is the Zaoatar speaks forth to me.

(The Zaoatar.) So let the Ratu from his Righteousness, holy and learned, speak forth!

YASNA VIII.

OFFERING OF THE MEAT-OFFERING IN PARTICULAR.
THE FAITHFUL PARTAKE.

I. A blessing is Righteousness (called) the Best.

It is weal ; it is weal to this (man),

When toward Righteousness Best there is right.

I offer the Myazda (of the) meat-offering with a complete and sacred offering ; and I offer Haurvatatâ (who guards the water), and Ameretatâ (who guards the plants and the wood), and the flesh of the blessed Kine ; and I offer the Haoma and the Haoma-juice, the wood-billets and the perfume for the praise of Ahura Mazda, and of the Ahuna-vairya, the veracious word, and for that of the pious and beneficent Prayer for blessings, and for the redoubted Curse of the wise, and for the praise of the Haoma, and of the Mâthra of the holy Zarathustra ; and may it come to us with sacred fulness (to accept and to recompense our gift).

2. (The Ratu speaks.) Eat, O ye men, of this Myzda, the meat-offering, ye who have deserved it by your righteousness and correctness!

3. O ye Bountiful Immortals, and thou, the Mazdayasnian law, ye just men and just women, and ye Zaothrás, whoever among these Mazdayasnians would call himself a Mazdayasnian desiring to live in the practice of the liberality of Righteousness [for by sorcery the settlements of Righteousness are ruined], do ye cause (such an one) to be (still further) taught, (ye), who are the waters, the plants, and the Zaothras !

4. And whoever of these Mazdayasnians, adults, when he invokes with earnestness, does not adhere to these words, and (so) speaks, he approaches to that (word) of the magician ; (but, as against that magician's word) 'a blessing is Righteousness (called) the Best.'

5. May'st Thou, O Ahura Mazda ! reign at Thy will, and with a saving rule over Thine own creatures, and render Ye the holy (man) also a sovereign at his will over waters, and over plants, and over all the clean and sacred (creatures) which contain the seed of Righteousness. Strip ye the wicked of all power !

6. Absolute in power may the holy be, bereft of all free choice the wicked ! Gone (may he be), met as foe, carried out from the creatures of Spenta Mainyu, hemmed in¹ without power over any wish !

7. I will incite, even I who am Zarathustra², the heads of the houses, villages, Zantus, and provinces, to the careful following of this Religion which is that of Ahura, and according to Zarathustra, in their thoughts, their words, and their deeds.

¹ Or 'shut out,' which would seem better adapted.

² This piece is a reproduction, or close imitation, of some earlier fragment. It sounds like an exhortation delivered while the Faith was still new.

8. I pray for the freedom and glory of the entire existence of the holy (man) while I bless it, and I pray for the repression and shame¹ of the entire existence² of the wicked.

9. Propitiation to Haoma who brings righteousness (to us) for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and for praise. (The Zaothar ?) As the Ahû to be (revered and) chosen, the Zaothar speaks forth to me. (The Ratu.) As an Ahû to be (revered and) chosen, the Zaothar speaks forth to me. (The Zaothar.) So let the Ratu from his Righteousness, holy and learned, speak forth !

YASNA IX.

THE HÔM YAST.

The Haoma-yast has claims to antiquity (owing to its subject, but not to its dialect), next after the Srôš-yast. H(a)oma=Soma, as a deity, flourished not only before the Gâthas, but before the Rîks of the Veda, in Aryan ages before Iranian and Indian became two peoples.

The astonishing circumstance has been elsewhere noted that a hymn, which is a reproduction of an Aryan original, should, notwithstanding its earlier characteristics, be necessarily assigned to a date much later than the Gâthas in which H(a)oma worship is not mentioned.

¹ The Pahlavi translator, as I think, had a text before him which read duszhvâthrem ; I so correct. Against the keen and most interesting suggestion of dusz + âthrem, I am compelled to note ahvâthrê, showing a compositum a + hvâthra, which seems not probable if = a + hu + âthra. Duszâthra, not ahvâthrê, would have been written. Cp. hveng=hvan for root.

² Possibly 'house.'

Probably on account of bitter animosities prevailing between their more southern neighbours and themselves, and the use of Soma by the Indians as a stimulant before battle, the Iranians of the Gâthic period had become lukewarm in their own H(a)oma worship. But that it should have revived, as we see it in this Yast, after having nearly or quite disappeared, is most interesting and remarkable. Was it definitively and purposely repudiated by Zarathustra, afterwards reviving as by a relapse? I do not think that it is well to hold to such deliberate and conscious antagonisms, and to a definite policy and action based upon them. The Soma-worship, like the sacramental acts of other religions which have become less practised after exaggerated attention, had simply fallen into neglect, increased by an aversion to practices outwardly similar to those of 'Daêva-worshippers.' The Yast is, of course, made up of fragments, which I have endeavoured to separate by lines. In the translation I have given a rhythmical rendering, necessarily somewhat free. It was difficult to import sufficient vivacity to the piece, while using a uselessly awkward literalness. The freedom, as elsewhere, often consists in adding words to point the sense, or round the rhythm. (Expressions for identical Zend words have been here, as elsewhere, purposely varied.)

1. At the hour of Hâvani¹. H(a)oma came to Zarathustra, as he served the (sacred) Fire, and sanctified (its flame), while he sang aloud the Gâthas.

And Zarathustra asked him: Who art thou, O man! who art of all the incarnate world the most beautiful in Thine own body² of those whom I have seen, (thou) glorious [immortal]?

2. Thereupon gave H(a)oma answer³, the holy one who driveth death afar: I am, O Zarathustra

¹ In the morning from six to ten.

² Or, 'beautiful of life.'

³ 'Me,' omitted as interrupting rhythm, seems to be merely dramatic; or did it indicate that there was an original Zarathustrian Haoma Gâtha from which this is an extension?

H(a)oma, the holy and driving death afar ; pray to me, O Spitâma, prepare me for the taste. Praise toward me in (Thy) praises as the other [Saosh-yants] praise.

3. Thereupon spake Zarathustra : Unto H(a)oma be the praise¹. What man, O H(a)oma ! first prepared thee for the corporeal world ? What blessedness was offered him ? what gain did he acquire ?

4. Thereupon did H(a)oma answer me, he the holy one, and driving death afar : Vivanghvant² was the first of men who prepared me for the incarnate world. This blessedness was offered him ; this gain did he acquire, that to him was born a son who was Yima, called the brilliant, (he of the many flocks, the most glorious of those yet born, the sunlike-one of men³), that he made from his authority both herds and people free from dying, both plants and waters free from drought, and men could eat imperishable food.

5. In the reign of Yima swift of motion was there neither cold nor heat, there was neither age nor death, nor envy⁴ demon-made. Like fifteen-yearlings⁵ walked the two forth, son and father, in their stature and their form, so long as Yima, son of Vivanghvant ruled, he of the many herds !

6. Who was the second man, O H(a)oma ! who

¹ Might not the entire sixteenth verse be placed here ?

² The fifth from Gaya Maretan the Iranian Adam, but his counterpart, the Indian Vivasvat, appears not only as the father of Yama, but of Manu, and even of the gods, (as promoted mortals ?).

³ Compare svar-dṛśas pávamânâs.

⁴ So the Pahlavi.

⁵ Males, like females, seem to have been considered as developed at fifteen years of age.

prepared thee for the corporeal world? What sanctity was offered him? what gain did he acquire?

7. Thereupon gave H(a)oma answer, he the holy one, and driving death afar: Âthwya¹ was the second who prepared me for the corporeal world. This blessedness was given him, this gain did he acquire, that to him a son was born, Thraêtaona² of the heroic tribe,

8. Who smote the dragon Dahâka³, three-jawed and triple-headed, six-eyed, with thousand powers, and of mighty strength, a lie-demon of⁴ the Daêvas, evil for our settlements, and wicked, whom the evil spirit Angra Mainyu made as the most mighty Drug(k) [against the corporeal world], and for the murder of (our) settlements, and to slay the (homes) of Asha!

9. Who was the third man, O H(a)oma! who prepared thee for the corporeal world? What blessedness was given him? what gain did he acquire?

10. Thereupon gave H(a)oma answer, the holy one, and driving death afar: Thrîta⁵, [the most helpful of the Sâmas⁶], was the third man who prepared me for the corporeal world. This blessedness was given

¹ Comp. Tritá âptîá.

² Comp. the Indian Traitâná connected with Tritá.

³ Let it be remembered that Tritá smote the Ahi before Indra, Indra seeming only to re-enact the more original victory which the Avesta notices. Concerning Azhi Dahâka, see Windischmann's Zendstudien, s. 136.

⁴ Free.

⁵ In the Rîg-veda âptyá seems only an epithet added to the name Tritá*; and the two serpents of the Avesta are suspicious. Two names seem to have become two persons, or has the Avesta the more correct representation?

⁶ Have we the Semites here? They certainly penetrated as conquerors far into Media, and it seems uncritical to deny their leaving traces. The gloss may be very old.

* And to that of other gods.

him, this gain did he acquire, that to him two sons were born, Urvâkhshaya and Keresâspa, the one a judge confirming order, the other a youth of great ascendant, ringlet-headed¹, bludgeon-bearing.

11. He who smote the horny dragon swallowing men, and swallowing horses, poisonous, and green of colour, over which, as thick as thumbs are, greenish poison flowed aside, on whose back once Keresâspa cooked his meat in iron caldron at the noon-day meal; and the deadly, scorched, upstarted², and springing off, dashed out the water as it boiled. Headlong fled affrighted manly-minded³ Keresâspa.

12. Who was the fourth man who prepared thee,

¹ Comp. Kapardînam.

² I abandon reluctantly the admirable comparison of hvîs with the Indian svîd (Geldner), also when explained as an inchoative (Barth.), but the resulting meaning is far from natural either here or in Vend. III, 32 (Sp. 105). That the dragon should begin to sweat (!) under the fire which was kindled upon his back, and which caused him to spring away, seems difficult. The process was not so deliberate. He was scorched, started, and then sprang. Also in Vend. III, 32 when the barley is produced the demons hardly 'sweat (with mental misery).' The idea is too advanced for the document. Burnouf's and Haug's 'hiss' was much better in both places. But I prefer the hint of the Pahlavi lââ vazîrînd. In Vend. III, 32 (Sp. 105), khîst-hômand. Ner. taptastka sa nrisam-sah kukshubhe [dvîpâdo * babhûva]. Whether hvîsatka=hîsatka (?) has anything to do with hiz or khiz=Pahlavi âkhîzîdanô †, N. P. 'hîzîdan, is a question. I follow tradition without etymological help; perhaps we might as well write the word like the better known form as a conjecture.

³ The Pahlavi translator makes the attempt to account for the epithet 'manly-minded' as applied to Keresâspa while yet he fled affrighted; he says: Hômand marðmînisnih hanâ yehevînd, aîghas libbem-man pavan gâsdârt; Ner. asya paurushamânasatvam * idam babhûva yad asau kaitanyam sthâne dadhau, 'his manly-mindedness was this, that he kept his wits on the occasion.' See the same story treated somewhat differently in the Yasts by Darmesteter (p. 295, note 2).

† Or, âkhîzîdanô.

O H(a)oma ! for the corporeal world ? What blessedness was given him ? what gain did he acquire ?

13. Thereupon gave H(a)oma answer, he the holy, and driving death afar : Pourushaspa¹ was the fourth man who prepared me for the corporeal world. This blessedness was given him, this gain did he acquire, that thou, O Zarathustra ! wast born to him, the just, in Pourushaspa's house, the D(a)êva's foe, the friend of Mazda's lore, (14) famed in Airyêna Vaêgah ; and thou, O Zarathustra ! didst recite the first the Ahuna-vairya², four times intoning it, and with verses kept apart [(Pâzand) each time with louder and still louder voice].

15. And thou didst cause, O Zarathustra ! all the demon-gods to vanish in the ground who aforetime flew about this earth in human shape (and power. This hast thou done), thou who hast been the strongest, and the staunchest, the most active, and the swiftest, and (in every deed) the most victorious in the two spirits'³ world.

16. Thereupon spake Zarathustra : Praise to H(a)oma. Good is H(a)oma, and the well-endowed, exact and righteous in its nature, and good inherently, and healing, beautiful of form, and good in deed, and most successful in its working⁴, golden-hued, with bending sprouts. As it is the best for drinking, so (through its sacred stimulus) is it the most nutritious⁵ for the soul.

17. I make my claim on thee, O yellow one ! for ¹ Son of Pâtîrasp or Spêtârasp ; Bundahis XXXII, 1, 2, &c.

² The Ahuna-vairya is in the Gâthic dialect, and in the Ahuna-vaiti metre ; it may have been composed by Z. It named the Gâtha.

³ Comp. Y. XXX, 6 ?

⁴ Free.

⁵ Comp. pathmæng gavôî.

inspiration¹. I make my claim on thee for strength ; I make my claim on thee for victory ; I make my claim on thee for health and healing (when healing is my need) ; I make my claim on thee for progress and increased prosperity, and vigour of the entire frame, and for understanding², of each adorning kind, and for this, that I may have free course among our settlements, having power where I will, overwhelming angry malice, and a conqueror of lies.

18. Yea, I make my claim on thee that I may overwhelm the angry hate of haters, of the D(a)êvas and of mortals, of the sorcerers and sirens³, of the tyrants⁴, and the Kavis, of the Karpans, murderous bipeds, of the sanctity-destroyers, the profane apostate bipeds, of the wolves four-footed monsters, of the invading host, wide-fronted, which with strata-gems⁵ advance.

19. This first blessing I beseech of thee, O H(a)oma, thou that drivest death afar ! I beseech of thee for (heaven), the best life of the saints, the radiant, all-glorious⁶.

This second blessing I beseech of thee, O H(a)oma, thou that drivest death afar ! this body's health (before that blest life is attained).

This third blessing I beseech of thee, O H(a)oma, thou that drivest death afar ! the long vitality of life.

¹ Or, is madhem related to medhá as well as mazdâ (fem.) ?

² Pahl. farzânakîh.

³ Hardly 'witches,' outwardly attractive, but evil female beings.

⁴ Pahl. sâstârânô.

⁵ Pahl. pavan frîfârîh ; Ner. pratâranatayâ.

⁶ Vispô-hvâthrem does not mean 'comfortable' here. Hvan is the root ; comp. hveng=sun.

20. This fourth blessing I beseech of thee, O H(a)oma, thou that drivest death afar! that I may stand forth on this earth with desires gained¹, and powerful, receiving satisfaction, overwhelming the assaults of hate, and conquering the lie.

This fifth blessing, O H(a)oma, I beseech of thee, thou that drivest death afar! that I may stand victorious on earth, conquering in battles², overwhelming the assaults of hate, and conquering the lie.

21. This sixth blessing I ask of thee, O H(a)oma, thou that drivest death afar! that we may get good warning of the thief, good warning of the murderer, see first the bludgeon-bearer, get first sight of the wolf. May no one whichsoever get first the sight of us. In the strife with each may we be they who get the first alarm!

22. H(a)oma grants to racers³ who would run a course with span both speed and bottom (in their horses). H(a)oma grants to women come to bed with child a brilliant offspring and a righteous line.

H(a)oma grants to those (how many!) who have long sat searching books, more knowledge and more wisdom.

23. H(a)oma grants to those long maidens, who sit at home unwed, good husbands, and that as soon as asked, he H(a)oma, the well-minded.

24. H(a)oma lowered Keresâni⁴, dethroned him from his throne, for he grew so fond of power, that

¹ Pahl. min hvâstâr.

² Pahl. vâniđâr pavan kûshânô.

³ Arvantô=aurvantô; so the Pahl. arvand.

⁴ Comp. the Vedic Kṛiśānu, archer and demi-god who guarded the Soma. Ner. seems to notice that the name recalls that of the Christians.

he treacherously said: No priest behind ¹ (and watching) shall walk the lands for me, as a counsellor to prosper them, he would rob everything of progress, he would crush the growth of all !

25. Hail to thee, O H(a)oma, who hast power as thou wilt, and by thine inborn strength ! Hail to thee, thou art well-versed in many sayings, and true and holy words. Hail to thee for thou dost ask no wily questions, but questionest direct.

26. Forth hath Mazda borne to thee, the star-bespangled girdle ², the spirit-made, the ancient one, the Mazdayasnian Faith.

So with this thou art begirt on the summits of the mountains, for the spreading of the precepts, and the headings ³ of the Māthra, (and to help the Māthra's teacher),

27. O H(a)oma, thou house-lord, and thou clan-lord, thou tribe-lord, and chieftain of the land, and thou successful learned teacher, for aggressive strength I speak to thee, for that which smites with victory, and for my body's saving, and for manifold delight !

28. Bear off from us the torment and the malice of the hateful. Divert the angry foe's intent !

What man soever in this house is violent and wicked, what man soever in this village, or this tribe, or province, seize thou away the fleetness from his feet; throw thou a veil of darkness o'er his mind; make thou his intellect (at once) a wreck!

¹ So the Pahlavi, before others, read apās ; comp. frās.

² Haug's keen-sighted suggestion, pourvanfm=paurva=the Pleiades + nfm=leading the P., looks doubtful, and seems refuted by Yast XXIV, 29, where Darmesteter renders a word probably akin, as 'the many.' I would here render 'the former.'

³ The 'grasp,' the 'summary of them.'

29. Let not the man who harms us, mind or body, have power to go forth on both his legs, or hold with both his hands, or see with both his eyes, not the land (beneath his feet), or the herd before his face.

30. At the aroused and fearful¹ Dragon, green, and belching forth his poison, for the righteous saint that perishes, yellow H(a)oma, hurl thy mace²!

At the (murderous) bludgeon-bearer, committing deeds unheard of³, blood-thirsty, (drunk) with fury, yellow H(a)oma, hurl thy mace!

31. Against the wicked human tyrant, hurling weapons at the head, for the righteous saint that perishes, yellow H(a)oma, hurl thy mace!

Against the righteousness-disturber, the unholy life-destroyer, thoughts and words of our⁴ religion well-delivering, yet in actions never reaching, for the righteous saint that perishes, yellow H(a)oma, hurl thy mace!

32. Against the body of the harlot, with her magic minds o'erthrowing with (intoxicating) pleasures⁵, to the lusts her person offering, whose⁶ mind as vapour wavers as it flies before the wind, for the righteous saint that perishes, yellow H(a)oma, hurl thy mace!

¹ Pahl. sakhmakan; Ner. bhayamkare.

² Or, 'strike thy club.'

³ 'Deeds apart,' 'evil deeds.'

⁴ Free.

⁵ Or, 'holding.'

⁶ Yênhê must be an error; otherwise 'offering the person to him whose mind as vapour wavers.'

YASNA X.

1. Let the Demon-gods and Goddesses fly far away¹ from hence, and let the good Sraosha make here his home! [And may the good Blessedness here likewise dwell], and may she here spread delight and peace within this house, Ahura's, which is sanctified by H(a)oma, bringing righteousness (to all).

2. At the first force of thy pressure, O intelligent! I praise thee with my voice, while I grasp at first thy shoots. At thy next pressure, O intelligent! I praise thee with my voice, when as with full force of a man I crush thee down.

3. I praise the cloud that waters thee, and the rains which make thee grow on the summits of the mountains; and I praise thy lofty mountains where the H(a)oma branches spread².

4. This wide earth do I praise, expanded far (with paths), the productive, the full bearing, thy mother, holy plant! Yea, I praise the lands where thou dost grow, sweet-scented, swiftly spreading, the good growth of the Lord. O H(a)oma, thou growest on the mountains, apart on many paths³, and there still may'st thou flourish. The springs of Righteousness most verily thou art, (and the fountains of the ritual find their source in thee)!

¹ The Pahlavi as corrected by the MS. of Dastur Hoshanggi Gâmâspgi has barâ akhar min latamman padênd barâ shêdâ-; Ner. Rîte pasêât asmât prapatanti, rîte devâh rîte devasahâyâh devyâh, uttamañ Sroso nivasati.

² Or, 'where, O Haoma! thou hast grown,' reading—isa with Barth. as 2nd sing. perf. pret. middle.

³ Or, 'on the pathways of the birds.'

5. Grow (then) because I pray to thee on all thy stems and branches, in all thy shoots (and tendrils) increase thou through my word!

6. H(a)oma grows while he is praised, and the man who praises him is therewith more victorious. The lightest pressure of thee, H(a)oma, thy feeblest praise, the slightest tasting of thy juice, avails to the thousand-smiting of the D(a)êvas.

7. Wasting doth vanish from that house, and with it foulness, whither in verity they bear thee, and where thy praise in truth is sung, the drink of H(a)oma, famed, health-bringing (as thou art). [(Pâzand) to his village and abode they bear him.]

8. All other toxicants go hand in hand with Rapine of the bloody spear, but H(a)oma's stirring power goes hand in hand with friendship. [Light is the drunkenness of H(a)oma (Pâzand).]

Who as a tender son caresses H(a)oma, forth to the bodies of such persons H(a)oma comes to heal.

9. Of all the healing virtues, H(a)oma, whereby thou art a healer, grant me some. Of all the victorious powers, whereby thou art a victor, grant me some. A faithful praiser will I be to thee, O H(a)oma, and a faithful praiser (is) a better (thing) than Righteousness the Best; so hath the Lord, declaring (it), decreed.

10. Swift¹ and wise hath the well-skilled² Deity created thee; swift and wise on high Haraiti did He, the well-skilled, plant thee.

11. And taught (by implanted instinct) on every side, the bounteous¹ birds have carried thee to the Peaks-above-the-eagles², to the mount's extremest summit, to the gorges and abysses, to the heights of many pathways³, to the snow-peaks ever whitened.

¹ Having immediate effect, and giving wisdom.

² Comp. Y. XLIV, 5.

12. There, H(a)oma, on the ranges dost thou grow of many kinds. Now thou growest of milky whiteness, and now thou growest golden; and forth thine healing liquors flow for the inspiring of the pious. So terrify away from me the (death's) aim of the curser. So terrify and crush his thought who stands as my maligner.

13. Praise be to thee, O H(a)oma, (for he makes the poor man's thoughts as great as any of the richest whomsoever.) Praise be to H(a)oma, (for he makes the poor man's thoughts as great as when mind reacheth culmination.) With manifold retainers dost thou, O H(a)oma, endow the man who drinks thee mixed with milk; yea, more prosperous thou makest him, and more endowed with mind.

14. Do not vanish from me suddenly like milk-drops in the rain; let thine exhilarations go forth ever vigorous and fresh; and let them come to me with strong effect. Before thee, holy H(a)oma, thou bearer of the ritual truth, and around thee would I cast this body, a body which (as all) may see (is fit for gift and) grown⁴.

15. I renounce with vehemence the murderous woman's⁵ emptiness, the Gaini's, hers, with intellect

¹ Possibly 'the birds taught by the bounteous one;' the 'God-taught birds.'

² Elsewhere and here also possibly a proper name.

³ Or the 'pathways of the birds;' so Haug, following Spiegel and Justi. Gugrati, as above.

⁴ Which is seen as mine well-grown.

⁵ Gaini seems always used in an evil sense in the later Avesta.

dethroned¹. She vainly thinks to foil us, and would beguile both Fire-priest and H(a)oma ; but she herself, deceived therein, shall perish. And when she sits at home², and wrongly eats of H(a)oma's offering, priest's mother will that never make her, nor give her holy³ sons !

16. ⁴To five do I belong, to five others do I not ; of the good thought am I, of the evil am I not ; of the good word am I, of the evil am I not ; of the good deed am I, and of the evil, not.

To Obedience am I given, and to deaf disobedience, not ; to the saint do I belong, and to the wicked, not ; and so from this on till the ending shall be the spirits' parting. (The two shall here divide.)

17. Thereupon spake Zarathustra : Praise to H(a)oma, Mazda-made. Good is H(a)oma, Mazda-made. All the plants of H(a)oma praise I, on the heights of lofty mountains, in the gorges of the valleys, in the clefts (of sundered hill-sides) cut for the bundles bound by women. From the silver cup I pour Thee to the golden chalice over⁵. Let me not thy (sacred) liquor spill to earth, of precious cost.

18. These are thy Gâthas⁶, holy H(a)oma, these

¹ I would correct to a form of kh ratu.

² Compare the avoiding the service mentioned by the Pahlavi translator on Y. LIII, 5.

³ Or, more safely, 'many sons.'

⁴ Haoma speaks.

⁵ Here the priest evidently manipulates the cups containing the Haoma-juice.

⁶ The application of this term here seems to point to a high antiquity for the Haoma Yast ; if not in the present piece, which is not so old as the Gâthas, then in previous hymns to Haoma of which this Yast is an improvement, or extension.

thy songs, and these thy teachings¹, and these thy truthful ritual words, health²-imparting, victory-giving, from harmful hatred healing giving.

19. These and thou art mine, and forth let thine exhilarations flow; bright and sparkling let them hold on their (steadfast) way; for light are thine exhilaration(s), and flying lightly come they here. Victory-giving smiteth H(a)oma, victory-giving is it worshipped; with this Gâthic word we praise it.

20. Praise to the Kine; praise and victory (be) spoken to her! Food for the Kine, and pasture! 'For the Kine let thrift use toil; yield thou us food³.'

21. We worship the yellow lofty one; we worship H(a)oma who causes progress, who makes the settlements advance; we worship H(a)oma who drives death afar; yea, we worship all the H(a)oma plants. And we worship (their) blessedness, and the Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitâma, the saint⁴.

YASNA XI.

PRELUDE TO THE H(A)OMA-OFFERING⁵.

1. Three clean creatures (full of blessings) curse betimes while yet invoking, the cow, the horse, and then H(a)oma. The cow cries to her driver⁶ thus:

¹ Ner. possibly figuratively yâh kas̥it asvâdanâh̥.

² Ner. saundaryam.

³ See Y. XLVIII, 5.

⁴ The Yênê hâtâm follows.

⁵ This characteristic fragment is repeated and extended in the later literature of the Parsis. The curse of the cow, horse, and of Haoma (scilicet the priest) when they are stinted, was extended to all domestic animals. It has been difficult to avoid the full metrical rhythm of the original with its jingling cadence. A full freedom is also not avoided.

⁶ Not 'to the priest;' Ner. gr̥ihîtâram.

Childless be thou, shorn of offspring, evil-famed, and slander-followed, who foddered¹ fairly dost not use me, but fattenest me for wife or children, and for thy niggard selfish meal.

2. The horse cries to his rider thus : Be not spanner² of the racers ; stretch no coursers to full-speed ; do not stride across the fleetest, thou, who dost not pray me swiftness in the meeting thick with numbers, in the circuit thronged with men.

3. H(a)oma speaks his drinker thus : Childless be thou, shorn of offspring, evil-famed, and slander-followed, who holdest me from full outpouring, as a robber, skulls in-crushing. No head-smiter³ am I ever, holy H(a)oma, far from death⁴.

4. Forth my father gave an offering, tongue and left eye chose Ahura, set apart for H(a)oma's meal.

5. Who this offering would deny me, eats himself, or prays it from me, this which Mazda gave to bless me, tongue with left eye (as my portion).

6. In his house is born no fire-priest, warrior ne'er in chariot standing, never more the thrifty tiller. In his home be born Dahâkas, Mûrakas of evil practice, doing deeds of double nature.

7. Quick, cut off then H(a)oma's portion, gift of flesh for doughty H(a)oma ! Heed lest H(a)oma

¹ 'Who dost not give me cooked (food)' seems improbable. If hvâstām means fodder, why is it fem., especially here with a feminine correlative? I think that 'having good food' is the meaning of the word, as an adjective, and agreeing with gām understood. Possibly, 'who dost not bestow upon me as the one well-foddered.'

² Dialectically used.

³ 'Light is the intoxication of Haoma ;' (other toxicants smite the head).

⁴ 'Having death afar.'

bind thee fettered, as he bound the fell Turanian Frangrasyan¹ (the murderous robber) fast in iron close-surrounded in the mid-third² of this earth! 8. Thereupon spake Zarathustra³: Praise to H(a)oma made by Mazda, good is H(a)oma Mazda-made.

9. ⁴Who to us is one hereupon to thee (becomes) two, to be made to three, for the five⁵-making of the four, for the seven-making of the sixth, who are your nine in the decade (?), who serve you and with zeal⁶.

10. ⁷To thee, O holy H(a)oma! bearer of the ritual sanctity, I offer this my person which is seen (by all to be) mature, (and fit for gift); to H(a)oma the effective do I offer it, and to the sacred exhilaration which he bestows; and do thou grant to me (for this), O holy H(a)oma! thou that drivest death afar, (Heaven) the best world of the saints, shining, all brilliant.

¹ A Turanian king.

² Observe the threefold division of the earth; see it also in Vend. II.

³ A poetical reproduction. Z. had been long among the ancient dead.

⁴ The Raspi at present hands the Haoma-cup to the priest at this point; the efficacy of the liquor is supposed to be multiplied.

⁵ Peṛdaidyâi is to be read as of course; the letter o, not unlike e in a MS. when turned, was probably half inverted.

⁶ This seems rendered by the Pahlavi as an interlude between the Ratu and the Zaoṭar; comp. Y. XXVIII, 11. Several broken sentences from other parts of the Avesta are here doubtfully recalled, perhaps as having especial sanctity.

⁷ The Raspi brings the Haoma-vessel to the Baresman at this point; and touching its stand, the Mâh-rû, lays a cloth on the right hand of the Zaoṭar, who, looking at the vessel, proceeds to recite as follows in verse 10.

11. (The Ashem Vohû, &c.)

12-15. May'st Thou rule at Thy will, O Lord¹!

16. I confess myself a Mazdayasnian of Zarathustra's order².

17. ³I celebrate my praises for good thoughts, good words, and good deeds for my thoughts, my speeches, and (my) actions. With chanting praises I present all good thoughts, good words, and good deeds, and with rejection I repudiate all evil thoughts, and words, and deeds. 18. Here I give to you, O ye Bountiful Immortals! sacrifice and homage with the mind, with words, deeds, and my entire person; yea, (I offer) to you the flesh of my very body (as your own). And I praise Righteousness. A blessing is Righteousness (called) the Best, &c.

YASNA XII (SP. XIII).

THE MAZDAYASNIAN CONFESSION⁴.

1. I drive⁵ the Daêvas hence; I confess as a Mazda-worshipper of the order of Zarathustra, estranged from the Daêvas, devoted to the lore of

¹ See Y. VIII, 5-8.

² See Y. III, 24, 25.

³ This piece is in the Gâthic dialect, and therefore an especially fitting prelude to the Confession of faith in Y. XII.

⁴ This piece in the Gâthic dialect has claims to higher antiquity next after the Haptanghâiti. Its retrospective cast shows that it is later than the original period. Verse 7 savours of a later date with its reference to the plants and waters. That Zarathustra, Kavi Vîstâspa, Frashaostra, and Gâmâspa are named by no means proves that they were still living. Still, they are not mentioned with any fanciful or superstitious exaggeration; they are not yet demi-gods.

⁵ As a partial explanation of nâismî* from nas, compare the aorist nesat. Possibly also from nad, 'I curse the demons.'

the Lord, a praiser¹ of the Bountiful Immortals; and to Ahura Mazda, the good and endowed with good possessions, I attribute all things good, to the holy One, the resplendent, to the glorious, whose are all things whatsoever which are good; whose is the Kine, whose is Asha (the righteous order pervading all things pure), whose are the stars, in whose lights the glorious beings and objects are clothed².

2. And I choose Piety, the bounteous and the good, mine may she be³. And therefore I loudly deprecate all robbery⁴ and violence against the (sacred) Kine, and all drought⁵ to the wasting of the Mazdayasnian villages.

3. Away from (?) their thoughts do I wish to lead (the thought of) wandering at will, (away the thought of) free nomadic pitching of the tent, for I wish to remove(?) all wandering from⁶ (their) Kine which abide in steadfastness upon this land; and bowing down in worship to Righteousness I dedicate my offerings with praise so far as that. Never may I stand as a source of wasting, never as a source of withering to the Mazdayasnian villages, not for the love⁷ of body or of life.

4. Away do I abjure the shelter and headship of the

¹ And sacrificer.

² A genuine citation from the Gâthas (see Y. XXXI, 7).

³ A genuine allusion to the Gâthas (Y. XXXII, 2).

⁴ This preserves the proper reading of tâyuska (so the Pahlavi) in Y. XXIX, 1.

⁵ Viyâpa as beyond a doubt; so viyâpem in verse 3.

⁶ Frâ has the same force as in fra perenaoti (?), to fill forth, to empty. Otherwise, 'forth to their thoughts I offer in my prayer free ranging at their choice, and a lodging where they will, together with their cattle which dwell upon this land.'

⁷ Comp. nâiri-kinanghô, khra^tu-kinanghô, and shaêtô-kinanghô.

Daêvas, evil as they are ; aye, utterly bereft of good, and void of virtue, deceitful in their wickedness, of (all) beings those most like the Demon-of-the-Lie, the most loathsome of existing things, and the ones the most of all bereft of good.

5. Off, off, do I abjure the Daêvas and all possessed by them, the sorcerers and all that hold to their devices, and every existing being of the sort ; their thoughts do I abjure, their words and actions, and their seed (that propagate their sin); away do I abjure their shelter and their headship, and the iniquitous of every kind who act as Rakhshas act!

Thus and so in very deed might Ahura Mazda have indicated¹ to Zarathustra in every question which Zarathustra asked, and in all the consultations in the which they two conversed together. 6. Thus and so might Zarathustra have abjured the shelter and the headship of the Daêvas in all the questions, and in all the consultations with which they two conversed together, Zarathustra and the Lord.

And so I myself, in whatsoever circumstances I may be placed, as a worshipper of Mazda, and of Zarathustra's order, would so abjure the Daêvas and their shelter, as he who² was the holy Zarathustra abjured them (once of old).

7. To that religious sanctity³ to which the waters appertain, do I belong, to that sanctity to which the plants, to that sanctity to which the Kine of blessed gift⁴, to that religious sanctity to which Ahura Mazda, who made both Kine and holy men, belongs,

¹ Reading adakhshayaêtâ ; otherwise khshayaêtâ, commanded.

² The Pahlavi structure 'he who' foreshadowed, as often.

³ Not in the sense of recompense here.

⁴ Observe this original meaning ; 'butter' is here impossible.

to that sanctity do I. Of that creed which Zarathustra held, which Kavi Vistâspa, and those two, Frashaostra and Gâmâspa; yea, of that religious faith which every Saoshyant who shall (yet come to) save (us), the holy ones who do the deeds of real significance, of that creed, and of that lore, am I.

8. A Mazda-worshipper I am, of Zarathustra's order; (so) do I confess, as a praiser and confessor, and I therefore praise aloud the well-thought thought, the word well spoken, and the deed well done;

9. Yea, I praise at once the Faith of Mazda, the Faith which has no faltering utterance¹, the Faith that wields the felling halbert², the Faith of kindred marriage, the holy (Creed), which is the most imposing, best, and most beautiful of all religions which exist, and of all that shall in future come to knowledge, Ahura's Faith, the Zarathustrian creed. Yea, to Ahura Mazda do I ascribe all good, and such shall be the worship of the Mazdayasnian belief!

YASNA XIII (SP. XIV).

INVOCATIONS AND DEDICATIONS.

1. I address (my invocation to) Ahura Mazda. And I invoke (among guardian beings) the chief³ of the house-lord, and the chief of the Vis-lord¹, and the chief of the Zantu-lord². And I invoke the chief of the province-lord³. And the chief of women I invoke, the Mazdayasnian Faith, the blessed and good *Parendi*⁴, her who is the holy one of human-kind⁵. And I invoke this (holy) earth which bears us.

¹ Fraspâvaokhedhrâm; 'y' miswritten for 'v.' Fra seems to be prohibitive 'speech without falling, or hesitation;' better as adj.

² Comp. Y. XXXI, 18.

³ This Ratu is the description and representation of the Nmânô-paiti as occupying the attention of the worshippers chiefly at the time of his mention in the course of the ritual. (I vary the expression 'chief' with that of 'lord' here for the sake of change.) Once established as a Ratu in the ritual, he became a guardian genius Nmânya; so of the others. (Y. XIII is in the Gâthic dialect.)

2. And I invoke the friendly and most helpful person's⁶ lord, the Fire of Ahura Mazda, and also the most energetic lords of holy men, those who are most strenuous⁷ in their care of cattle and the fields, and the chief of the thrifty tiller of the earth. And I invoke the steady settler⁸ of sanctity, (and) the chief of the charioteer.

3. And I invoke the chief of the fire-priest by means of the most imposing sciences of the Mazdayasnian Faith. And I invoke the chief of the Ātharvan, and his pupils I invoke; yea, the lords of each of them. I invoke these lords, and I summon the Bountiful Immortals here, and the Prophets who shall serve us, the wisest as they are, the most scru-

¹ Visya.

² Zantuma.

³ Dahvyuma = Dahyuma.

⁴ The goddess of riches.

⁵ Lit. biped; see elsewhere where quadruped means merely beast.

⁶ Or, 'households.'

⁷ Ashethwôzgemā (several manuscripts have ashe) finds its explanation from the Pahlavi of Dastur Hoshanggi Gâmâspgî's MS. It may be read kabed rang rasisntûm instead of kabed yôm rasisntûm. The ancient error of yôm arose from the fact that the copyist had before him a form which might be read either rôg or rang, the characters being identical for either word. He could not reconcile himself to rang in the sense of effort, and so decided for rôg; but in order to guide his successors aright, he changed it for its synonym yôm, which, as Spiegel well remarks, affords but little sense. But the word is rang, as I believe, and this is at once corroborated by Ner.'s bahuklesa. Read as + thwakhsa + gatemā = kabed + rang + rasisntûm, the most progressing with painful energy.

⁸ Or, 'steadiest forces.'

pulous in their exactness (as) they utter words (of doctrine and of service), the most devoted (to their duties likewise), and the most glorious in their thoughts(?)¹. And I invoke the most imposing forces of the Mazdayasnian Faith, and the fire-priests I invoke, and the charioteers, the warriors, and the thrifty tillers of the soil.

4. And to You, O Ye Bountiful Immortals! Ye who rule aright, and dispose (of all) aright, I offer the flesh of my very frame, and all the blessings of my life.

Thus² the two spirits³ thought, thus they spoke, and thus they did;

5. And therefore as Thou, O Ahura Mazda! didst think, speak, dispose, and do all things good (for us), so to Thee would we give, so would we assign to Thee our homage; so would we worship Thee with our sacrifices. So would we bow before Thee with these gifts, and so direct our prayers to Thee with confessions of our debt.

6. By the kinship of the good kindred⁴, by that of Righteousness the good (Thy righteous servant's nature) would we approach Thee, and by that of the good thrift-law, and of Piety the good.

7. And we would worship the Fravashi of the Kine of blessed gift⁵, and that of the holy Gaya Maretan, and we would worship the holy Fravashi⁶

¹ I should think that the reference was here to khṛatavō, Y. XLVI, 3. See Y. XXXII, 14, as alternatively rendered.

² A portion of the text has here fallen out.

³ The recognition of a strong dualism here is imperative. Ahura alone is praised.

⁴ Or, 'of the good kinsman, the lord(?)'.

⁵ Elsewhere meaning 'meat,' just as Ameretatâ and Haurvatâ mean wood and water.

⁶ Or, 'sanctity and the Fravashi.'

of Zarathustra Spitâma, the saint. Yea, that one of beings do we worship whose better (service) in the sacrifice Ahura Mazda knows; (even those women do we worship) whose¹ (better service thus is known). Yea, both (holy) men and women (do we worship whom Ahura Mazda knows²). As the Ahû is excelling, so is our Ratu, one who rules from the Righteous Order, a creator of mental goodness, and of life's actions done for Mazda; and the Kingdom is to Ahura which to the poor (may offer) nurture³.

A blessing is the Right called the best, there is weal, there is weal to this (man), when toward Righteousness Best (he does) right⁴.

8. We worship the Ahuna-vairya; and we worship Asha Vahista the best(?), the bountiful Immortal. And we sacrifice to the Hâ fraoreti, even to the confession and laudation of the Mazdayasnian Faith!

YASNA XIV (SP. XV).

DEDICATIONS.

1. I will come to You, O Ye Bountiful Immortals! as a praiser and a priest, and an invoker and sacrificer, as a memorising reciter and a chanter, for Your sacrifice and homage, which are to be offered to You, the Bountiful Immortals, and for our dedication and sanctification; (yea, for ours) who are the holy prophets (destined to benefit the saints).

2. And to You, O Ye Bountiful Immortals²! would I dedicate the flesh of my very body³, and all the blessings of a prospered life⁴.

3. In this Zaothra with this Baresman, I desire to ¹ Feminine.

² Elsewhere with verbal difference.

³ See Y. XXXIII, 14.

⁴ Verses 1, 2 are Gâthic.

approach the holy Yazads with my praise¹, and all the holy lords of the ritual order at their times, Hâvani at his time, and Sâvanghi and Visya at their times. 4. I confess myself a Mazdayasnian, and of Zarathustra's order².

5. The Zaoatar speaks : As an Ahû (revered and) chosen, the Zaoatar (?) speaks forth to me (?).

The Ratu speaks: As an Ahû (revered and) to be chosen, the Zaoatar speaks forth to me.

The Zaoatar : So let the Ratu from his Righteousness, holy and learned, speak forth !

YASNA XV (SP. XVI).

THE SACRIFICE CONTINUES.

1. With precept, praise, and with delight produced by grace³, I call upon the Bountiful Immortals the good, and also therewith the beautiful by name⁴; and I sacrifice to them with the blessing of the good ritual, with the earnest blessings of the good Mazdayasnian Faith.

2. Whose best gift from his Righteousness is mine in the offering Ahura this knoweth ; who have lived, and live ever, by their names these I worship, while I draw near with praises⁵. The Good Kingdom is to be chosen, that lot which most of all bears on (our blessings⁶).

3. Let Sraosha (Obedience) be here present for

¹ See Y. II, 18.

² See Y. III, 24, 25.

³ Root rap=rabh, a reception of grace, or being received by grace.

⁴ Namān may be meant for a locative ; 'with the beautiful things in their name (?)'.

⁵ See Y. LI, 22.

⁶ See Y. LI, 1.

the sacrifice of Ahura Mazda, the most beneficent, the holy, who is so dear to us as at the first, so at the last ; yea, let him be present here ¹.

4. As the Ahû (revered and) to be chosen, the Âtarevakhsha thus speaks forth to me.

(Response) : So let the Ratu from his righteousness, holy and learned, speak forth !

YASNA XVI (Sp. XVII).

THE SACRIFICE CONTINUES WITH INCREASED FULNESS OF EXPRESSION.

1. We worship Ahura Mazda, the holy lord of the ritual order, who disposes (all) aright, the greatest Yazad, who is also the most beneficent, and the one who causes the settlements to advance, the creator of good creatures ; yea, we worship Him with these offered Zaothras, and with truthfully and scrupulously delivered words ; and we worship every holy Yazad of the heaven (as well) !

2. And we worship Zarathustra Spitâma in our sacrifice, the holy lord of the ritual order with these Zaothras and with faithfully delivered words ; and we worship every holy earthly Yazad as we worship him ; and we worship also the Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitâma, the saint. And we worship the utterances of Zarathustra and his religion, his faith and his lore.

3. And we worship the former religions of the world ² devoted to Righteousness which were instituted at the creation, the holy religions of the Creator Ahura Mazda, the resplendent and glorious. And we worship Vohu Manah (the Good Mind), and Asha Vahista (who is Righteousness the Best), and Khshathra-vairya, the Kingdom to be desired, and the good and bountiful Âramaiti (true piety in the believers), and Haurvatât and Ameretatât (our Weal and Immortality).

¹ This fragment in the Gâthic dialect might more properly be placed before the Srôsh Yast.

² So the Pahlavi translator, probably reading angheus ; otherwise

4. Yea, we worship the Creator Ahura Mazda and the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son, and the good waters which are Mazda-made and holy, and the resplendent sun of the swift horses, and the moon with the seed of cattle (in his beams¹); and we worship the star Tistrya, the lustrous and glorious; and we worship the soul of the Kine of blessed endowment, (5) and its Creator Ahura Mazda; and we worship Mithra of the wide pastures, and Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, and Rashnu the most just, and the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the saints, and the Blow-of-victory Ahura-given (as it is). And we worship Râman Hvâstra, and the bounteous Wind of blessed gift, (6) and (its) Creator Ahura Mazda, and the good Mazdayasnian Religion, and the good Blessedness and Arstât.

And we worship the heaven and the earth of blessed gift, and the bounteous Mâthra, and the stars without beginning (to their course), self-disposing as they are.

7. And we worship the glorious works of Righteousness in which the souls of the dead find satisfaction and delight [(Pâzand) which are the Fravashis

'of the conscience that loves the right.' In Yast XIII, 118 the word is a proper name through an error.

¹ Possibly in allusion to the menses. The moon is masc.

of the saints], and we worship (Heaven) the best world of the saints, shining, all glorious.

8. And we worship the two, the milk-offering and the libation, the two which cause the waters to flow forth¹, and the plants to flourish, the two foes who meet the Dragon¹ demon-made; and who are set to meet, to defeat, and to put to flight, that cheat², the Pairika, and to contradict the insulting malice of the Ashemaogha (the persecuting heretic) and that of the unholy tyrant full of death³.

9. And we worship all waters and all plants, and all good men and all good women. And we worship all these Yazads, heavenly and earthly⁴, who are beneficent and holy.

10. And we worship thee (our) dwelling-place who art the (earth, our) bounteous Āramaiti⁵, and Thee, O Ahura Mazda, O holy Lord of this abode⁶! which is the home of healthy herds and healthy men, and of those who are both endowed with health and lover(s) of the ritual right.

(Response of the individual worshipper(?).) Wherefore whichever of persons, or whatever of bodily influences, is most helpful and preserving in that abode (thus owned by Mazda) let this meet me in mine abode, and there may it abide for summer and for winter. (Or⁷ let that one meet me in all my house,

¹ We cannot mistake a connection here with yó áhim gaghāna—avāsrīgat sártave saptá síndhūn.

² Or is it possible that a plague of mice is meant, mūs being here indeclinable?

³ Ordering the execution of many of his subjects.

⁴ Gaēthyāta with J 3, K 11.

⁵ Later association of Ā. and the earth.

⁶ Originally recited in private houses.

⁷ Alternative.

in whom are what of influences are the most mighty power for the body and the person's life ; yea, let that one meet me there, and there abide for summer and for winter (for my help) !)

YASNA XVII.

TO THE FIRES, WATERS, PLANTS, &C.

1-10¹, 11. We worship thee, the Fire, O Ahura Mazda's son ! We worship the fire Berezi-savangha (of the lofty use²), and the fire Vohu-fryâna (the good and friendly³), and the fire Urvâzista (the most beneficial and most helpful⁴), and the fire Vâzista (the most supporting⁵), and the fire Spênista (the most bountiful⁶), and Nairya-sangha the Yazad of the royal lineage⁷, and that fire which is the house-lord of all houses and Mazda-made, even the son of Ahura Mazda, the holy lord of the ritual order, with all the fires.

12. And we worship the good and best waters Mazda-made, holy, all the waters Mazda-made and holy, and all the plants which Mazda made, and which are holy.

¹ See chapter VI, which is nearly identical with XVII, 1-10.

² This fire is that before Ahura Mazda and the kings.

³ This fire dwells in the bodies of men and beasts (animal heat).

⁴ This is in trees and plants.

⁵ This in the clouds (lightning).

⁶ This is the fire which is applied in the world (Bundahis, West, page 61).

⁷ That N. is here referred to as connected with the fire, seems certain ; this fire corresponds with that of Vâhrâm in places of worship.

13. And we worship the Māthra-spenta (the bounteous word-of-reason), the Zarathustrian law against the Daêvas, and its long descent.

14. And we worship Mount Ushi-darena which is Mazda-made and shining with its holiness, and all the mountains shining with holiness, and of abundant glory, and which Mazda made —.

15. And we worship the good and pious prayer for blessings, (16) and these waters and (these lands), (17) and all the greatest chieftains, lords of the ritual order¹;

18. And I praise, invoke, and glorify the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the saints, those of the house, the Vts, the Zantuma, the Da^hvyuma², and the Zarathustrôtema, and all the holy Yazads³!

YASNA XVIII⁴.

1. Grant me, Thou who art maker of the Kine, plants and waters, Immortality, Mazda! Grant, too, Weal, Spirit bounteous —.

YASNA XIX.

ZAND OR COMMENTARY ON THE AHUNA-VAIRYA FORMULAS⁵.

(As the Ahû is excellent, so (is) the Ratu (one who rules) from the righteous Order, a creator of mental goodness and of life's actions done for Mazda; and

¹ 1-17 occur also in MSS. as Y. LIX, 1-17.

² Dahyuma.

³ The Yênhê hâtâm follows.

⁴ See Y. LI, 7, and Y. XLVII.

⁵ The obvious errors contained in this ancient comment cannot the Kingdom (is) for Ahura which to the poor shall offer a nurturer.)

1. Zarathustra asked of Ahura Mazda: O Ahura Mazda, Thou most bounteous Spirit! maker¹ of the corporeal worlds, the holy One! which was that word which Thou did'st declare to me, (2) which was before the sky, and before the water, before the earth, and before the cattle, before the plants, and before the fire, and before the holy man, and the Demon-gods (the Daêvas), before the Khrafstra-men², and before all the incarnate world; even before all the good creatures made by Mazda, and which contain (and are) the seed of righteousness?

3. Thereupon Ahura Mazda said: It was this piece³, the Ahuna-vairya, O Spitama Zarathustra! which I pronounced as thine (4) before the sky, and before the waters, before the land, and before the cattle and the plants, and before the fire, Ahura Mazda's son, before the holy man⁴, and before the Daêvas, and Khrafstra-men, and before the entire corporeal world, even before the good creatures made by Mazda, which contain (and are) the seed of righteousness.

5. It was these part(s) of the Ahuna-vairya, O Spi-destroy its great interest as a specimen of early exegesis. Where I hold it to be erroneous may be seen from my rendering of the Ahuna without further observations. The Ahuna-vairya is in the Gâthic dialect, and the Ahunavaiti metre. This Zand is in the Zend (sic). Ahû gives better sense as a nom.

¹ See daunghôiz para below.

² May not khrafstra be a degeneration from kehrp-astar? While the term may be applied to wild beasts, one is strongly inclined to hold that foul insects are chiefly referred to.

³ This part of the Ahuna (?), meaning its several parts.

⁴ Tradition naturally specifies Gaya Maretan.

tama Zarathustra! which especially belongs to me, and when each is intoned aloud without the (needless) repetition¹ of verses and of words, and without their omission, it is worth a hundred of their other stanzas, even although they are prominent in the ritual, and likewise equally as well recited without additions or omissions; nay, further, when it is intoned imperfectly but added to, and with omissions, it is even then in effect equivalent (not to a hundred indeed, but) to ten other (stanzas) that are prominent.

×6. And whoever in this world of mine which is corporeal shall mentally recall, O Spitâma* Zarathustra! a portion of the Ahuna-vairya, and having thus recalled it, shall undertone it, or beginning to recite it with the undertone, shall then utter it aloud, or chanting it with intoning voice, shall worship thus, then with even threefold (safety and with speed²) I will bring his soul over the Bridge of Kînvat, I who am Ahura Mazda (I will help him to pass over it) to Heaven (the best life), and to Righteousness the Best, and to the lights of heaven³.

7. And whoever, O Spitama Zarathustra! while undertoning the part(s) of the Ahuna-vairya (or this piece the Ahuna-vairya), takes ought therefrom, whether the half, or the third, or the fourth, or the fifth, I who am Ahura Mazda will draw his soul off from the better world ; yea, so far off will I withdraw it as the earth is large and wide ; [and this ¹ earth is as long as it is broad ²].

¹ I do not think that mispronunciation is here intended; the Pahlavi has abarâ shûtakîh; aîghas barâ lâ khelmûnêd; Ner. na sete. I am strongly inclined to read anapashûta for anapishûta.

² Three times seems to me to lack meaning, but it may have given rise to a foolish belief that the soul went three times before death to heaven.

³ Vahistaëibyô retaining this sense here.

8. And I pronounced this saying which contains its Ahû and its Ratu ³ before the creation of this heaven, before the making of the waters, and the plants, and the four-footed kine, before the birth of the holy biped man, before this sun with its body made for the acquisition of the creation of the Bountiful Immortals ⁴.

9. ⁵And the more bountiful ⁶ of the two Spirits (Ahura) declared to me ⁷ (Zarathustra) the entire creation of the pure, that which exists at present, that which is in the course of emerging into existence ⁸, and that which shall be, with reference to the performance and realisation 'of the actions of a life devoted to Mazda ⁹.'

10. And this word is the most emphatic of the words which have ever been pronounced, or which are ¹⁰ now spoken, or which shall be spoken in future; for (the eminence of) this utterance is a thing of such a nature, that if all the corporeal and living world

¹ Īm here equals iyám.

^{*} Pâzand.

³ So, referring to the wording of the Ahuna.

⁴ Enabling us to receive the blessings which they bestow through the influence of the sun. 'The sun-shaped matter' would give us a materialism. The Pahlavi has 'levîno min zak khurkhshêdô brîno (?) kerpô tanô ĩ khûrkshêd pavan barâ ayâpakîh ĩ ameshô-spendânô yehabûnd.'

⁵ I hold that Ahura speaks no further here.

⁶ See Y. XLV, 1.

⁷ Of course fictitious, as Z. had long been among the dead.

⁸ Does bavaintîka mean 'past'?

⁹ Through the state of action ; skyaothananâm anghêus Mazdâi.

¹⁰ Can mruyê(-vê) be a third singular like ghnê, isê?

should learn it, and learning should hold fast by it, they would be redeemed from their mortality!

11. And this our word I have proclaimed as a symbol to be learned ¹, and to be recited, as it were, to every one of the beings under the influence of and for the sake of Righteousness the Best.

12. And 'as' (the worshipper has) here spoken it forth, when he has thus 'appointed' the 'Lord and regulator ²,' so (by thus reciting these authoritative words), he acknowledges Ahura Mazda (as prior to, and supreme) over, those creatures who have 'the mind' ³ as their first. 'As' he acknowledges Him as the greatest of them all, 'so' he assigns the creatures to Him (as to their originator).

13. As he undertones the third sentence, he thereby announces that 'all the amenities of life appertain to the 'good' Mazda ⁴, (and come) from Him. As he recites 'dazda mananghō,' 'the creator of mind,' he acknowledges Him as superior and prior to mind; and as he makes Him the one who indicates (the truth) to mind, (saying) 'mananghō of mind,' which means that by this much he makes Him (its director), and then he makes Him 'the lord of actions ⁵.'

14. And when he acknowledges Him for the creatures thus, 'O Mazda ⁶!' he acknowledges Him (as

¹ Or, 'it has been declared to us, the learner, and the one in charge of the ritual.'

² In the words yathâ ahû vairyô, athâ ratus.

³ See dazda mananghō, coming 'before' skyaothananām angheus, khshathrem, and vâstârem.

⁴ Can the Ahuna have lost words, and is Mazdau hugtîs vangheus a citation? At all events, the Zandist errs in separating vangheus from mananghō. He attributes mystical meaning to every word.

⁵ Comp. ahû-skyaothananām.

⁶ Reading Mazda (?).

their ruler) when he assigns the creatures to Him thus. He then assigns the Kingdom to Ahura¹, saying: 'Thine, O Mazda! is the Kingdom.' And he assigns a nourisher and protector to the poor, saying: Yim drigubyô dadať vâstârem; that is, as a friend to Spitama². This is the fifth sentence, (and it concludes) the entire recital and word, (even) the whole of this word of Ahura Mazda³.

15. He who is the best (of all) Ahura Mazda, pronounced the Ahuna-vairya, and as He pronounced it as the best, so He caused it to have its effect⁴, (He, ever) the same, (as He is).

The evil one at once⁵ arose (to oppose Him), but He (Ahura) repelled that wicked one with His interdict, and with this repelling renunciation: Neither our minds are in harmony, nor our precepts, nor our comprehensions, nor our beliefs, nor our words, nor our actions, nor our consciences, nor our souls⁶!

CATECHETICAL ZAND⁷.

16. And this saying, uttered by Mazda, has three stages, or measures⁸, and belongs to four classes (of men as its supporters), and to five chiefs (in the political world, without whom its efficiency is

¹ Khshathremâ Ahurâi â.

² As having the interest of the poor at heart.

³ Supposing Ahura (?) to be meant by Ahû and Ratu; see Mazdâi Ahurâi. The Zandist may have rendered: As Ahura is the (first) to be chosen, so He is our Ratu from His righteousness, the creator of Vohûman (including all good creatures), &c.

⁴ 'Praised' (?).

⁵ Reading haithwať; Pahlavi tîz; possibly 'being present.'

⁶ See Y. XLV, 2.

⁷ This Zand differs, as to the application of Ahû and Ratu, from the former.

⁸ Afsman elsewhere applies to metre.

marred), and it has a conclusion ending with a gift. (Question.) How are its measures (constituted)? (Answer.) The good thought, the good word, and the good deed. 17. (Question.) With what classes of men? (Answer.) The priest, the charioteer (as the chief of warriors), the systematic tiller¹ of the ground, and the artisan². These classes therefore accompany the religious man throughout his entire duty³ with the correct thought, the truthful word, and the righteous action. These are the classes and states in life which give attention to the rulers⁴, and fulfil the (laws) of religion; (yea, they are the guides and companions of that religious man) through whose actions the settlements are furthered in righteousness.

18. (Question.) How are the chiefs (constituted)? (Answer.) They are the house-chief, the village-chief, and the tribe-chief, the chief of the province, and the Zarathustra⁵ as the fifth. That is, so far as those provinces are concerned which are different from, and outside of the Zarathustrian regency, or domain. [Ragha⁶ which has four chiefs (only) is the Zarathustrian (district)]. (Question.) How are the chiefs of this one constituted? (Answer.) They (are) the house-chief, the village-chief, the tribe-chief, and the Zarathustra as the fourth. 19. (Question.) What is the thought well thought? (Answer.) (It is that which the holy man thinks), the one who holds the holy thought to be before all other things⁷. (Question.)

¹ These are 'the poor,' but not mendicants.

² A class not in the Gâthas; observe the rise of a caste system.

³ Or, 'experience.'

⁴ Or, 'the ritual.'

⁵ The title of a governor.

⁶ It did not need the fifth. It was a centre of rule.

⁷ Ashavan manas paoiryô.

What is the word well spoken? (Answer.) It is the Māthra Spenta¹, the bounteous word of reason. (Question.) What is the deed well done? (Answer.) It is that done with praises², and by the creatures who regard Righteousness as before all other things. 20. (Question.) Mazda made a proclamation, whom did He announce? (Answer.) Some one who was holy, and yet both heavenly and mundane³. (Question.) What was His character, He who made this sacred enunciation? (Answer.) He who is the best (of all), the ruling one. (Question.) Of what character (did He proclaim him the coming one)? (Answer.) As holy and the best, a ruler who exercises no wanton or despotic power⁴.

21. We sacrifice to the (several) part(s) of the Ahuna-vairya. We sacrifice to the memorised recital of the Ahuna-vairya, and its regular chanting and its use in the full Yasna.

YASNA XX.

ZAND, OR COMMENTARY, ON THE ASHEM VOHŪ.

1. A blessing is Righteousness (called) the best; there is weal, there is weal to this man when the Right (helps) the Righteousness best, (when the pious man serves it in truth⁵). Ahura Mazda spake forth: Ashem vohŭ vahistem asti. To this Asha, the holy ritual sanctity, one attributes the ¹ Probably the Gāthas with their lost portions, also the Vendîdād.

² Ritual strictness based upon practical piety.

³ The Saoshyant.

⁴ The latter part of this Zand shows that the Ratu was recognised as a human ruler in it.

⁵ Elsewhere verbally different; 'when Asha is for A.V.'

qualities of 'good' and 'best,' as one attributes property to an owner; thus this sentence vohû vahistem asti is substantiated (at once ¹).

2. Ustâ asti ustâ ahmâi; by this attribution of blessedness (the praiser) assigns every person (or thing) of a sacred nature to every holy person, and as one usually (?) and regularly (?) ² assigns every person or thing (?) ³ that is holy to every holy man.

3. Yyať ashâi vahistai ⁴; by these words the worshipper ascribes the entire Māthra (to Asha Vahista), and ascribes all to the Māthra, as one ascribes the kingdom to Righteousness, and as one ascribes righteousness to the invoking saint; yea, as one ascribes righteousness to us who are the prophets (who shall help and bless the people). The three maxims of the sentences (are thus fulfilled). And every word (in its detail), and the entire utterance in its proclamation, is the word of Ahura Mazda.

CATECHETICAL ADDITION ⁵.

4. Mazda has made a proclamation. (Question.) Whom did He announce? (Answer.) That holy one who is both heavenly and earthly. (Question.) Of what character is He who has thus announced Him? (Answer.) He is the best, and the one who is exercising sovereign power. (Question.) Of what character is the man whom He announced? (Answer.)

¹ It is carried into effect; possibly 'rendered fit for praising' (?).

² The Pahlavi indicates nâ stâitya (?).

³ Ashavanem here and in Y. XIX, 19 might be a neuter from a transition, or addition.

⁴ 'Ashem.'

⁵ This Catechetical addition is identical with that in Y. XIX. The wording alone is slightly altered in the translation to relieve the sameness.

The holy and the best, the one who rules with no capricious tyranny.

We sacrifice to the (several) part(s) of the Asha Vahista (prayer). We sacrifice to the heard-recital of the Asha Vahista, to its memorising, its chanting, and its sacrificial use ¹!

YASNA XXI.

CATECHETICAL ZAND, OR COMMENTARY UPON THE YÊNHÊ HÂTÂM ².

(The Yênhê. (To that one) of beings do we offer, whose superior (fidelity) in the sacrifice Ahura Mazda recognises by reason of the sanctity (within him; yea, even to those female saints also do we sacrifice) whose (superior fidelity is thus likewise known; thus) we sacrifice to (all, to both) the males and females (of the saints) !)

¹ The Yênhê hâtâm follows.

² The expressions in this prayer were suggested by Y. LI, 22; but the Zand does not consistently follow the thoughts in the Gâtha. Təm understood should be supplied as an object for yazamaidē in connection with yênhê, as well as tauskâ for yaung-hâm. In Y. LI, 22, it is, however, by no means certain that yazâi applies to a təm yêhyâ. Holding the twenty-first verse in mind, I am obliged to refer yêhyâ to nâ spentô. Here, however, men and women are worshipped, as it is improbable that the 'Immortals' whose names are in the feminine are meant. The prayer is in the Gâthic dialect, and ancient metre would hardly contain so artificial a formation. It can only be defended from the teng yazâi hvâis nâmenis of Y. LI, 22.

Or did the composer of the prayer correctly render Y. LI, 22, and boldly write his succinct words as being clear to his hearers from explanations which are now lost? Such explanations (oral or written) as a matter of course existed from the first. No composer fails to discuss his productions.

1. A word for the Yasna by Zarathustra, the saint. Yênhê, &c. Here the worshipper indicates and offers the Yasna (which is the sacrificial worship) of Mazda as by the command (or as the institution) of Ahura¹. Hâtâm. Here the worshipper offers the sacrificial worship as if with the beings who are among those who are destined to live². 2. Yâunghâm. Here he indicates and offers the sacrificial worship of those holy females who have Âramaiti at their head³, as homage to the Immortals. These are the three sentences which comprehend all the Yasnian speech. (Question.) To whom is this Yasna addressed? (Answer.) To the Bountiful Immortals (in the course of the Yasna). 3. Thereupon spake Mazda: Salvation to this one, whosoever he may be! May the absolute ruler Ahura grant it. (Question.) 4. Whom did He answer with this answer? (Answer.) He answered: The state of salvation; and with this answer, 'the state of salvation,' he answered every saint who exists, every one who is coming into existence, and every one who shall exist in the future. (Question. Who answered thus? Answer.) The best One. (Question. What did He answer?) (Answer.) The best thing. (That is,) the best One, Mazda, answered the best and the holy (answer) for the better and the holy man. 5. We sacrifice to this piece, the Yênhê hâtâm, the prominent and holy Yast.

¹ Referring yênhê to Ahura (?).

² Fit to live, clean.

³ The Ameshôspends whose names are in the feminine; so the Zandist erroneously.

YASNA XXII.

THE SACRIFICE CONTINUES.

1. With the Baresman brought hither together with the Zaothra, for the worship of the Creator Ahura Mazda, the resplendent, the glorious, and for that of the Bountiful Immortals, I desire to approach this Haoma with my praise, offered (as it is) with punctilious sanctity (or, for a blessing), and this fresh milk, and this plant Hadhânaêpata. 2. And, as an act of worship to the beneficent waters, I desire to approach these Zaothras with (my) praise offered (as they are) with punctilious sanctity, having the Haoma with them, and the flesh, with the Hadhânaêpata. And I desire to approach the Haoma-water with my praise for the beneficent waters; and I desire to approach the stone mortar and the iron mortar with my praise. 3. And I desire to approach this plant for the Baresman with my praise, and the well-timed prayer for blessings, that which has approached (to accept our homage), and the memorised recital and the fulfilment of the good Mazdayasnian Faith, and the heard recital of the Gâthas, and⁴ the well-timed and successful prayer for blessings, that of the holy lord of the ritual order. And I desire to approach these wood-billets and their perfume with my praise,—thine, the Fire's, O Ahura Mazda's son! Yea, I desire to approach all good things with my praise, those which Mazda made, and which have the seed of sanctity (within them), (4) for the propitiation of Ahura Mazda and of the Bountiful Immortals, and of Sraosha the blessed, and of Ahura Mazda's Fire, the lofty ritual lord¹!

20. And I desire to approach this Haoma with (my) praise, that which is thus lifted up with sanctity, and this milk (fresh as it is, and as if) living and lifted up with sanctity, and this plant the Hadhânaê-pata lifted up with sanctity. 21. And I desire to approach these Zaothras with (my) praise for the beneficial waters, these Zaothras which have the H(a)oma with them and the milk with them, and the Hadhânaê-pata, and which are lifted up with sanctity. And I desire to approach the Haoma-water with (my) praise for the beneficial waters, and the two mortars, the stone one and the iron one, (22) and I desire to approach this branch for the Baresman with my praise, and the memorised recital and fulfilment of the Mazdayasnian law, and the heard recital of the Gâthas, and the well-timed and persistent prayer for blessings (uttered) by the holy lord² of the ritual order, and this wood and perfume, even thine, O Fire, Ahura Mazda's son, and all good objects Mazda-made (23) for the propitiation of Ahura Mazda, the resplendent, the glorious, and of the Bountiful Immortals, and of Mithra of the wide pastures, and of Râman Hvâstra³, (24) and of the resplendent sun, immortal, radiant, of the fleet horses, and of Vayu, (of predominant influence and) working on high, set over the other beings in the creation [(Pâzand); that is for thee thus (O Vayu) when thine influence is that which apper-

¹ 5-19=Y. III, 5-19; 20-23=1-4 from imem.

² The priest? (Repetitions are, as everywhere, curtailed and varied.)

³ For closer rendering of details, see verses 2, 3, 4, which differ chiefly in the final dedication.

tains to Spenta Mainyu¹], and for the propitiation of the most just knowledge Mazda-given, and of the holy and good Religion, the Mazdayasnian Faith; (25) for the propitiation of the Māthra Spenta, (the bounteous) and holy, and the effective, instituted against the Daêvas, the Zarathustrian law, and of the long descent of the good Mazdayasnian Faith² [the holding in mind and devotion to the Māthra Spenta, and knowledge of the Mazdayasnian Religion] for the propitiation of the understanding which is innate and Mazda-made, and of that which is heard by the ear; (26) and for thy propitiation, the Fire's, O Ahura Mazda's son! [(Pāzand); (yea) thine, the Fire's, O Ahura Mazda's son] with all the fires, and for the propitiation of Mount Ushi-darena, the Mazda-made, radiant with sanctity; (27) and of all the holy Yazads, spiritual and earthly, and of the holy Fravashis, the redoubted and overwhelming, those of the ancient lore, and those of the next of kin and of the Yazad of the spoken name!

YASNA XXIII.

THE FRAVASHIS OF THE SAINTS; PRAYERS FOR THEIR APPROACH³.

1. I desire to approach with my praise⁴ those Fravashis which have existed from of old, the Fravashis of the houses, and of the villages, of the communities, and of the provinces, which hold the ¹ And not the evil Vayu, which appertains to Angra Mainyu.

² Insert, 'and of the good Zarathustrian devotion.'

³ This chapter is said to be reserved for funeral occasions.

⁴ Or, 'I pray for the approach.' See Y. XXVI.

heaven in its place apart, and the water, land, and cattle, which hold the children in the wombs safely enclosed apart so that they do not miscarry. 2. And I desire to approach toward the Fravashi¹ of Ahura Mazda, and with my praise, and for those of the Bountiful Immortals, with all the holy Fravashis which are those of the heavenly Yazads. And I desire to approach the Fravashi of Gaya Maretan (the life-man) in my worship with my praise, and for that of Zarathustra Spitâma, and for those of Kavi Vistâspa, and of Isat-vâstra², the Zarathustrian, with all the holy Fravashis of the other ancient counsellors as well. 3. And I desire in my worship to approach toward every holy Fravashi whosoever it may be, and wheresoever dead upon this earth (its possessor may have lain), the pious woman, or the girl of tender years, the maiden diligent (among the cattle) in the field (who) may have dwelt (here; yea, all) which are now worshipped from this house³, which are attentive to, and which attain to (our) good Yasnas and (our) homage. 4. Yea, I desire to approach the Fravashis of the saints with my praise, redoubted (as they are) and overwhelming, the Fravashis of those who held to the ancient lore, and the Fravashis of the next-of-kin; and I desire to approach toward the Fravashi of mine own⁴ soul in my worship with my praise; and I desire therewith to approach toward all the lords of the ritual, and with

¹ Fravashi seems a dative; comp. ūtī.

² Zarathustra's eldest son by his wife Padokhshah; he was the chief of priests according to tradition.

³ This Yasna was recited from house to house.

⁴ The 'own' soul; notice the seeming distinction between Fravashi and soul.

praise ; and I desire to approach all the good Yazads with my praise, the heavenly and the earthly, who are meet, for sacrifice and homage, because of Righteousness the Best !

YASNA XXIV.

PRESENTATIONS.

1. (And having approached these Haomas with our worship), we present them to Ahura Mazda ; (yea, we present) these Haomas, Myazdas, Zaothras, and the Baresman spread with punctilious sanctity, and the flesh, and the milk, fresh as if living, and lifted up with punctilious sanctity, and this branch the Hadhânaêpata likewise lifted up with sanctity.

2. (And having approached these Zaothras in our worship), we present them to the good waters having the Haoma with them, and the milk, and the Hadhânaêpata, and lifted up with scrupulous sanctity ; and (with them) we present the Haoma-water to the good waters, and both the stone and the iron mortar.

3. And we present this plant of the Baresman, and the timely prayer for blessings, which has approached in the due course of the ritual, and the recollection and practice¹ of the good Mazdayasnian Religion, and the heard recital of the Gâthas, and the timely prayer for blessings which has approached as the prayer of the holy lord of the ritual order ; and these wood-billets, and the perfume, (even) thine, the Fire's, O Ahura Mazda's son ! and all good objects Mazda-made, which have the seed of righteousness, we offer and present. 4. And these we present hereby to Ahura Mazda, and to Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed (and Righteous), and to the Bountiful Immortals; and to the Fravashis of the saints, even to the souls of the saints, and to the Fire of Ahura Mazda, the lofty lord of entire holy creation, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and for praise.

¹ Or the memorised recital and performance of its rites.

5. And these we present hereby to the Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitâma, the saint, for sacrifice, propitiation, and for praise, and to that of the people¹ who love Righteousness, with all the holy Fravashis of the saints who are dead and who are living, and to those of men who are as yet unborn, and to those of the prophets who will serve us, and will labour to complete the progress and renovation of the world².

6. And we present these Haomas, Myazdas, Zaothras, and the Baresman spread with sanctity, and the flesh, and the milk (fresh as if) living, and lifted up with sanctity, and the Hadhânaêpata branch.

7. And we present these Zaothras to the beneficial waters having the Haoma with them, and the flesh, and the Hadhânaêpata lifted up with sanctity, and the Haoma-water, to the good waters, with the stone and iron mortars, (8) and this plant of the Baresman, (and) the timely Prayer and the recollection and practice of the good Mazdayasnian Faith³, and these wood-billets, and the perfume, thine, the Fire's, O Ahura Mazda's son! and all objects which are Mazda-made, and which have, and are, the seed of Righteousness, these we offer and present.

9. (Yea,) we present these hereby to the Bountiful Immortals who rule aright, and who dispose of all

¹ Elsewhere perhaps, erroneously, as a proper name: or read anghus.

² Pahlavi frashakarð karðârân.

³ 'And the heard recital of the Gâthas.'

aright, the ever-living, ever-helpful, who abide with the Good Mind (of the Lord and of His folk¹) !

YASNA XXV.

1. And we worship the Bountiful Immortals with our sacrifice, who rule aright, and who dispose of all aright ; and we worship this Haoma, this flesh and branch, (2) and these Zaothras for the good waters, having the Haoma with them, and the flesh with them, and Hadhânaêpata, and lifted up with sanctity, and we worship the Haoma-water for the beneficial waters ; and we worship the two, the stone mortar and the iron mortar ; (3) and we worship this plant for the Baresman and the well-timed prayer for blessings which has approached (in its proper place within the ritual course), and also both the remembrance and the practice² of the good Mazdayasnian Religion, and the heard recital of the Gâthas, and the well-timed prayer for blessings of the holy lord of the ritual order which has approached, and these wood-billets with the perfume, (even) thine, the Fire's, O Ahura Mazda's son ! and we worship all good objects which are Mazda-made, and which contain (and are) the seed of Righteousness.

4. And we worship Ahura Mazda with our sacrifice, the resplendent, the glorious, and the Bountiful Immortals who rule aright, and who dispose (of all) aright, and Mithra of the wide pastures and Râman Hvâstra ; and we worship the shining sun, the resplendent, the immortal, of the fleet horses.

¹ See Y. IV, 4-25, which is repeated here. Expressions are curtailed.

² Or the memorised recital and fulfilment.

5. And we worship the holy wind which works on high, placed higher than the other creatures in the creation; and we worship this which is thine, O Vayu! and which appertains to the Spenta Mainyu within thee; and we worship the most true religious Knowledge, Mazda-made and holy, and the good Mazdayasnian law.

6. And we worship the Māthra Spenta verily glorious (as it is), even the law pronounced against the Daêvas, the Zarathustrian law, and its long descent¹; yea, we worship the good Mazdayasnian Religion, and the Māthra which is heart-devoted and bounteous (imparting heart's devotion to the saint); yea, we worship the Mazdayasnian Religion maintained in the understanding² of the saint; and we honour that science which is the Māthra Spenta, and the innate understanding Mazda-made, and the derived understanding, heard with ear, and Mazda-made.

7. Yea, we worship thee, the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son! the holy lord of the ritual order; and we worship all the Fires, and Mount Ushi-darena (which holds the light³) Mazda-made and holy, the Yazad mount, brilliant with sanctity. 8. And we worship every holy spiritual⁴ Yazad; and every holy earthly Yazad (who exists)!

¹ Its long tradition.

² Or maintaining the understanding.

³ A sunrise or sunset mountain; see the word applied intellectually just previously, also previous notes on it.

⁴ That is, heavenly.

YASNA XXVI.

THE FRAVASHIS; SACRIFICE AND PRAISE TO THEM.

1. I praise, invoke, and weave my hymn to the good, heroic, and bountiful Fravashis of the saints; (and having invoked these, then) we worship the Nmânyas, and the Vtśyas, and the Zantumas, and the Dahvyumas¹, and the Zarathustrôtemas.

2. And of all these prior Fravashis, we worship here the Fravashi of Ahura Mazda, which is the greatest and the best, the most beautiful and the firmest, the most wise and the best in form, and the one that attains the most its ends because of Righteousness. 3. And (having invoked them) hither, we worship the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the holy ones, those of the Bountiful Immortals, the brilliant, of effective glance, the lofty, the devoted, the swift ones of the creatures of Ahura who are imperishable and holy.

4. And (having invoked them) hither, we worship the spirit and conscience, the intelligence and soul and Fravashi of those holy men and women who early heard the lore and commands (of God²), and loved and strove after Righteousness, the ritual truth; and we worship the soul of the Kine of blessed gift. 5. And (having invoked it) hither, we worship the Fravashi of Gaya Maretan the holy, and the sanctity and Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitâma the saint; and we worship the Fravashi of Kavi Vîstâspa the holy, and that of Isať-vâstra the Zarathustrian, the saint.

¹ Dahyumas.

² 'Of the early religion.'

6. And (having invoked them) hither, we worship the life, conscience, intelligence, soul and Fravashi of the next of kin, of the saints male and female who have striven after the ritual truth, which are those of the dead and living saints, and which are those also of men as yet unborn, of the future prophets who will help on the renovation, and complete the human progress, with them all.

7. And (having invoked them) hither, we worship the souls of the dead [(Pâzand) which are the Fravashis of the saints ¹]; and of all the next of kin who have passed away in this house, of the Aêthrapaitis (the teachers) and of the disciples; yea, of all holy men and women; (8) and we worship the Fravashis of all the holy teachers and disciples; and of all the saints both male and female.

9. (And having invoked them) hither we worship the Fravashis of all the holy children who fulfil the deeds of piety; and we worship the Fravashis of the saints within the province; and those of the saints without the province. 10. We worship the Fravashis of (those) holy men and holy women; we worship all the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the saints from Gaya Maretan (the first created) to the Saoshyant, the victorious ².

11. Yea, we worship all the Fravashis of the saints, and we worship the souls of the dead [(Pâzand) which are the Fravashis of the saints]!

¹ Whether a real distinction existed in the minds of these early writers, between a Fravashi and a departed soul, is hard to say. That a Fravashi was worshipped as existing before the person to whom it appertained was born, may be owing to a poetical, and not a dogmatic, anticipation.

² From the Iranian Adam to the Christ of the resurrection; see Yast XIX, 89, 91.

YASNA XXVII.

PRELUDE TO THE CHIEF RECITAL OF THE AHUNA-VAIRYA.

1. This is to render¹ Him who is of all the greatest, our lord² and master³ (even) Ahura Mazda. And this to smite⁴ the wicked Angra Mainyu, and to smite Aêshma of the bloody spear, and the Mazainya Daêvas, and to smite all the wicked Varenya Daêvas.

2. And this is to further Ahura Mazda, the resplendent, the glorious, to further the Bountiful Immortals, and the influences of the star Tistrya, the resplendent, the glorious, (and) to the furtherance of the holy man, and of all the (bountiful and) holy creatures of the Bounteous Spirit.

3-5⁵. 6. The Haomas are crushed, O Mazda, Khshathra, and Asha, O ye Lords! Good is Sraosha who accompanies the sacrifice with the great glory⁶, and may he be present affording strenuous help.

7. We are offering saving acts of wisdom and of worship with the sacred gift of the Ahuna-vairya intoned with sanctity, and of the two mortars here

¹ Dazdyâi would be an infin. for an imperative; but it here refers to the Ahuna. We might say, 'Let this render,' &c.

² See Y. XXXIV, 5.

³ Referring to the Ahû and Ratu of the Ahuna, but with erroneous application.

⁴ Comp. Vend. XIX, 9 (Wg.).

⁵ The Ahuna appears here in the MS. with Y. XXXIV, 5, the â airymâ, and the Ashem Vohû.

⁶ Mâzâ rayâ; otherwise mâzarayâ, with greatness (see Y. XLIII, 12).

brought forward¹ with holy act, and with that of the correctly uttered words likewise ; and therefore may they be to us the more saving in their wise significance.

8-12². 13. As the Ahû is excellent, so is the Ratu (one who rules) from (his) sanctity, a creator of mental goodness, and of life's actions done for Mazda ; and the Kingdom (is) for Ahura, which to the poor may offer a nurturer. 14. (What is Your Kingdom, Your riches ; how may I be Your own in my actions, to nourish Your poor, O Mazda ? Beyond ; yea, beyond all we declare You, far from Daêvas and Khrafstra-accursed mortals³!)

15. We worship the Ahuna-vairya. We worship Asha Vahista, the most beautiful⁴, the Bountiful Immortal⁵.

YASNA XXXV.

YASNA HAPTANGHÂITI.

With the Yasna of the 'Seven Chapters' which ranks next in antiquity after the Gâthas, we already pass into an atmosphere distinct from theirs. The dialect still lingers, but the spirit is changed. We have advanced personification of the Bountiful Immortals ; that is, their personification seems more prominent, while the ideas of which they are the personification already, and to a proportionate degree, have grown dim. The name Amesha Spenta occurs: the Fravashis appear ; the Fire is worshipped, the Earth, and the Grass.

To the waters, to the Soul of the Kine, and to all holy or clean

¹ Here the Parsi priests now manipulate the mortars.

² See Y. XXXIII, 11-14 ; and Y. I, 23, and Y. XII.

³ See Y. XXXIV, 15. The Ashem follows.

⁴ Or, 'the best.'

⁵ The Yênhê hâtâm follows. For Y. XXVIII-XXXIV, see the Gâtha Ahunavaiti above, pp. 2-194.

beings, the very word yazamaidê is applied for the first time. On the other hand, many later objects of worship are totally absent, the six seasons of the creation, the five divisions of the day, the five Gâthas, Zarathustra, the Baresman, the Haoma, &c. A considerable period of time must have elapsed since the Gâthas had been composed, and a lengthy period must also be supposed to have passed before the Avesta of the later type began to be sung and recited. The chapter numbered XLII in the Vendîdâd Sâdah of Brockhaus (1850), and in the edition of Westergaard (1852), and numbered XLI, 18-35 in Spiegel's edition, seems a later addition; but it cannot be very much later, as it preserves the dialect and general features. An intentional imitation is not probable. Spiegel has included it with chapter XLI to preserve the number 'seven;' and if the entire section is to be called 'the Yasnas of the Seven Chapters,' it should most certainly not be numbered XLII! I so number merely to follow Westergaard, as do the first two parts of these translations from the Avesta. This portion should neither be incorporated with chapter XLI, nor numbered as a separate one; it should be noted as a supplement. The name 'Seven Chapters' was of course given to the pieces long after their composition.

PRAISE TO AHURA AND THE IMMORTALS; PRAYER FOR THE PRACTICE AND DIFFUSION OF THE FAITH.

1. We sacrifice to Ahura Mazda, the holy Lord of the ritual order, and to the Bountiful Immortals, who rule aright, who dispose of all aright; and we sacrifice to the entire creation of the clean, the spiritual and the mundane, with the longing blessing of the beneficent ritual, with the longing blessing of the benignant Religion, the Mazdayasnian Faith.

2. We are praisers of good thoughts, of good words, and of good actions, of those now and those hereafter¹ [(Pâzand) of those being done, and of those completed]. We implant ¹(?) them (with our homage, and we do this) the more, and yet the more since we are (praisers) of the good (from whom they spring).

¹ The Pahlavi translator, as so often, first saw the proper explanation here.

3. That, therefore, would we choose, O Ahura Mazda! and thou, O Righteousness the beautiful! that we should think, and speak, and do those thoughts, and words, and deeds, among actual good ² thoughts, and words, and actions, which are the best for both the worlds; (4) and together with these gifts (?) and actions which are thus the best, we would pray for the Kine (which represents the pure creation), that she may have comfort and have fodder from the famed, and from the humble, from the potent and the weak.

5. To the best of good rulers (is) verily the Kingdom, because we render and ascribe it to Him, and make it thoroughly His own (?), to Mazda Ahura do we ascribe it, and to Righteousness the Best.

6. As thus both man or woman knows (the duty), both thoroughly and truly, so let him, or her, declare it and fulfil it, and inculcate it upon those who may perform it as it is. 7. We would be deeply mindful of Your sacrifice and homage, Yours, O Ahura Mazda! and the best, (and we would be mindful) of the nurture of the Kine. And that let us inculcate and perform for You according as we may, and (for) such (praisers as we are).

8. Under the shelter ³ of the ritual Order let us do so in the active fulfilment ³ of its (precepts) toward every one of the (clean) and better creatures which are fit to live¹, with a gift for both the worlds.

¹ Or, we are 'purifiers,' or 'adorners.' Tradition 'spreading from man to man,' so thoroughly implanting themselves; comp. perhaps nîd.

² Hâtâm in this sense.

³ Or, 'in the house and stall.'

 9. Yea, those words and sayings, O Ahura Mazda! we would proclaim as Righteousness, and as of the better mind (?); and we would make Thee the one who both supports (us in our proclamation) of them, and who throws still further light upon them (as they are),

10. And by reason of Thy Righteous Order, Thy Good Mind, and Thy Sovereign Power, and through the instrumentality of our praises of Thee, O Ahura Mazda! and for the purpose of (still further) praises, by Thy spoken words, and for (still further) spoken words, through Thy Yasna, and for (still further) Yasnas (would we thus proclaim them, and make Thee the bestower of our light).

YASNA XXXVI.

TO AHURA AND THE FIRE.

1. We would approach You two, O (Ye) primeval ones in the house² of this Thy holy Fire, O Ahura Mazda, Thou most bounteous Spirit! Who brings pollutions to this (Thy flame) him wilt Thou cover with pollutions (in his turn). 2. But as the most friendly do Thou give us zeal, O Fire of the Lord! and approach us³, and with the loving blessing of the most friendly, with the praise of the

¹ Or, 'live-stock.'

² Or, 'in the service of the Fire;' so the Pahlavi: consider also the occurrence of forms of var(e)z in the other sense in the close proximity. Fire temples did not exist; some shelter, however, must have been afforded. Also the dual pouruyê(-ve) may refer to Ahura and the Fire. Comp. Y. XXX, 3. Or, is it 'at first?'

³ Possibly, 'but most favoured is he whom (yem).'

most adored. Yea, may'st thou approach to aid us in this our greatest (undertaking) among the efforts of our zeal.

3. The Fire of Ahura Mazda art thou verily¹; yea, the most bounteous one of His Spirit, wherefore Thine is the most potent of all names (for grace), O Fire of the Lord! 4. And therefore we would approach Thee, (O Ahura!) with the help of Thy Good Mind (which Thou dost implant within us), with Thy (good) Righteousness, and with the actions and the words inculcated by Thy good wisdom!

5. We therefore bow before Thee, and we direct our prayers to Thee with confessions of our guilt, O Ahura Mazda! with all the good thoughts (which Thou dost inspire), with all the words well said, and the deeds well done, with these would we approach Thee. 6. And to Thy most beauteous body² do we make our deep acknowledgments, O Ahura Mazda! to those stars (which are Thy body); and to that one, the highest of the high, [such as the sun was called]!

YASNA XXXVII.

TO AHURA, THE HOLY CREATION, THE FRAVASHIS OF THE JUST, AND THE BOUNTIFUL IMMORTALS.

1. Thus therefore do we worship Ahura Mazda, who made the Kine (the living creation), and the (embodied) Righteousness (which is incarnate in the clean), and the waters, and the wholesome plants, the stars, and the earth, and all (existing) objects that are good. 2. Yea, we worship Him for His Sovereign Power and His greatness, beneficent (as they are), and with priority among the Yazads¹ who abide beside the Kine (and care for her protection and support).

¹ Vôi looks as if it represented vâf here.

² See Y. I, 1.

3. And we worship Him under His name as Lord, to Mazda dear, the most beneficent (of names). We worship him with our bones, and with our flesh, (with our bodies and our life). And we worship the² Fravashis of the saints, of holy men, and holy women; (4) and Righteousness the Best do we worship, the most beauteous, the Bountiful Immortal and that which is endowed with light in all things good.

5. And we worship the Good Mind (of the Lord), and His Sovereign Power, and the Good Faith, the good law of our thrift, and Piety the ready mind (within Thy folk)!

YASNA XXXVIII.

TO THE EARTH AND THE SACRED WATERS.

1. And now we worship this earth which bears us, together with Thy wives³, O Ahura Mazda! yea, those Thy wives do we worship which are so desired from their sanctity. 2. We sacrifice to their zealous wishes, and their capabilities, their inquiries (as to duty), and their wise acts of pious reverence, and with these their blessedness, their full vigour and good portions, their good fame and ample wealth. 3. O ye waters! now we worship you, you that are showered down, and you that stand in pools and vats, and you that bear forth (our loaded vessels?) ye female Ahuras of Ahura, you that serve us (all) in helpful ways, well forded and full-flowing, and effective for the bathings, we will seek you and for both the worlds! 4. Therefore did Ahura Mazda give you names, O ye beneficent¹ ones! when He who made the good bestowed you. And by these names we worship you, and by them we would ingratiate ourselves with you, and with them would we bow before you, and direct our prayers to you with free confessions of our debt. O waters, ye who are productive², and ye maternal ones, ye with heat³ that suckles the (frail and) needy (before birth), ye waters (that have once been) rulers of (us) all, we will now address you as the best, and the most beautiful; those (are) yours, those good (objects) of our offerings, ye long of arm to reach our sickness, or misfortune⁴, ye mothers of our life!

¹ Or, 'with the priority in the Yasnas, (we who are they) who abide.'

² Tem is interpolated; or shall we render: 'We worship Him' as in the F. with adverbial use as in the Greek, and often here?

³ Compare the Indian gnás. The waters are wives, as is the earth; below they are mothers.

YASNA XXXIX.

TO THE SOUL OF THE KINE, &c.

1. And now we sacrifice to the Kine's soul, and to her created body, and we sacrifice to the souls

¹ Vanguhís with K₄, &c.

² Compare azi as applied to the Kine.

³ Compare agnáyas, reading agnayô. Or is it agnivau with a suffix va?

⁴ Or, 'our sicknesses and welfare.'

of cattle who are fit to live¹ (for us), and whose (we ?) are, such as are the same to them.

2. And we worship the souls of those beasts which are tame and broken in, and of wild herds, and the souls of the saints wherever they were born, both of men and of women, whose good consciences are conquering in the strife against the Daévas, or will conquer, or have conquered.

3. And now we worship the Bountiful Immortals (all) the good, and both those male², and those female³ (by their names). The males among them do we worship, ever living, and ever helpful, who dwell beside the pious, and the females thus the same. 4. As Thou, O Ahura Mazda! hast thought and spoken, as thou hast determined, and hast done these things (effecting) what is good, therefore do we offer to Thee, therefore do we ascribe to Thee our praises, and worship Thee, and bow ourselves before Thee; and therefore would we direct our prayers to Thee, Ahura! with confessions of our sin.

5. And we thus draw near to Thee together with the good kinship of our kindred, with that of Righteousness the blessed, and the good law of thrift and energy and the good Piety, the ready mind (within Thy folk)!

YASNA XL.

PRAYERS FOR HELPERS.

1. And now in these Thy dispensations, O Ahura Mazda! do Thou wisely⁴ act for us, and with abun-

¹ Live-stock.

² Yôî.

³ Yaustâ.

⁴ A fem. noun mazdâ = medhá.

dance with Thy bounty and Thy tenderness¹ as touching us; and grant that reward which Thou hast appointed to our souls, O Ahura Mazda! 2. Of this do Thou Thyself bestow upon us for this world and the spiritual; and now as part thereof (do Thou grant) that we may attain to fellowship with Thee, and Thy Righteousness for all duration.

3. And do Thou grant us, O Ahura! men who are righteous, and both lovers and producers of the Right as well. And give us trained beasts for the pastures, broken in for riding², and for bearing, (that they may be) in 'helpful³ companionship with us, and as a source of long enduring vigour, and a means of rejoicing grace to us for this⁴.

4. So let there be a kinsman lord for us, with the labourers of the village, and so likewise let there be the clients (or the peers⁵). And by the help of those may we arise.

So may we be to You, O Mazda Ahura! holy and true⁶, and with free giving of our gifts.

YASNA XLI.

A PRAYER TO AHURA AS THE KING, THE LIFE, AND THE REWARDER.

1. Praises, and songs, and adorations do we offer to Ahura Mazda, and to Righteousness the Best; yea, we offer and we ascribe them, and proclaim them.

2. And to Thy good Kingdom, O Ahura Mazda!

¹ Otherwise, 'understanding which protects' (?).

² So the Pahlavi and Ner. ³ Bezvaitê. ⁴ May we be rejoicing(?).

⁵ Hakhmā (= -a) replacing the airyaman of the Gāthas, and throwing light upon its meaning. The form is irregular.

⁶ Or, 'holy rishis' (ereshayō?).

may we attain for ever, and a good King be Thou over us ; and let each man of us, and so each woman, thus abide, O Thou most beneficent of beings, and for both the worlds ! 3. Thus do we render Thee, the helpful Yazad, endowed with good devices, the friend of them (who worship Thee) with (well-adjusted) ritual ; so may'st Thou be to us our life, and our body's vigour, O Thou most beneficent of beings, and that for both the worlds !

4. Aye, let us win and conquer (?) long life, O Ahura Mazda ! in Thy grace, and through Thy will may we be powerful. May'st Thou lay hold on us to help, and long, and with salvation, O Thou most beneficent of beings !

5. Thy praisers and Māthra-speakers may we be called ¹, O Ahura Mazda ! so do we wish, and to this may we attain ². What reward most meet for our deserving Thou hast appointed for the souls, O Ahura Mazda ! (6) of that do Thou bestow on us for this life, and for that of mind ³. Of that reward (do Thou Thyself grant this advantage), that we may come under Thy protecting guardianship, and that of Righteousness for ever. We sacrifice to that brave Yasna, the Yasna Haptanghâiti ⁴, the holy, the ritual chief !

YASNA XLII.

A SUPPLEMENT TO THE HAPTANGHÂITI ⁵.

1. We worship You, O Ye Bountiful Immortals ! with the entire collection of this Yasna, Haptanghâiti

¹ See Y. L, 11.

² Or, 'abide.'

³ See Y. XXVIII, 3.

⁴ Here the Haptanghâiti once ended.

⁵ Of not greatly later origin.

(as we sum up all). And we sacrifice to the fountains of the waters, and to the fordings of the rivers, to the forkings of the highways, and to the meetings of the roads.

2. And we sacrifice to the hills that run with torrents, and the lakes that brim with waters, and to the corn that fills the corn-fields; and we sacrifice to both the protector and the Creator, to both Zarathustra and the Lord.

3. And we sacrifice to both earth and heaven, and to the stormy wind that Mazda made, and to the peak of high Haraiti, and to the land, and all things good.

4. And we worship the Good Mind (in the living) and the spirits of the saints. And we sacrifice to the fish of fifty-fins¹, and to that sacred beast the Unicorn² (?) which stands in Vouru-kasha, and we sacrifice to that sea of Vouru-kasha where he stands, (5) and to the Haoma, golden-flowered, growing on the heights; yea, to the Haoma that restores us, and aids this world's advance. We sacrifice to Haoma that driveth death afar, (6) and to the flood-streams of the waters, and to the great flights of the birds, and to the approaches of the Fire-priests, as they approach us from afar³, and seek to gain the provinces, and spread the ritual lore. And we sacrifice to the Bountiful Immortals all⁴!

¹ See, however, Bundahis (West), p. 66.

² See Bundahis, chap. XIX, also Darmesteter, Ormuzd and Ahriman (pp. 148-150).

³ Yôî yêyâ dûrâ points to a migration of Zoroastrianism, coming West(?).

⁴ For Yasna XLIII-LI, see above, pp. 98-187.

YASNA LII (SP. LI).

A PRAYER FOR SANCTITY AND ITS BENEFITS.

1. I pray with benedictions for a benefit, and for the good, even for the entire creation of the holy (and the clean); I beseech for them for the (generation which is) now alive, for that which is just coming into life ¹, and for that which shall be hereafter. And (I pray for that) sanctity which leads to prosperity, and which has long afforded shelter ², which goes on hand in hand with it ³, which joins it in its walk, and of itself becoming its close companion as it delivers forth its precepts, (2) bearing every form of healing virtue which comes to us in waters ⁴, appertains to cattle, or is found in plants, and overwhelming all the harmful malice of the Daêvas, (and their servants) who might harm this dwelling ⁵ and its lord, (3) bringing good gifts, and better blessings, given very early, and later (gifts), leading to successes, and for a long time giving shelter ⁶. And so the greatest, and the best, and most beautiful benefits of sanctity fall likewise to our lot (4) for the sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and the praise of the Bountiful Immortals, for the bringing prosperity to this abode, and for the prosperity of the entire creation of the holy,

¹ Or, 'for that which is past?' bavâithyâika.

² Dareghô-vârethmanem is treated as a feminine; see also dareghô-vârethmanô in verse 3.

³ Have we hvô-aiwishâkîm, as representing some more regular form?

⁴ Medicinal springs.

⁵ This Yasna was celebrated from house to house.

⁶ Vârethmanô.

and the clean, (and as for this, so) for the opposition of the entire evil creation. (And I pray for this) as I praise through Righteousness, I who am beneficent, those who are (likewise of a better mind) ¹. 5-8. (See Y. VIII, 5-8.) (For Y. LIII, see Gâthas, pp. 190-194.)

YASNA LIV ² (SP. LIII).

THE AIRYEMÂ-ISHYÔ.

1. Let the Airyaman, the desired friend and peersman, draw near for grace to the men and to the women who are taught of Zarathustra, for the joyful grace of the Good Mind, whereby the conscience may attain its wished-for recompense. I pray for the sacred reward of the ritual order which is (likewise so much) to be desired; and may Ahura Mazda grant ³ it, (or cause it to increase).

2. We sacrifice to the Airyemâ-ishyô, the powerful, the victoriously smiting, the opponent of assauling malice, the greatest of the sentences of the holy ritual order. And we sacrifice to the bounteous Gâthas that rule supreme in the ritual, the holy (and august). And we sacrifice to the Praises of the Yasna which were the productions of the world of old ⁴.

¹ Citation from the Gâthas (Y. XLV, 6).

² This piece in the Gâthic dialect, and in a metre supposed by some to be identical with that of the Vahistôisti, is very old, and ranks with the Ahuna-vairya and Ashem Vohû in importance.

³ Or, can masatâ (sic) equal 'with his liberality, or majesty,' leaving yantu to be understood with Ahurô?

⁴ The later Avesta notes the antiquity of the older.

YASNA LV (Sp. LIV).

THE WORSHIP OF THE GÂTHAS AS CONCLUDED, AND THAT OF THE STAOTA YÊSNYA¹ AS BEGINNING.

1. We present hereby and we make known, as our offering to the bountiful Gâthas which rule (as the leading chants) within (the appointed times and seasons of) the Ritual, all our landed riches, and our persons, together with our very bones and tissues, our forms and forces, our consciousness, our soul, and Fravashi.

2. That which Gâthas (may) be to us, which are our guardians and defenders, and our spiritual food, yea, which (may) be to our souls both food and clothing, such are these Gâthas to us, guardians, and defenders, and (spiritual) food, even such they are, both food and clothing to the soul.

And (may) they be to us (for this our offering) abundant givers of rewards, and just and righteous ones, for the world beyond the present, after the parting of our consciousness and body. 3. And may these (Praises of the Offering) come forth, and appear for us with power and victorious assault, with health and healing, with progress, and with growth, with preparation and protection, with beneficence and sanctity, and abounding with gifts² toward him who can understand; yea, let them appear (with free liberality to the enlightened), let them appear as

¹ Staota Yêsnya seems to designate that part of the Yasna which begins with the Srôsh Yast.

² Frârâiti; or possibly 'to the freely giving,' (the term. '-ti' as a dative).

Mazda, the most beneficent, has produced them, He the one who is victorious when He smites, and who helps the settlements advance, for the protection, and the guarding of the religious order of the settlements which are now being furthered, and of those which shall bring salvation to us, and for the protection of the entire creation of the holy (and the clean).

4. And may'st thou, (O Asha ! who abidest within the Gâthas¹), give to every holy man who comes with this prayer for a blessing, and endeavouring to help himself², according to his good thoughts, and words, and deeds.

5. We are therefore worshipping both the (divine) Righteousness and the Good Mind, and the bountiful Gâthas, that rule as the leading chants within (the times and the seasons of) the holy ritual order.

6. And we worship the Praises of the Yasna which were the production of the ancient world, those which are (now) recollected and put in use³, those which are now learned and taught, those which are being held (in mind, and so) repeated, those remembered and recited, and those worshipped, and thus the ones which further the world through grace in its advance.

And we worship the part(s)⁴ of the Praises of the Yasna, and their recitation as it is heard, even their memorised recital, and their chanting, and their offering (as complete).

¹ Conjectural; see Ashem below. ² Pahlavi avô nafsman.

³ Recited from memory, and used in the ceremonial.

⁴ The part, 'each part.'

YASNA LVI (SP. LV).

INTRODUCTION TO THE SRÔSH YAST.

1. Let Sraosha (the listening Obedience) be present here for the worship of Ahura Mazda, the most beneficent, and holy, of him) who is desired by us as at the first, so at the last; and so again may attentive Obedience be present here for the worship of Ahura Mazda, the most beneficent and the holy who (is so) desired by us.

2. (Yea), let Sraosha (the attentive Obedience) be present here for the worship of the good waters, and for the Fravashis of the saints which are so desired by us, [and for (their¹) souls], as at the first, so at the last.

And thus again may Sraosha (the listening Obedience) be present here for the worship of the good waters, and for the Fravashis of the saints, which are so desired by us, [(and) for (their) souls].

3. Let Sraosha (the listening Obedience) be present here for the worship of the good waters; yea, let the good Obedience be here for the worship of the good and bountiful Immortals who rule aright, and dispose (of all) aright, the good, and for the worship of the good Sanctity, or Blessedness, who is closely knit with the Righteous Order, to perfect us, and to incite us. May Sraosha (Obedience) be here present for the worship of the good waters, he the good and the holy², as at the first, so at the last.

¹ One might be inclined to render 'who are so desired by us for our souls.' But I think that the words are Pâzand to the preceding.

² Or, 'endowed with recompense.'

4. And so again may Sraosha, (Obedience) the good, be present here for the worship of the good waters, and of the good¹ and bountiful Immortals, and of Blessedness the good who is closely knit with the Righteous Order to perfect and to incite us². Yea, we worship Sraosha the blessed and the stately, who smites with victory, and who furthers the settlements in their advance, the holy lord of the ritual order³.

YASNA LVII (SP. LVI).

THE SRÔSH YAST⁴.

1. A blessing is Righteousness (called) the Best, &c.

Propitiation be to Sraosha, Obedience the blessed, the mighty, the incarnate word of reason, whose body is the Māthra, him of the daring spear, devoted to the Lord, for (his) sacrificial worship, homage, propitiation, and praise.

¹ Of the female (feminine) names.

² Or, 'give to us.' The Ahuna and Ashem Vohû follow here.

³ The Yênhê hâtâm, &c. follows.

⁴ As Sraosha is the only divinity of the later groups mentioned in the first four Gâthas, this Yast would seem to have claims to antiquity next after the pieces in the Gâthic dialect. The name Sraosha does not appear to have lost its meaning as an abstract quality, notwithstanding the materialistic imagery. With Y. XXVIII, 6 in view, where Sraosha 'finds the way' to Ahura, or 'finds His throne,' we may understand that the worshippers, who first heard this Yast, praised listening obedience, or repentance, as they did nearly all the remaining abstract qualities, together with their principal prayers, and hymns themselves. The rhythm of the original has been somewhat imitated in the rendering given, as it is difficult to avoid doing so, and to avoid other objectionable features at the same time.

I.

2. We worship Sraosha, (Obedience) the blessed, the stately, him who smites with the blow of victory, and who furthers the settlements, the holy, (ruling) as the ritual lord. Him do we worship, who in ¹ the creation of Mazda the first adored Ahura, with the Baresman spread, who worshipped the Bountiful Immortals ² (first), who worshipped both the protector and the Creator, who are ³ (both) creating all things in the creation.

3. For his splendour and his glory, for his might, and the blow which smites with victory, I will worship him with the Yasna of the Yazads, with a Yasna loud intoned, him Obedience the blessed, with the consecrated waters, and the good Blessedness, the lofty, and Nairya-sangha, the stately; and may he draw near to us to aid us, he who smites with victory, Obedience the blessed!

4. We worship Sraosha, Obedience the blessed, and that lofty Lord who is Ahura Mazda Himself, Him who has attained the most to this our ritual, Him who has approached the nearest to us in our celebrations. And we worship all the words of Zarathustra, and all the deeds well done (for him), both those that have been done (in times gone by),

¹ So 'tradition.'

² Sraosha was not reckoned as one of the Ameshôspends at the time of the composition of this verse.

³ Comp. Y. XXX, 4; but Ahura and some one of the Immortals, or possibly Zarathustra (see Y. XLII, 2), must be meant here. Angra Mainyu could not have been worshipped as either protector or creator. Observe the present tense.

and those which are yet to be done (for him in times to come).

II.

5. We worship Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed and the stately, him who smites with the blow of victory, who prospers the settlements, the holy ritual lord, (6) who first spread forth the Baresman, and the three bundles, and the five bundles, and the seven bundles, and the nine, till it was heaped for us knee-high, and to the middle of the thighs¹, for the Bountiful Immortals, for their worship, and their homage, and their propitiation, and their praise.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might, and the blow which smites with victory, I will worship him with the Yasna of the Yazads, with a Yasna loud intoned, him Obedience the blessed, with the consecrated waters.

III.

7. We worship Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, the stately, who smites with the blow of victory, who furthers the settlements, the holy ritual chief.

8. Who first chanted the Gâthas, the five² Gâthas of Zarathustra, the Spitâma, the holy (with the fashion) of their metres³, and after the well-constructed order of their words, together with the Zand which they contain, and the questions⁴ which they

¹ Le Barsom est de cinq branches dans les Darouns ordinaires. Il est de sept branches pour le Daroun No naber, pour le Freoueschi, et pour le Gâhânâbâr. Il est de neuf branches pour le Daroun des Rois, et pour celui du Mobed des Mobeds (Anquetil).

² This proves that the Gâthas were greatly older than this Yast. That the Gâthas were originally five seems improbable; yet they had become reduced to that number at this time.

³ Nom. sing.?

⁴ Comp. ta' thwâ peresâ, &c.; 'questions back and forth.'

utter, and the answers which they give, for the Bountiful Immortals, for their sacrifice and homage, their propitiation, and their praise.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might

IV.

9. We worship Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed and the stately, who smites with the blow of victory, and who furthers the settlements, the holy ritual chief, (10) who for the poor among (our) men and women built a mighty house¹, who after sunset, and with his levelled battle-axe, smites Aêshema bloody wounds, and having struck the head, casts him lightly (?)² (to the earth), as the stronger (smites) the weaker.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might

V.

11. We worship Sraosha, Obedience the blessed and the stately, him who smites with the blow of victory, who furthers the settlements, the holy ritual chief, as the energetic, and the swift, the strong, the daring (and redoubted) hero, (12) who comes back from all his battles (and comes from them) a conqueror, who amid the Bountiful Immortals sits as companion at their meeting³.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might

¹ One of the earliest notices of the kind.

² Hu + angh, or can sas = to be inactive, indicate a change?

³ This is possibly the origin of a later view which established Sraosha as one of the Immortals, to fill up the number seven without including Ahura. The original 'seven spirits' included Ahura.

VI.

13. We worship Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, who is the strongest and most persistent of the youths, the most energetic, and the swiftest, who of all the youths strikes most with terror¹ from afar (?). [Be ye desirous, O ye Mazdayasnians! of the Yasna of Obedience the blessed².]

14. Far from this house, this village, and this tribe, and from this country, the evil and destructive terrors (shall) depart. In the dwelling of that man in whose abode Obedience the blessed, who smites victoriously, is satisfied and welcomed, there is that holy man who thus contents him (most) forward in the thinking better thoughts, in the speaking truthful (ritual) words, and in the doing holy deeds³.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might . . .

VII.

15. We worship Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed and the stately, who is the conqueror of the Kayadha, and the Kâidhya, who was the smiter of the Lie-demon of the Daêvas, the one veritably powerful, the destroyer of the world, who is the guardian and watchman over all the migrations (?) of the tribes.

16. Who sleeplessly and vigilant guards the creatures of Ahura, who sleeplessly and with vigilance

¹ =kat-tarestemem, comp. for form katpayãm.

² Possibly an ancient interpolation. Repetitions are curtailed.

³ This verse 14 may be an ancient extension of the Yast; it may of course be taken for granted that within a certain period at a very remote time, the Yast was altered and improved.

Verse 16 may have originally formed two sections; the formula 'we worship,' &c. having been omitted.

saves them, who with halberd raised on high guards all the corporeal world after setting of the sun, (17) who has never slept in quiet since the two Spirits made the worlds, [the bounteous and the evil one¹], who guards the homes of Asha, who battles all (?) the days long and the nights with all the Daêvas [(Pâzand) the Mâzanian], (18) nor terror-stricken does he turn in affright before (their power); but before him all the Daêvas turn in affright against their will, and rush to darkness in their fear.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might

VIII.

19. We worship Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, whom Haoma worshipped on the highest height of high Haraiti, he Haoma, the reviver², and the healer, the beautiful, the kingly³, of the golden eye, (20) of the gracious words⁴, of the warning and the guarding words, who intones our hymns on every side⁵, who possesses understanding and of every brilliant form, which abounds in many an explanation⁶ and revelation of the word, who has the first place in the Mâthra.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might

IX.

21. We worship Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed,

¹ This seems a gloss; its import is correct.

² The renovator, as completing the progress which makes things fresh, frashôkereti.

³ Possibly compare soma râgan; but see the following adjective, and read as alternative 'brilliant.'

⁴ Possibly 'who excites to much speech.'

⁵ Comp. pairi gaêthê, Y. XXXIV, 2.

⁶ Having much Zand.

whose house stands with its thousand pillars, as victorious, on the highest height of high Haraiti, self-lighted from within, star-studded from without, (22) to whom the Ahuna-vairyā has come, the axe of victory¹, and the Haptanghâiti, and the Fshûshô-mâthra which smites with victory, and all the Yasna sections.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might . . .

X.

23. We worship Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, by whose might and victorious power, and wise conduct, and (full) knowledge, the Bountiful Immortals² descend upon this earth of seven quarters.

24. Who as teacher of the law will stride forth upon this earth with its dwellers in the body, and ruling as he will.

And in this Religion, Ahura Mazda has been confessed³ with faith, and the Good Mind likewise with Him, and Righteousness the Best, and Khshathra-vairyā, and Piety the Bounteous, and the Universal Weal and Immortality; and the question to the Lord is asked, and Mazda's lore (is written).

25. O Sraosha (Obedience), thou blessed one, and stately! protect us for the lives; yea, for both, (for that) of this world which is corporeal, and for the world of mind, against unhappy⁴ death, and the remorseless Wrath of rapine, against the hosts with ill-intent, who lift their bloody spears⁵ against us;

¹ Comp. Vend. XIX, 10.

² They listen to Obedience, and so descend.

³ The meaning 'doth confess,' if correct, would show a very great degeneration from the lore of the Gâthic period.

⁴ Lit. 'evil.'

⁵ Bannered spears; spears with streamers.

yea, against their assaults whom¹ the Wrath-demon will set on, and Vîdhâtu, demon-made. 26. Therefore may'st thou, O Sraosha, the blessed and the stately! grant swiftness to our teams, soundness to our bodies, and abundant observation² of our foes, and their smiting (as we mark them), and their sudden death.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might

XI.

27. We worship Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, whom four racers draw in harness, white and shining, beautiful, and powerful³, quick to learn, and fleet⁴, obeying before speech, heeding orders from the mind, with their hoofs of horn gold-covered, (28) fleeter than (our) horses, swifter than the winds, more rapid than the rain(-drops as they fall); yea, fleeter than the clouds, or well-winged birds, or the well-shot arrow as it flies⁵, (29) which overtake these swift ones all, as they fly after⁶ them pursuing, but which are never overtaken when they flee, which plunge away from both the weapons (hurled on this side and on that) and draw Sraosha with them, the good Sraosha and the blessed; which from both the weapons (those on this side and on that) bear the good Obedience the blessed, plunging forward in their zeal, when he takes his course from India on the East, and when he lights down in the West.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might

¹ The hosts. ² So the Pahlavi and Ner. See also Y. IX, 21.

³ Spenta can hardly mean 'holy' here.

⁴ Âsava for asaya(?); 'y' miswritten for 'v.' Comp. gâtava (form).

⁵ Reading anghamanayau for anhê manayau; otherwise, 'swifter than one's thought'(?).

⁶ Lit. 'not those after overtake.' Possibly 'these who all overtake those who fly with turned backs, who are not overtaken from behind.'

XII.

30. We worship Obedience the blessed and the stately, who though lofty and so high, yea, even to the girdle, yet stoops to Mazda's creatures, (31) who thrice within the day, and three times of a night, will drive on to that Karshvar Hvaniratha, called the luminous, as he holds in both the hands¹ and poizes his knife-like battle-axe, which flies as of itself, and to cleave the Daêvas' skulls, (32) to hew down Angra Mainyu, the wicked, and to hew down Rapine of the bloody spear, to hew down the Daêvas of Mazendran², and every Demon-god.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might . . .

XIII.

33. We worship Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed and the stately, him who smites with victory, both here and not here, and on this entire earth. And we worship all the (gifts) of Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, the mighty, and the strong, whose body is the Mâthra.

Yea, we worship (all the martial gifts) of Sraosha (Obedience) the mighty, both armed with shielding armour, and a warrior strong of hand, skull-cleaver of the Daêvas, conquering the endowments³ of the conqueror, the holy conqueror of the conqueror, and (his) victorious powers, and the Ascendency which it bestows, and we worship

¹ Snaithis must designate a two-handed weapon.

² Observe how far West the word Daêva is applied; also, if Hindvô is not in a gloss in verse 29, the fact proves that a vast geographical extent was familiar to the writers of the Avesta.

³ Vanaitis, fem. as vispau refers to attributes celebrated in the Yart.

this Ascendency of Sraosha's (the same which conquers theirs); and that of Arsti do we praise as well. 34. And every house by Sraosha guarded do we worship, wherein the blessed friendly Sraosha is befriended and made welcome, where the holy man is far advanced (?) in holy thoughts, and righteous words and deeds.

For his splendour and his glory, for his might, which smites with victory, I will worship him with the Yasna of the Yazads, with a Yasna loud-intoned, him Obedience the blessed, with the consecrated waters, and the good Blessedness, the lofty, and Nairyasangha, the stately, and may he come to us to aid us, he who smites with victory, Obedience the blessed!

YASNA LVIII (Sp. LVII).

THE FSHŪSHÔ-MĀTHRA ¹.

1. (Introduction.) (To the increase of our homage and praise of God) we offer this service² which, as our defence³, may shield us, which is worship⁴ with its beneficent results; and Blessedness is with it of a verity⁵, and Piety as well. [(Pâzand) and of this worship the results here mentioned are the well-thought thought, the word well spoken, and the deed well done]; and let this our worship shelter us from the Daêva and from the evil-minded man. 2. And to this worship do we confide⁶ our settle-

¹ This piece in the Gâthic dialect has claims to an antiquity as high as Y. XII. It recalls the Gâthas in many ways. The increaser of cattle is identical with the thrifty tiller, and is the typical saint.

² The Pahlavi has sûd a partial transcription, but the word is obscure.

³ See nipâtû.

⁴ Nem with KIR.

⁵ Hâ + ge; comp. Indian sa + gha; or possibly from ha.

⁶ 'Make mention of.'

ments and persons for protection and care, for guarding, and for oversight; (3) and in this worship will we abide, O Ahura Mazda! and with joy.

In this worship do we exercise our choices; and to it will we approach, and to it will we belong; yea, to revering worship will we confide our settlements and persons for protection, and for care, for guarding, and for oversight, to such worship as is the praise of such as You¹.

MĀTHRA.

4. The owner of herds is the righteous (one), and he is victorious when he strikes, and thus he is the best; [(Pâzand) we therefore offer (this) service (for herd-owners²)] for the herd-owner is the father of the Kine by the help of him who follows the ritual order; and he is the father of the holy man as well, and of the sanctified creation³. He is in verity the bestower of blessings, and to him⁴, O Ye Bountiful Immortals⁵! we render, (and his do we make) Your greatness, Your goodness, and Your (spiritual) beauty, and let this man, the cattle-owner, approach to guard over us; and may he be our watchman together with the Righteous Order, and with store for our nourishment and full generous liberality, together with sharing of the goods⁶, with gentleness⁷, and with Ahura Mazda's sacred Fire!

¹ Khshmvâtô is often Gâthic for 'You.'

² Pâzand, as fshûshê is a plural, and not Gâthic. Or, 'we make men cattle-owners (we invite them to be such).'

³ The creation is mentioned in connection with the Kine. The typical saint stands at the head of the clean creation.

⁴ Whose?

⁵ See below.

⁶ Root vi + dâ (dhishâ); so also the Pahl. 'barâ dahisnîh.'

⁷ Akîñh va âtashiê î Aûharmazd-dâd. The word is difficult.

5. O Ye Bountiful Immortals! as Ye have made us, so do Ye save us, holy men, and saintly women (as we are, and steadfast in the faith)¹. Save us, O Ye Bountiful Immortals! Ye who rule aright, and who dispose (of all) aright, for none other do I know, save You; then with Your Righteousness² do Ye save us.

6. And we offer hereby our thoughts, and words, and actions, our herds, and men, to the Bountiful Spirit. And may the creative stars of Ahura Mazda, the Creator, shine down on us, and round about us³ with full herds and healthy settlements, with healthy herds and healthy men, and with all in vigour, and endowed with the blessing of the Lord. 7. Praise to Thee, O Fire of Ahura Mazda! may'st thou come to (us in) the greatest one of the engrossing interests⁴ for the help of the great (effort), for the joy-producing grace of the great (interest of our cause); grant us both Weal and Deathlessness!

8. We sacrifice to the entire collection of the Praises of the Yasna, with the careful structure of their language which has reached the most its object. And we offer (our homage) in our celebrations to Thy body, O Ahura Mazda! the most beautiful of forms, these stars, and to that one, the highest of the high [(Pâzand) such as the sun was called]. Yea, we worship the Praises of the Yasna which were the production of the world of old.

¹ Or, 'male and female holy ones, (the Amesha).'

² Y. XXXIV, 7.

³ Lit. 'may we be closely beheld by the creative lights,' &c.

⁴ Allusion to maze-yaunghô.

YASNA LIX (SP. LVIII).

MUTUAL BLESSINGS.

1-17. (See Y. XVII, 1-17.) 18-27. (See Y. XXVI, 1-10.) 28. We worship Verethraghna, the Ahura-made, the victorious blow; and we worship the Saoshyant, who smites with victory; and we sacrifice to this Baresman with its Zaothra and its girdle (which is its band) and which is spread with sanctity. And we sacrifice to (our) own soul(s), and to (our) own Fravashi(s). 29. (See Y. XVII, 19.) 30. (The Ratu speaks): O thou good (servant of the Lord)! may that be thine which is better than the good; may'st thou acquire that which is (thine) own¹ in the Zaothra; may'st thou attain to that reward which the Zaothar has been obtaining², who is far advanced in his good thoughts, and words, and deeds.

31. (The Zaothar speaks): May that happen to you (likewise) which is better than the good, and may that not happen which is worse than the evil, and may that likewise not be my lot. 32. As (our) Ahû (is) excellent, so (is our) Ratu (one who rules) from his Righteousness, a creator of mental goodness, and of life's actions done for Mazda, and the Kingdom (is) to Ahura which to the poor will offer a nurturer. A blessing is Asha called the Best, &c. We sacrifice to the Ahuna-vairya; we sacrifice to Asha Vahista³ the most beautiful, the Bountiful

¹ Avô nafsman.

² Hanayamnô zungha, a periphrastic perfect.

³ Asha Vahista occurs as immediately suggested by the Ashem

Immortal. And we sacrifice to the Fshûshô-māthra, the by-spoken¹. And we sacrifice to the entire collection of the Praises of the Yasna; (yea), to the Yasna Praises which were instituted in the world of yore.

YASNA LX (SP. LIX).

PRAYERS FOR THE DWELLING OF THE SACRIFICER².

1. Thus that better than the good may he approach, who shows to us straight paths of profit appertaining to this bodily life and to the mental likewise, in the eternal (?) realms where dwells Ahura; yea, may he approach it, who is Thy worthy servant, and good citizen, O Great giver Lord³!

2. May these blessings approach this house, which are the wise perceptions of the saints, the sacred blessings bestowed through the ritual, their guileless characteristics, together with their recognition of what is due; and may the Righteous Order appear for this village, and the Divine Sovereign Power, together with the benefit and glorious welfare (which ensues),

3. And with these the long enduring prominence of this Religion of Ahura's, the Zārazhustrian Faith. And may the Kine⁴ be now with greatest speed within (the farm-yard of) this house, most speedily Vohû formula, Asha Vahista seems therefore a proper name, both here and in the formula, if one place explains the other (?).

¹ The ever-spoken (?). The Yēnhê and Ahuna follow.

² Said on the visitation of farm-houses by the travelling priest.

³ See Y. XLIII, 3.

⁴ Gaus seems feminine here, and used collectively, and hata has the Indian sense of sata.

may the rewarded sanctity and the strength of the holy man be here, most speedily as well Ahura's lore. 4. And may the good and heroic and bountiful Fravashis of the saints come here, and may they go hand in hand with us with the healing virtues of (their) blessed gifts as wide-spread as the earth, as far-spread as the rivers, as high-reaching¹ as the sun, for the furtherance² of the better men, for the hindrance of the hostile, and for the abundant growth of riches and of glory.

5. May Sraosha (Obedience) conquer disobedience³ within this house, and may peace triumph over discord here, and generous giving over avarice, reverence³ over contempt, speech with truthful words over lying utterance. May the Righteous Order gain the victory over the Demon of the Lie⁴.

6. As in this (house) the Bountiful Immortals seek for good Yasnas and good praises from the blessed Sraosha (who governs here), and as they seek for (one) good sacrifice and act of homage (more especially their own) which is a good offering⁵ (to them) for (our) salvation, and a good offering in praise, together with a long continued offering of the entire self⁶, (7) let not then (their) brilliant glory⁷ ever desert this house, nor the bright abundance, nor an illustrious⁸ offspring legitimately⁹ born, nor that long continued companionship which is the

¹ Earth-wide, stream-long, sun-high. ² Isti seems a dative.

³ The name Sraosha had not lost its original meaning; so of Âr(a)maiti.

⁴ Asha-Drugem?

⁵ Possibly, 'good support.'

⁶ Pahl. benafsman.

⁷ Hvâthrava/ hvarenô determines the sense. ⁸ See 'hvâthrava.'

⁹ The Pahl. does not necessarily render 'heavenly;' the word elsewhere means 'original.'

furtherance of that good blessedness which teaches concerning glory¹. 8-10 (= Y. VIII, 5-7).

11. In order that our minds may be² delighted, and our souls the best, let our bodies be glorified as well, and let them, O Mazda! go likewise openly (unto Heaven) as the best world³ of the saints as devoted to Ahura, (12) and accompanied by Asha Vahista (who is Righteousness the Best), and the most beautiful! And may we see Thee, and may we, approaching, come around about Thee, and attain to entire companionship with Thee! And we sacrifice to the Righteous Order, the best, the most beautiful, the bounteous Immortal!

YASNA LXI (SP. LX).

1. Let us peal⁴ forth the Ahuna-vairya in our liturgy between the heaven and earth, and let us send forth the Asha Vahista in our prayer the same, and the Yênhê hâtâm. And let us send forth in our liturgies between the heaven and earth the pious and good prayer of the pious man for blessings, (2) for the encounter with, and for the displacement of Angra Mainyu with his creatures which are likewise evil as he is, for he is filled with death (for those whom he has made). Aye, let us send that petition forth for the encounter with, and for the dislodgment of the Kahvaredhas and of the individual *Kahvaredha*⁵ the male, and the female

¹ Or, 'welfare.'

² Aunghân.

³ The nom. is difficult. The Ashem Vohû and Ahuna follow.

⁴ De Harlez, 'faisons retentir.'

⁵ The Pahlavi perhaps 'diminishers;' Darmesteter, 'causing to pine.'

(to the last individual of each), (3) and for the encounter with, and the dislodgment of the Kayadhas, and of the individual Kayadhians, male and female¹, and of the thieves and robbers, of the Zandas², and the sorcerers, of the covenant breakers, and of those who tamper with the covenants. 4. Yea, we send it forth for the encounter with, and for the overthrow of the murderers of the saints, and of those who hate and torment us for our Faith, and of those who persecute the ritual, and the tyrant full of death. Yea, let us peal them forth for the encounter with, and the overthrow of the wicked, O Zarathustra Spitama! whoever they may be, whose thoughts, and words, and works are not congenial to the holy ritual laws.

5. And how shall we drive the Demon of the Lie from hence from us³? Aye, how shall we, the prophets who are yet to serve and save (thy people), drive the Drug from hence, so that we, having power over her as being utterly without power, may drive her hence with blow from the seven Karshvars, for the encounter with, and for the dislodgment of the entire evil world⁴?

YASNA LXII (Sp. LXI).

TO THE FIRE.

1. I offer my sacrifice and homage to thee, the Fire, as a good offering, and an offering with our hail

¹ 'Cannibals' has been suggested as the meaning here.

² The later Zendiks are of course not meant, unless we have an interpolation.

³ Citation from the Gáthas, Y. XLV, 6.

⁴ Citations follow.

of salvation, even as an offering of praise with benedictions, to thee, the Fire, O Ahura Mazda's son ! Meet for sacrifice art thou, and worthy of (our) homage. And as meet for sacrifice, and thus worthy of our homage, may'st thou be in the houses of men (who worship Mazda). Salvation be to this man who worships thee in verity and truth, with wood in hand, and Baresman ready, with flesh in hand, and holding too the mortar. 2. And may'st thou be (ever) fed with wood as the prescription orders. Yea, may'st thou have thy perfume justly, and thy sacred butter without fail, and thine andirons regularly placed. Be of full-age as to thy nourishment, of the canon's age as to the measure of thy food, O Fire, Ahura Mazda's son ! 3. Be now aflame¹ within this house ; be ever without fail in flame ; be all ashine within this house ; be on thy growth² within this house ; for long time be thou thus to the furtherance of the heroic (renovation), to the completion of (all) progress, yea, even till the good heroic (millennial) time when that renovation shall have become complete. 4. Give me, O Fire, Ahura Mazda's son ! a speedy glory, speedy nourishment, and speedy booty, and abundant glory, abundant nourishment, abundant booty, an expanded mind, and nimbleness of tongue for soul and understanding, even an understanding continually growing in its largeness, and that never wanders³, and long enduring virile power, (5) an offspring sure of foot, that never sleeps on watch [not for a third part of the day, or night], and that rises quick from bed⁴, and

¹ Or, 'for giving light.'

² Or, 'to give light' ? comp. ukhshânô and ukhshâ.

³ Read apairyâthem.

⁴ Or, 'has the quickest place.'

likewise a wakeful offspring, helpful to culture, or reclaim, legitimate, keeping order in men's meetings, (yea,) drawing men to assemblies through their influence and word, grown to power, skilful, redeeming others from oppression, served by many followers, which may advance my line (in prosperity and fame), and (my) Vîs, and my Zantû, and (my) province, (yea, an offspring) which may deliver orders to the Province as (firm and righteous rulers). 6. And may'st thou grant me, O Fire, Ahura Mazda's Son! that whereby instructors may be (given) me, now and for evermore, (giving light to me of Heaven) the best life of the saints, brilliant, all glorious. And may I have experience ¹ of the good reward, and the good renown, and of the long forecasting preparation of the soul. 7. The Fire of Ahura Mazda addresses this admonition to all for whom he cooks the night and morning (meal). From all these, O Spitama! he wishes ² to secure good care, and healthful care (as guarding for salvation), the care of a true praiser. 8. At both the hands of all who come by me, I, the Fire, keenly look: What brings the mate to his mate (thus I say to him), the one who walks at large, to him who sits at home? [We worship the bounteous Fire, the swift-driving charioteer ³.]

9. And if this man who passes brings him wood brought (with good measure that is) with sacred care, or if he brings the Baresman spread with sanctity, or the Hadhânaêpata plant, then afterwards Ahura Mazda's Fire will bless him, contented, not offended, and in (its) satisfaction (saying thus). 10. May a herd of kine be with thee, and a multitude of men, may an active mind go with thee, and an active soul as well. As a blest soul may'st thou live through thy life, the nights which thou shall live. This is the blessing of the Fire for him who brings it wood (well) dried, sought out for flaming, purified with the earnest blessing of the sacred ritual truth¹. 11. We strive after the flowing on of the good waters, and their ebb² as well, and the sounding of their waves, desiring their propitiation; I desire to approach them with my praise³. 12 = Y. III, 24, 25.

¹ Bartholomae follows tradition boldly here, rendering 'aushalten, festhalten an; giriftar yehvînâni(î).'

² Or, 'is worshipped for.'

³ This curious gloss seems thrown in as a solace to the Fire for the expression preceding. It savours of the Rîk.

YASNA LXIII⁴ (SP. LXII).

(See Y. XV, 2; Y. LXVI, 2; Y. XXXVIII, 3.)

YASNA LXIV (SP. LXIII).

(See Y. XLVI, 3; Y. L, 6-11.)

YASNA LXV (SP. LXIV).

TO ARDVI SÛRA ANÂHITA, AND THE WATERS.

1. I will praise the water Ardvi Sûra Anâhita, the wide-flowing (as it is) and healing in its influence,

¹ The Ashem Vohû occurs here.

² Or, 'falling.'

³ See as alternative Darmesteter's masterly rendering of the Âtas Nyâyis, 7-18.

⁴ This chapter is composed of short passages from other portions of the Yasna collected together possibly for the purpose of filling out the number of sections to some figure no longer known.

efficacious against the Daêvas, devoted to Ahura's lore, and to be worshipped with sacrifice within the corporeal world, furthering all living things¹(?) and holy, helping on the increase and improvement of our herds and settlements, holy, and increasing our wealth, holy, and helping on the progress of the Province, holy (as she is)? 2. (Ardvi Sûra Anâhita) who purifies the seed of all male beings, who sanctifies the wombs of all women to the birth, who makes all women fortunate in labour, who brings all women a regular and timely flow of milk, (3) (Ardvi Sûra Anâhita) with a volume sounding from afar², which is alone equal in its bulk to all the waters which flow forth upon earth, which flows down with mighty volume from high Hukairya to the sea Vouru-kasha. 4. And all the gulfs³ in Vouru-kasha are stirred (when it falls down), all the middle doth well up when Ardvi Sûra Anâhita rushes in, when she plunges foaming into them, she, whose are a thousand tributaries, and a thousand outlets, and each as it flows in, or rushes out, is a forty days' ride in length to a rider mounted well.

5. And the (chief) outlet to this one water (Ardvi Sûra Anâhita) goes apart, dividing to all the seven Karshvars. And this outlet to my river, Ardvi Sûra Anâhita, bears off its waters always in summer and in winter. This my river purifies the seed of men, and wombs of women, and women's milk⁴.

6. Let the saints' Fravashis now draw near, those of the saints who live, or have lived, of those born, or yet to be born; yea, let them come near which

¹ The Pahlavi has gân, or gûy, in which latter case the meaning 'springs' would be better.

² Or, 'famed from afar.'

³ Lit. 'sides.'

⁴ See Darmesteter's Âbân Yast, I-V.

have borne these waters up stream from the nearest ones (that lie below as the outlet pours away ¹).

7. Let not our waters be for the man of ill intent, of evil speech, or deeds, or conscience ; let them not be for the offender of a friend, not for an insulter of a Magian ², nor for one who harms the workmen, nor for one who hates his kindred. And let not our good waters (which are not only good, but) best, and Mazda-made, help on the man who strives to mar our settlements which are not to be corrupted, nor him who would mar our bodies, (our) uncorrupted (selves), (8) nor the thief, or bludgeon-bearing ruffian who would slaughter the disciples, nor a sorcerer, nor a burier of dead bodies, nor the jealous, nor the niggard, nor the godless heretic who slays disciples, nor the evil tyrant among men. Against these may our waters come as torments. As destructive may these come (?), may they come to him who has done those first (foul evils), as to him who does the last ³.

9. O waters ! rest ⁴ still within your places while the invoking priest shall offer.

Shall not the invoker make offering to these good waters, and with the inculcated words ? (And how shall this be done ?) Shall he not be tongue-fettered, if he offers else than with the ritual ? Shall (not) the words be so delivered as the Aêthrapaiti teaches ? Where shall the blessings be (inserted) ? Where the supplications with confessions ? Where the gifts of those that offer ? 10 ⁵. (It shall be only thus) as Ahura Mazda showed before to Zarathustra, and as Zara-

¹ Or, 'drawn up in vapours for the supply of the waters by the rain.'

² So the indication of the Pahlavi.

³ î-dî.

⁴ Or, 'rejoice ye.'

⁵ Response.

thustra taught the corporeal worlds (thé men on earth)! Thou shalt pray the first petition to the waters, O Zarathustra, and after that thou shalt offer the Zaothras to the waters, sanctified, and sought out with pious care; and thou shalt pronounce these words (as follows, thus): (11) O ye waters, I beseech of you this favour; and grant ye me this great one in whose bestowal ye flow down to me for the bettering (of my state), with a never-failing truth. O ye waters, I beseech of you for wealth of many kinds (which gives) power (to its holder ¹), and for an offspring self-dependent whom multitudes will bless, and for whose wasting, or defeat, or death, or vengeful punishment, or overtaking, no one prays.

12. And this do I beseech of you, O waters, this, O ye lands, and this, ye plants! This wealth and offspring I beseech of You, O Ye Bountiful Immortals, who rule aright, who dispose (of all) aright, O Ye good beings, male and female ², givers of good things; and this I beseech of you, O ye beneficent, mighty, and overwhelming Fravashis of the saints, and this (of thee), O Mithra of the wide pastures, and this of thee, O blest and stately Sraosha; and of thee, O Rashnu the most just, and of thee, O Fire, Ahura Mazda's son; and of thee, O lofty lord, the royal Apām-napât, of the fleet horses; aye, of You all, ye Yazads, bestowers of the better gifts and holy.

13. And this do ye therefore grant me, O ye holy waters, and ye lands ³!

14. And grant me likewise what is still greater than this all, and still better than this all, and more beautiful, and more exceeding precious (and that is, Immortality and Welfare ¹), O Ye Yazads, holy and ruling mightily, and powerful at once, and grant it speedily according to this Gâthic (?) word: (Yea), by veritable grace let that be done ² (?) for us which is most promotive of our weal. 15. And according to this further word again: Grant me, Thou who art maker of the Kine, the plants, and the waters, Immortality and likewise Weal, O Ahura Mazda, Thou most bounteous Spirit. And grant me these two eternal gifts through Thy Good Mind in the doctrine ³.

¹ Powerful.

² Some of the names are in the feminine.

³ Here repeat as above from 'O ye plants' to 'givers of the better thing and holy.'

16-18. (See Y. XV, 2; Y. LVI, 3-4 ⁴.)

YASNA LXVI (Sp. LXV).

TO THE AHURIAN ONE ⁵.

1. I am now offering this Zaothra here with sanctity ⁶, together with the Haoma and the flesh, and the Hadhânaêpata lifted up with sacred regularity as to thee, O Ahurian One, for the propitiation of Ahura Mazda, of the Bountiful Immortals, of Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, and of the Fire of Ahura Mazda, the ritual's lofty lord. 2. Y. VII, 5-19. 3. Y. XXII, XXVIII, 24-27.

YASNA LXVII (Sp. LXVI).

1-4. (See Y. XXIII, 1-4, replacing 'I desire to approach with sanctity' by 'I offer with sanctity'; see also Y. VII, 24.) 5-7. (See Y. XXXVIII, 3-5.)

¹ See below.

² See Y. L, 11.

³ See Y. LI, 7.

⁴ The Ahuna and Ashem Vohû follow.

⁵ I should say Ardvî Sûra Anâhita; see Y. LXVIII, 10, where the good waters are addressed as Ahurian Ones of Ahura.

⁶ Or, 'for a blessing.'

YASNA LXVIII (SP. LXVII).

TO THE AHURIAN ONE, AND THE WATERS.

1. We offer this to thee, O Ahurian (daughter) of Ahura! as a help¹(?) for life. If we have offended thee, let this Zaothra then attain to thee (for satisfaction), for it is thine with its Haoma, and its milk, and its Hadhânaêpata. 2. And may'st thou approach to me for milk and for libation, O Zaothra! as health, for healing, and for progress, for growth and in preparation for ceremonial merit, for good renown, for equanimity², and for that victory which makes the settlements advance.

3. Yea, we worship thee with sacrifice, O thou Ahurian (daughter) of Ahura with the Zaothras of the good thought; and we worship, O Ahura, one with the Zaothras of the good word and deed (4) for the enlightenment of the thoughts, and words, and actions, for preparation for the soul, for the settlement's advance, and to prepare the saints endowed with ritual merit.

5. And grant me, O thou Ahurian One! Heaven, and to have an offspring manly and legitimate, who may promote my house, my village, my tribe and province, and the authority thereof.

6. We sacrifice to thee, O thou Ahurian one! And we sacrifice to the sea Vouru-kasha, and to all waters upon earth, whether standing, or running, or waters of the well, or spring-waters which perennially flow, or the drippings of the rains, or the irrigations of canals. 7. With this hymn from the (spirit of) the Yasna do we worship thee, and with the homage which it offers as it is the most legitimate¹ Yasna, and homage of them (all) because of Righteousness the Best. We sacrifice to the good waters, and to the best, which Mazda created. 8. And we sacrifice to the two, to the milk and to the libation, which make the waters flow, and the plants sprout forth, opposing therein the Dragon Daêva-made, for the arrest of that cheat the Pairika, and to contradict the insulting malice of the Ashemaogha (the disturber and destroyer of our Faith), and of the unholy tyrant full of death, and of the human Daêva (worshipper) of hateful malice (and intent).

¹ The Pahlavi translator saw the root av in this sense here with K4, 11; P6, but the form is strange.

² So the Pahlavi indicates with no impossible suggestion.

9. And may'st thou hear our sacrificial chants, O thou Ahurian (daughter) of Ahura! Yea, be propitiated by our Yasna, O Ahurian one! and so may'st thou be present² at our Yasna; may'st thou come to us to help, as we chant our full-offered Yast, with the full offering of Zaothras.

10. If any man shall sacrifice to you, O ye good waters, the Ahurian ones of Ahura! with the best and most fitting Zaothras offered piously, (11) to that man ye give both splendour and glory, with health and vigour of the body and prominence of form; yea, to him ye give possessions which entail abundant glory, and a legitimate scion, and a long enduring life, and (Heaven at the last), the best life of the saints, shining, all glorious. 12. And to me also do ye now give it, to me who am offering this Yasna as a priest³.

¹ Or 'virtuous,' with Darmesteter.

² May'st thou sit.

³ Zôto ũ yastar hômanam.

(Response¹.) And to us Mazdayasnians who are likewise offering sacrifice, do ye grant (both the desire and knowledge of the path that is correct²), to us colleagues, and disciples, Aêthrapaitis and Aêthryas, men and women as well as children, and maidens of the field, (13) who think good only, for the overwhelming of oppression and of malice in the raids of the invader, and in face of foes who hate. Grant to us both the desire³ of, and the knowledge of that straightest path, the straightest because of Righteousness, and of (Heaven) the best life of the Saints, shining, all glorious. As the Ahû is excellent, so is the Ratu (one who rules) from the Righteous Order, a creator of mental goodness and of life's actions done for Mazda. And the kingdom (is) for Ahura, which to the poor may offer nurture. 14. (The Zaothar speaks): I beseech with my benediction for a safe abode, for a joyful and a long abode for the dwellers in this village from whence these Zaothras (which I offer come). And I pray in my benediction for a safe abode, and a quiet and a joyful one, and a long abiding to every Mazdayasnian village, and for a succour even with my wants, for a succour with salutations of salvation, and for one with praises, O Fire⁴! and for thee, O Ahurian one of Ahura! do I ask the fullest Yast.

15. And I pray for (?) Râman Hvâstra for this Province, and for healthfulness and healing. And I pray for it with my blessing for you pious men, for all. And I pray for him who is saintly with (true) goodness, whosoever he may be, between heaven and the earth, for a thousand healing remedies, and for ten thousand of the same.

¹ Or, 'the priest continues speaking for the people.' ² See below.

³ Or, 'this desire, the knowledge.' ⁴ Or, 'of the Fire.'

16-19. (See Y. VIII, 5-8.) 20. Thus may it happen as I pray. 21. And by this may I gain¹ (that) blessing, the good Blessedness (our sanctity rewarded). And we address, and we invoke religious zeal and capability, and the waters with our Yasna² thus: O ye good waters! since (they are) yours, do ye, as you are asked, grant splendour and grant glory, ye who are well able so to give; and do ye, O ye waters! grant (once more) that helpful blessing which was gained from you of old!

22. Praise (be) to Ahura Mazda, and to the Bountiful Immortals. Praise (be) to Mithra of the wide pastures. Praise to the fleet-horsed sun. Praise to (the star which so we name, and with this sun) Ahura Mazda's eyes. Praise to the Kine³ (the herds of blessed gift). Praise to Gaya (Maretan) and to the Fravashi of Zarathustra (first of) saints; yea, praise to the entire creation of the holy (and the clean), to those now living, and to those just passing into life, and to those of days to come. 23. And do Thou then Ahura, as in answer to these our prayers and songs of praise, cause us to prosper to salvation through Thy Good Mind, the Sovereign Power, and Thy Righteous Order (in Thy ritual and law⁴)!

¹ Or, 'the good wisdom' from the second dâ (good adjustment).

² Passages follow from Y. XXXVIII, 2-5.

³ The Gâthic Kine.

⁴ See Y. XXXIII, 10. Citations follow from Y. XXXVI, 6; Y. XLIII, 6, also the Ashem and Y. III, 24, 25; then Y. XLVII, 1-7. Then the words 'we worship the chapter Spentâ-mainyu from the beginning,' then the Yênhê hâtâm.

YASNA LXIX (SP. LXVIII).

This chapter is composed of fragments: see Y. XV, 2; and Y. LI, 1 and 22.

YASNA LXX (SP. LXIX).

TO THE BOUNTIFUL IMMORTALS, AND THE INSTITUTIONS OF RELIGION.

1. I would worship these (the Bountiful Immortals) with my sacrifice, those who rule aright, and who dispose (of all) aright, and this one (especially) I would approach with my praise, (Ahura Mazda). He is thus hymned (in our praise-songs). Yea, we worship in our sacrifice that deity and lord, who is Ahura Mazda, the Creator, the gracious helper, the maker¹ of all good things; and we worship in our sacrifice Zarathustra Spitâma, that chieftain (of the rite).

2. And we would declare those institutions established for us, exact (and undeviating as they are). And I would declare forth those of Ahura Mazda, those of the Good Mind, and of Asha Vahista (who is Righteousness the Best), and those of Khshatra-vairya (the Realm to be desired), and those of the Bountiful Âramaiti (the Piety within us), and those of Weal and Immortality, and those which appertain to the body² of the Kine, and to the Kine's soul, and those which appertain to Ahura Mazda's Fire, (3) and those of Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, and of Rashnu the most just, and those of Mithra of the wide pastures, and of (the good and) holy Wind, and of the good Mazdayasnian Religion, and of the good and pious Prayer for blessings, and those of the good and pious Prayer which frees one from belying, and the good and pious Prayer for blessing against unbelieving words¹. 4. (And these we would declare) in order that we may attain unto that speech which is uttered with (true) religious zeal, or that we may be as prophets of the provinces, that we may succour him² who lifts his voice (for Mazda³), that we may be as prophets who smite with victory, the befriended of Ahura Mazda, and persons the most useful to Him⁴, holy men (indeed) who think good thoughts, and speak good words, and do good deeds. 5. That he may approach us with the Good Mind⁵, and that (our souls) may advance in good, let it thus come; yea, 'how may my soul advance in good? let it thus advance⁶.'

¹ Reading tashvæunghem(?) (comp. dadhvæunghem), according to the indication of the Pahlavi.

² Tashan with change of accent. So the Pahlavi indicates.

6. We praise the flood and ebb of the good waters, and their roar, and that high Ahura, the royal Apām-napât, the glittering one, of the fleet horses; and this for the sacrifice, and homage, and propitiation, and praise of the entire holy creation; and may Sraosha (Obedience) be here (to aid us). 7. (Yea), we sacrifice to Sraosha, Obedience the blessed⁷.

¹ Read the gloss to the Pahlavi in Visp. IX, 3, anêranîhâ.

² Or, barentû, 'let them lift.'

³ Y. XXXI, 12.

⁴ See Y. XXXI, 22.

⁵ Y. XLIV, 1.

⁶ Y. XLIV, 8.

⁷ The Yênhê hâtâm.

YASNA LXXI (Sp. LXX).

THE YASNA CONCLUDING.

1. Frashaostra, the holy, asked the saintly Zarathustra: Answer me, O thou most eminent Zarathustra, what is (in very truth) the memorised recital of the rites?

What is the completed delivery of the Gâthas¹?
 2. Upon this Zarathustra said: (It is as follows.) We worship Ahura Mazda with our sacrifice (as) the holy lord of the ritual order; and we sacrifice to Zarathustra likewise as to a holy lord of the ritual order; and we sacrifice also to the Fravashi of Zarathustra, the saint. And we sacrifice to the Bountiful Immortals, (the guardians²) of the saints. 3. And we sacrifice to (all) the good heroic and bounteous Fravashis of the saints, of the bodily (world on earth), and of the mental (those in Heaven). And we worship that one of ritual lords who attains the most his ends; and we sacrifice to that one of the Yazads, lords of the ritual order, who is the most strenuous, who gains the most, who reaches most to what he seeks, even that well-timed Prayer which is the prayer of that holy ritual lord, and which has approached the nearest (to us for our help).

4. We sacrifice to Ahura Mazda, the holy lord of the ritual order, and we worship His entire body¹, and we worship the Bountiful Immortals all; and we worship all the ritual lords. And we sacrifice to the entire Mazdayasnian Faith. And we worship all the sacred metres.

¹ This, while very ancient as regards us, is of course not genuine in its present shape. It was doubtless composed long after Frashaostra and Zarathustra had ceased to live. It may be, however, an expansion of an earlier document.

² 'The Amesha Spenta of the holy ones.'

5. And we worship the entire bounteous Māthra, even the entire system of the Faith set up against the Daêvas; and we worship its complete and long descent. And we sacrifice to all the holy Yazads, heavenly and earthly; and we worship all the good, heroic, and bountiful Fravashis of the saints.

6. And we worship all the holy creatures which Mazda created, and which possess the holy institutions², which were established holy in their nature³, which possess the holy lore, and the holy sacrifice, which are holy, and for the holy, and to be worshipped by the holy. And we worship all the five⁴ Gāthas, the holy ones, and the entire Yasna [its flow and its ebb⁵, and the sounding (of its chants)]. 7. And we sacrifice to all the Praises of the Yasna, and to all the words which Mazda spake, which are the most fatal to evil thoughts, and words, and deeds; (8) and which designate⁶ the evil thought, and word, and deed, and which then cut down and fell every evil thought, and word, and deed. [(Pâzand.) One would think of it as

¹ The heavenly bodies are thus termed elsewhere, and the sun is called his eye. { written for it.

² Possibly, 'were created pure.'

³ 'Shaped holy.'

⁴ Or, 'are worshipped as holy,' vahmyāta, or yēsnyāta.

⁵ This figure is too advanced to be probable. The text has been disturbed. The words describe the waters elsewhere.

⁶ So with the Pahlavi, referring the word to the third kar, the root of khratu, passive (?) form, with active sense. It also, however, not impossibly might mean 'cut around,' preparatory to felling.

when the fire cuts, sucks out, and consumes the dry wood which has been sanctified and carefully selected (for its flame).] And we sacrifice to the strength, the victory, the glory, and the speed of all these words (as they go forth for their work). 9. And we sacrifice to all the springs of water, and to the water-streams as well, and to growing plants, and forest-trees¹, and to the entire land and heaven, and to all the stars, and to the moon and sun, even to all the lights without beginning (to their course)². And we sacrifice to all cattle, and to the aquatic beasts, and to the beasts that live on land, and to all that strike the wing, and to the beasts that roam the plains, and to those of cloven hoof. 10. And to all Thy good and holy female (creatures) in the creation do we sacrifice, (O Thou who art) Ahura Mazda³ the skilful maker ! on account of which Thou hast made many things and good things (in Thy world). And we sacrifice to those male creatures in the creation which are Thine and which are meet for sacrifice because of Asha Vahista (of Righteousness the Best). And we sacrifice to all the mountains brilliant with holiness, and to all the lakes which Mazda created, and to all fires. And we sacrifice to all the truthful and correctly spoken words, (11) even those which have both rewards and Piety within them. Yea, we worship (you) for protection and shielding, for guarding and watching; and may ye be to me for preparation.

I call upon the Gâthas here, the bountiful holy ones,

¹ Elsewhere rendered 'stems.'

² Not determined like the course of a planet.

³ We should expect the vocative after 'Thy.'

ruling in the ritual order ; yea, we sacrifice to you, (O ye Gâthas !) for protection and shielding, for guarding and watching. Mine may ye be as a preparation. For me, for (mine) own soul I call on (you) ¹, and we would worship (you) for protection and for shielding, for guarding and for watching. 12. And we sacrifice to Weal, the complete welfare, holy and ruling in its course in the ritual order ; and we sacrifice to Deathlessness (the immortal being of the good), holy, and ruling in the ritual order. And we sacrifice to the question of the Lord, and to His lore, the holy chiefs, and to the heroic Haptanghâiti, the holy lord of the ritual order. 13. (Frasha.) Let the holy Zarathustra himself seek out a friend and a protector. And I say² to thee (O Zarathustra !) to make to thee a friend holy beyond the holy, and truer than the true, for that is the better thing ; for he is evil who is the best to the evil, and he is holy to whom the holy is a friend³, (14) for these are the best of words, those which Ahura Mazda spoke to Zarathustra.

And⁴ do thou, O Zarathustra ! pronounce these words at the last ending of (thy) life. 15. For if, O Zarathustra ! thou shalt pronounce these words at the last ending of (thy) life I, Ahura Mazda, will keep your soul away from Hell. Yea, so far away shall I hold it as is the breadth and extension of the earth [(Pâzand) and the earth is as wide as it is long].

16. As thou dost desire, O holy (one) ! so shalt thou be, holy shalt thou cause (thy) soul to pass over ¹ Or, 'I would invoke (mine) own soul ;' see verse 18.

² Possibly the rejoinder of Frashaostra, or these are 'the best words' referred to in verse 14 ; but the section is a dialogue.

³ Y. XLVI, 6.

⁴ Ahura speaks.

the Kinvaŋ Bridge; holy shalt thou come into Heaven. Thou shalt intone the Gâtha Ustavaiti, reciting the salvation hail ¹.

17. We sacrifice to the active man, and to the man of good intent, for the hindrance of darkness, of wasting of the strength and life, and of distraction. And we sacrifice to health and healing, to progress and to growth, for the hindrance of impurity, and of the diseases of the skin ².

18. And we sacrifice to the (Yasna's) ending words, to those which end the Gâthas. And we sacrifice to the bounteous Hymns themselves which rule in the ritual course, the holy ones.

And we sacrifice to the Praise-songs of the Yasna which were the products of the world of yore; yea, we sacrifice to all the Staota-Yêsnya hymns. And we sacrifice to (our) own soul and to (our) Fravashi. 19-21. (See Y. VI, 14-16.) 22. I praise, invoke, and I weave my song to the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the saints, to those of the house, and of the village, the district and the province, and to those of the Zarathustrôtemas. 23. And we sacrifice to the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son, the holy ritual chief.

And we sacrifice to this Baresman having the Zaotra with it, and its girdle with it, and spread with sanctity, the holy ritual chief. And we sacrifice to Apãm-napât, and to Nairya-sangha, and to that Yazad, the wise man's swift Curse.

And we sacrifice to the souls of the dead, [which are the Fravashis of the saints]. 24. And we sacrifice to that lofty Lord who is Ahura Mazda Himself.

¹ Y. XLIII, 1 follows.

² Diseases arising from filth.

25. And we pray (again) for the Kine (once more) with these gifts and (ceremonial) actions which are the best¹. 26-28. (See Y. VIII, 5-7.) 29-31. (See Y. LX, 11-13.)

YASNA LXXII. (See Y. LXI.)

¹ See Y. XXXV, 4; Y. XLVIII, 6.

VISPARAD.

VISPARAD I¹.

1. I announce ², and (will) complete (my Yasna) to the lords ³ of the spiritual creatures, and to the lords of the earthly creatures, to the lords ³ of those which live under the waters, and to the lords of those which live upon land, to the lords of those which strike the wing, and to the lords of those which roam (wild) upon the plains, to the lords of those of (home-beasts) of the cloven hoof, holy lords of the ritual order.

2. I announce, and I (will) complete (my Yasna) to the Yearly festivals, the lords of the ritual order, to Maidhyô-zaremaya, the milk-giver, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Maidhyô-shema, the pasture-giver, and to Paitishahya, the corn-giver, and to Ayâthrima, the furtherer or breeder, the spender of the seed of males, and to Maidhyâiryas the cold ⁴, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Hamaspath-maêdhaya, the especial time for ritual deeds ⁵, holy lords of the ritual order.

¹ This Visparad consists of additions to various portions of the Yasna; and its several chapters generally follow the corresponding portions of the Yasna in the Vendidad Sâdah. The word Visparad means 'all the chiefs,' referring to the 'lords of the ritual.' Chapter I should be read immediately after Yasna I, 9.

² Or, 'I invite.'

³ Lords because ruling as chief objects of attention during their mention in the course of the sacrifice, also, as in this case, genii guarding over all of their class.

⁴ So De Harlez, admirably following the Pahl. sardîk (sic).

⁵ Pavan yazisn kardarih.

3. I announce, and I (will) complete (my Yasna) to the settlements of the future one, when the future ¹ shall produce them as it were anew, and I celebrate and will complete (my Yasna) to the Praises of the Yasna ² collected, completed, and much-offered, and to the Myazdas of the saints of the ritual, male and female.

4. And I announce, and will complete (my Yasna) to the Seasons, the lords of the ritual order, and to the heard recital of the Ahuna-vairya, and to Righteousness the Best, to him who has (?) our praise, and to the Yênhê hâtâm, the frequent chant of sacrifice ³, the holy, and ruling in the ritual order.

5. And I announce and complete (my Yasna) to the Gâtha Ahunavaiti, the holy, ruling in the ritual order, and to those women who bring forth many sons of many talents, Mazda-given, and holy lords of the ritual order, and to that (chant) which has its Ahû and its Ratu ⁴ (before it in the Yasna).

And I celebrate, and will complete (my sacrifice) to the Yasna Haptanghâiti ⁵, holy, and ruling in the ritual order, [and to the water Ardvi Anâhita ⁶].

6. And I announce, and I (will) complete (my Yasna) to the Gâtha Ustavaiti, the holy, ruling in the ritual order, and to the mountains which shine

¹ Aunghairyô, a collective, or zîzanen, a participle.

² Here is praise to a part of the Yasna itself, although not yet recited in the V. S.

³ Its chief word is yazamaidê, it is 'the well-sacrificed,' the word often occurring.

⁴ Or, 'to him who is devoted to the Ahuna, with its Ahû and Ratu (?).'

⁵ Observe the priority of the Haptanghâiti; it should be read first.

⁶ Interpolated.

with holiness, the abundantly brilliant¹ and Mazda-made, the holy lords of the ritual order.

And I announce, and (will) complete (my Yasna) to the Gâtha Spentâ-mainyu, the holy, ruling in the ritual order; and I celebrate and will complete (my Yasna) to Verethraghna (the blow of victory²) Ahura-given, the holy lord of the ritual order.

7. And I announce, and (will) complete (my Yasna) to the Gâtha Vohu-khshathra, holy, ruling in the ritual order, and to Mithra of the wide pastures, and to Râman Hvâstra, the holy lords of the ritual order. And I celebrate and will complete my Yasna to the Gâtha Vahistôisti, the holy, ruling in the ritual order. And I celebrate and will complete my Yasna to the good and pious Prayer for blessings, the benediction of the pious³, and to that Yazad, the redoubted and swift Curse of the wise, the holy lord of the ritual order.

8. And I announce, and (will) complete (my Yasna) to the Airyemâ-ishyô, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to the Fshûshô-mâthra, and to that lofty lord Hadhaokhdha⁴, the holy lord of the ritual order.

9. And I announce, and (will) complete (my Yasna) to the questions asked of Ahura, and to the lore of Ahura, to the Ahurian Dahvyuma (Dahyuma), and to the Ahurian Zarathustrôtema, holy lords of the ritual order, and to the farm-house with its pastures

¹ This sense is most obvious.

² The 'fiend-smiting' is the common meaning of vritrahâ; but verethra is clearly 'victory' in Zend; vritrá also equals defensive valour.

³ Can dahmahêta mean 'the departed saint' here?

⁴ A lost part of the Avesta, two fragments of which only survive.

which give pasture to the Kine of blessed gift, and to the holy cattle-breeding man¹.

VISPARAD II².

1. In this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the lords of (the ritual) which are spiritual with my praise; and I desire to approach the earthly lords (as well). And I desire to approach the lords of the water with my praise, and the lords of the land; and I desire to approach with my praise those chiefs which strike the wing, and those which wander wild at large, and those of the cloven hoof, who are chiefs of the ritual (in their turn).

2. In this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the holy Yearly festivals with my praise, the lords of the ritual order, Maidhyô-zaremaya, the milk-giver, and Maidhyô-shema, the pasture-giver, and Paitishahya, the corn-giver, and Ayâthrima the breeder, the spender of the seed of males, Maidhy-âirya, the cold, Hamaspathmaêdhaya, the especial time for ritual duties, the holy lords of the ritual order.

3. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the future one of the settlements with my praise, the holy lord of the ritual order, when the future one shall produce (them as it were anew).

And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach all these chieftains of the ritual with my praise whom Ahura Mazda mentioned to Zarathustra

¹ Comp. Y. XXIX, 2. Y. I, 10-23 follows.

² Visparad II should be read after Yasna II, 8, of which it is an extension.

for sacrifice and homage because of Asha Vahista (of Righteousness the Best).

4. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach Thee¹, the lord, with my praise, Thou who art Ahura Mazda, the spiritual lord and regulator² of the spiritual creatures [the lord and regulator of the spiritual creation].

And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach thee, Zarathustra Spitâma, with my praise, the terrestrial (lord and regulator) of the terrestrial creation, [the lord and regulator of the terrestrial creation].

5. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the man who recites the ritual rites with my praise, who is maintaining thus the thought well thought, and the word well spoken, and the deed well done, and Piety the bountiful, even him³ who maintains the Mâthra of the Saoshyant, by whose actions the settlements are advanced in the righteous order.

6. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the (yearly) Seasons with my praise, the holy lords of the ritual order, and the Ahuna-vairya as it is recited, and Asha Vahista when he is lauded⁴, and the Yênhê hâtâm, the frequent chant of sacrifice.

7. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the Gâtha Ahunavaiti with my praise.

¹ It is certainly not impossible that the idea of 'invoking the approach of Ahura' was meant, but 'approaching him' is more natural.

² Ahûmka ratûmka, applied to the same person, the usage arising from an erroneous rendering of the Ahuna-vairya; see Y. XIX, 12.

³ Yô, with K7b, K11, daretem, passive form; or, 'who (has) the Mâthra held.' The text must, however, be in disorder.

⁴ In the Ashem Vohû.

And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to worship those women with my praise who are well-portioned¹, and of good parentage, and who are stately in their growth; yea, I desire to approach that chant in my praise which has the Ahû and the Ratu, [for He is verily the one who has the Ahû and the Ratu, that is, Ahura Mazda²].

And I desire to approach the heroic Yasna Haptanghâiti in my praise, the holy, and ruling in the ritual order; and Ardvi Sûra Anâhita, the holy, and ruling in the ritual order.

8. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the Gâtha Ustavaiti with my praise, the holy, and ruling in the ritual order; and I desire to approach those mountains³ with my praise which shine with holiness, abundantly glorious, Mazda-made, the holy lords of the ritual order, and the Gâtha Spentâ-mainyu, and Verethraghna, the blow of victory, Mazda-given, the holy lord of the ritual order, and the Victorious Ascendency (which it bestows).

9. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the Gâtha Vohu-khshathra with my praise, the holy, and ruling in the ritual order, and Mithra of the wide pastures, and Râman Hvâstra, and the Gâtha Vahistôisti, and the pious and good prayer for blessings, and the pious and holy man, and that Yazad, the redoubted and swift curse of the wise.

10. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the Airyemâ-ishyô with my praise, and the Fshûshô-māthra, and that lofty lord, the Hadhaokhdha, holy lord(s) of the ritual order.

¹ So the Pahlavi.

² Erroneous Pâzand.

³ This sentence affords support to my rendering of âyêsê, as expressing a desire to approach, rather than one for the approach of (the Genius of) the Mountain; at the same time the latter idea may very possibly be the correct one. (Expressions are curtailed.)

11. And in this Zaothra with this Baresman I desire to approach the question asked of Ahura, and the lore of the Lord (which he reveals in answer), and the farm-house of the man possessed of pastures, and the pasture produced for the Kine of blessed gift, and the holy cattle-breeding man¹.

VISPARAD III.

BEGINNING OF THE HAOMA OFFERING; ROLL-CALL OF THE PRIEST².

1. (The Zaotar speaks.) (I call for) the Hâvanan³, and would have him here.

(The Ratu answers.) I will come (and fulfil his duties).

(The Zaotar speaks.) I would have the Âtarevakhsha⁴ here.

(The Ratu answers.) I will come (and fulfil the services which fall to his charge).

(The Zaotar.) I would have the Frabaretar⁵.

(The Ratu.) I will come (and fulfil the services which fall to his charge).

(The Zaotar.) I would have the Âberet⁶ present.

(The Ratu.) I will come (for him).

¹ Y. II, 10 follows Visparad II, 11.

² This chapter 1-5 follows Y. XI, 1-8 in the Vendîdâd Sâdah; so, appropriately.

³ The Ratu answers for all according to the rubric printed by Westergaard, but of later origin than the text. It arose from the fact that the several offices were later united in that of the Ratu. Originally the corresponding official answered to his title. The Hâvanan was the Mobad who pounded the Haoma in the mortar.

⁴ The Mobad who fed the Fire.

⁵ The Mobad who aided the presentations. ⁶ The water carrier.

(The Zaoatar.) I would have the Âsnatar ¹.

(The Ratu.) I will come (and do the duties which he serves).

(The Zaoatar.) I would have the Raêthwiskar ² to be here.

(The Ratu.) I will come (for him).

(The Zaoatar.) I would have the Sraoshâvareza ³ present, the wisest one, the most correct and veracious in his speech.

(The Ratu.) I will come. 2. (The Zaoatar.) I would have the Fire-priest to be here, and the warrior, and the thrifty tiller ⁴ of the earth, and the house-lord, and the lords of the Vts and the Zantu.

3. And I summon the youth of holy thoughts, words and works, and of good conscience ; (yea), the youth of good speech, given (in marriage) to his kin ⁵. And I summon the province-ranger, and the itinerant of many arts, and the house-mistress.

4. And I summon the woman advanced in her holy thoughts, and words, and deeds, and well subordinated, whose ruler is her lord ⁶, the holy one, who is (as) the bounteous Âramaiti ; (yea), I summon even Thy wives, O Ahura ! And I summon likewise the holy man advanced in his good thoughts, and words, and deeds, who is learned in pious lore, and innocent of the Kayadha, and by whose deeds the settlements are furthered in the righteous order.

¹ The washer.

² The mixer (?), or the Mobad who attended to disinfections.

³ The Mobad who attended to penance.

⁴ The typical layman.

⁵ This important custom was fully treated in the lost Nask, No. 16 (or No. 18; by another reckoning).

⁶ So the most, but ratukhshathra means elsewhere 'ruling in the ritual as supreme.'

5. Yea, we summon you, whoever you may be, if only chiefs of the Mazdayasnians; and we summon the Bounteous Immortals, and the pious Saoshyants (the prophets for our help), the most correct and truthful in their speech, the most zealous, the most glorious in their thoughts, the greatest ones, and the powerful; and we summon the Fire-priests, and the warriors, and the diligent husbandman of the Mazdayasnian Faith.

6¹. (The Zaotar.) As an Ahû to be (revered and) chosen, the Âtarevakhsha (announcing) speaks forth ² to me.

(The Ratu[?].) So let the Ratu from his righteousness, holy and learned, speak forth.

(The Ratu.) As an Ahû to be (revered and) chosen, the Zaotar (announcing) speaks forth ² to me.

(The Zaotar.) So let the Ratu from (his) righteousness, holy and learned, speak forth.

(The Ratu.) Thou art the announcer for us, O Fire-priest! [(Pâzand.) It is the ³ Zaotar (who is meant).]

(The Zaotar.) I will come as this Zaotar, and recite the Staota Yêsnaya with memorised intoning, chanting, and praise.

VISPARAD IV (SP. V)⁴.

I. (Yea,) we sacrifice to the thoughts of the mind, and to the good wisdom, and to the good and blessed

¹ This section follows Y. XI, 9-15 in the V. S., preceding a section described as Y. XI, 59, 60, in the B. V. S.

² Probably in an imperative sense, or, with some, an infinitive.

³ Read Zaotasti which contains sandhi. It seems a gloss to explain the Âthraom (sic). It is zaotâ asti.

⁴ This section, preceding Y. XI, closed in the B. V. S., seems to me sanctity, and to the good religious knowledge, and to good health (of soul and body). [At their (several) seasons, and with the presence of seasonable circumstances, they are hymned¹.] 2. Confession is to be made for the Kine; we, Zarathustrian Mazda-yasnians, celebrate at the sacrificial time for the Myazda-offering, at the time for the Ratufriti, the prayer for blessings, for the sacrificial worship, homage, propitiation, and praise of the entire creation of the holy (and the clean).

VISPARAD V (SP. VI)².

1. I come to You, O Ye Bountiful Immortals! as a praiser priest, and invoker, as a memoriser, reciting (Your ritual), and as a chanter for Your sacrifice and homage, Your propitiation, and Your praise; (yea, for Yours) the Bountiful Immortals, and for our preparation, (O ye holy Saoshyants!) and for your well-timed prayer for blessings, and your sanctification, and for our victorious smiting of our foes, beneficial (as it is) for our souls, for ours, the Saoshyants, (with you), and holy. 2. And I make my offering to You, O Ye Bountiful Immortals, who rule aright, and who dispose (of all) aright! (Yea), I offer You the flesh of my very body, and all the blessings of my life as well.

3. And I confess my belief in Thee, O Ahura to belong properly after Yasna VIII, and the Myazda offering with the Ratufriti.

¹ Pâzand.

² This piece should be read after Yasna XIV, with which it is nearly identical. The language of the translation is slightly varied to relieve the effect of sameness.

Mazda! and as a Mazdayasnian of the order of Zarathustra, and in accordance with his Faith.

VISPARAD VI (SP. VII) ¹.

In accordance with the precept, with praise, and with the joyful reception of grace, with Zaothras intelligently offered, with sacrificial words correctly spoken, I call the good Amesha Spenta by their names of beauty; yea, I worship the Bountiful Immortals by their beautiful names, with the blessing of the ritual Order, with the longing blessing of Righteousness the good.

VISPARAD VII (SP. VIII) ².

1. We worship the (sacrificial) words correctly uttered, and Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, and the good Ashi, (the blest order of our rites), and Nairya-sangha. And we worship the victorious Peace as the unprostrated and unmoved. And we sacrifice to the Fravashis of the saints, and to the Kinvaŋ Bridge, and to the Garô Nmâna of Ahura, even Heaven, the best world of the saints, the shining and all glorious!

2. And we sacrifice to that better path ³ that leads to that Best World (as well). And we worship Arstât (Justice) the good, which helps the settlements to advance and flourish, benefiting them thereby, that Arstât which is the Mazdayasnian Faith; and (with her) we worship Rashnu the most just, and

¹ Nearly identical with Yasna XV.

² This chapter should be read after Yasna XVII, which it appropriately follows in the Vendîdâd Sâdah.

³ Possibly 'the best (better) course of that best world.'

Mithra of the wide pastures. And we worship Pareñdi the wealthy, wealthy with a wealth of thoughts, with a throng of words, and with a breadth of actions, [for she makes our persons agile (for good thoughts and words and actions)]. 3. And we worship that virile defensive¹ Heroism which possesses men who think beforehand, and heroic men, which is fleeter² than the fleet, stronger than the strong, which comes to him who is endowed by God, which, when especially made theirs by men, produces one who is a freer of the body. And we worship Sleep³, the Mazda-made, the gladdener of the herd and men. 4. And we worship those things in the creation of the holy which are the ancient institutions, those formed before the sky, the water, the land, the plants, and the Kine of blessed gift. And we worship the sea Vouru-kasha, and the stormy wind which is made by Mazda, and the shining heaven, of old created, the first-made earthly object of (all) the earthly world.

5. And we worship thee, the Fire, O Ahura Mazda's son! the holy lord of the ritual order, and this Baresman, having the Zaothra with it, and the girdle with it, spread out with sanctity, the holy ritual chief, and we worship Apām-napāt (the son of waters).

¹ One might consider, 'virile power which has men and heroes in the mind beforehand;' but vareti=gôrdîh.

² Âsyayau (sic) and takhmôtâsyayau (sic) agree with feminines; possibly because of the male qualities referred to. They might be said to be in apposition rather than in agreement with the feminine.

³ Sleep is elsewhere an evil; a Demon, Bûshyâsta, rules it; but this is untimely sleep; see, on the other hand, Y. XLIV, 5.

VISPARAD VIII (SP. IX).

1. With this word be Thou approached ¹, with the proper word be Thou present here, Thou who art Ahura Mazda, the holy, together with the good Yazads who are the Bountiful Immortals, who rule aright, and dispose (of all) aright, together with fifty, and a hundred, and a thousand, and ten thousand, and millions, and yet more.

2. And to Him who rules the best let the Kingdom be ²!

VISPARAD IX (SP. X) ³.

1. (I desire to offer my homage and my praise ⁴) to the offered Haomas and Zaothras, and to those also which shall yet be offered, which smite victoriously, and are foes of hatred, and following in company (as they do) with the healing virtues of sanctity, following also in company with those of Kisti (religious knowledge), and with the remedies of Mazda, and with those of Zarathustra and the Zarathustrôtema, (2) and to the offered Haomas and Zaothras which accompany those remedies which belong to the holy disciple well versed in good devices ⁵, and accompanying those of the itinerant also versed in good devices ⁵, and accompanying those likewise of the good Mazdayasnian Faith, and those of the pious and beneficent Prayer for blessings, and of the pious and good veracity, and

¹ 'Mediated' (?), or 'known,' madhayangha (-uha).

² See Y. XXXV, 5.

³ This section should be read before Y. XXII.

⁴ Supplied necessarily from Visp. X, 2; see its genitive.

⁵ Or, 'sciences' (in some cases medical).

of the pious word against unbelief, (3) for information and explanation, for preparation (?) and devotion, for the libation and complete offering, for the complete recital of the liturgy memorised as well; and to those Haomas which are pungent, bounteous, holy, and offered with sanctity (and for a blessing), to those which are yet to be offered with sanctity, and which are now being celebrated, and which are likewise in the future to be celebrated, to those which are being pressed with sanctity, and to those which are yet to be pressed, (to these I desire to approach, and to express my homage and my praise). 4. And I desire to express my homage and my praise to the strength of the strong, and to the victorious blow of the mighty, to the powerful Rectitude and Blessedness, to Kisti and the Priority for the powerful Ascendency, and to these powerful Yazads which are the Bountiful Immortals, who rule aright, and dispose of all aright, ever-living, ever-helpful, who, male and female, dwell together with the Good Mind, (to these I desire in my homage and my praises to approach); (5) (yea, I desire to approach for homage and praises toward) our Universal Weal and Immortality, to the body of the Kine, and to the Kine's Soul. (And I desire to approach) the Fire of the spoken name¹, and toward that farm-house which is sanctified and which has fields and comfort², and mercy (for the poor); (6) as a praiser with praise for the sacrifice, homage, which is this praise of Ahura Mazda, of the Bountiful Immortals, and of the holy and lofty Lord, for the sacrifice, and homage of the Lord that most attains his ends, and which is this praise of that blessedness which has approached us, and of that well-timed prayer for blessings offered in the ritual, (7) which is likewise the praise of the Māthra Spenta (the bounteous word of reason), and of the Mazdayasnian Religion, and the Praises of the *Yasnas*¹, which is also that of all the lords of the ritual, and of all the well-timed prayers for blessings, for the sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and glorification of the entire creation of the holy (and the clean).

¹ Having a Yast.

² Here is an instance where hvâthra may mean 'comfort.'

VISPARAD X (SP. XI)².

1. I desire to approach the Arezahis with my praise, and the Savahis, and Fradadhafshu, and Vīdadhafshu, and Vouru-baresti, and Vouru-garesti, and this Karsh-var which is Hvaniratha. 2. And I desire to approach the stone mortar with my praise, and the iron mortar, and the cup that holds the Zaothra, and the hair (which stays the spilling³), and Thy Baresman spread with sanctity. And I desire to approach the Ahuna-vairya with my praise, and the ritual prayers beside Ahuna, and the standing offices of the Mazdayasnian Faith.

VISPARAD XI (SP. XII).

1. To Ahura Mazda would we present⁴ our offered Haomas and that which is lifted up, as the most

¹ Perhaps 'the Yasts in the Yasna,' otherwise the latter portion of the Yasna.

² This section follows Y. XXII.

³ The varesa consists (as used at present) of three, five, or seven hairs from the tail of a white bull, which are tied to a gold, silver, copper, or brass ring. This can be used as long as the bull lives, but as often as it is used it must be reconsecrated. (Haug.)

⁴ The wording is purposely varied in the renderings to avoid sameness.

beneficial to Verethraghna (the blow of victory) which furthers the settlements; and that which is offered to the good and holy king, and that which is offered to the holy ruler which rules according to, or in the ritual, and we make known our Haomas to the Bountiful Immortals, and to the good waters; and we present our Haomas each to (our) own soul¹; and we announce our Haomas in our celebration to the entire creation of the holy (and the clean).

2. Yea, we present these Haomas and Haoma-implements, and these spread mats, and these Myazdas, these stones, the first in the creation, the stone mortar brought here with the yellow² Haoma in it, and the iron mortar brought here with the yellow Haoma in it, this Haoma-water, and this Baresman spread with sanctity, (3) these bodies, and (their) forces, these striving Zaothras (that seek to find Thy grace), this holy Haoma, and the flesh, and the holy man, and the saint's innate thoughts, even the Saoshyants' innate thoughts.

And we present this fresh milk as an offering, now lifted up with sanctity, and this Hadhânaêpata plant, lifted up with sanctity; (4) and we offer, and present these Zaothras with our celebration, having the Haoma with them, and the milk, and the Hadhânaêpata, to the good waters and offered up with piety. And we present the Haoma-water in our celebrations to the good waters, and both the stone and the iron mortar, (5) and this branch for the Baresman, and the prayer for blessings uttered at the fitting moment which has approached (for our help in its order with the prayers), and the recollection and practice of the good Mazdayasnian law, and the heard recital of the Gâthas, the well-timed prayer for blessings as it comes uttered by the saint (and for our help), and ruling (while it is spoken) as a ritual lord, and these wood-billets, and the perfume even Thine, the Fire's, O Ahura Mazda's son! and all good objects (which are ours), and Mazda-made, and which have the seed of sanctity (or are that seed).

¹ To the soul of the person who may be reciting.

² Zâiri with K₄.

6. Yea, these we make known and we announce in this our celebration to Ahura Mazda (as our gift), and to Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, and to Ashi (who is the recompense), and to Rashnu the most just, and to Mithra of the wide pastures, and to the Bountiful Immortals, and the Fravashis of the saints, and to their souls, and to the Fire of Ahura Mazda, the lord, and to the lofty lord (the Apām-napât?), and to the Myazda, the lord, and to the well-timed prayer for blessings as it rules in the order of our prayers, for the sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and adoration of the entire creation of the holy (and the clean).

7. Yea, these we make known in this our celebration hereby for the Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitâma, the saint, for its sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise, and to the (Fravashi) of Anghuyu (?)¹ who hath loved righteousness, together with all the holy Fravashis of the saints, of those now dead, and of those of the living, and of those of men unborn, of the prophets that shall serve us, bringing on the renovation of the completed world. 8-11, see verses 2-5.

12. Yea, we would make these known hereby in our celebrations to the Bountiful Immortals, who rule aright, and who dispose (of all) aright, the ever-living, ever-helpful, who are good (?), and bestowers of the good, who dwell with the Good Mind [(Pâzand) for they who are the Bountiful Immortals abide with the Good Mind, they who rule aright, and dispose (of all) aright, for thence they are regulated, and thence they arose, (namely,) from the Good Mind ¹].

¹ Here, erroneously, a proper name as in Yast XIII. Possibly of that Zarathustrian world (period) which loved righteousness; the word occurs after the name of Z. I think, that 'y' should be 'v.'

13. And we make known these our celebrations as the more promotive for this ² house, for the furtherance of this house, and as benefits for this house, because of the increase of this household, as overcoming the restrictions which impede this household, and as overcoming the harmful malice which may mar this house, to bless its herds, and its retainers, born, and yet to be born, for the saints of the house as it was aforetime, of it as it ³ stands here now, and to which we likewise now belong as the Saoshyants of the provinces, (14) [which (is that we are Saoshyants) for the saints who do good deeds, and of the female saints who do good deeds, and of the saints who do the deeds conspicuously good, and of the females likewise thus, of the saints who do good deeds upon good deeds, and of the females thus the same].

15. And we make these known in our celebrations to the good Fravashis of the saints which are formidable and overwhelming in their aid. 16. And we make these known in our celebrations hereby to Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, and to the good

¹ Vohu Manah certainly appears the most prominent here. They arose from the 'good thought' of Ahura.

² This office was celebrated in private houses by itinerant priests.

³ Yênhê aêm might be a citation from some lost prayer. The singular aêm may, however, be taken collectively, as families are spoken of.

Blessedness, and to Nairya-sangha, and to the victorious Peace, and to Ahura Mazda's Fire, and to the lofty lord, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and for praise, to the entire creation of the holy and the clean. 17, 18 = Visp. X, 1, 2.

19. (Sp. XIII.) Yea, we make that known which is lifted up in offering, and which is the Avesta¹ as the holy Ahura Mazda directed that it should be said, and as Zarathustra, the holy, directed, and as I, the priest, who am acquainted with their sacrifice and homage, am now letting it be known. I who understand the lawful and legitimate Avesta², and the ritual prescripts (20) for Your sacrifice, homage, and propitiation, O Ye who are the Bountiful Immortals, and for our preparation (?), and for the success of our well-uttered prayer for blessings, for victory, sanctification, and the well-being of our souls, (of ours), for (we are) the holy Saoshyants.

21. Yea, we make these known in our celebrations here, and we offer them to Him who is Ahura Mazda, of all the greatest, the master and the Lord.

VISPARAD XII (Sp. XIV)³.

1. For the offered Haomas which have been offered in libation to that lofty Lord Ahura Mazda and to the holy Zarathustra Spitama (produce) abundance in cattle and in men; and this⁴ abundance is (as) the good Sraosha, who accompanies (us) with the great

¹ Âvista probably = Avesta; compare Veda. The moral and ceremonial laws.

² Avestic.

³ Follows Y. XXVII.

⁴ Hâ seems to have a certain conjunctive force like sa in composition, 'And thereto the good Sraosha;' or is it an interjection?

splendour of sanctity, and may he¹ be here with energetic effort (to aid us in our worship).

2. We offer the wise offerings of the Ahuna-vairya intoned with sanctity and yet to be intoned, possessing their many teachings of religious wisdom (as they do), and those of the two mortars which pour the Haomas out, and which are pushed forward with precision², and are now in the course of being thus advanced once more³. 3. (And so we teach as well the many teachings of the religious wisdom) contained in the words correctly spoken, in the Zarathustrian utterances⁴, and in the ceremonies correctly practised, and the Baresmans spread exactly, and the Haomas pressed correctly, and the praise, Yasnas, and the doctrines of the Mazdayasnian Religion with their recitations, and their movements. 4. For thus they may become to us more full of devices and of wisdom, and so we offer these wise ritual deeds in the creation, so we impart them with their many points of meaning while we (ourselves) still ponder them as those which Ahura Mazda, the holy One, delivered, which have (as if) their nourishment from Vohu Manah⁵ and their growth from the Righteous Order, which are the greatest of all beings, the best, and the most beautiful; for thus shall these be to us the more full of wisest meaning, and more full of incitation⁶, and may we be among those (who are) of Spənta Mainyu's world in that we are imparting (to the chosen) these

¹ Recall hetâ of Y. XLVI, 1.

² With punctilious sanctity.

³ The Parsi priests at present make appropriate manipulations here.

⁴ In the now ancient Gâthas, &c.

⁵ Compare gaêthau vispau yau vohû thraostâ mananghâ.

⁶ Or, 'may we be more zealous than any who are in the creation of the bounteous spirit.'

precepts of the wisest meaning and these incitations which are contained therein. 5. And full of wisest meaning be ye two to us, O (thou) stone mortar, and (thou) the iron one, as ye are now turned, and as ye are now being advanced¹, ye two mortars of the house, [and of the village, of the tribe, and of the province, and ye who are in this house (itself), this village, tribe, and province]; yea, in those which are ours, Mazdayasnians, who are steadfast in our worship, who appear with our wood-billets and our perfumes, and with our supplicated blessings [(Pâ-zand) for so may they be to us, the more full of wisest teaching].

VISPARAD XIII (SP. XV)².

1. According to the ritual we worship Ahura Mazda; according to the ritual we worship the Bountiful Immortals; and we sacrifice to the sacrificial word correctly spoken, and to every Mâthra (as to a sacred word of reason). And we sacrifice to Zarathustra, him who is especially the possessor of the Mâthra³; and we sacrifice to the 'blessings for the saints'⁴; and we worship the 'hail'⁵ addressed to the Bountiful Immortals.

2. Also we worship the three principal (chapters) uttered (in the Yasna) without addition or omission⁶;

¹ Referring to manipulations.

² This fragment follows Y. XXX in the Vendîdâd Sâdah, and was written in allusion to Y. XXVIII, Y. XXIX, and Y. XXX.

³ Referring to mâtthra srevaêmâ in Yasna XXVIII, 8.

⁴ Referring to the words savaââ ashavabyô in Yasna XXX, 11.

⁵ Referring to the word ustâ in Yasna XXX, 11.

⁶ The three first chapters XXVIII-XXX; the text has bad grammar, or broken connection.

and we worship the three principal ones without addition or omission; we worship the three commencing ones entire without addition or omission¹. And we worship the entirety² of the three principal ones without addition or omission; and their Hâs, their metrical lines, their words, and their word-structure [and their recital, memorising, chanting, and their steadfast offering].

VISPARAD XIV (SP. XVI)³.

1. (We worship Ahura Mazda, the holy Lord of the ritual order⁴; and we sacrifice to the Gâtha Ahunavaiti) with its measures, and word-structure, and its Zand, with its questions and counter-questions, with its words and its metric feet. And we sacrifice to these as well-recited, and now in the course of being recited, as well-worshipped, and now in the course of being used in worship⁵. 2. (Yea, we sacrifice to it) in

¹ It is difficult to see how anapishûtâ can mean 'without retrenchment,' but the context seems to require it, and the Pahlavi translation bears evidence to it. Perhaps read anapashûtâ.

² 'The whole three first.' Some suppose the three prayers to be intended (the Ahuna-vairya, the Ashem Vohû, and the Yênhê hâtâm). I think that the three chapters XXVIII-XXX are meant. As the piece follows those three chapters in the Vendîdâd Sâdah, so its expressions indicate a reference to them. This might tend to show that the Ahunavaiti was at one time, if not originally, divided at this place.

³ This fragment was written in evident allusion to the entire Ahunavaiti, which it follows in the Vendîdâd Sâdah. It expresses the veneration acquired by the first Gâtha long after its composition.

⁴ From the Vendîdâd Sâdah.

⁵ Frâyazentâm may be a metaplasm; otherwise 'of the sacrificers.'

its own 'wisdom'¹, in its own 'clearness'², in its own 'loving intention'², in its sovereignty, and its own ritual order, and its 'acquired boon'², which is also that given by Ahura Mazda for the promotion of piety, for that thought which originates from the 'heart-devoted self'².

3. (Sp. Chapter XVII.) Also we worship the Ahuna-vairya, the holy lord of the ritual order, the holy lord with its Ahû and its Ratu [(Pâzand); for He is the one with the title Ahû and Ratu, who is Ahura Mazda³]. 4. And we sacrifice to the constituent parts of the Gâtha Ahunavaiti, to its chapters, and its metrical lines, its words, and word-structure, [and to its heard-recital, and memorised recital, its continuous and its steadfast offering].

VISPARAD XV (Sp. XVIII)⁴.

1. Hold your feet in readiness, and your two hands, and your understandings⁵, O ye Zarathustrian Mazdayasniâns! for the well-doing of lawful deeds in accordance with the sacred Order, and for the avoidance of the unlawful and evil deeds which are contrary to the ritual. Let the good deeds for the furtherance of husbandry be done⁶ here. Render ye the needy rich⁷. 2. Let Sraosha (Obedience) be present here for the worship of Ahura Mazda,

¹ Dâmi with K4. Possibly in their own house (dâmi=dani).

² These words probably allude severally, say, to dâmi in Y. XXXI, 7, kithrâ in Y. XXXI, 22, zaoshê in Y. XXXIII, 2, 10, âyaptâ in Y. XXVIII, 8, to zarzdau in Y. XXXI, 1.

³ Erroneous.

⁴ This piece is a later composed prelude to the Haptanghâiti, which it precedes in the Vendîdâd Sâdah.

⁵ Sursum corda! ⁶ Comp. gavôî verezyâtâm, Y. XLVIII, 5.

⁷ 'Place the needy with those without need.'

the most helpful, and the holy, who is so desired by us in the pronunciation, and for the service, and the pondering¹ of the Yasna Haptanghâiti, for the heart's devotion to it, for its memorisation, and its victorious and holy recital (or for the victorious saint), without addition or omission, (3) which has been intoned, and which shall yet be uttered as great, powerful, smiting with victory, separate from harmful malice, for the pronunciation of victorious words for Ahura Mazda's Fire. (4, 5 are identical with Visp. IX, 6, 7.)

VISPARAD XVI (SP. XIX)².

1. And we worship the Fire here, Ahura Mazda's son, and the Yazads having the seed of fire in them, and the Rashnus having the seed of fire³ in them; and we worship the Fravashis of the saints. And we worship Sraosha who smites with victory, and the holy man, and the entire creation of the holy (and the clean). 2. And we worship the Blessedness and the Fravashi of Zarathustra Spitâma, the saint. And we worship the saints and their blessed Fravashis (as of one). And we worship all their Fravashis (as considered each apart), and those of the saints within the Province, and those of the saints without the Province; yea, we worship the Fravashis of holy men and holy women (wherever they may be, those devoted to the Order of the Faith). And we sacrifice to those whose (service) for us in the Yasna Ahura Mazda, the holy, has known as the better¹, and of these Zarathustra is the living chief² and master. And we sacrifice to the fields and the waters, the lands and the plants, and to the constituent parts of the Yasna Haptanghâiti, its chapters, its metred lines, its words, and word-structure.

¹ Possibly mǎzdâtaê/a.

² This piece follows the Haptanghâiti in the Vendîdâd Sâdah; it was intended as a sequel to it.

³ Having the power to propagate its worship, maintaining it unextinguished. De Harlez makes the admirable suggestion, 'bright as flame'; but the Pahlavi renders tokhmak.

VISPARAD XVII (SP. XX)³.

And we strive after the good thoughts, words, and deeds inculcated in the Yasna Haptanghâiti. A blessing is the Right (called) the Best, (there is) weal; (there is) weal for this (man) when toward Righteousness Best (there is) right.

VISPARAD XVIII (SP. XXI)⁴.

1. We worship Ahura Mazda with the usta⁵. And we worship the Amesha Spenta with the usta, and the holy man, the saint. And we worship the prior world of the holy (and of the clean) with an usta, and the state of weal and salvation for the holy man (the saint).
2. And we worship that life-long state of blessedness (for the holy) which is the evil man's calamity⁶; yea, we worship his eternal⁷ salvation, and with the salvation prayer. And we sacrifice to every saint who

¹ Comp. Y. LI, 22.

² Anghuska ratuska here referred to the same person; comp. ahû.

³ An addition to chapter XVI.

⁴ This piece having reference to various expressions in the Gâtha Ustavaiti, follows it in the Vendidad Sâdah.

⁵ Referring to ustâ in Y. XLIII, 1.

⁶ See Y. XLV, 7.

⁷ Akaranem=the eternal thing; otherwise an adjective of two terminations; or, finally, read -âm.

exists, who is now coming into existence, and who shall exist in future.

VISPARAD XIX (Sp. XXII)¹.

1. We worship Ahura Mazda the bountiful; and we worship the Bountiful Immortals (saying the Spenta). And we sacrifice to the bountiful saint, and to the bountiful anticipative understanding². Also we sacrifice to the good and bountiful Âramaiti (the ready mind). And we worship her together with³ the bountiful creatures in the creation of the pure. And we sacrifice to the holy creatures who have intelligence as their first⁴, (to those foremost in their mind). And we worship the omniscient understanding, and Him who is Ahura Mazda (Himself). 2. And we sacrifice to the shining sun, which is the highest of the high; yea, we worship the sun together with the Bountiful Immortals, and the Māthras with their good ceremonies⁵. Also we sacrifice to the glorious achievements, and to this glory (which we have gained). And we sacrifice to the herds which have the Fire and its blessings⁶. Also we worship the holy benefit which is so widely

¹ The word spenta throughout alludes to the Gâtha Spentâ-mainyu, but it is of course not without grammatical application.

² In the Bundahis especially referred to Ahura.

³ Or, 'together with the bountiful creatures we worship the holy creatures.'

⁴ This expression may have been accidentally determined by the position of the word manô in the Ahuna-vairya formula; see Y. XIX. 12.

⁵ Or, 'the well-fulfilled.'

⁶ 'Fire-made' is unintelligible; 'fire gifts-having' may refer to the flocks and herds, as expressing the source of that prosperity which is represented by the holy Fire.

diffused¹, and that wisdom which is the bounteous Âramaiti, whose are the laws² of the Righteous Order, and of those holy creatures who have Righteousness as their first.

VISPARAD XX (Sp. XXIII)³.

1. (Homage to the Gâtha Vohu-khshathra⁴! We sacrifice to the Vohu-khshathra), (the good kingdom) even the Khshathra-vairya, the kingdom to be desired; and we sacrifice to the iron-founding⁵, and to the (sacrificial) words⁶ correctly spoken which smite (the foe) with victory, and which hold the Daêvas subject.

And we worship that reward and that health, that healing and that progress, that growth and that victorious smiting⁷ (2) which are between the Vohu-khshathra and the Vahistôisti⁸, (and which are acquired by us) by the memorised recital of the good thoughts, good words, and good deeds, for the withstanding of evil thoughts, and words, and deeds; yea, for the undoing of all treacherous thoughts (directed) against me, and of all false words, and unfair deeds. 3. [And we sacrifice to the later Yasna, the heroic Haptanghâiti⁹, (and which as it recurs becomes) the holy ritual chief.]

¹ Pahl. fravaft sûd.

² Dâthra with K₄.

³ This piece from the later Avesta follows Y. LI, in the Vendîdâd Sâdah.

⁴ From the Vendîdâd Sâdah.

⁵ Associated with this Gâtha from Y. LI, 9.

⁶ Compare Y. LI, 3. ⁷ Y. LI, 9; also perhaps Y. LIII, 8, 9.

⁸ Between; that is, described in the space between the Vohu-khshathra and the Vahistôisti, i.e. in Y. LII. See hamistê in Y. LII, 4, and paitistâtê in Visp. XX, 2.

⁹ This would seem misplaced; perhaps Y. XLII is meant, which follows the Haptanghâiti.

VISPARAD XXI (SP. XXIV).

1. We strive earnestly, and we take up our Yasna and our homage to the good waters, and to the fertile fruit-trees (which bear as of themselves), and to the Fravashis of the saints ; yea, we take up our Yasna, and our homage earnestly to those beings which are (so) good, the waters, and the trees, and the Fravashis of the saints, (2) and to the Kine, and to Gaya (Maretan), and to the Māthra Spenta (the bounteous word-of-reason), the holy, which works (within and for us with effect), to these we take up our Yasnas and our homage with earnest zeal, and to Thee, O Ahura Mazda ! and to thee, O Zarathustra, we do the same ; and to thee, O lofty lord (the Apām-napât), and to the Bountiful Immortals. 3. And we sacrifice to the listening (that hears our prayers) and to that mercy, and to the hearing of (our spoken) homage, and to that mercy which is (shown in response to our offered) praise. And we sacrifice to the frâ râiti vîdushê, which is contained in the piece hvâdaênâis ashaonts ; and we sacrifice to 'the good praise which is without hypocrisy, and which has no malice (as its end)' ; and we sacrifice to the later Yasna and to its offering ; and we sacrifice to the chapters of the later Yasna, and to its metrical lines, its words, and word-structure.

VISPARAD XXII (SP. XXV).

With this chant (fully) chanted, and which is for the Bountiful Immortals and the holy Saoshyants (who are the prophets who shall serve us), and by means of these (ceremonial) actions, which are (of all) the best, we desire to utter our supplications for the Kine. It is that chant which the saint has recognised as good and fruitful of blessed gifts, and which the sinner does not know¹. May we never reach that (ill-luck that the sinner) may outstrip us (in our chanting), not in the matter of a plan (thought out), or of words (delivered), or ceremonies (done²), nor yet in any offering whatever when he (?) approaches (us for harm).

VISPARAD XXIII (SP. XXVI)³.

1. We worship Ahura Mazda as the best⁴ (worship to be offered in our gifts). We worship the Amesha Spenta (once more, and as) the best. We worship Asha Vahista (who is Righteousness the Best). And we sacrifice to those (prayers) which are evident as the best; that is, the Praises of the Yasnas.

Also we sacrifice to that best wish, which is that of Asha Vahista, and we worship Heaven, which is the best world of the saints, bright and all-glorious; and we sacrifice likewise to that best approach which leads to⁵ it. 2. And we sacrifice to that reward,

¹ The parties are divided by knowledge and ignorance (compare the Gnosis). See Y. XXXI, 12

² Not in thought, word, or deed may we reach (his) priority in progress.

³ This piece from the later Avesta follows Y. LIII, in the Vendidad Sâdah, and has reference to its expressions.

⁴ It is an important suggestion which holds vahistem as equal to 'saying vahistem,' in allusion to the Vahistâ frstis; but as the word is inflected further on (see vahistahê), and as it moreover once applies to Asha, as Asha Vahista, it is better to render it as having adjective application throughout, being none the less, of course, an intentional echo of the first word of Y. LIII, 1.

⁵ Or, 'of it.'

health, healing, furtherance, and increase, and to that victory which is within¹ the two, the Ahunavairya and the Airyemâ-ishyô, through the memorised recital of the good thoughts, words, and deeds (which they enjoin).

¹ Possibly 'between them,' meaning the Gâthas which are so placed.

ÂFRÎNAGÂN.

ÂFRÎNAGÂN.

AS to the present use of these blessings, says Haug (ed. West): 'Âfrînagân are blessings which are to be recited over a meal consisting of wine, milk, and fruits, to which an angel, or the spirit of a deceased person, is invited, and in whose honour the meal is prepared. After the consecration (which only a priest can perform) is over, the meal is eaten by those who are present. The performance of these Âfrînagân is required of every Parsi at certain fixed seasons of the year. These are the six Gahanbârs, each lasting five days (at the six original seasons of the year) for which the Âfrînagân Gahanbâr is intended, the five Gâtha-days (the five last days of the year), during which the Âfrînagân Gâtha must be used; and, lastly, the third day (Ardibahist) of the first month (Fravardin) in the year, at which the performance of Âfrînagân Rapithwin, devoted to the spirit presiding over the southern quarter (who is the guardian of the way to paradise), is enjoined to every Parsi whose soul wants to pass the Kinvað after death.' (Essays, 2nd edition, page 224.)

I. ÂFRÎN[-AGÂN] GAHANBÂR¹.

1. I confess myself a Mazda-worshipper, and of Zarathustra's order, a foe of the Daêvas, devoted to the lore of the Lord, for the holy Hâvani¹, the regulator of the ritual order (and its lord in its turn), for its sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise; (and I confess myself) for Sâvanghi and for Vîsya, the holy lords of the ritual order, for their sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise, and for that of the Asnya, the day-lords of the days during daylight, and of the days in their length, for the Mâhya, month-lords, and the Yâirya, year-lords, and for those of the especial seasons, and for the worship, homage, propitiation, and praise of that lofty lord who is the Ritual Righteousness (itself); yea, for the worship, homage, propitiation, and praise of the lords of the days, months, years, and seasons—for those lords of the ritual order who are of all the greatest, who are the regulators of the ritual at the time of Hâvani.

¹ The Âfrîn for the morning hours from 6 to 10.

2. To Maidhyô-zaremya ¹, the lord [or to Maidhyô-shema ¹, the lord, or to Paitishahya ¹, the lord, or to Ayâthrima ¹, Maidhyâirya ¹, or Hamaspathmaêdhaya], be propitiation, homage, and praise.

3. O ye Mazdayasnians who are here present! offer ye² this ritual service, and present ye the Myazda which is that of the Maidhyô-zaremya, taking a piece of sound flesh from a choice beast, with a full flow of milk.

4. If ye are able to do this, (well); if ye are unable to do it, ye may take then (a portion) of some liquor of equal value, it matters not which it is, and have it consumed as it is proper; and so be ye discreet from your obedience, most correctly faithful in your speech, most saintly from your sanctity, best ordered in your exercise of power, least straitened by oppressions, heart-easy with rejoicings, most merciful of givers, most helpful to the poor, fulfilling most the ritual, the blest and longed-for Asha, (coy?) riches woman-minded(?) bringing (as reward). If ye can do this and with vigour, (well); (5) if not, bring wood to the Ratu's house. It matters not what [kind, so it be well cut, and very dry, and in loads of fitting size. If that is possible, (well); if not, then let a man bring wood to the Ratu's dwelling, and heap it up as high as the ear, or to reach the fore-shoulder, or with the fore-arm measure, (or at least as high as the end of the hanging hand). If that is possible, (well); (6) but if it has not been possible, then let the worshipper (with the mind's offering) ascribe the power to him who rules the best, Ahura, (saying¹): Wherefore for this cause verily we offer and ascribe the Sovereign Power to Ahura Mazda, who rules the best, and to Righteousness (the ritual and moral Order), and we complete our sacrifice to them. Thus is the Myazda offered with the well-timed prayer for blessings.

¹ The name of the season at the time present, when the text is recited, is to be used.

² Bring ye, O these Mazdayasnians!

7. In case that a man does not give of the first Myazda which is that of the Maidhyô-zaremaya, O Spitama Zarathustra! the Ratu that has the right to that Myazda, and who has this person under his guidance, expels² that (false) disciple who has not his Myazda with him, as a man that does not worship, from the midst of the Mazda-worshippers. 8. In the case that a man does not give of the second Myazda, O Spitama Zarathustra! which is that of the Maidhyô-shema, then let² the Ratu to whom the Myazda should come, and who has the person under his guidance, expel that disciple, since he comes without his Myazda, as he would a man who refuses to recite his vows, from among the number of the Mazda-

¹ Or, 'because we offer.'

² Not 'renders him (detected) among the Mazdayasnians;' compare for form ahtarê-mrôyê; see also fra-dasti and fra-perenaoti; also the present may be used for the imperative.

worshippers. 9. In the case that a man does not give of the third Myazda, O Spitama Zarathustra! which is that of Paitishahya, then let the Ratu who ought to receive that Myazda, and who has had the person under his guidance, expel that disciple which brings no Myazda, as a detected¹ reprobate, from among the number of the Mazdayasnians. 10. In case that a man does not offer of the fourth Myazda, O Spitama Zarathustra! which is that of the Ayâthrima, let the Ratu who ought to receive that Myazda, and who has the person under his guidance, expel that disciple, since he brings no Myazda, as a refuse² beast from among the number of the Mazdayasnians. 11. In the case that a man does not give of the fifth Myazda, which is that of the Maidhyâirya, then let the Ratu to whom that Myazda belongs as a perquisite, and who has that person under his guidance, expel him, since he brings no Myazda, as an alien³, from among the number of the Mazdayasnians. 12. In case that a man does not give of the sixth Myazda, which is that of the Hamaspathmaêdhaya, O Spitama Zarathustra! let the Ratu to whom that Myazda belongs as a perquisite, and who has this person under his discipline to learn him the lore of Ahura, expel him, (as ignorant) since he brings no Myazda, from among the number of the Mazdayasnians. 13. And let him decry him afterwards without hesitation⁴, and drive⁵ him out; and let that Ratu lay upon him after-

¹ Possibly 'having a breast burnt by the ordeal,' and so 'detected;' or 'hot-breasted, vehement' (?); comp. úras.

² It may be '(his) excluded beast,' or 'his stray beast' (?).

³ Or, possibly, 'he is rejected when offering himself as arrived from the settlements' (?).

⁴ 'Without recoiling.'

⁵ Syazdayôiz.

wards the expiating deeds without reserve; and in accordance with these rules, let the disciple treat the Ratu. (Let him beware of failure to bring his Myazda, or if he fails let the disciple bear, as is befitting, what is due.) A blessing is Righteousness (called) the Best, it is weal, it is weal for this (man) when toward Righteousness Best there is right.

14. I bless with my prayer the royal Province-chiefs (who are faithful worshippers) of Ahura Mazda, the resplendent, the glorious, (beseeching) for superior strength for them, and for more important victory, and more influential rule, and desiring for them further authoritative power, and helpful support, and long duration to their reign, and the prolonged vitality of their frames, and health. 15. And I pray in my benediction for strength well-shaped and stately of growth, and which smites victoriously, Ahura-made, and crushing, and for an ascendancy abundantly subduing all who are filled with furious hate, assaulting the evil-minded enemies, and destroying, as if at once, the deadly, godless¹ foes.

16. And I pray in my blessing that he (the province-governor) may conquer in victorious battles every malicious foe, and each malignant, profane in thoughts, and words, and actions, (17) that he may indeed be constantly victorious in his own religious thoughts, and words, and deeds, and unvarying in the smiting of every foe, and of every Daêva-worshipper, and that he may, as he proceeds², be well rewarded, and of good repute, possessing a far-foreseeing preparation of the soul. 18. And I pray with blessings thus: Live thou long and blessed be thou, 'hail' to thee; live for the aid of holy men, and for the crushing of the evil; and I pray for Heaven (for thee) the best world of the saints, shining, all glorious. And thus may it happen as I pray—¹. 19. And I bless in my prayer the sacrifice, and homage, and the strength, and swiftness of the day-lords during daylight, and of the lords of the days in their length, of the month-lords, and the year-lords, and of the lords of the seasons² (in their course), and for the worship, homage, propitiation, and praise of the lofty lord who is the Righteous Ritual itself, and of those lords of the ritual who are of all the greatest, and who are the lords of the ritual at the time of Hâvani, for Maidhyô-zaremaya the lord, [(or) for Maidhyô-shema the lord, (or) for Paitishahya² the lord, or for Ayâthrima, Maidhyâirya, or Hamaspathmaêdhaya²⁺³].

¹ Unfriendly and untrue; ‘* avratyá.’

² Recall yôî zazentê vanghâu sravahî.

II. ÂFRÎN[-AGÂN]⁴ GÂTHA⁴.

1. As the Ahû is (revered and) to be chosen, so (is) the Ratu (one who rules) from the Righteous Order, a creator of mental goodness, and of life's actions done for Ahura, and the Kingdom (is) to Mazda, which to the poor may offer a nurturer.

I confess myself a Mazda-worshipper—for the praise of Ahura Mazda, the resplendent, the glorious, and of the Bountiful Immortals, for the bountiful and

¹ See Y. XXXV, 2. The Ahuna follows.

² The name varies with the season in which the sacrifice is made.

³ As in 18.

⁴ Recited during the days called after the Gâthas, the last five of the year. A long period of time must have elapsed since the Gâthas were composed, as they probably were not originally 'five,' and yet seem to have been only remembered as such.

holy Gâthas which rule in the ritual order. (Propitiation and praise be) to the Gâtha Ahunavaiti, and to the Gâtha Ustavaiti, to the Gâtha Spentâ-mainyu, and to the Gâtha Vohu-khshathra, and to the Gâtha Vahistôisti. 2. Propitiation to the Fravashis of the saints, the mighty, overwhelming, even to those of the saints of yore, who held the primeval faith (the Gâthic faith), and to those of the next of kin.

3. We sacrifice to Ahura Mazda, the resplendent, the glorious; and we sacrifice to the Amesha Spenta who rule aright, and who dispose (of all aright). And we sacrifice to the bounteous and holy Gâthas, which rule (as the first) in the ritual order.

We sacrifice to the Gâtha Ahunavaiti, the holy, as it rules in the ritual order; and we sacrifice to the Gâtha Ustavaiti, the holy, as it rules in the ritual order; and we sacrifice to the Gâtha Spentâ-mainyu, the holy, as it rules in the ritual order; and we sacrifice to the Gâtha Vohu-khshathra, the holy, as it rules in the ritual order; and we sacrifice to the Gâtha Vahistôisti, the holy, as it rules in the ritual order. 4 = Yt. XIII, 49-52¹.

III. ÂFRÎN[-AGÂN]² RAPITHVIN³.

1. I confess myself a Mazda-worshipper, of Zarathustra's order, a foe to the Daêvas, devoted to the lore of the Lord, for Rapithwina, the holy lord of the ritual order, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise, and for Frâdat-fshu³ and Zantuma⁴,

¹ Verses 5, 6 = Â. I, 14-18; for verse 6, see verses 1, 2; also see Â. I, 19.

² To be recited on the third day (Ardibahist) of the first month (Fravardin). ³ A genius who furthered cattle.

⁴ The genius of the Zantu, presiding over this Gâh Rapithvin.

the holy lord(s) of the ritual order. 2. And to Ahura Mazda, the resplendent, the glorious, and to the Bountiful Immortals, be propitiation, and to Asha Vahista (who is Righteousness the Best), and to the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son, and to all the holy Yazads, heavenly and earthly, and to the Fravashis of the saints, the mighty and overwhelming—.

3. For thus did Ahura Mazda speak to Spitama Zarathustra the word which was spoken for the ritual time of the Rapithwina, (saying): Ask us, O holy Zarathustra ¹, what are Thy questions to be asked of us ², for Thy question is as that mighty one when Thy ruler speaks his mighty wish ¹. 4. Then Zarathustra asked Ahura Mazda: O Ahura Mazda, most bountiful ³ creator of the material worlds and holy! what does that man acquire, what does he merit, what reward shall there be for that man (5) who shall recite the Rapithwina office with the Rapithwina prayer for blessing, and who shall sacrifice with ⁴ the Rapithwina office with hands (well) washed, and with (well) washed mortars, with the Baresman spread, and with Haoma high uplifted, and with fire brightly flaming, with Ahuna-vairya loud intoned, with Haoma-moistened tongue, and with a body Māthra-bound? 6. And Ahura Mazda answered him: As the wind from the southern quarter, O Spitama! causes the entire material world to advance and to increase, and as it will bless it ⁵, rejoice it, and cause it to progress ⁶, such a like reward does such a man receive, (7) who

¹ Erroneous.

² Ahmâi; see Y. XLIII, 10 with ahmâ.

³ Insert 'spirit.'

⁴ Or, 'to.'

⁵ Saoshyati^{ka}; or can saoshyanti be a locative absolute, preserving a fuller form?

⁶ Or, 'causes it to enter into helpful joy' (?).

recites the Rapithwina-ratu with the Rapithwina blessing, and sacrifices with¹ it with (well) washed hands, and mortars, with Baresman spread, and Haoma lifted, with fire brightly flaming, and with Ahuna-vairya loud intoned, and with Haoma-moistened tongue, and a body Māthra-bound! 8. Thus hath Ahura Mazda declared to Spitama Zarathustra the word which (should be) spoken at the Rapithwina time. 9, 10. (See Â. I, 14-19.)

¹ Or, 'to.'

THE GÂHS.

THE GÂHS.

THE Gâhs are the five divisions of the day. The Hâvani from 6 to 10 A.M., the Rapithwina from 10 A.M. to 3 P.M., the Uzayêirina from 3 to 6 P.M., the Aiwisrûthrima from 6 to 12 P.M., the Ushahina from 12 P.M. to 6 A.M. The Gâhs here following are prayers which must be recited at the Gâhs of the day; hence their name¹.

I. THE GÂH HÂVAN².

Unto Ahura Mazda be propitiation. A blessing is Righteousness (called) the Best—.

1. I confess myself a Mazda-worshipper, of Zarathustra's order, a foe to the Daêvas, devoted to the lore of the Lord, for the holy Hâvani, regulator of the ritual order, for its sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise, and for Sâvanghi and Visya, the righteous regulator(s) of the ritual order, for their homage, sacrifice, propitiation, and praise, and for those of the Asnya, the day-lords during daylight, and the Ayara, lords of the days in their length, and for the Mâhya, the month-lords, and the Yâirya, year-lords, and for those of the especial seasons.

2. And to Mithra of the wide pastures, of the thousand ears, of the myriad eyes, the Yazad of the spoken name³, be sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise, and to Râman Hvâstra.

3, 4. And we sacrifice to Ahura Mazda the holy ¹ The term Gâh, itself, may have arisen from the practice of chanting the Gâthas at different fixed times in the day.

² To be recited every day at the time of Hâvani.

³ Having a special Yast.

lord of the ritual Order, and to Zarathustra, and to the Fravashi of Zarathustra, the saint. And we sacrifice to the Bounteous Immortals, (the guardians) of the saints, and to the good, heroic, and bounteous Fravashis of the saints (of the living and of the dead), of the bodily, and of those in heaven. And we sacrifice to the highest of the lords, the one that most attains its ends; and we sacrifice to the most strenuous of the Yazads, the most satisfying of the lords of the ritual order, the one who reaches (what he seeks), the most infallibly of those who have as yet approached the nearest in the ritual, even to the timely prayer of the saint who rules in the ritual order. 5. And we sacrifice to the Hāvani, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to the Universal Weal, the holy, ruling in the ritual order, and to Deathlessness, the holy, ruling in the ritual order. And we sacrifice to the question and lore of the holy lord of the ritual. And we sacrifice to that heroic mighty Yasna, the Haptanghâiti, the lord of the ritual order. 6. And we sacrifice to Sâvanghi and Vîsya, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order; and we sacrifice to the Airyemâ-ishyô¹, the holy lord of the ritual order, the powerful, victoriously smiting, that which no hate can reach, which overwhelms all torments, and which passes over all torments with victory, which is the uppermost, and the middle, and the foremost, for the effective invocation of that surpassing Māthra, the five Gāthas.

7, 8. And we sacrifice to Mithra of the wide pastures—, and to Râman Hvâstra, for the worship and exaltation of Vîsya, the chief. And we sacrifice to

¹ The personified prayer; see Y. LIV.

Viśya, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to Mithra, and to Râman Hvâstra —.

9-11. And we sacrifice to thee, the Fire, O Ahura Mazda's son, the holy lord of the ritual order. And we sacrifice to this Baresman which has the Zaothra with it, and the girdle with it, and which is spread with exact sanctity, itself the holy lord. And we sacrifice to the Apām-napât, and to Nairya-sangha, and to that Yazad, the swift curse of the wise. And we sacrifice to the souls of the dead, [which are the Fravashis of the saints]. And we worship that exalted Lord who is Ahura Mazda, the highest object of the ritual order, who is the one who has attained the most to homage in the ritual. And we sacrifice to all the words which Zarathustra spake, and to all the deeds well done, and to those which shall yet be done in days to come. (And) we sacrifice to that male one of beings whose (gift) in the offering Ahura doth know to be better, and of female saints, the same. As the Ahû is to be (revered and) chosen, so (is) the Ratu, one who rules from the Righteous Order, a creator of mental goodness, and of life's actions done for Mazda, and the Kingdom (is) to Ahura, which to the poor shall offer a nurturer—.

II. GÂH RAPITHVIN¹.

1. Propitiation to Ahura Mazda. A blessing is Asha Vahista. I confess as a Mazda-worshipper, and of Zarathustra's order—for Rapithwina, the holy lord of the ritual order, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and for praise, and for Frâdat-fshu and Zantuma, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and for praise. 2. And propitiation be to Asha Vahista, and to Ahura Mazda's Fire, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise¹. 3. 4. (See Y. LXXI, 2, 3.)

¹ Recited every day at the hour of Rapithwina.

5. And we sacrifice to the Rapithwina, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to the Gâtha Ahunavaiti, the holy, and ruling in the ritual order ; and to the Gâtha Ustavaiti, and to the Gâtha Spentâ-mainyu, and to the Gâtha Vohu-khshathra, and to the Gâtha Vahistôisti, holy, and ruling in the ritual order. 6. And we sacrifice to Frâdat-fshu, and to Zantuma, and to the Fshûshô-mâthra, even to the word correctly spoken, and we sacrifice to the (many) words correctly spoken, even to the victorious ones which slay the Demon-gods (the Daêvas²). And we sacrifice to the waters and the lands, and to the plants, and to the heavenly Yazads who are givers of the holy and the good. And we sacrifice to the Bountiful Immortals, (the guardians) of the saints.

7. And we sacrifice to the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the saints, and to the heights of Asha (called) Vahista, and to the greatest Mâthras as moving us to action, the greatest as teaching faithfulness to holy vows, the greatest as referring to actions which are evidently just, and the greatest for the acquisition of the Mazdayasnian Faith. 8. And we sacrifice to that assembly and reunion which the Bountiful Immortals hold when they gather (?) on the heights of Heaven, for the sacrifice and homage of Zantuma, the lord.

And we (therefore) sacrifice to Zantuma (as) the holy lord of the ritual order. 9. And we sacrifice to Asha Vahista (who is Righteousness the Best), and to the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son —. 10. Yea, we sacrifice to Thee, the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son, the holy ritual lord —.

¹ The Ahuna follows.

² Zarathustra conquered the Demon with the Ahuna-vairya.

I bless the sacrifice, homage, strength, and swiftness of Asha Vahista, and of the Fire, of Ahura Mazda —. And to this one be the glory!

III. GÂH UZIREN¹.

1. Propitiation to Ahura Mazda! A blessing is Asha Vahista—. I confess myself a Mazdayasnian of the order of Zarathustra, a foe to the Daêvas, devoted to the lore of the Lord, for the Uzayêirina, the holy lord of the ritual order, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise, and for Frâdat-vîra and Da^hvyuma, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order, for their sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise. 2. And to that lofty Ahura, Apâ^m-napât, and to the waters which Mazda created be sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise²! 3, 4. (G. I, 3, 4.) 5. We sacrifice to the Uzayêirina, the holy lord of the ritual order. And we sacrifice to the Zao^tar, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to the Hâvanan, and to the Âtarevakhsha, and to the Frabaretar, and to the Âberet, and to the Âsnatar, and the Raêthwiskar, and to the Sraoshâvareza, holy lords of the ritual order. 6. And we sacrifice to Frâdat-vîra and Da^hvyuma, the holy lord of the ritual order. And we sacrifice to the stars, the moon, and the sun, and to the constellations (?), and we sacrifice to the stars without beginning (to their course ?), and to the glory of the doctrinal proclamations which are the evil man's distress¹. 7. And we sacrifice to the manifest performer of the truth (the correct maintainer of the rites), the holy lord of the ritual order. And we sacrifice to the later lore; yea, we sacrifice to the manifest fulfiller of the truth, and to the (entire) creation of the holy (and the clean) by day and by night with Zaothras together with offered prayers, for the sacrifice and homage of Dahvyuma, the lord. And we sacrifice to Dahvyuma, the holy lord of the ritual order. 8. And we sacrifice to that lofty and royal lord, the brilliant Apām-napât of the fleet horses; and we sacrifice to the water which is Mazda-made and holy. 9, 10. And we sacrifice to thee, the Fire, Ahura Mazda's son². 11³. And I bless the sacrifice, homage, strength, and swiftness of that lofty Ahura Napât-apām, and of the water which Mazda created⁴.

¹ Recited every day at the hour of Uzayêirina.

² The Ahunâ follows.

IV. GÂH AIWISRÛTHRIMA⁵.

1. Propitiation be to Ahura Mazda. A blessing is Asha Vahista—. I confess myself a Mazdayasnian, and of Zarathustra's order, a foe to the Daêvas, devoted to the lore of the Lord, for Aiwisrûthrima, and *Aibigaya*⁶, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order, for their sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise, and for *Frâdat-vîspām-hugyâiti*⁷ and *Zarathustrôtema*⁸, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order, for their sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise. 2. And to the

¹ See Y. XLV, 7.

² The Yēnhê hâtām here follows.

³ The Ahuna follows.

⁴ The Ashem follows.

⁵ Recited every day at the hour of Aiwisrûthrima.

⁶ Or, 'that furthers life.'

⁷ The genius presiding over all that furthers happiness.

⁸ The genius presiding over the highest office in a province.

Fravashis of the saints, and to the women who have many sons, and to that prosperity of home which lasts without reverse throughout the year, and to Strength, well-shaped and stately, and to the victorious Blow Ahura-given, and for the crushing Ascendency which it bestows, (to all) be propitiation—. 3, 4. (See Gāh I, 3, 4.) 5. And we sacrifice to Aiwisrûthrima (and) Aibigaya, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order, and to thee, O Ahura Mazda's Fire ! And we sacrifice to the stone-mortar, and to the iron-mortar, and to this Baresman spread with sanctity, with the Zaothra, and with its girdle, holy lords of the ritual order. Also we sacrifice to the sacred two, to the waters and the plants, and to the sacred vows for the soul, (as) holy lord(s) of the ritual order. 6. Also we sacrifice to Frâdat-vîspām-hugyâiti (as) ruling in the ritual order ; and we sacrifice to Zarathustra, the holy lord of the ritual ; also we sacrifice to the Māthra Spenta, (the bounteous word of reason¹), and to the soul of the Kine, and to the Zarathustrôtema². 7. Also we sacrifice to the Fire-priest, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to the charioteer (the warrior), the holy lord of the ritual order. Also we sacrifice to the thrifty tiller of the earth, the holy lord of the ritual order. And we sacrifice to the house-lord, and to the village-chief, and to the Zantu-chief, and to the province-chief of the province, the holy lord of the ritual order. 8. And we sacrifice to the youth of the good thoughts, good words, and good deeds, even to the youth of good conscience, the holy lord of the ritual order ; yea, we sacrifice to the youth of the spoken word (who spoke the words which we hold so dear¹), the holy lord of the ritual order. Yea, we sacrifice to the youth who is given to his kin (and married to his blood), the holy lord of the ritual order. And we sacrifice to him who ranges through the province², and to the itinerant with his many arts³, the holy ritual lords. And we sacrifice to the house-mistress, holy, and ruling in the ritual order. 9. And we sacrifice to the holy woman forward⁴ in good thoughts, and words, and deeds, receiving her instructions well, having her husband as her lord, the holy, and such as Âramaiti, the bounteous, is, and such as are thy wives, O Mazda, Lord!

¹ The Gāthas and Vendidad ; the first verse of the Gāthas mentions the Kine's soul.

² ' And to Zarathustra.'

And we sacrifice to the holy man most forward in good thoughts, and words, and works, wise as to piety, simple as to sin, by whose deeds the settlements advance in the holy order, for the worship and homage of the Zarathustrôtema, the lord. And we sacrifice to the Zarathustrôtema, the holy lord of the ritual order. 10. And we sacrifice to the good, heroic, bountiful Fravashis of the saints, and to the women who have many sons, and to that Prosperity which endures throughout the year, and to the well-shaped and stately Strength. And we sacrifice to the Blow of Victory, Ahura-given, and to the crushing Ascendency which it secures. 11, 12. (See Gâh I, 9, 10.) 13. (The Ahuna-vairya, &c.)

¹ See Yast XXII.

² It is very probable that the Yasna was at that period celebrated from house to house.

³ Medical?

⁴ Is it possibly, 'favouring good thoughts,' &c.?

V. GĀH USHAHIN¹.

1. Propitiation to Ahura Mazda. I confess myself a Mazda-worshipper, of the order of Zarathustra, a foe to the Daêvas, devoted to the lore of the Lord, for the Ushahina, for sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise, and to Beregya and Nmânya, the holy lord(s) of the ritual order. 2. Propitiation be to Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, endowed with recompense, smiting with the blow of victory, and causing the settlements to advance and to increase.

3, 4. (See Gâh I, 3, 4.) 5. We sacrifice to Ushahina, the holy lord of the ritual order; and we sacrifice to the beautiful Aurora, and to the dawn of morning; yea, we sacrifice to the morning, the shining², of the glittering horses, having the men of forethought (as its servants), yea, having men of forethought and heroes (awake and at their work), to the morning which gives light within the house³. And we sacrifice to the lights of dawn which are radiant with their light and fleetest horses which sweep over (?) the seven-fold earth. And we sacrifice to Ahura Mazda, the holy lord of the ritual order, and to the Good Mind, and to Asha Vahista (who is Righteousness the Best), and to Khshathra-vairya, and to Âramaiti, the bounteous and the good.

6. And we sacrifice to Beregya, even the holy lord of the ritual order, even to Nmânya with the longing desire for the good Asha, and with the longing desire for the good Mazdayasnian law, for the worship and homage of Nmânya, the lord. 7. And we sacrifice to Sraosha, and to Rashnu, the most just, and to Arstât, who causes the settlements to advance and to increase. 8, 9. (See Gâh I, 9, 10.) 10. And I bless the sacrifice, homage, strength, and swiftness of Sraosha (Obedience) the blessed, endowed with sanctity, smiting with the blow of victory, and who causes the settlements to advance; and I bless the sacrifice of Rashnu, the most just, and that of Arstât, who causes the settlements to advance and to increase¹.

¹ Recited every day at the hour of Ushahina.

² So, better than 'royal,' which is, however, possible.

³ Or, 'while it abides.'

¹ The Ashem and the Ahmâi raêška.

MISCELLANEOUS FRAGMENTS.

I.

1. (An incitation to the priest or worshipper.) As thou keepest company with the Good Mind, and with Righteousness the Best, and with Khshathra-vairya (the Kingdom to be desired), speak to the male and female disciples of Zarathustra Spitama the saint, (and declare) the praise which is to be spoken, that of the Yasna, even the words against which no anger¹ shall prevail.

2. And do thou, O Zarathustra²! declare our words for sacrifice and worship, ours, the Bountiful Immortals', that the waters may (thus) be sacrificed to by thee, and the plants, the Fravashis of the saints, and the created Yazads, heavenly and earthly, which are holy and beneficent.

II.

1. I confess myself a Mazda-worshipper—for the praise of Thraêtaona, the Âthwyan. Let them declare it—. Propitiation be to the Fravashi of Thraêtaona, the Âthwyan, the saint. 2. We sacrifice to Thraêtaona, the Âthwyan, the holy lord of the ritual order; and may we be free from the dog Kuro³, and the Tarewani³, and the Karpan, (we who are) of⁴ those who sacrifice in order. 3. (The Ahuna

¹ Others 'the unrestricted words.'

² Perhaps 'Zarathustra' is here merely the equivalent of 'priest.'

³ Obscure.

⁴ Awkward formations.

follows.) Sacrifice, homage, strength, and swiftness be to the Fravashi of Thraêtaona, the saint. (The Ahem and Ahmâi raêška follow.)

III.

1. All good thoughts, and all good words, and all good deeds are thought, and spoken, and done with intelligence; and all evil thoughts, and words, and deeds are thought, and spoken, and done with folly.
2. And let (the men who think, and speak, and do) all good thoughts, and words, and deeds inhabit¹ Heaven (as their home). And let those who think, and speak, and do evil thoughts, and words, and deeds abide in Hell. For to all who think good thoughts, speak good words, and do good deeds, Heaven, the best world, belongs. And this is evident, and as of course (?) (or, 'and therewith their seed').

IV.

1. I proclaim the Airyemâ-ishyô as the greatest of all authoritative prayers, O Spitama! as the most influential and helpful for progress; and may the Saoshyants (who would further us) use it and revere it.

2. I am speaking in accordance with it, O Spitama! and therefore I shall rule as sovereign over creatures which are mine, I who am Ahura Mazda. Let no one rule as Angra Mainyu² over realms that are his own, O Zarathustra Spitama! 3. Let Angra Mainyu be hid beneath the earth³. Let the Daêvas likewise disappear. Let the dead arise (unhindered by these foes), and let bodily life be sustained in these now lifeless bodies.

¹ Ashaêta = â + shaêta used subjunctively.

² Insert 'of the evil faith.'

³ In Y. IX, 14, 15, it is the Ahuna-vairya which drives the Daêvas beneath the earth.

V.

1. To Ahura Mazda, the radiant, the glorious, to the Bountiful Immortals, to Force well-shaped and stately, to the Blow of Victory, Ahura-given, to the Victorious Ascendency (which it secures), to the path of pleasantness, to the good Zarenumant¹, to the 'Glowing' Mountain made by Mazda, and to all the Yazads! 2. We sacrifice to Ahura Mazda, the radiant, the glorious, and to the Bountiful Immortals who rule aright, who dispose (of all) aright, and to Force well-shaped and stately, and to the Blow of Victory, and to the Ascendency of Victory, and to the path of pleasantness, and to Zarenumant, the good, which Mazda created, and to the 'Glowing' Mount, and to every saint.

VI².

Propitiation be to the created body of the Kine of blessed endowment, and to the Kine's soul (so, if there is one cow presented³). Propitiation be to the body and soul of you two (so, if there are two³). —To your body and soul (if there are three, or the entire herd³). (The Ahuna follows.)

¹ According to the Bundahis, the name of a lake.

² This fragment was spoken when the milk was drawn from the cow, or cows, for the offering, and when the water was received with which the udder of the cow was to be washed. (Sp. transl. vol. iii, p. 254.)

³ These words are in Persian introduced as rubric.

VII¹.

1. To the good waters, and to all the waters which Mazda created, and to that lofty lord, Apām-napāt, and to thee, O Ahurian One of Ahura, that water which Mazda created! be sacrifice, homage, propitiation, and praise. (The Ahuna follows.) 2. We utter our praises forth to thee, O Ahurian One of Ahura! and we complete good sacrifices, and deeds of adoration, with good gifts of offering, and gifts with praise, which are appropriate to thee among the holy Yazads. I will seek to render thee content. I will pour thee out. [Let them now recite the lofty Gâthas which belong to the ritual.]

VIII².

1. The moons* of the season will wane. Let the Mazdayasnian (pray) for a smiter who may destroy quickly (the demon who causes their decrease). And quickly indeed may the malignant one die off—. For no one of her adherents can maintain this Drug(k) by prayers.

2. Smiting fiercely³ with her weapon, she, the Drug(k), goes on, and most mighty she has been. And she wanders on, O Zarathustra! as mindful of her might, and strong⁴ in proportion as she advances

¹ This was to be spoken when the vessel containing the Zaothras was taken in hand (Sp.).

² This fragment is very much broken in its connections, and most corrupt in its grammatical forms. The translation is entirely conjectural. Section IX has also irregularities.

³ Some form of dva may be conjectured.

⁴ 'With her weapon.'

as the sinful Drug(k). But may Khshathra¹ be with me—, so that . . . the deadly one may die away, for thereupon the blow of destruction shall come upon the Drug(k)².

IX.

1. The Ahuna-vairya is a prayer to be (revered and) chosen as the choice one of Mazda. The Khshathra-vairya is likewise such, and the Yâ daêna³. They (it) will gain the reward. Yathâ ahû vairyo. It is the word of Mazda. They are the words in season. It is the Māthra-spenta word, the unsubdued, the undeceived, the victorious, the opponent of malice, the healing and victorious word of Mazda, which, as it is pronounced⁴, gives most the victory to him who utters it. 2. I have declared the hymn which is most helpful and victorious against the words of Aêshma, which is health-giving and healing, and conducive to progress, the multiplier, and the furtherer of growth. And let the worshipper present it with a liberal offering . . . with its pleasing words. Let that be done through veritable grace which helps us on the most⁵. The Kingdom (is) to Ahura, which to the poor may grant a nurturer⁶.

¹ Khshathra~~ta~~ ?

² See Y. XXX, 10.

³ So I conjecture as the commencing words of some piece.

⁴ 'For healing.'

⁵ Y. L, 11.

⁶ Last line of the Ahuna.

INDEX.

- Aêshma, page xix, xxi, 161, 280, 393.
 Aêthrapaiti, 279, 318, 323.
 Aêthrya, 323.
 Age of the Gâthas, &c., xxviii-xxxvii;
 age as compared with one another, xxvii, 92.
 Agni, 80, 129.
 Ahî, 233.
 Ahuna-vairya, 2, 194, 227, 228, 254,
 260, 261, 264, 293, 303, 309,
 312, 336, 349, 354, 356, 357,
 360, 364, 372, 374, 375, 384,
 386, 391, 392, 393.
 Ahunavaiti(î), xxvii, 2, 3, 91, 92,
 336, 339, 373, 382.
 Aburian, 287, 320, 321, 322, 323,
 337, 392.
 Ahû, 228, 230, 255, 259, 262, 281, 309, 323, 336, 357, 372, 381.
 Aibigaya, 197, 201, 204, 209, 215,
 219, 384, 385.
 Airyemâ-ishyô, 293, 337, 340, 364, 380, 390.
 Airyêna Vaêgah, 235.
 Aiwisrûthrima, 197, 201, 204, 209,
 215, 219, 224, 379, 384, 385.
 Aka Manah, xviii, xix, 60.
 Alborg, 19.
 Alexander, xl.
 Ameretatât, 66, 76, 207, 211, 213,
 226, 227, 228, 252, 256.
 Amesha Spenta, xxx, 281, 327, 345, 351, 363.
 Ameshôspends, 11, 13, 14, 27, 145, 148, 269; (bidden to approach, 77).
 Anâhita, xxx.
 Angra Mainyu, xxx, 25, 110, 233,
 272, 298, 312, 390.
 Apâm-napât, 197, 204, 209, 215, 219,
 224, 319, 326, 331, 346, 351,
 362, 381, 383, 384, 392.
 Arani, 41.
 Archangels, xxiv, 27, 124, 178.
 Ardâ Virâf, xl.
 Ardibahîst, 367.
 Ardvi Sûra Anâhita, 316, 336, 340.
 Arezahi, 349.
 Armenian, xlii.
 Arsacids, xli.
 Arstâr, 198, 205, 209, 215, 220, 224,
 256, 345, 388.
 Arsti, 306.
 Artaxerxes Mnemon, xxx.
 Artaxerxes, the Sasanian, xli.
 Aryan, x, xviii, xxiv, xlii, 1.
 Asha, xxiv, 3, 5, 6, 7, 12, 14, 15, 16,
 33, 39, 44, 68, 77, 89, 94, 127,
 157, 159, 161, 162, 164, 165,
 168, 176, 182, 191, 225, 248,
 295, 302, 311, 368, 387.
 Asha Vahista, 2, 201, 218, 267, 268, 281, 309, 312, 325, 329, 339,
 363, 374, 382, 383, 384.
 Ashem Vohû, 293, 356.
 Ashi, 200, 345.
 Ashi Vanguhi, 206, 211.
 Asiatic Commentaries, xxxvii-xliii.
 Asnya, 196, 219, 223, 368, 379.
 Aurora, 114, 175, 387.
 Authorship of the Gâthas, xxiii, 2, 167-169, 173.
 Avesta, xxix, xxxi, xxxiii, xxxv,
 xxxix, xli, xlii, xlvi, xlvii, 15, 17, 40, 51, 68, 71, 78, 88, 126, 167,
 184, 185, 282, 293, 337, 353,
 361.
 Ayara, 379.
 Ayâthrima, 198, 205, 210, 216, 220,
 224, 335, 338, 368, 370, 372.
 Azhi Dahâka, 233.
 Âberer, 341, 383.
 Âdarbad Mahraspand, xli.
 Âfrînagân, ix, 367.
 Âramaiti(î), xii, 14, 15, 27, 32, 33,
 46, 58, 77, 87, 88, 101, 109, 124,
 126, 146, 148, 149, 150, 152,
 155, 156, 159, 167, 176, 180,

- 186, 191, 256, 257, 269, 311, 325, 342, 360, 361, 386.
Asnatar, 342, 383.
Ātarevakhsha, 255, 341, 343, 383.
Ātharvan, 251.
Āthwya, 233, 389.
- Babylon, xxxv.
Bactria, xxviii, xxix, xxxii, xxxv.
Bagāhya, xxx.
Bardiya, xxxv.
Baresman, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207,
208, 213, 246, 253, 270, 299,
309, 314, 315, 331, 338, 339,
340, 341, 346, 349, 350, 354,
374, 381.
Battle, 39, 50, 110, 118, 154, 162, 189.
Behistun, xxix, xxxv.
Bendva, xxvi, 160, 162, 163.
Beregya, perhaps better as adj., 197, 205, 209, 215, 220, 224,
387.
Bridge, 140, 154, 183, 194, 261.
Bundahis, 37, 360, 391.
Burial, xxxi.
Būshyāsta, 346.
- Captivity, xlii.
Conversion of all men, 41.
Cow, 45, 391.
Creation, 108, 196.
Cremation, xxxi.
Croesus, xxxi.
Cuneiform Ins., xxix, xxxiv.
Cyrus, xxxv.
- Daēna, 124, 126, 155, 161, 165, 169, 189.
Daēva, xix, xx, xxi, 8, 26, 27, 39, 51,
54, 57, 58, 59, 70, 85, 110, 111,
121, 122, 129, 132, 153, 160,
161, 164, 189, 199, 202, 211,
212, 231, 235, 236, 241, 247,
249, 260, 272, 280, 281, 292,
301, 302, 305, 306, 317, 322,
366, 371, 379, 387, 390.
Dahāka, 233, 245.
Dabvyuma (Dahyuma), 197, 204,
209, 215, 219, 224, 251, 259,
278, 337, 384.
Dakhma, xxxi.
Darius, xxx, xxxi, xxxii, xxxiii, xxxv, xxxvii.
Daughter, 37, 92, 123, 146.
- Demi-gods, 4, 85, 240, 260.
Dog, 389.
Dragon, xxvi, 233, 234, 239, 322.
Draogha, xxx.
Drūg (Drug), xix, 33, 35, 40, 160, 163, 192, 233, 313, 392, 393.
Dualism, xix, 25, 26, 123.
- Erethe, 226.
- Fire, 41, 80, 84, 95, 96, 100, 102,
116, 132, 138, 147, 150, 177,
182, 196, 199, 204, 206, 208,
209, 210, 212, 214, 215, 216,
219, 220, 222, 223, 224, 225,
227, 258, 260, 270, 271, 272,
274, 275, 276, 277, 281, 284,
285, 314, 315, 316, 319, 320,
323, 325, 331, 346, 348, 351,
353, 358, 360, 374, 375, 381,
383, 384, 385.
Fire priest, 243.
— Berezi-savangha, 258.
— Spenista, 258.
— Urvāzista, 258.
— Vāzista, 258.
— Vohu-fryāna, 258.
Frabaretar, 341, 383.
Frangrasyan, 246.
Frashakard, 27, 82, 96, 101.
Frashaostra, xxvi, xxviii, 14, 15, 22,
69, 76, 92, 133, 142, 153, 161,
165, 168, 169, 185, 190, 247,
250, 327, 330.
Fravashi, 27, 32, 197, 199, 201, 204,
205, 207, 208, 209, 212, 214,
215, 216, 218, 219, 223, 224,
227, 244, 255, 256, 259, 272,
273, 275, 278, 279, 281, 286,
294, 296, 309, 311, 317, 319,
324, 327, 328, 331, 345, 351,
352, 358, 362, 374, 381, 382,
385, 386.
Frādat-fshu, 197, 204, 209, 215, 219,
223, 373, 381, 382.
Frādat-vīra, 197, 204, 209, 215, 219,
224, 383.
Frādat-vīspām-hugyāiti, 204, 209,
215, 219, 224, 384, 385.
Fryāna, 133, 141, 190.
Fshūshō-māthra, 303, 306, 310, 337, 341, 382.
- Gahanbār, 367.
Ganrāk Mīnavad, 35.

- Garôdman, 19, 109, 170, 173, 184, 345.
 Gaya Maretan, 252, 260, 324, 362.
 Gâh, ix, 373, 379.
 Gâtha(â), ix-xxvii, 1-194, 195, 208, 213, 214, 230, 231, 243, 270, 281, 282, 293, 295, 299, 329, 330, 331, 336, 337, 339, 340, 351, 356, 372, 373, 392.
Gen Urvan, 11.
 Gnostic, xiv, xx, xlvi, 71.
 Grehma, xxvi, 63, 64.
 Gaini, 192, 242.
 Gâmâspa, xxvi, xxviii, 76, 94, 143, 153, 166, 168, 169, 185, 247, 250.
 Hadhaokhdha, 337, 341.
 Hadhânaêpata, 208, 270, 316, 320, 321, 350.
 Haêkar-aspa, xxvi, 142, 191.
 Hamaspathmaêdhaya, 198, 205, 210, 216, 220, 225, 335, 338, 370, 372.
 Hamêstagâ, 72.
 Haoma, 158, 208, 213, 214, 227, 228, 230, 231, 232, 233, 235-246, 271, 302, 321, 347, 349, 350, 353, 354, 374, 375.
 Haoma-water, 208, 227, 228, 270, 271.
 Haptanghâiti(i), 91, 247, 281, 303, 330, 336, 340, 380.
 Haraiti, 241, 302, 303.
 Haurvadad, 119.
 Haurvatât, 66, 76, 207, 211, 213, 226, 228, 252, 256.
 Hâvan, 379.
 Hâvanan, 341, 383.
 Hâvani, 196, 198, 201, 202, 205, 207, 209, 210, 211, 212, 215, 219, 222, 223, 226, 231, 254, 367, 368, 372, 379, 380.
 Heaven, a spiritual state, xx, xlvii, 25, 30.
 Hegelianism, xix.
 Hell, a spiritual state, xx, xlvii, 25, 30.
 Heptade, xviii.
 Herodotus, xxix, xxx, xxxv, 69, 120.
 Historical character of the Gâthas, xxvi, 1.
 Hoshangî G., 240, 251.
 Hôrn Yast, 230.
 Hukairya, 317.
 Hvaniratha, 305, 349.
 Hvôgva, xxvi, xxviii, 92, 94, 133, 142, 185.
 Immortality, 94.
 India, xxxii, 137.
 Indo-aryans, xxxiii.
 Inscriptions, xxx, xxxiv.
 Iran, xxxvii, 137.
 Irano-aryans, xxxiii.
 Isha-khshathra, 97.
 Israel, 160.
 Isti, 97, 135.
 Kabvaredhas, 312.
 Karpans, xxvi, 63, 65, 66, 121, 140, 158, 177, 184, 236, 389.
 Karshvar, 58, 305, 313, 317, 349.
 Kavis, xxvi, 56, 64, 65, 66, 121, 140, 142, 183, 185, 186, 190, 236, 247, 250, 273.
 Kayadha, 301, 313, 342.
 Kâidhya, 301.
 Keresâni, 237.
 Keresâspa, 234.
 Khrafstra, 20, 85, 87, 260, 281.
 Khshathra, xxiv, 12, 14, 33, 55, 128, 146, 152, 162, 178.
 Khshathra-vairya, 182, 256, 325, 361, 387, 389.
 Kine, xix, xx, cp. xxix, 14, 36, 38, 44, 46, 55, 56, 62, 63, 65, 69, 72, 73, 82, 90, 111, 114, 121, 131, 135, 136, 137, 146, 147, 148, 149, 152, 171, 176, 177, 180, 184, 196, 226, 227, 244, 248, 249, 259, 262, 283, 286, 307, 310, 320, 325, 332, 346, 348, 363, 385, 391.
 Kuro, 389.
 Kinvar Bridge, 141, 161, 173, 183, 331, 345, 367.
 Kisti, 152, 177, 200, 211, 226, 347.
 Last judgment, 95, 100.
 Magavan, 70.
 Maghavan, 75.
 Magi, xxxv.
 Magian, xxxi, 185, 318.
 Magic, 239.
 Maidhyâirya, 198, 205, 210, 216, 220, 225, 335, 338, 368, 370, 372.
 Maidhyô-mâh, xxvi, xxviii, 186.

- Maidhyô-shema, 198, 205, 210, 216, 220, 224, 335, 338, 368, 369,
 372.
 Maidhyô-zaremayâ, 198, 205, 210,
 216, 220, 224, 335, 338, 368,
 369, 372.
 Marriage song, 187.
 Maruts, 108.
 Mazainya, 280.
 Mazdaism, xxix seq.
 Mazdayasnian, 206, 217, 225, 229,
 238, 247, 253, 256, 270, 272,
 277, 282, 323, 328, 343, 344,
 345, 347, 349, 351, 354, 355,
 357, 368, 369, 370, 382, 383,
 387.
 Mazendran, 305.
 Mâh-rû, 246.
 Mâhya, 198, 205, 220, 224, 368, 379.
 Mâzanian, 302.
 Mâthra, xx, 10, 15, 21, 25, 37, 74, 105,
 110, 119, 123, 126, 172, 173,
 174, 176, 179, 181, 185, 199,
 206, 208, 213, 214, 217, 218,
 227, 228, 238, 256, 259, 266,
 267, 272, 277, 290, 297, 302,
 305, 306, 307, 310, 328, 339,
 341, 349, 355, 360, 362, 374,
 375, 380, 382, 385, 393.
 Medes, xxxi.
 Medhâ, 8, 9, 104.
 Media, xxxiv, xxxv.
 Metres, xviii, xlii, 133.
 Mithra, xxx, 196, 199, 204, 205, 209,
 210, 216, 219, 220, 223, 225,
 256, 271, 319, 326, 337, 346,
 351, 379, 380, 381.
 Mobad, 341, 342.
 Mohammed, 160.
 Moon, 113.
 Mortar, 270, 350, 354, 355, 374, 385.
 Mount Alborg, 19.
 Môghu, 185.
 Mûrakas, 245.
 Myazdas, 207, 214, 226, 228, 229,
 350, 368, 369, 370, 371.
 Nairya-sangha, 258, 298, 331, 345, 353, 381.
 Neryosangh, xii, xiv, xxxix.
 Nmânya, 197, 205, 209, 215, 220,
 224, 387, 388.
 Omniscience of Ahura, 47, 101.
 Origin of evil, xix, 25, 29, 30, 31.
 Originality of the Gâthas, xx.
 Padokhshah, 273.
 Paederast, 183.
 Pairika, 257.
 Paitishahya, 198, 205, 210, 216,
 220, 224, 335, 338, 368, 370,
 372.
 Pantheism, xviii.
 Paradise, 71, 143, 261.
 Parahaoma, 208, 214.
 Pareñdi, 251, 346.
 Parsi, xxxix, xl, 48, 108.
 Pâtirasp, 235.
 Perozes, xxii.
 Persepolis, xxix, xl.
 Persian, xi, xxxi, xxxix, xl, xlii, xlv,
 6, 34, 69.
 Personification of Ameshôspends,
 xxiv.
 Place of Origin of the Gâthas, xxviii-xxxiii.
 Pleiades, 238.
 Pourukâsta, 191.
 Pourushaspa, 235.
 Puçgâb, xxxiii.
 Raêthwîkar, 342, 383.
 Ragha, xxviii, xxix.
 Rakshas, 249.
 Rapithwîna, 197, 201, 204, 209, 215,
 219, 223, 367, 373, 374, 379,
 381, 382.
 Rasâstâr, 200, 211, 217, 226.
 Rashnu, 198, 205, 209, 215, 220, 224,
 256, 319, 326, 345, 351, 358,
 388.
 Raspi, 246.
 Ratu, 3, 12, 41, 66, 71, 73, 78, 101,
 146, 163, 176, 177, 180, 208,
 213, 228, 230, 246, 250, 253,
 254, 259, 262, 309, 323, 336,
 340, 343, 357, 369, 370, 371,
 372.
 Ratufriti, 344.
 Râma, 163.
 Râman Hvâstra, 196, 204, 209, 256,
 271, 323, 337, 340, 379, 380.
 Recompense to the good and evil,
 34, 35, 52, 100, 161, 167.
 Renovation of the world, 33, 82, 90, 131.
 Resurrection, 391.
 Rîg-veda, xxxvi, xxxvii, xl, xlv, 35, 114, 139, 162, 199, 233.
 Rîks, xv, xxxvi, xxxviii, xlv, 20, 24, 70, 80, 315.
 Rishl, 91.

- Sadduceeism, xxxii.
 Saoshyant, 71, 82, 101, 124, 129, 131, 132, 136, 153, 158, 176, 189, 191, 232, 250, 266, 309, 339, 343, 344, 350, 352, 362, 390.
 Sasanids, xxii.
 Satan, 26, 54.
 Savahis, 349.
 Saviours, 89, 94, 131, 133, 189.
 Sâmas, 233.
 Sâvanghi, 196, 201, 202, 204, 207, 209, 212, 215, 219, 222, 223, 254, 367, 379, 380.
 Sâyana, xl.
 Scyths, xxxii.
 Shapur II, xli.
 Snaithis, 110, 123, 305.
 Soma, 158, 231.
 Sovereignty of Ahura, 8.
 Spenista fire, 258.
 Spenta mainyu, 45, 67, 70, 83, 106, 145, 199, 201, 210, 211, 216, 217, 225, 226, 229, 272, 277.
 Spentâ-mainyu Gâtha, xxvii, 92, 145, 307, 337, 340, 360, 373, 381, 382.
 Spitami, 191.
 Spitâma (Spitama), xxvi, xxviii, 92, 133, 141, 182, 186, 188, 190, 212, 218, 227, 255, 264, 299, 313, 315, 325, 339, 351, 353, 370, 374, 375, 389, 390.
 Sraosha (transl. Obedience), 15, 20, 74, 93, 95, 96, 97, 101, 103, 104, 105, 127, 197, 205, 208, 209, 212, 215, 218, 221, 222, 224, 254, 256, 271, 274, 280, 296, 297-306, 311, 319, 320, 325, 326, 352, 353, 357, 358, 388.
 Sraoshâvareza, 342, 383.
 Srôsh Yast, 296, 297.
 Staota Yēsnya, 294, 331.
 Texts, xlv.
 Thraëtaona, 233, 389, 390.
 Thritha, 233.
 Tistrya, 199, 210, 216, 225, 256, 280.
 Tradition, xii.
 Traitana, 233.
 Trishrup, xliii, 91, 145, 162.
 Turanian, xxi, 133, 141, 188, 246.
 Unicorn (?), 291.
 Urvâkhshaya, 234.
 Urvâzista, 258.
 Ushahina, 197, 202, 205, 209, 215, 219, 224, 379, 387.
 Ushi-darena, 200, 206, 211, 225, 259, 277.
 Usig(k), xxvi, 121.
 Urtavaiti(i), xxvii, 91, 92, 331, 336, 340, 359, 373, 382.
 Urtâ, 7, 91.
 Uzayêirina, 197, 201, 204, 209, 215, 219, 224, 379, 383.
 Vahista Manah, 31, 66.
 Vahistôisti(i), 293, 337, 340, 361, 373, 382.
 Varenya, 280.
 Varesa, 349.
 Vayu, xix, 189, 192, 193, 271, 272.
 Veda, xxix, xxxix, xlii, 14, 32, 102, 136, 143, 164.
 Vedic, x, xv, xxix, xxxvi, xliii, xlv, 14, 32, 102, 136, 143, 164.
 Vendidad, xxiii, xxvi, xxx, xxxiii, 1, 78, 81, 95, 110, 149.
 Vendidad Sâdah, 17, 195, 335, 355, 356, 358, 359, 361, 363.
 Verethraghna, 337, 340, 350.
 Visparad, ix, 332, &c.
 Vivasvat, 232.
 Vidadhafshu, 349.
 Vidhâtu, 304.
 Vis, 259, 315, 342.
 Vistâspa, xxv, xxviii, xxix, xxxiii, 14, 15, 22, 69, 76, 133, 142, 153, 166, 168, 169, 170, 185, 186, 190, 247, 250.
 Visya, 196, 202, 204, 209, 212, 215, 219, 223, 251, 367, 379, 380.
 Vivanghusha, 61.
 Vivanghvant, 232.
 Vohu-fryâna, 258.
 Vohu-khshathra, 337, 340, 361, 373, 382.
 Vohu Manah, xii, xxiv, 5, 12, 16, 33, 66, 127, 148, 154, 162, 256, 352, 354.
 Vologeses I, xli.
 Vouru-kasha, 317, 321, 346.
 Waters, 286, 316, 392.
 Yama, 232.
 Yasna, ix, 1, 91, 195.
 Yast, 1.
 Yazad, 207, 209, 212, 218, 227, 255, 258, 259, 272, 306, 320, 327,

- 328, 331, 337, 347, 348, 374, 380, 389, 391, 392.
Yâirya, 198, 368, 379.
Yênê hâtâm, 228, 268, 281, 336.
Yima, 61, 232.
- Zand, 40, 356.
Zandas, 313.
Zantu, 230, 251, 315, 342, 373, 385.
Zantuma, 197, 204, 209, 215, 219,
223, 259, 373, 381, 382.
Zaotar, 149, 213, 228, 230, 246, 254, 342, 343, 383.
- Zaothra, 203, 204, 206, 207, 213,
214, 255, 309, 321, 323, 338,
339, 340, 341, 350, 384, 385.
Zarathustra, personal history, xxiii, xxiv; call, 9; unfavourable reception, 5, 11, 101, 103; consecration to Ahura, 79, 108; suffering, 93, 134; trust in Ahura, 81.
Zarathustrôtema, 197, 204, 209, 215,
224, 259, 331, 337, 347, 384,
385, 386.
Zarenumant, 391.
Zendiks, 313.

In addition to the occurrences cited above, the words aêshma, aka manah, ameretatâr, amesha spenta, asha, ashi vanguhi, asnya, âramaiti, âtharvan, drûg, frashakarâ, ganrâk mînavad, haurvatâr, îsti, khshathra, kinvar, kisti, mazdayasnian, mâhya, mâthra, ratu, spenta mainyu, sraosha, vahista manah, verethraghna, vîsya, vohu manah, zaotar occur as translated.

With regard to the subject indexed as the originality of the Gâthas, it is not intended to deny that the original migrations of the entire Aryan race may have been from the North-west.

On page 198 read Maidhyô-shema, Maidhyô-zaremaya; p. 204, -gyâiti; p. 209, -gyâitê.

TRANSLITERATION OF ORIENTAL ALPHABETS ADOPTED FOR THE TRANSLATIONS OF THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST.

CONSONANTS.	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit.	Zend.	Pehlvi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.		III Class.
	I Class.	II Class.	III Class.
Gutturales.
1 Tenuis	k	क	𐬕	𐬑	𐬑	𐬑	𐬑	k
2 " aspirata	kh	ख	𐬖	𐬒	𐬒	𐬒	𐬒	kh
3 Media	g	ग	𐬔	𐬓	𐬓	𐬓	𐬓
4 " aspirata	gh	घ	𐬕	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔
5 Gutturo-labialis	q
6 Nasalis	ñ (ng)	ङ	{ 𐬕 (ng) }
7 Spiritus asper	h	ह	𐬖 (h)	𐬖	𐬖	𐬖	𐬖	h, hs
8 " lenis	,
9 " asper faucalis	ʔh
10 " lenis faucalis	ʔh
11 " asper fricatus		'h	. . .
12 " lenis fricatus		'h	. . .
Gutturales modificatae (palatales, &c.)
13 Tenuis		k	. . .	च	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔	k
14 " aspirata		kh	. . .	छ	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	kh
15 Media		g	. . .	ज	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔
16 " aspirata		gh	. . .	झ	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕
17 " Nasalis		ñ	. . .	ञ	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕

CONSONANTS (continued).	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit.	Zend.	Pehlvi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.	II Class.	III Class.
18 Semivocalis	y			य	𐬚	𐬎	𐬎	𐬎	י	y
19 Spiritus asper
20 " lenis		(y)
21 " asper assibilatus		(y)
22 " lenis assibilatus		s		श	𐬑	𐬑	𐬑	𐬑		z
Dentales.
23 Tenuis	t			त	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔	ת	t
24 " aspirata	th			थ	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	ת	th
25 " assibilata
26 Media	d		TH	द	𐬌	𐬌	𐬌	𐬌
27 " aspirata	dh			ध	𐬍	𐬍	𐬍	𐬍
28 " assibilata			DH
29 Nasalis	n			न	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	נ	n
30 Semivocalis	l			ल	𐬥	𐬥	𐬥	𐬥	ל	l
31 " mollis 1		l
32 " mollis 2			L
33 Spiritus asper 1	s			स	𐬑	𐬑	𐬑	𐬑	ס	s
34 " asper 2			S (S)
35 " lenis	z			ज	𐬑	𐬑	𐬑	𐬑	ז	z
36 " asperimus 1			z (z)
37 " asperimus 2			z (z)

Dentales modificatae
(linguales, &c.)

38	Tennis
39	" aspirata
40	Media
41	" aspirata
42	Nasalis
43	Semivocalis	r
44	" fricata	f
45	" diacritica
46	Spiritus asper	sh
47	" lenis	zh

Labiales.

48	Tennis	p
49	" aspirata	ph
50	Media	b
51	" aspirata	bh
52	Tennisima
53	Nasalis	m
54	Semivocalis	w
55	" aspirata	hw
56	Spiritus asper	f
57	" lenis	v
58	Anusvāra
59	Visarga

[illegible]

VOWELS.	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit.	Zend.	Pehlevi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.	II Class.	III Class.
1 Neutralis	0
2 Laryngo-palatalis	ə
3 " labialis	ɔ
4 Gutturalis brevis	a			अ	𐬀	𐬀	𐬀	ا	א	...
5 " longa	ā	(a)		आ	𐬁	𐬁	𐬁	آ	א	...
6 Palatalis brevis	i			इ	𐬂	𐬂	𐬂	ي	י	...
7 " longa	ī	(i)		ई	𐬃	𐬃	𐬃	יי	י	...
8 Dentalis brevis	ɛ			ए
9 " longa	ē			ऐ
10 Lingualis brevis	ɪ			ऋ
11 " longa	ī			ॠ
12 Labialis brevis	u			उ
13 " longa	ū	(u)		ऊ
14 Gutturo-palatalis brevis	e			ए
15 " longa	é(āi)	(e)
16 Diphthongus gutturo-palatalis	āi	(ai)
17 " "	ei(ēi)
18 " "	oi(ōu)
19 Gutturo-labialis brevis	o
20 " longa	ō(au)	(o)
21 Diphthongus gutturo-labialis	āu	(au)
22 " "	eu(ēu)
23 " "	ou(ōu)
24 Gutturalis fracta	ä
25 Palatalis fracta	ī
26 Labialis fracta	ū
27 Gutturo-labialis fracta	ō

HOME USE CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT
MAIN LIBRARY

This book is due on the last date stamped below.
1-month loans may be renewed by calling 642-3405.
6-month loans may be recharged by bringing books to Circulation Desk.

Renewals and recharges may be made 4 days prior to due date.

ALL BOOKS ARE SUBJECT TO RECALL 7 DAYS AFTER DATE CHECKED OUT.

DEC 22 1974 17

REC'D CIRC DEPT

NOV 22 '74

MAY 06 1990

AUTO DISC

MAY 01 1990

LD21—A-40m-5,'74
(R8191L)

General Library
University of California
Berkeley

YC 54595

U.C. BERKELEY LIBRARIES

0022674806

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

UC-NRLF

B 3 021 332

REESE LIBRARY
OF THE
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

Class

685

M246

v. 32

THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

London
HENRY FROWDE

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE
AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

TRANSLATED

BY VARIOUS ORIENTAL SCHOLARS

AND EDITED BY

F. MAX MÜLLER

VOL. XXXII

Oxford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1891

[All rights reserved]

Oxford

PRINTED AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

BY MORACE HART, PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY

VEDIC HYMNS

TRANSLATED BY

F. MAX MÜLLER

PART I

HYMNS TO THE MARUTS, RUDRA, VÂYU, AND VÂTA

Oxford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1891

[All rights reserved]

Handwritten text: Handwritten Handwritten

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION	ix
PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION	xxix
HYMNS, TRANSLATION AND NOTES:—
Mandala X, 121, The Unknown God	I →
I, 6, Indra and the Maruts	14
„ 19, Agni and the Maruts	53 ↗
„ 37, The Maruts	63 ↖
„ 38, „	81—
„ 39, „	97—
„ 64, „	106—
„ 85, „	126
„ 86, „	154
„ 87, „	159
„ 88, „	169
„ 165, The Maruts and Indra	179
„ 166, The Maruts	209
„ 167, „	272 ↗
„ 168, „	279
„ 170, Dialogue between Indra and Agastya	286
„ 171, The Maruts	289
„ 172, „	293
II, 34, „	295
V, 52, „	312
„ 53, „	319
„ 54, „	325
„ 55, „	333
„ 56, „	337
„ 57, „	340
„ 58, „	343
„ 59, „	347

	PAGE
Mandala V, 60, Agni and the Maruts	352
„ 61, The Maruts	356
„ 87, „	363
VI, 66, „	368
VII, 56, „	373
„ 57, „	379
„ 58, „	382
„ 59, The Maruts and Rudra	386
VIII, 7, The Maruts	390
„ 20, „	400
„ 94, „	408
X, 77, „	412
„ 78, „	416
I, 43, Rudra	419
„ 114, „	422
II, 33, Rudra, the Father of the Maruts	426
VI, 74, Soma and Rudra	434
VII, 46, Rudra	436
→ I, 2, Vāyu	440
„ 134, „	444
X, 168, Vāta	449
„ 186, „	451
APPENDICES :—
I. Index of Words	455
II. List of the more important Passages quoted in the Preface and in the Notes	530
III. A Bibliographical List of the more important Publications on the Rig-veda	540
Corrigenda	551

Transliteration of Oriental Alphabets adopted for the Translations of the Sacred Books of the East	553
---	-----

INTRODUCTION.

I finished the Preface to the first volume of my translation of the Hymns to the Maruts with the following words :

‘ The second volume, which I am now preparing for Press, will contain the remaining hymns addressed to the Maruts. The notes will necessarily have to be reduced to smaller dimensions, but they must always constitute the more important part in a translation or, more truly, in a deciphering of Vedic hymns.’

This was written more than twenty years ago, but though since that time Vedic scholarship has advanced with giant steps, I still hold exactly the same opinion which I held then with regard to the principles that ought to be followed by the first translators of the Veda. I hold that they ought to be decipherers, and that they are bound to justify every word of their translation in exactly the same manner in which the decipherers of hieroglyphic or cuneiform inscriptions justify every step they take. I therefore called my translation the first traduction raisonnée. I took as an example which I tried to follow, though well aware of my inability to reach its excellence, the Commentaire sur le Yasna by my friend and teacher, Eugène Burnouf. Burnouf considered a commentary of 940 pages quarto as by no means excessive for a thorough interpretation of the first chapter of the Zoroastrian Veda, and only those unacquainted with the real difficulties of the Rig-veda would venture to say that its ancient words and thoughts required a less painstaking elucidation than those of the Avesta. In spite of all that has been said and written to the contrary, and with every wish to learn from those who think that the difficulties of a translation of Vedic hymns have been unduly exaggerated by me, I cannot in the least modify what I said twenty, or rather forty years ago, that a mere translation of the Veda, however accurate, intelligible, poetical, and even beautiful, is of absolutely no value for the advancement of Vedic scholarship, unless it is followed by pièces justificatives, that is, unless the translator gives his reasons why he has translated every word about which there can be any doubt, in his own way, and not in any other.

It is well known that Professor von Roth, one of our most eminent Vedic scholars, holds the very opposite opinion. He declares that a metrical translation is the best commentary, and that if he could ever think of a translation of the Rig-veda, he would throw the chief weight, not on the notes, but on the translation of the text. 'A translation,' he writes, 'must speak for itself. As a rule, it only requires a commentary where it is not directly convincing, and where the translator does not feel secure.'

Between opinions so diametrically opposed, no compromise seems possible, and yet I feel convinced that when we come to discuss any controverted passage, Professor von Roth will have to adopt exactly the same principles of translation which I have followed.

On one point, however, I am quite willing to agree with my adversaries, namely, that a metrical rendering would convey a truer idea of the hymns of the Vedic R̥shis than a prose rendering. When I had to translate Vedic hymns into German, I have generally, if not always, endeavoured to clothe them in a metrical form. In English I feel unable to do so, but I have no doubt that future scholars will find it possible to add rhythm and even rhyme, after the true meaning of the ancient verses has once been determined. But even with regard to my German metrical translations, I feel in honesty bound to confess that a metrical translation is often an excuse only for an inaccurate translation. If we could make sure of a translator like Rückert, even the impossible might become possible. But as there are few, if any, who, like him, are great alike as scholars and poets, the mere scholar seems to me to be doing his duty better when he produces a correct translation, though in prose, than if he has to make any concessions, however small, on the side of faithfulness in favour of rhythm and rhyme.

If a metrical, an intelligible, and, generally speaking, a beautiful translation were all we wanted, why should so many scholars clamour for a new translation, when they have that by Grassmann? It rests on Böhlingk and Roth's Dictionary, or represents, as we are told, even a more advanced stage of Vedic scholarship. Yet after the well-known contributors of certain critical Journals had repeated ever so many times all that could possibly be said in praise of Grassmann's, and in dispraise of Ludwig's translation, what is the result? Grassmann's metrical translation, the merits of which, considering the time when it was published, I have never been loth to acknowledge, is hardly ever appealed to, while Ludwig's prose rendering, with all its drawbacks, is universally considered as the only scholarlike translation of the Rig-veda now in existence. Time tries the troth in everything.

There is another point also on which I am quite willing to admit that my adversaries are right. 'No one who knows anything about the Veda,' they say, 'would think of attempting a translation of it at present. A translation of the Rig-veda is a task for the next century.' No one feels this more strongly than I do; no one has been more unwilling to make even a beginning in this arduous undertaking. Yet a beginning has to be made. We have to advance step by step, nay, inch by inch, if we ever hope to make a breach in that apparently impregnable fortress. If by translation we mean a complete, satisfactory, and final translation of the whole of the Rig-veda, I should feel inclined to go even further than Professor von Roth. Not only shall we have to wait till the next century for such a work, but I doubt whether we shall ever obtain it. In some cases the text is so corrupt that no conjectural criticism will restore, no power of divination interpret it. In other cases, verses and phrases seem to have been jumbled together by later writers in the most thoughtless manner. My principle therefore has always been, Let us translate what we can, and thus reduce the untranslatable portion to narrower and narrower limits. But in doing this we ought not to be too proud to take our friends, and even our adversaries, into our confidence. A translation on the sic volo sic jubeo principle does far more harm than good. It may be true that a judge, if he is wise, will deliver his judgment, but never propound his reasons. But a scholar is a pleader rather than a judge, and he is in duty bound to propound his reasons.

In order to make the difference between Professor von Roth's translations and my own quite clear, I readily accept the text which he has himself chosen. He took one of the hymns which I had translated with notes (the 165th hymn of the first Mandala), and translated it himself metrically, in order to show us what, according to him, a really perfect translation ought to be*. Let us then compare the results.

On many points Professor von Roth adopts the same renderings which I had adopted, only that he gives no reasons, while I do so, at least for all debatable passages. First of all, I had tried to prove that the two verses in the beginning, which the Anukramanî ascribes to Indra, should be ascribed to the poet. Professor von Roth takes the same view, but for the rest of the hymn adopts, like myself, that distribution of the verses among the singer, the Maruts, and Indra which the Anukramanî suggests. I mention this because Ludwig has defended the view of the author of the Anukramanî with very strong arguments. He quotes from the Taitt. Br. II, 7, 11, and from the Tândya Br. XXI, 14, 5, the old legend that Agastya made offerings to the Maruts, that, with or without Agastya's consent, Indra seized them, and that the Maruts then tried to frighten Indra away with lightning. Agastya and Indra, however, pacified the Maruts with this very hymn.

Verse 1.

The first verse von Roth translates as follows :

‘Auf welcher Fahrt sind insgemein begriffen Die altersgleichen mitgebornen Marut?
Was wollen sie? woher des Wegs? Das Pfeifen
Der Männer klingt: sie haben ein Begehren.’

* Z. D. M. G., 1870, XXIV, p. 301.

Von Roth here translates subh by Fahrt, journey. But does subh ever possess that meaning? Von Roth himself in the Dictionary translates subh by Schönheit, Schmuck, Bereitschaft. Grassmann, otherwise a strict adherent of von Roth, does not venture even to give Bereitschaft, but only endorses Glanz and Pracht. Ludwig, a higher authority than Grassmann, translates subh by Glanz. I say then that to translate subh by Fahrt, journey, may be poetical, but it is not scholarlike. On the meanings of subh I have treated I, 87, 3, note 2. See also Gaedicke, Accusativ, p. 163.

But there comes another consideration. That mimikshire is used in the sense of being joined with splendour, &c. we see from such passages as I, 87, 6, bhānū-bhiḥ sám mimikshire, i. e. 'they were joined with splendour,' and this is said, as in our passage, of the Maruts. Prof. von Roth brings forward no passage where mimikshire is used in the sense in which he uses it here, and therefore I say again, his rendering may be poetical, but it is not scholarlike.

To translate arḥanti śuśhmam by 'das Pfeifen klingt,' is, to say the least, very free. Sushma comes, no doubt, from svas, to breathe, and the transition of meaning from breath to strength is intelligible enough. In the Psalms we read (xviii. 15), 'At the blast of the breath of thy nostrils the channels of waters were seen, and the foundations of the earth were discovered.' Again (Job iv. 9), 'By the blast of God they perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed;' Isaiah xi. 4, 'And with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked.' Wrestlers know why breath or wind means strength, and even in the expression 'une œuvre de longue haleine,' the original intention of breath is still perceived. In most passages therefore in the Rig-veda where sushma occurs, and where it means strength, prowess, vigour, we may, if we like, translate it by breath, though it is clear that the poet himself was not always aware of the etymological meaning of the word. Where the sound of sushma is mentioned (IX, 50, 1; X, 3, 6, &c.), it means clearly breath. But when, as in VI, 19, 8, sushma has the adjectives dhanaspr̥t, sudáksha, we can hardly translate it by anything but strength. When, therefore, von Roth translates sushma by whistling, and arkanti by sounding, I must demur. Whistling is different from breathing, nor do I know of any passage where ark with sushma or with any similar word for sound means simply to sound a whistle. Why not translate, they sing their strength, i.e. the Maruts, by their breathing or howling, proclaim themselves their strength? We find a similar idea in I, 87, 3, 'the Maruts have themselves glorified their greatness.' Neither Grassmann nor Ludwig venture to take sushma in the sense of whistle, or arkanti in the sense of sounding. Bergaigne seems to take vrishanaḥ as a genitive, referring to Indra, 'ils chantent la force à Indra,' which may have been the original meaning, but seems hardly appropriate when the verse is placed in the mouth of Indra himself (Journ. Asiat. 1884, p. 199). Sushma never occurs as an adjective. The passages in which von Roth admits sushma as an adjective are not adequate. Does mitgeboren in German convey the meaning of sániḥ, 'of the same nest?'

Verse 2.

The second verse contains few difficulties, and is well rendered by von Roth :

'An wessen Sprüchen freuen sich die Jungen?
Wer lenkt die Marut her zu seinem Opfer?
Gleich Falken streichend durch den Raum der Lüfte—
Wie bringt man sie mit Wunscheskraft zum Stehen?'

Verse 3.

The third verse is rendered by von Roth :

'Wie kommt es, Indra, dass du sonst so munter,
Heut' ganz alleine fährst, sag an Gebieter!
Du pflegtest auf der Fahrt mit uns zu plaudern;
Was hast du wider uns, sprich, Rosselenker!'

Von Roth takes kútaḥ in a causal sense, why? I believe that kútaḥ never occurs in that sense in the Rig-veda. If it does, passages should be produced to prove it.

Māhinaḥ can never be translated by 'sonst so munter.' This imparts a modern idea which is not in the original.

Subhāna*h* does not mean auf der Fahrt, and plaudern, adopted from Grassmann, instead of sám prikkhase, introduces again quite a modern idea. Ludwig calls such an idea 'abgeschmackt,' insipid, which is rather strong, but not far wrong.

Verse 4.

Von Roth :

'Ich liebe Sprüche, Wünsche und die Tränke,
Der Duft steigt auf, die Presse ist gerüstet;
Sie flehen, locken mich mit ihrem Anruf,
Und meine Füchse führen mich zum Mahle.'

It is curious how quickly all difficulties which beset the first line seem to vanish in a metrical translation, but the scholar should face the difficulties, though the poet may evade them.

To translate súshma*h* iyarti by 'der Duft steigt auf,' the flavour of the sacrifices rises up, is more than even Grassmann ventures on. It is simply impossible. Benfey (Entstehung der mit r anlautenden Personalendungen, p. 34) translates: 'My thunderbolt, when hurled by me, moves mightily.'

Again, prábhrita*h* me ádri*h* does not mean die Presse ist gerüstet. Where does Indra ever speak of the stones used for pressing the Soma as my stone, and where does prábhrita*h* ever mean gerüstet?

Verse 5.

Von Roth :

'So werden wir und mit uns unsre Freunde (Nachbarn),
Die freien Männer, unsre Rüstung nehmen,
Und lustig unsre Schecken alsbald schirren.
Du kommst uns eben ganz nach Wunsch, o Indra.'

The first lines are unnecessarily free, and the last decidedly wrong. How can svadhām ánu hí na*h* babhútha mean 'Du kommst uns eben ganz nach Wunsch?' Svadhâ does not mean wish, but nature, custom, wont (see I, 6, 4, note 2; and Bergaigne, Journ. Asiat. 1884, p. 207). Babhútha means 'thou hast become,' not 'thou comest.'

Verse 6.

Von Roth :

‘Da war’s auch nicht so ganz nach Wunsch, o Maruts,
Als ihr allein mich gegen Ahi schicktet!

Ich aber kräftig, tapfer, unerschrocken,

Ich traf die Gegner alle mit Geschossen.’

The only doubtful line is the last. Von Roth’s former translation of nam, to bend away from, to escape from (cf. φεύγω and bhug), seems to me still the right one. He now translates ‘I directed my arrow on every enemy,’ when the genitive, as ruled by ánamam, requires confirmation. As to sam ádhatta I certainly think von Roth’s last interpretation better than his first. In the Dictionary he explained samdhâ in our passage by to implicate. Grassmann translated it by to leave or to desert, Ludwig by to employ. I took it formerly in the usual sense of joining, so that yát mām ékam samádhatta should be the explanation of svadhâ, the old custom that you should join me when I am alone. But the construction is against this, and I have therefore altered my translation, so that the sense is, Where was that old custom you speak of, when you made me to be alone, i. e. when you left me alone, in the fight with Ahi? The udâtta of ánamam is not irregular, because it is preceded by hi.

Verse 7.

Von Roth :

‘Gewaltiges hast du gethan im Bunde

Mit uns, o Held, wir mit vereinter Stärke,

Gewaltiges vermögen wir, du mächtiger

Indra, wenn es uns Ernst ist, ihr Gesellen.’

By this translation, the contrast between ‘thou hast done great things with us,’ and ‘Now let us do great things once more,’ is lost. Kṛinávâma expresses an exhortation, not a simple fact, and on this point Grassmann’s metrical translation is decidedly preferable.

Verse 8.

Von Roth :

‘Vṛitra schlug ich mit eigener Kraft, ihr Marut,

Und meine Wuth war’s, die so kühn mich machte,

Ich war's, der—in der Faust den Blitz—dem Menschen
Den Zugang bahnte zu den blinkenden Gewässern.'

This is a very good translation, except that there are some syllables too much in the last line. What I miss is the accent on the I. Perhaps this might become stronger by translating :

'Ich schlug mit eigner Kraft den Vṛitra nieder,
Ich, Maruts, stark durch meinen Zorn geworden ;
Ich war's, der blitzbewaffnet für den Menschen Dem lichten Wasser freie Bahn geschaffen.'

Verse 9.

Von Roth :

'Gewiss, nichts ist was je dir widerstünde,
Und so wie du gibts keinen zweiten Gott mehr,
Nicht jetzt, noch künftig, der was du vermöchte :
Thu' denn begeistert was zu thun dich lüset.'

Here I doubt about begeistert being a true rendering of pravṛiddha, grown strong. As to karishyāh instead of karishyā, the reading of the MSS., Roth is inclined to adopt my conjecture, as supported by the analogous passage in IV, 30, 23. The form which Ludwig quotes as analogous to karishyam, namely, pravatsyam, I cannot find, unless it is meant for Āpast. Srauta S. VI, 27, 2, namo vo-stu prāvātsyam iti Bahvrikāh, where however prāvātsyam is probably meant for prāvātsam.

Grassmann has understood devātā rightly, while Roth's translation leaves it doubtful.

Verse 10.

Von Roth :

'So soll der Stärke Vorrang mir allein sein :
Was ich gewagt, vollführ' ich mit Verständniss.
Man kennt mich als den Starken wohl, ihr Marut,
An was ich rühre, Indra der bemeistert's.'

Von Roth has adopted the translation of the second line, which I suggested in a note ; Ludwig prefers the more abrupt construction which I preferred in the translation. It is difficult to decide.

Verse 11.

Von Roth :

‘Entzückt hat euer Rühmen mich, ihr Marut,
Das lobenswerthe Wort, das ihr gesprochen,
Für mich—den Indra—für den freud’gen Helden,
Als Freunde für den Freund, für mich—von selbst ihr.’

The last words für mich—von selbst ihr are not very clear, but the same may be said of the original tanvê tanûbhih. I still adhere to my remark that tanu, self, must refer to the same person, though I see that all other translators take an opposite view. Non liquet.

Verse 12.

Von Roth :

‘Gefallen find ich, wie sie sind, an ihnen,
In Raschheit und in Frische unvergleichlich.
So oft ich euch, Marut, im Schmuck erblickte, Erfreut’ ich mich und freue jetzt an euch mich.’

This is again one of those verses which it is far easier to translate than to construe. Ākkhānta me may mean, they pleased me, but then what is the meaning of kṛadāyātha kṛa nūnām, ‘may you please me now,’ instead of what we should expect, ‘you do please me now.’ In order to avoid this, I took the more frequent meaning of kṛad, to appear, and translated, ‘you have appeared formerly, appear to me now.’

To translate ānedyāḥ srāvaḥ ā śhaḥ dādhanāḥ, by ‘in Raschheit und in Frische unvergleichlich,’ is poetical, but how does it benefit the scholar? I take ā dhā in the sense of bringing or giving, as it is often used; cf. II, 38, 5. This is more compatible with śhaḥ, food, vigour. I am not certain that ānēdyāḥ can mean blameless. Roth s. v. derives ānedyā from a-nedya, and nedya from nid. But how we get from nid to nedya, he does not say. He suggests anedyāḥ or anedyasravaḥ as emendations. I suggested anedyam. But I suspect there is something else behind all this. Anedīyaḥ may have been intended for ‘having nothing coming nearer,’ and like an-uttama, might express excellence. Or anedyāḥ may have been an adverb, not nearly.

These are mere guesses, and they are rather contradicted by anedyāḥ, used in the plural, with anavadyāḥ. Still it is better to point out difficulties than to slur them over by translating 'in Raschheit und in Frische unvergleichlich.' It is possible that both Roth and Sāyana thought that anedyāḥ was connected with nediyāḥ; but what scholars want to know is the exact construction of a sentence.

Verse 13.

Von Roth :

'Ist irgendwo ein Fest für euch bereitet,
So fahrt doch her zu unsrer Schaar, ihr Schaaren!
Der Andacht Regungen in uns belebend,
Und werdet Zeugen unserer frommen Werke.'

In this verse there is no difficulty, except the exact meaning of apivâtáyantaḥ, on which I have spoken in note 1.

Verse 14.

Von Roth :

'Wo dankbar huldigend der Dichter lobsingt,
Hier wo uns Mānya's Kunst zusammenführte,
Da kehret ein, ihr Marut, bei den Frommen,
Euch gelten ja des Beters heil'ge Sprüche.'

Prof. von Roth admits that this is a difficult verse. He translates it, but again he does not help us to construe it. Grassmann also gives us a metrical translation, but it differs widely from von Roth's :

'Wenn wie zur Spende euch der Dichter herlockt, Und der Gesang des Weisen uns herbeizog,' &c. ;
and so does Geldner's version, unless we are to consider this as an improved rendering from von Roth's own pen :

'Wenn uns des Mānya Kunst zur Feier herzieht, Wie Dichter ja zu Festen gerne rufen,' &c.

Here Geldner conjectures duvasyā for duvasyāt, and takes duváse as an infinitive.

Verse 15.

Von Roth :

'Geweih't ist euch der Preis, Marut, die Lieder,
Des Mānya, des Mandârasohns, des Dichters,
Mit Labung kommt herbei, mir selbst zur Stärkung [Geb't Labung uns und wasserreiche Fluren].'

How tanvê vayām is to mean 'mir selbst zur Stärkung' has not been explained by von Roth. No doubt tanvê may mean mir selbst, and vayām zur Stärkung; but though this may satisfy a poet, scholars want to know how to construe. It seems to me that Roth and Lanman (Noun-inflection, p. 552) have made the same mistake which I made in taking ishām for an accusative of ish, which ought to be ísham, and in admitting the masculine gender for vrigána in the sense of Flur.

I still take yásishṭa for the 3 p. sing. of the precative Ātmanepada, like ganishishṭa and vanishishṭa. With the preposition áva, yásishṭhāh in IV, 1, 4, means to turn away. With the preposition á therefore yásishṭa may well mean to turn towards, to bring. If we took yásishṭa as a 2 p. plur. in the sense of come, we could not account for the long î, nor for the accusative vayām. We thus get the meaning, 'May this your hymn of praise bring vayām,' i. e. a branch, an offshoot or offspring, tanvê, for ourselves, ishá, together with food. We then begin a new sentence: 'May we find an invigorating autumn with quickening rain.' It is true that ishá, as a name of an autumn month, does not occur again in the Rig-veda, but it is found in the Satapatha-bráhmaṇa. Vrigána, possibly in the sense of people or enemies, we have in VII, 32, 27, ágñâtāh vrigánāh, where Roth reads wrongly ágñâtā vrigánā; V, 44, 1 (?); VI, 35, 5. Gírádānu also would be an appropriate epithet to ishá.

Professor Oldenberg has sent me the following notes on this difficult hymn. He thinks it is what he calls an Ākhyāna-hymn, consisting of verses which originally formed part of a story in prose. He has treated of this class of hymns in the Zeitschrift der D. M. G. XXXIX, 60 seq. He would prefer to ascribe verses 1 and 2 to Indra, who addresses the Maruts when he meets them as they return from a sacrifice. In this case, however, we should have to accept rīramāma as a pluralis majestaticus, and I doubt whether Indra ever speaks of himself in the plural, except it may be in using the pronoun naḥ.

In verse 4 Professor Oldenberg prefers to take prá- bhr̥ito me ádrih̥ in the sense of 'the stone for pressing the Soma has been brought forth,' and he adds that me need not mean 'my stone,' but 'brought forward for me.' He would prefer to read śúshma m iyarti, as in IV, 17, 12; X, 75, 3, though he does not consider this alteration of the text necessary.

Professor Oldenberg would ascribe vv. 13 and 14 to Indra. The 14th verse would then mean, 'After Mānya has brought us (the gods) hither, turn, O Maruts, towards the sage.' Of this interpretation I should like to adopt at all events the last sentence, taking varta for vart-ta, the 2 p. plur. imperat. of vr̥it, after the Ad class.

The text of the Maitrāyaṇī Samhitā, lately published by Dr. L. von Schröder, yields a few interesting various readings: v. 5, ekam instead of etāñ; v. 12, śravā instead of śrava; and v. 15, vayāmsi as a variant for vayām, which looks like a conjectural emendation.

A comparison like the one we have here instituted between two translations of the same hymn, will serve to show how useless any rendering, whether in prose or poetry, would be without notes to justify the meanings of every doubtful word and sentence. It will, no doubt, disclose at the same time the unsettled state of Vedic scholarship, but the more fully this fact is acknowledged, the better, I believe, it will be for the progress of our studies. They have suffered more than from anything else from that baneful positivism which has done so much harm in hieroglyphic and cuneiform researches. That the same words and names should be interpreted differently from year to year, is perfectly intelligible to every one who is familiar with the nature of these decipherments. What has seriously injured the credit of these studies is that the latest decipherments have always been represented as final and unchangeable. Vedic hymns may seem more easy to decipher than Babylonian and Egyptian inscriptions, and in one sense they are. But when we come to really difficult passages, the Vedic hymns often require a far greater effort of divination than the hymns addressed to Egyptian or Babylonian deities. And there is this additional difficulty that when we deal with inscriptions, we have at all events the text as it was engraved from the first, and we are safe against later modifications and interpolations, while in the case of the Veda, even though the text as presupposed by the Prâtisākhya may be considered as authoritative for the fifth century B.C., how do we know what changes it may have undergone before that time? Nor can I help giving expression once more to misgivings I have so often expressed, whether the date of the Prâtisākhya is really beyond the reach of doubt, and whether, if it is, there is no other way of escaping from the conclusion that the whole collection of the hymns of the Rig-veda, including even the Vāḷakhilya hymns, existed at that early time^a. The more I study the hymns, the more I feel staggered at the conclusion at which all Sanskrit scholars seem to have arrived, touching their age. That many of them are old, older than anything else in Sanskrit, their grammar, if nothing else, proclaims in the clearest way. But that some of them are modern imitations is a conviction that forces itself even on the least sceptical minds. Here too we must guard against positivism, and suspend our judgment, and accept correction with a teachable spirit. No one would be more grateful for a way out of the maze of Vedic chronology than I should be, if a more modern date could be assigned to some of the Vedic hymns than the period of the rise of Buddhism. But how can we account for Buddhism without Vedic hymns? In the oldest Buddhist Suttas the hymns of three Vedas are constantly referred to, and warnings are uttered even against the fourth Veda, the Āthabbana^b. The Upanishads also, the latest productions of the Brāhmaṇa period, must have been known to the founders of Buddhism. From all this there seems to be no escape, and yet I must confess that my conscience quivers in assigning such compositions as the Vāḷakhilya hymns to a period preceding the rise of Buddhism in India.

^a See Preface to the first edition, p. xxxii.

^b Tuvaśakasutta, ver. 927; Sacred Books of the East, vol. x, p. 176; Introduction, p. xiii.

I have often been asked why I began my translation of the Rig-veda with the hymns addressed to the Maruts or the Storm-gods, which are certainly not the most attractive of Vedic hymns. I had several reasons, though, as often happens, I could hardly say which of them determined my choice.

First of all, they are the most difficult hymns, and therefore they had a peculiar attraction in my eyes.

Secondly, as even when translated they required a considerable effort before they could be fully understood, I hoped they would prove attractive to serious students only, and frighten away the casual reader who has done so much harm by meddling with Vedic antiquities. Our grapes, I am glad to say, are still sour, and ought to remain so for some time longer.

Thirdly, there are few hymns which place the original character of the so-called deities to whom they are addressed in so clear a light as the hymns addressed to the Maruts or Storm-gods. There can be no doubt about the meaning of the name, whatever difference of opinion there may be about its etymology. Marut and maruta in ordinary Sanskrit mean wind, and more particularly a strong wind, differing by its violent character from vāyu or vāta ^a. Nor do the hymns themselves leave us in any doubt as to the natural phenomena with which the Maruts are identified. Storms which root up the trees of the forest, lightning, thunder, and showers of rain, are the background from which the Maruts in their personal and dramatic character rise before our eyes. In one verse the Maruts are the very phenomena of nature as convulsed by a thunderstorm; in the next, with the slightest change of expression, they are young men, driving on chariots, hurling the thunderbolt, and crushing the clouds in order to win the rain. Now they are the sons of Rudra and Prisni, the friends and brothers of Indra, now they quarrel with Indra and claim their own rightful share of praise and sacrifice. Nay, after a time the storm-gods in India, like the storm-gods in other countries, obtain a kind of supremacy, and are invoked by themselves, as if there were no other gods beside them. In most of the later native dictionaries, in the Medinî, Viśva, Hemaṅdra, Amara, and Anekārthadhvanimañgarî, Marut is given as a synonym of deva, or god in general^a, and so is Maru in Pāli.

^a The Vāyus are mentioned by the side of the Maruts, Rv. II, 11, 14.

But while the hymns addressed to the Maruts enable us to watch the successive stages in the development of so-called deities more clearly than any other hymns, there is no doubt one drawback, namely, the uncertainty of the etymology of Marut. The etymology of the name is and always must be the best key to the original intention of a deity. Whatever Zeus became afterwards, he was originally conceived as Dyaus, the bright sky. Whatever changes came over Ceres in later times, her first name and her first conception was Sarad, harvest. With regard to Marut I have myself no doubt whatever that Mar-ut comes from the root MṚ, in the sense of grinding, crushing, pounding (Sk. mṛināti, himsāyām, part. mūrṇa, crushed, like mṛidita; āmúr and āmúri, destroyer). There is no objection to this etymology, either on the ground of phonetic rules, or on account of the meaning of Marut^b. Professor Kuhn's idea that the name of the Maruts was derived from the root MṚ, to die, and that the Maruts were originally conceived as the souls of the departed, and afterwards as ghosts, spirits, winds, and lastly as storms, derives no support from the Veda. Another etymology, proposed in Böhtlingk's Dictionary, which derives Marut from a root MṚ, to shine, labours under two disadvantages; first, that there is no such root in Sanskrit^c; secondly, that the lurid splendour of the lighting is but a subordinate feature in the character of the Maruts. No better etymology having been proposed, I still maintain that the derivation of Marut from MṚ, to pound, to smash, is free from any objection, and that the original conception of the Maruts was that of the crushing, smashing, striking, tearing, destroying storms.

^a Anundoram Borooah, Sanskrit Grammar, vol. iii, p. 323.

^b See Lectures on the Science of Language, vol. ii, p. 357 seq.

^c Marúti is a word of very doubtful origin.

It is true that we have only two words in Sanskrit formed by the suffix ut, marút and garút in garút-mat, but there are other suffixes which are equally restricted to one or two nouns only. This ut represents an old suffix vat, just as us presupposes vas, in vidus (vidushî, vidush-tara) for vid-vas, nom. vid-vân, acc. vidvâmsam. In a similar way we find side by side párus, knot, párvan, knot, and párvata, stone, cloud, presupposing such forms as parvat* and parut. If then by the side of parut*, we find Latin pars, partis, why should we object to Mars, Martis as a parallel form of Marut? I do not say the two words are identical, I only maintain that the root is the same, and the two suffixes are mere variants. No doubt Marut might have appeared in Latin as Marut, like the neuter cap-ut, capitis (cf. prae-ceps, prae-cipis, and prae-cipitis); but Mars, Martis is as good a derivation from MĀ as Fors, Fortis is from *GHĀ. Dr. von Bradke (Zeitschrift der D.M.G., vol. xl, p. 349), though identifying Marut with Mars, proposes a new derivation of Marut, as being originally Mavrit*, which would correspond well with Mavors. But Mavrit* has no meaning in Sanskrit, and seems grammatically an impossible formation.

If there could be any doubt as to the original identity of Marut and Mars, it is dispelled by the Umbrian name çerfo Martio, which, as Grassmann^b has shown, corresponds exactly to the expression sárdha-s māruta-s, the host of the Maruts. Such minute coincidences can hardly be accidental, though, as I have myself often remarked, the chapter of accidents in language is certainly larger than we suppose. Thus, in our case, I pointed out that we can observe the transition of the gods of storms into the gods of destruction and war, not only in the Veda, but likewise in the mythology of the Polynesians; and yet the similarity in the Polynesian name of Maru can only be accidental^c.

* Biographies of Words, p. 12.

^b Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xvi, p. 190; and note to Rv. I, 37, 1, p. 70.

^c M. M., Science of Religion, p. 255.

And I may add that in Estonian also we find storm-gods called Marutu uled or maro, plural marud^a.

Fourthly, the hymns addressed to the Maruts seemed to me to possess an interest of their own, because, as it is difficult to doubt the identity of the two names, Marut and Mars, they offered an excellent opportunity for watching the peculiar changes which the same deity would undergo when transferred to India on one side and to Europe on the other. Whether the Greek Ares also was an offshoot of the same root must seem more doubtful, and I contented myself with giving the principal reasons for and against this theory^b.

Though these inducements which led me to select the hymns to the Maruts as the first instalment of a translation of the Rig-veda could hardly prevail with me now, yet I was obliged to place them once more in the foreground, because the volume containing the translation of these hymns with very full notes has been used for many years as a text book by those who were beginning the study of the Rig-veda, and was out of print. In order to meet the demand for a book which could serve as an easy introduction to Vedic studies, I decided to reprint the translation of the hymns to the Maruts, and most of the notes, though here and there somewhat abbreviated, and then to continue the same hymns, followed by others addressed to Rudra, Vāyu, and Vāta. My task would, of course, have been much easier, if I had been satisfied with making a selection, and translating those hymns, or those verses only, which afford no very great difficulties. As it is, I have grappled with every hymn and every verse addressed to the Maruts, so that my readers will find in this volume all that the Vedic poets had to say about the Storm-gods.

In order to show, however, that Vedic hymns, though they begin with a description of the most striking phenomena of nature, are by no means confined to that narrow sphere, but rise in the end to the most sublime conception of a supreme Deity, I have placed one hymn, that addressed to the Unknown God, at the head of my collection. This will clear me, I hope, of the very unfair suspicion that, by beginning my translation of the Rig-veda with hymns celebrating the wild forces of nature only, I had wished to represent the Vedic religion as nature-worship and nothing else. It will give the thoughtful reader a foretaste of what he may expect in the end, and show how vast a sphere of religious thought is filled by what we call by a very promiscuous name, the Veda.

^a Bertram, Ilmatar, Dorpat, 1871, p. 98.

^b Lectures on the Science of Language, vol. ii, p. 357.

The MS. of this volume was ready, and the printing of it was actually begun in 1885. A succession of new calls on my time, which admitted of no refusal, have delayed the actual publication till now. This delay, however, has been compensated by one very great advantage. Beginning with hymn 167 of the first Mandala, Professor Oldenberg has, in the most generous spirit, lent me his help in the final revision of my translation and notes. It is chiefly due to him that the results of the latest attempts at the interpretation of the Veda, which are scattered about in learned articles and monographs, have been utilised for this volume. His suggestions, I need hardly say, have proved most valuable; and though he should not be held responsible for any mistakes that may be discovered, whether in the translation or in the notes, my readers may at all events take it for granted that, where my translation seems unsatisfactory, Professor Oldenberg also had nothing better to suggest.

Considering my advancing years, I thought I should act in the true interest of Vedic scholarship, if for the future also I divided my work with him. While for this volume the chief responsibility rests with me, the second volume will contain the hymns to Agni, as translated and annotated by him, and revised by me. In places where we really differ, we shall say so. For the rest, we are willing to share both blame and praise. Our chief object is to help forward a critical study of the Veda, and we are well aware that much of what has been done and can be done in the present state of Vedic scholarship, is only a kind of reconnaissance, if not a forlorn hope, to be followed hereafter by a patient siege of the hitherto impregnable fortress of ancient Vedic literature.

F. MAX MÜLLER.

OXFORD :
6th Dec. 1891.

PREFACE

TO THE FIRST EDITION.

WHEN some twenty years ago I decided on undertaking the first edition of the two texts and the commentary of the Rig-veda, I little expected that it would fall to my lot to publish also what may, without presumption, be called the first translation of the ancient sacred hymns of the Brahmans. Such is the charm of deciphering step by step the dark and helpless utterances of the early poets of India, and discovering from time to time behind words that for years seemed unintelligible, the simple though strange expressions of primitive thought and primitive faith, that it required no small amount of self-denial to decide in favour of devoting a life to the publishing of the materials rather than to the drawing of the results which those materials supply to the student of ancient language and ancient religion. Even five and twenty years ago, and without waiting for the publication of Sâyaṇa's commentary, much might have been achieved in the interpretation of the hymns of the Rig-veda. With the MSS. then accessible in the principal libraries of Europe, a tolerably correct text of the Samhitâ might have been published, and these ancient relics of a primitive religion might have been at least partially deciphered and translated in the same way in which ancient inscriptions are deciphered and translated, viz. by a careful collection of all grammatical forms, and by a complete intercomparison of all passages in which the same words and the same phrases occur. When I resolved to devote my leisure to a critical edition of the text and commentary of the Rig-veda rather than to an independent study of that text, it was chiefly from a conviction that the traditional interpretation of the Rig-veda, as embodied in the commentary of Sâyaṇa and other works of a similar character, could not be neglected with impunity, and that sooner or later a complete edition of these works would be recognised as a necessity. It was better therefore to begin with the beginning, though it seemed hard sometimes to spend forty years in the wilderness instead of rushing straight into the promised land.

What a translation of the Rig-veda ought to be.

It is well known to those who have followed my literary publications that I never entertained any exaggerated opinion as to the value of the traditional interpretation of the Veda, handed down in the theological schools of India, and preserved to us in the great commentary of Sâyaṇa. More than twenty years ago, when it required more courage to speak out than now, I expressed my opinion on that subject in no ambiguous language, and was blamed for it by some of those who now speak of Sâyaṇa as a mere drag in the progress of Vedic scholarship. Even a drag, however, is sometimes more conducive to the safe advancement of learning than a whip; and those who recollect the history of Vedic scholarship during the last five and twenty years, know best that, with all its faults and weaknesses, Sâyaṇa's commentary was a sine quâ non for a scholarlike study of the Rig-veda. I do not wonder that others who have more recently entered on that study are inclined to speak disparagingly of the scholastic interpretations of Sâyaṇa. They hardly know how much we all owe to his guidance in effecting our first entrance into this fortress of Vedic language and Vedic religion, and how much even they, without being aware of it, are indebted to that Indian Eustathius. I do not withdraw an opinion which I expressed many years ago, and for which I was much blamed at the time, that Sâyaṇa in many cases teaches us how the Veda ought not to be, rather than how it ought to be understood. But for all that, who does not know how much assistance may be derived from a first translation, even though it is imperfect, nay, how often the very mistakes of our predecessors help us in finding the right track? If now we can walk without Sâyaṇa, we ought to bear in mind that five and twenty years ago we could not have made even our first steps, we could never, at least, have gained a firm footing without his leading strings. If therefore we can now see further than he could, let us not forget that we are standing on his shoulders.

I do not regret in the least the time which I have devoted to the somewhat tedious work of editing the commentary of Sāyana, and editing it according to the strictest rules of critical scholarship. The Veda, I feel convinced, will occupy scholars for centuries to come, and will take and maintain for ever its position as the most ancient of books in the library of mankind. Such a book, and the commentary of such a book, should be edited once for all; and unless some unexpected discovery is made of more ancient MSS., I do not anticipate that any future Bekker or Dindorf will find much to glean for a new edition of Sāyana, or that the text, as restored by me from a collation of the best MSS. accessible in Europe, will ever be materially shaken*. It has taken a long time, I know; but those who find fault with me for the delay, should remember that few

* Since the publication of the first volume of the Rig-veda, many new MSS. have come before me, partly copied for me, partly lent to me for a time by scholars in India, but every one of them belonged clearly to one of the three families which I have described in my introduction to the first volume of the Rig-veda. In the beginning of the first Ashṭaka, and occasionally at the beginning of other Ashṭakas, likewise in the commentary on hymns which were studied by native scholars with particular interest, various readings occur in some MSS., which seem at first to betoken an independent source, but which are in reality mere marginal notes, due to more or less learned students of these MSS. Thus after verse 3 of the introduction one MS. reads: sa prāha nṛpatiṃ, rājan, sāyanāryo mamānugaḥ, sarvaṃ vetty esha vedānāṃ vyākhyātrītena, yugyatām. The same MS., after verse 4, adds: ityukto mādhavāryeṇa vīrabukkamahāpatiḥ, anvarāt sāyanātārāyaṃ vedārthasya prakāśane.

I had for a time some hope that MSS. written in Grantha or other South-Indian alphabets might have preserved an independent text of Sāyana, but from some specimens of a Grantha MS. collated for me by Mr. Eggeling, I do not think that even this hope is meant to be realised. The MS. in question contains a few independent various readings, such as are found in all MSS., and owe their origin clearly to the jottings of individual students. When at the end of verse 6, I found the independent reading, vyutpannas tāvatā sarvā riko vyākhyātum arhati, I expected that other various readings of the same character might follow. But after a few additions in the beginning, and those clearly taken from other parts of Sāyana's commentary, nothing of real importance could be gleaned from that MS. I may mention as more important specimens of marginal notes that, before the first punaḥ kīdrīsam, on page 44, line 24 (1st ed.), this MS. reads: athavā yagñasya devam iti sambandhaḥ, yagñasya prakāśakam ityārthaḥ, purohitam iti prithagvīśhanam. And again, page 44, line 26, scholars, if any, have worked for others more than I have done in copying and editing Sanskrit texts, and that after all one cannot give up the whole of one's life to the collation of Oriental MSS. and the correction of proof-sheets. The two concluding volumes have long been ready for Press, and as soon as I can find leisure, they too shall be printed and published *.

In now venturing to publish the first volume of my translation of the Rig-veda, I am fully aware that the fate which awaits it will be very different from that of my edition of the text and commentary. It is a mere contribution towards a better understanding of the Vedic hymns, and though I hope it may give in the main a right rendering of the sense of the Vedic poets, I feel convinced that on many points my translation is liable to correction, and will sooner or later be replaced by a more satisfactory one. It is difficult to explain to those who have not themselves worked at the Veda, how it is that, though we may understand almost every word, yet we find it so difficult to lay hold of a whole chain of connected thought, and to discover expressions that will not throw a wrong shade on the original features of the ancient words of the Veda. We have, on the one hand, to avoid giving to our translations too modern a character, or paraphrasing instead of translating; while, on the other, we cannot retain expressions which, if literally rendered in English or any modern tongue, would have an air of quaintness or absurdity totally foreign to the intention of the ancient poets. There are, as all Vedic scholars know, whole verses which, as yet, yield no sense whatever. There are words the meaning of before punaḥ kīdrīṣam, this MS. adds: athavā rītvigam rītvigvid (vad) yagñā-nirvāhakam hotāraṁ devānām āhvātāraṁ; tathā ratnadhātāmaṁ. In the same line, after ratnānām, we read ramanīyadhanānām vā, taken from page 46, line 2. Various readings like these, however, occur on the first sheets only, soon after the MS. follows the usual and recognised text. [This opinion has been considerably modified after a complete collation of this MS., made for me by Dr. Winternitz.] For the later Ashśakas, where all the MSS. are very deficient, and where an independent authority would be of real use, no Gantha MS. has as yet been discovered.

* They have since been printed, but the translation has in consequence been delayed.

which we can only guess. Here, no doubt, a continued study will remove some of our difficulties, and many a passage that is now dark, will receive light hereafter from a happy combination. Much has already been achieved by the efforts of European scholars, but much more remains to be done; and our only chance of seeing any rapid progress made lies, I believe, in communicating freely what every one has found out by himself, and not minding if others point out to us that we have overlooked the very passage that would at once have solved our difficulties, that our conjectures were unnecessary, and our emendations wrong. True and honest scholars whose conscience tells them that they have done their best, and who care for the subject on which they are engaged far more than for the praise of benevolent or the blame of malignant critics, ought not to take any notice of merely frivolous censure. There are mistakes, no doubt, of which we ought to be ashamed, and for which the only amende honorable we can make is to openly confess and retract them. But there are others, particularly in a subject like Vedic interpretation, which we should forgive, as we wish to be forgiven. This can be done without lowering the standard of true scholarship or vitiating the healthy tone of scientific morality. Kindness and gentleness are not incompatible with earnestness,—far from it!—and where these elements are wanting, not only is the joy embittered which is the inherent reward of all bonâ fide work, but selfishness, malignity, aye, even untruthfulness, gain the upper hand, and the healthy growth of science is stunted. While in my translation of the Veda and in the remarks that I have to make in the course of my commentary, I shall frequently differ from other scholars, I hope I shall never say an unkind word of men who have done their best, and who have done what they have done in a truly scholarlike, that is, in a humble spirit. It would be unpleasant, even were it possible within the limits assigned, to criticise every opinion that has been put forward on the meaning of certain words or on the construction of certain verses of the Veda. I prefer, as much as possible, to vindicate my own translation, instead of examining the translations of other scholars, whether Indian or European. Sâyana's translation, as rendered into English by Professor Wilson, is before the world. Let those who take an interest in these matters compare it with the translation here proposed. In order to give readers who do not possess that translation, an opportunity of comparing it with my own, I have for a few hymns printed that as well as the translations of Langlois and Benfey* on the same page with my own. Everybody will thus be enabled to judge of the peculiar character of each of these translations. That of Sâyana represents the tradition of India; that of Langlois is the ingenious, but thoroughly uncritical, guess-work of a man of taste; that of Benfey is the rendering of a scholar, who has carefully worked out the history of some words, but who assigns to other words either the traditional meaning recorded by Sâyana, or a conjectural meaning which, however, would not always stand the test of an inter-comparison of all passages in which these words occur. I may say, in general, that Sâyana's translation was of great use to me in the beginning, though it seldom afforded help for the really difficult passages. Langlois' translation has hardly ever yielded real assistance, while I sincerely regret that Benfey's rendering does not extend beyond the first Mandala.

It may sound self-contradictory, if, after confessing the help which I derived from these translations, I venture to call my own the first translation of the Rig-veda. The word translation, however, has many meanings. I mean by translation, not a mere rendering of the hymns of the Rig-veda into English, French, or German, but a full account of the reasons which justify the translator in assigning such a power to such a word, and such a meaning to such a sentence. I mean by translation a real deciphering, a work like that which Burnouf performed in his first attempts at a translation of the Avesta,—a traduction raisonnée, if such an expression may be used. Without such a process, without a running commentary, a mere translation of the ancient hymns of the Brahmans will never lead to any solid results. Even if the translator has discovered the right meaning of a word or of a whole sentence, his mere translation does not help us much, unless he shows us the process by which he has arrived at it, unless he places before us the pièces justificatives of his final judgment. The Veda teems with words that require a justification ; not so much the words which occur but once or twice, though many of these are difficult enough, but rather the common words and particles, which occur again and again, which we understand to a certain point, and can render in a vague way, but which must be defined before they can be translated, and before they can convey to us any real and tangible meaning. It was out of the question in a translation of this character to attempt either an imitation of the original rhythm or metre, or to introduce the totally foreign element of rhyming. Such translations may follow by and by : at present a metrical translation would only be an excuse for an inaccurate translation.

* In the new edition, Langlois' translation has been omitted, and those of Ludwig and Grassmann have been inserted occasionally only.

While engaged in collecting the evidence on which the meaning of every word and every sentence must be founded, I have derived the most important assistance from the Sanskrit Dictionary of Professors Böhtlingk and Roth, which has been in course of publication during the last sixteen years. The Vedic portion of that Dictionary may, I believe, be taken as the almost exclusive work of Professor Roth, and as such, for the sake of brevity, I shall treat it in my notes. It would be ungrateful were I not to acknowledge most fully the real benefit which this publication has conferred on every student of Sanskrit, and my only regret is that its publication has not proceeded more rapidly, so that even now years will elapse before we can hope to see it finished. But my sincere admiration for the work performed by the compilers of that Dictionary does not prevent me from differing, in many cases, from the explanations of Vedic words given by Professor Roth. If I do not always criticise Professor Roth's explanations when I differ from him, the reason is obvious. A dictionary without a full translation of each passage, or without a justification of the meanings assigned to each word, is only a preliminary step to a translation. It represents a first classification of the meanings of the same word in different passages, but it gives us no means of judging how, according to the opinion of the compiler, the meaning of each single word should be made to fit the general sense of a whole sentence. I do not say this in disparagement, for, in a dictionary, it can hardly be otherwise ; I only refer to it in order to explain the difficulty I felt whenever I differed from Professor Roth, and was yet unable to tell how the meaning assigned by him to certain words would be justified by the author of the Dictionary himself. On this ground I have throughout preferred to explain every step by which I arrived at my own renderings, rather than to write a running criticism of Professor Roth's Dictionary. My obligations to him I like to express thus once for all, by stating that whenever I found that I agreed with him, I felt greatly assured as to the soundness of my own rendering, while whenever I differed from him, I never did so without careful consideration.

The works, however, which I have hitherto mentioned, though the most important, are by no means the only ones that have been of use to me in preparing my translation of the Rig-veda. The numerous articles on certain hymns, verses, or single words occurring in the Rig-veda, published by Vedic scholars in Europe and India during the last thirty years, were read by me at the time of their publication, and have helped me to overcome difficulties, the very existence of which is now forgotten. If I go back still further, I feel that in grappling with the first and the greatest of difficulties in the study of the Veda, I and many others are more deeply indebted than it is possible to say, to one whose early loss has been one of the greatest misfortunes to Sanskrit scholarship. It was in Burnouf's lectures that we first learnt what the Veda was, and how it should form the foundation of all our studies. Not only did he most liberally communicate to his pupils his valuable MSS., and teach us how to use these tools, but the results of his own experience were freely placed at our service, we were warned against researches which he knew to be useless, we were encouraged in undertakings which he knew to be full of promise. His minute analysis of long passages of Sāyana, his independent interpretations of the text of the hymns, his comparisons between the words and grammatical forms, the thoughts and legends of the Veda and Avesta, his brilliant divination checked by an inexorable sense of truth, and his dry logical method enlivened by sallies of humour and sparks of imaginative genius, though not easily forgotten, and always remembered with gratitude, are now beyond the reach of praise or blame. Were I to criticise what he or other scholars have said and written many years ago, they might justly complain of such criticism. It is no longer necessary to prove that Nābhānedishṭha cannot mean 'new relatives,' or that there never was a race of Etendhras, or that the angels of the Bible are in no way connected with the Aṅgiras of the Vedic hymns; and it would, on the other hand, be a mere waste of time, were I to attempt to find out who first discovered that in the Veda deva does not always mean divine, but sometimes means brilliant. In fact, it could not be done.

In a new subject like that of the interpretation of the Veda, there are certain things which everybody discovers who has eyes to see. Their discovery requires so little research that it seems almost an insult to say that they were discovered by this or that scholar. Take, for instance, the peculiar pronunciation of certain words, rendered necessary by the requirements of Vedic metres. I believe that my learned friend Professor Kuhn was one of the first to call general attention to the fact that semivowels must frequently be changed into their corresponding vowels, and that long vowels must sometimes be pronounced as two syllables. It is clear, however, from Rosen's notes to the first Ashṭaka (I, 1, 8), that he, too, was perfectly aware of this fact, and that he recognised the prevalence of this rule, not only with regard to semivowels (see his note to RV. I, 2, 9) and long vowels which are the result of Sandhi, but likewise with regard to others that occur in the body of a word. 'Animadvertē,' he writes, 'tres syllabas postremas vocis adhvarānām dipodiae iambicae munus sustinentes, penultima syllaba praeter iambi prioris arsin, thesin quoque sequentis pedis ferente. Satis frequentia sunt, in hac praesertim dipodiae iambicae sede, exempla syllabae naturae longae in tres moras productae. De qua re nihil quidem memoratum invenio apud Pingalam aliosque qui de arte metrica scripserunt: sed numeros ita, ut modo dictum est, computandos esse, taciti agnoscere videntur, quum versus una syllaba mancus non eos offendat.'

Now this is exactly the case. The ancient grammarians, as we shall see, teach distinctly that where two vowels have coalesced into one according to the rules of Sandhi, they may be pronounced as two syllables; and though they do not teach the same with regard to semivowels and long vowels occurring in the body of the word, yet they tacitly recognise that rule, by frequently taking its effects for granted. Thus in Sūtra 950 of the Prātisākhya, verse IX, 111, 1, is called an Atyashī, and the first pāda is said to consist of twelve syllables. In order to get this number, the author must have read, āyā rūkā hāṛīnyā pūñānāh.

Immediately after, verse IV, 1, 3, is called a Dhr̥iti, and the first pāda must again have twelve syllables. Here therefore the author takes it for granted that we should read, śākhē śākhāyām ābh̥y ā vāvṛt̥svā*.

No one, in fact, with any ear for rhythm, whether Saunaka and Pingala, or Rosen and Kuhn, could have helped observing these rules when reading the Veda. But it is quite a different case when we come to the question as to which words admit of such protracted pronunciation, and which do not. Here one scholar may differ from another according to the view he takes of the character of Vedic metres, and here one has to take careful account of the minute and ingenious observations contained in numerous articles by Professors Kuhn, Bollensen, Grassmann, and others.

* See also Sūtra 937 seq. I cannot find any authority for the statement of Professor Kuhn (Beiträge, vol. iii, p. 114) that, according to the Rik-prātisākhya, it is the first semivowel that must be dissolved, unless he referred to the remarks of the commentator to Sūtra 973.

With regard to the interpretation of certain words and sentences too, it may happen that explanations which have taxed the ingenuity of some scholars to the utmost, seem to others so self-evident that they would hardly think of quoting anybody's name in support of them, to say nothing of the endless and useless work it would entail, were we obliged always to find out who was the first to propose this or that interpretation. It is impossible here to lay down general rules:—each scholar must be guided by his own sense of justice to others and by self-respect. Let us take one instance. From the first time that I read the fourth hymn of the Rig-veda, I translated the fifth and sixth verses :

utá bruvantu naḥ nīdaḥ nīḥ anyātaḥ kīti ārata, dādhanāḥ indre it dūvaḥ,
 utá naḥ su-bhāgān arīḥ vokēyuh dasma kṛishṭāyaḥ, syāma it indrasya sārmani.

1. Whether our enemies say, 'Move away elsewhere, you who offer worship to Indra only,'—

2. Or whether, O mighty one, all people call us blessed : may we always remain in the keeping of Indra.

About the general sense of this passage I imagined there could be no doubt, although one word in it, viz. arīḥ, required an explanation. Yet the variety of interpretations proposed by different scholars is extraordinary. First, if we look to Sāyana, he translates :

1. May our priests praise Indra ! O enemies, go away from this place, and also from another place ! Our priests (may praise Indra), they who are always performing worship for Indra.

2. O destroyer of enemies ! may the enemy call us possessed of wealth ; how much more, friendly people ! May we be in the happiness of Indra !

Professor Wilson did not follow Sāyana closely, but translated :

1. Let our ministers, earnestly performing his worship, exclaim: Depart, ye revilers, from hence and every other place (where he is adored).

2. Destroyer of foes, let our enemies say we are prosperous: let men (congratulate us). May we ever abide in the felicity (derived from the favour) of Indra.

Langlois translated:

1. Que (ces amis), en fêtant Indra, puissent dire: Vous, qui êtes nos adversaires, retirez-vous loin d'ici.

2. Que nos ennemis nous appellent des hommes fortunés, placés que nous sommes sous la protection d'Indra.

Stevenson translated:

1. Let all men again join in praising Indra. Avaunt ye profane scoffers, remove from hence, and from every other place, while we perform the rites of Indra.

2. O foe-destroyer, (through thy favour) even our enemies speak peaceably to us, the possessors of wealth; what wonder then if other men do so. Let us ever enjoy the happiness which springs from Indra's blessing.

Professor Benfey translated:

1. And let the scoffers say, They are rejected by every one else, therefore they celebrate Indra alone.

2. And may the enemy and the country proclaim us as happy, O destroyer, if we are only in Indra's keeping*.

Professor Roth, s.v. anyáta^h, took this word rightly in the sense of 'to a different place,' and must therefore have taken that sentence 'move away elsewhere' in the same sense in which I take it. Later, however, s.v. ar, he corrected himself, and proposed to translate the same words by 'you neglect something else.'

Professor Bollensen (Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 462),

* I add Grassmann's and Ludwig's renderings:

Grassmann: Mag spottend sagen unser Feind:

'Kein Andrer kümmert sich um sie;

Drum feiern Indra sie allein.'

Und glücklich mögen, Mächtiger!

Die Freundesstämme nennen uns,

Nur wenn wir sind in Indra's Schutz.

Ludwig: Mögen unsere tadler sagen: sogar noch anderes entgeht euch (dabei), wenn ihr dienst dem Indra tut.

Oder möge uns glückselige nennen der fromme, so nennen, o wundertäter, die (fünf) völker, in Indra's schutze mögen wir sein.

adopting to a certain extent the second rendering of Professor Roth in preference to that of Professor Benfey, endeavoured to show that the 'something else which is neglected,' is not something indefinite, but the worship of all the other gods, except Indra.

It might, no doubt, be said that every one of these translations contains something that is right, though mixed up with a great deal that is wrong; but to attempt for every verse of the Veda to quote and to criticise every previous translation, would be an invidious and useless task. In the case just quoted, it might seem right to state that Professor Bollensen was the first to see that arīh should be joined with krishṭāyāh, and that he therefore proposed to alter it to arīh, as a nom. plur. But on referring to Rosen, I find that, to a certain extent, he had anticipated Professor Bollensen's remark, for though, in his cautious way, he abstained from altering the text, yet he remarked: Possitne arih pluralis esse, contracta terminatione, pro arāyāh?

After these preliminary remarks I have to say a few

Plan of the words on the general plan of my translation.
work.

I do not attempt as yet a translation of the whole of the Rig-veda, and I therefore considered myself at liberty to group the hymns according to the deities to which they are addressed. By this process, I believe, a great advantage is gained. We see at one glance all that has been said of a certain god, and we gain a more complete insight into his nature and character. Something of the same kind had been attempted by the original collectors of the ten books, for it can hardly be by accident that each of them begins with hymns addressed to Agni, and that these are followed by hymns addressed to Indra. The only exception to this rule is the eighth Mandala, for the ninth being devoted to one deity, to Soma, can hardly be accounted an exception. But if we take the Rig-veda as a whole, we find hymns, addressed to the same deities, not only scattered about in different books, but not even grouped together when they occur in one and the same book. Here, as we lose nothing by giving up the old arrangement, we are surely at liberty, for our own purposes, to put together such hymns as have a common object, and to place before the reader as much material as possible for an exhaustive study of each individual deity.

I give for each hymn the Sanskrit original * in what is known as the Pada text, i.e. the text in which all words (pada) stand by themselves, as they do in Greek or Latin, without being joined together according to the rules of Sandhi. The text in which the words are thus joined, as they are in all other Sanskrit texts, is called the Samhitâ text. Whether the Pada or the Samhitâ text be the more ancient, may seem difficult to settle. As far as I can judge, they seem to me, in their present form, the product of the same period of Vedic scholarship. The Prâtisâkhyas, it is true, start from the Pada text, take it, as it were, for granted, and devote their rules to the explanation of those changes which that text undergoes in being changed into the Samhitâ text. But, on the other hand, the Pada text in some cases clearly presupposes the Samhitâ text. It leaves out passages which are repeated more than once, while the Samhitâ text always repeats these passages; it abstains from dividing the termination of the locative plural su, whenever in the Samhitâ text, i.e. according to the rules of Sandhi, it becomes shu; hence nadishu, agishu, but ap-su; and it gives short vowels instead of the long ones of the Samhitâ, even in cases where the long vowels are justified by the rules of the Vedic language. It is certain, in fact, that neither the Pada nor the Samhitâ text, as we now possess them, represents the original text of the Veda. Both show clear traces of scholastic influences. But if we try to restore the original form of the Vedic hymns, we shall certainly arrive at some kind of Pada text rather than at a Samhitâ text; nay, even in their present form, the original metre and rhythm of the ancient hymns of the Rîshis are far more perceptible when the words are divided, than when we join them together throughout according to the rules of Sandhi. Lastly, for practical purposes, the Pada text is far superior to the Samhitâ text in which the final and initial letters, that is, the most important letters of words, are constantly disguised, and liable therefore to different interpretations. Although in some passages we may differ from the interpretation adopted by the Pada text, and although certain Vedic words have, no doubt, been wrongly analysed and divided by Sākalya, yet such cases are comparatively few, and where they occur, they are interesting as carrying us back to the earliest attempts of Vedic scholarship. In the vast majority of cases the divided text, with a few such rules as we have to observe in reading Latin, nay, even in reading Pāli verses, brings us certainly much nearer to the original utterance of the ancient Rishis than the amalgamated text.

* This is left out in the second edition.

The critical principles by which I have been guided in editing for the first time the text of the Rig-veda, require a few words of explanation, as they have lately been challenged on grounds which, I think, rest on a complete misapprehension of my previous statements on this subject.

As far as we are able to judge at present, we can hardly speak of various readings in the Vedic hymns, in the usual sense of that word. Various readings to be gathered from a collation of different MSS., now accessible to us, there are none. After collating a considerable number of MSS., I have succeeded, I believe, in fixing on three representative MSS., as described in the preface to the first volume of my edition of the Rig-veda. Even these MSS. are not free from blunders,—for what MS. is?—but these blunders have no claim to the title of various readings. They are lapsus calami, and no more; and, what is important, they have not become traditional *.

* Thus X, 101, 2, one of the Pada MSS. (P 2) reads distinctly yagñām prā kriṇuta sakhāyaś, but all the other MSS. have ayata, and there can be little doubt that it was the frequent repetition of the verb kri in this verse which led the writer to substitute kriṇuta for ayata. No other MS., as far as I am aware, repeats this blunder. In IX, 86, 34, the writer of the same MS. puts ragasi instead of dhāvasi, because his eye was caught by rāgā in the preceding line. X, 16, 5, the same MS. reads sām gakkhasva instead of gakkhatām, which is supported by S 1, S 2, P 1, while S 3 has a peculiar and more important reading, gakkhatāt. X, 67, 6, the same MS. P 2 has vī ākartha instead of vī ākarta.

A number of various readings which have been gleaned from Pandit Tārā-

The text, as deduced from the best MSS. of the Samhitâ text, can be controlled by four independent checks. The first is, of course, a collation of the best MSS. of the Samhitâ text.

The second check to be applied to the Samhitâ text is a comparison with the Pada text, of which, again, I possessed at least one excellent MS., and several more modern copies.

The third check was a comparison of this text with Sâyana's commentary, or rather with the text which is presupposed by that commentary. In the few cases where the Pada text seemed to differ from the Samhitâ text, a note was added to that effect, in the various readings of my edition; and the same was done, at least in all important cases, where Sâyana clearly followed a text at variance with our own.

The fourth check was a comparison of any doubtful passage with the numerous passages quoted in the Prâtisâkhya.

These were the principles by which I was guided in the critical restoration of the text of the Rig-veda, and I believe I may say that the text as printed by me is more correct than any MS. now accessible, more trustworthy than the text followed by Sâyana, and in all important points identically the same with that text which the authors of the nâtha's Tûlâdânâdipaddhati (see Trübner's American and Oriental Literary Record, July 31, 1868) belong to the same class. They may be due either to the copyists of the MSS. which Pandit Târânâtha used while compiling his work, or they may by accident have crept into his own MS. Anyhow, not one of them is supported either by the best MSS. accessible in Europe, or by any passage in the Prâtisâkhya.

RV. IX, 11, 2, read devayu		instead of devayuh ^b .
IX, 11, 4,	„ arkata	„	arkate ^b .
IX, 14, 2,	„ yadî sabandhavaḥ	„	yaddîptabandhavaḥ ^b .
IX, 16, 3,	„ anaptam	„	anuplam ^b .
IX, 17, 2,	„ suvânâsa	„	stuvânâsa ^b .
IX, 21, 2,	„ pravrinvento	„	pravrinvato ^b .
IX, 48, 2,	„ samvrikta	„	samyukta ^b .
IX, 49, 1,	„ no *pâm	„	no yâm ^b .
IX, 54, 3,	„ sûryaḥ	„	sûryam ^b .
IX, 59, 3,	„ sîda ni	„	sîdati ^b .

^b As printed by Pandit Târânâtha.

Prâtisâkhya followed in their critical researches in the fifth or sixth century before our era. I believe that starting from that date our text of the Veda is better authenticated, and supported by a more perfect apparatus criticus, than the text of any Greek or Latin author, and I do not think that diplomatic criticism can ever go beyond what has been achieved in the constitution of the text of the Vedic hymns.

Far be it from me to say that the editio princeps of the text thus constituted was printed without mistakes.

Aufrecht's
Romanised Reprint of the Rig-veda.

But most of these mistakes are mistakes which no attentive reader could fail to detect. Cases like II, 35, 1, where gôgishat instead of gôshishat was printed three times, so as to perplex even Professor Roth, or II, 12, 14, where sasamânâm occurs three times instead of sasamânâm, are, I believe, of rare occurrence. Nor do I think that, unless some quite unexpected discoveries are made, there ever will be a new critical edition, or, as we call it in Germany, a new recension of the hymns of the Rig-veda. If by collating new MSS., or by a careful study of the Prâtisâkhya, or by conjectural emendations, a more correct text could have been produced, we may be certain that a critical scholar like Professor Aufrecht would have given us such a text. But after carefully collating several MSS. of Professor Wilson's collection, and after enjoying the advantage of Professor Weber's assistance in collating the MSS. of the Royal Library at Berlin, and after a minute study of the Prâtisâkhya, he frankly states that in the text of the Rig-veda, transcribed in Roman letters, which he printed at Berlin, he followed my edition, and that he had to correct but a small number of misprints. For the two Mandalas which I had not yet published, I lent him the very MSS. on which my edition is founded; and there will be accordingly but few passages in these two concluding Mandalas, which I have still to publish, where the text will materially differ from that of his Romanised transcript.

No one, I should think, who is at all acquainted with the rules of diplomatic criticism, would easily bring himself to touch a text resting on such authorities as the text of the Rîg-veda. What would a Greek scholar give, if he could say of Homer that his text was in every word, in every syllable, in every vowel, in every accent, the same as the text used by Peisistratos in the sixth century B.C. ! A text thus preserved in its integrity for so many centuries, must remain for ever the authoritative text of the Veda.

To remove, for instance, the eleven hymns 49-59 in the eighth Māṇḍala from their proper place, or count them by themselves as Vāḷakhilya * hymns, seems to me, though no doubt perfectly harmless, little short of a critical sacrilege. Why Sāyana does not explain these hymns, I confess I do not know ^b ; but whatever the reason was, it was not because they did not exist at his time, or because he thought them spurious. They are regularly counted in Kātyāyana's Sarvānukrama, though here the same accident has happened. One commentator, Shadgurusishya, the one most commonly used, does not explain them ; but another commentator, Gagannātha, does explain them, exactly as they occur in the Sarvānukrama, only leaving out hymn 58. That these hymns had something peculiar in the eyes of native scholars, is clear enough. They may for a time have formed a separate collection, they

* The earliest interpretation of the name Vāḷakhilya is found in the Taittirīya-āraṇyaka, I, 23. We are told that Pragāpati created the world, and in the process of creation the following interlude occurs :

sa tapo = tapyata. sa tapas taptvā sarīram adhūnuta. tasya yan māṁsam āsīt tato = runāḥ ketavo vātarasanā rīshaya udatish/haṇ. ye nakhāḥ, te vaikhānasāḥ. ye bālāḥ, te bālakhilyāḥ.

He burned with emotion. Having burnt with emotion, he shook his body. From what was his flesh, the Rīshis, called Arunas, Ketus, and Vātarasanas, sprang forth. His nails became the Vaikhānasas, his hairs the Bālakhilyas.

The author of this allegory therefore took bāla or vāla in vāḷakhilya, not in the sense of child, but identified it with bāla, hair.

The commentator remarks with regard to tapas : nātra tapa upavāsādirūpam, kimtu srashāvyaṁ vastu kīdrīram iti paryālokanārūpam.

^b A similar omission was pointed out by Professor Roth. Verses 21-24 of the 53rd hymn of the third Māṇḍala, which contain imprecations against Vasishtha, are left out by the writer of a Pada MS., and by a copyist of Sāyana's commentary, probably because they both belonged to the family of Vasishtha. See my first edition of the Rîg-veda, vol. ii, p. lvi, Notes.

may have been considered of more modern origin *. I shall go even further than those who remove these hymns from the place which they have occupied for more than two thousand years. I admit they disturb the regularity both of the Mandala and the Ashṭaka divisions, and I have pointed out myself that they are not counted in the ancient Anukramanīs ascribed to Saunaka ; (History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, p. 220.) But, on the other hand, verses taken from these hymns occur in all the other Vedas^b; they are mentioned by name in the Brāhmanas (Ait. Br. V, 15 ; VI, 24), the Āraṇyakas (Ait. Ār. V, 10, p. 445), and the Sūtras (Āsv. Srauta Sūtras, VIII, 2, 3), while they are never included in the manuscripts of Parisishṭas or Khilas or apocryphal hymns, nor mentioned by Kātyāyana as mere Khilas in his Sarvānukrama. Eight^c of them are mentioned in the Bṛihaddevatā, without any allusion to their apocryphal character :

Parāṇy aṣṭau tu sūktāny riṣhīnām tigmategasām,
 Aindrāṇy atra tu shadvimsaḥ pragātho bahudaivataḥ.
Rig antyāgner akety agniḥ sūryam antyapado gagau.
 Praskanvas ka prishadhras ka prādād yad vastu kimkāna
 Bhūrid iti tu sūktābhyām akhilam parikīrtitam.
 Aindrāṇy ubhayam ity atra sha āgneyāt parāṇi tu.

‘The next eight hymns belong to Riṣhis of keen intellect^d; they are addressed to Indra, but the 26th Pragātha

* Sāyana (RV. X, 88, 18) quotes these hymns as Vālakhilya-saṃhitā. In the Mahābhārata XII, 59 ; 110 seq. the Vālakhilyas are called the ministers of King Vainya, whose astrologer was Garga, and his domestic priest Sukra ; see Kern, Bṛihat-saṃhitā, transl. p. 11.

^b This is a criterion of some importance, and it might have been mentioned, for instance, by Professor Bollensen in his interesting article on the Dvīpadā Virāg hymns ascribed to Parāśara (I, 65-70) that not a single verse of them occurs in any of the other Vedas.

^c Sāyana in his commentary (RV. X, 27, 15) speaks of eight, while in the Ait. Ār. V, 10, the first six are quoted (containing fifty-six verses, comm.), as being used together for certain sacrificial purposes.

^d Lest Saunaka be suspected of having applied this epithet, tigmategas, to the Vālakhilyas in order to fill the verse (pādapūranārtham), I may point out that the same epithet is applied to the Vālakhilyas in the Maitry-upanishad 2, 3. The nom. plur. which occurs there is tigmategasāḥ, and the commentator remarks: tigmategasas tīvrategaso=tyūrgitaprabhāvāḥ ; tegasā ityevamvidha etakāḥkākāḥsāṅketapāḥ kāṇḍasaḥ sarvatra. See also Maitr. Up. VI, 29.

(VIII, 54, 3-4, which verses form the 26th couplet, if counting from VIII, 49, 1) is addressed to many gods. The last verse (of these eight hymns), VIII, 56, 5, beginning with the words akety agniḥ, is addressed to Agni, and the last foot celebrates Sūrya. Whatsoever Praskanva and Prishadhra gave (or, if we read prishadhrāya, whatever Praskanva gave to Prishadhra), all that is celebrated in the two hymns beginning with bhūrīt. After the hymn addressed to Agni (VIII, 60), there follow six hymns addressed to Indra, beginning with ubhayam.'

But the most important point of all is this, that these hymns, which exist both in the Pada and Samhitā texts, are quoted by the Prātisākhya, not only for general purposes, but for special passages occurring in them, and nowhere else. Thus in Sūtra 154, hetāyaḥ is quoted as one of the few words which do not require the elision of a following short a. In order to appreciate what is implied by this special quotation, it is necessary to have a clear insight into the mechanism of the Prātisākhya. Its chief object is to bring under general categories the changes which the separate words of the Pada text undergo when joined together in the Ārshī Samhitā, and to do this with the utmost brevity possible. Now the Sandhi rules, as observed in the Samhitā of the Rig-veda, are by no means so uniform and regular as they are in later Sanskrit, and hence it is sometimes extremely difficult to bring all the exceptional cases under more or less general rules. In our passage the author of the Prātisākhya endeavours to comprehend all the passages where an initial a in the Veda is not elided after a final e or o. In ordinary Sanskrit it would be always elided, in the Samhitā it is sometimes elided, and sometimes not. Thus the Prātisākhya begins in Sūtra 138 by stating that if the short a stands at the beginning of a pāda or foot, it is always elided. Why it should be always elided in the very place where the metre most strongly requires that it should be pronounced, does not concern the author of the Prātisākhya. He is a statistician, not a grammarian, and he therefore simply adds in Sūtra 153 the only three exceptional passages where the a, under these very circumstances, happens to be not elided. He then proceeds in Sûtra 139 to state that a is elided even in the middle of a pāda, provided it be light, followed by y or v, and these, y or v, again followed by a light vowel. Hence the Samhitā writes te •vādan, so •yām, but not śikshanto •vratam, for here the a of avratam is heavy; nor mitramaho •vadyât, for here the a following the v is heavy

Then follows again an extension of this rule, viz. in the case of words ending in āvo. After these, a short a, even if followed by other consonants besides y or v, may be elided, but the other conditions must be fulfilled, i. e. the short a must be light, and the vowel of the next syllable must again be light. Thus the Samhitā writes indeed gāvo •bhītaḥ, but not gāvo •gman, because here the a is heavy, being followed by two consonants.

After this, a more general rule is given, or, more correctly, a more comprehensive observation is made, viz. that under all circumstances initial a is elided, if the preceding word ends in aye, ayaḥ, ave, or avaḥ. As might be expected, however, so large a class must have numerous exceptions, and these can only be collected by quoting every word ending in these syllables, or every passage in which the exceptions occur. Before these exceptions are enumerated, some other more or less general observations are made, providing for the elision of initial a. Initial a, according to Sûtra 142, is to be elided if the preceding word is vaḥ, and if this vaḥ is preceded by â, na, pra, kva, kītraḥ, savitâ, eva, or kaḥ. There is, of course, no intelligible reason why, if these words precede vaḥ, the next a should be elided. It is a mere statement of facts, and, generally speaking, these statements are minutely accurate. There is probably no verse in the whole of the Rig-veda where an initial a after vaḥ is elided, unless these very words precede, or unless some other observation has been made to provide for the elision of the a. For instance, in V, 25, 1, we find vaḥ preceded by akkīa, which is not among the words just mentioned, and here the Samhitā does not elide the a of agnim, which follows after vaḥ. After all these more or less general observations as to the elision of an initial a are thus exhausted, the author of the Prātisākhya descends into particulars, and gives lists, first, of words the initial a of which is always elided; secondly, of words which, if preceding, require under all circumstances the elision of the initial a of the next word, whatever may have been said to the contrary in the preceding Sūtras. Afterwards, he gives a number of passages which defy all rules, and must be given on their own merits, and as they stand in the Samhitā. Lastly, follow special exceptions to the more or less general rules given before. And here, among these special exceptions, we see that the author of the Prātisākhya finds it necessary to quote a passage from a Vāḷakhilya hymn in which hetáyaḥ occurs, i.e. a word ending in ayaḥ, and where, in defiance of Sūtra 141, which required the elision of a following initial a under all circumstances (sarvathā), the initial a of asya is not elided; VIII, 50, 2, Samhitā, satánikā hetáyo asya. It might be objected that the Prātisākhya only quotes hetáyaḥ as an exceptional word, and does not refer directly to the verse in the Vāḷakhilya hymn. But fortunately hetáyaḥ occurs but twice in the whole of the Rig-veda; and in the other passage where it occurs, I, 190, 4, neither the rule nor the exception as to the elision of an initial a, could apply. The author of the Prātisākhya therefore makes no distinction between the Vāḷakhilya and any other hymns of the Rig-veda, and he would have considered his phonetic statistics equally at fault, if it had been possible to quote one single passage from the hymns VIII, 49 to 59, as contravening his observations, as if such passages had been alleged from the hymns of Vasishtha or Viśvāmitra.

It would lead me too far, were I to enter here into similar cases in support of the fact that the Prātisākhya makes no distinction between the Vāḷakhilya and any other hymns of the Rig-veda-samhitā *. But I doubt whether the bearing of this fact has ever been fully realised. Here we see that the absence of the elision of a short a which follows after a word ending in ayaḥ, was considered of sufficient importance to be recorded in a special rule, because in most cases the Samhitā elides an initial a, if preceded by a word ending in ayaḥ. What does this prove? It proves, unless all our views on the chronology of Vedic literature are wrong, that in the fifth century B.C. at least, or previously rather to the time when the Prātisākhya was composed, both the Pada and the Samhitā texts were so firmly settled that it was impossible, for the sake of uniformity or regularity, to omit one single short a; and it proves à fortiori, that the hymn in which that irregular short a occurs, formed at that time part of the Vedic canon. I confess I feel sometimes frightened by the stringency of this argument, and I should like to see a possibility by which we could explain the addition, not of the Vālakhilya hymns only, but of other much more modern sounding hymns, at a later time than the period of the Prātisākhyas. But until that possibility is shown, we must abide by our own conclusions; and then I ask, who is the critic who would dare to tamper with a canon of scripture of which every iota was settled before the time of Cyrus, and which we possess in exactly that form in which it is described to us by the authors of the Prātisākhyas? I say again, that I am not free from misgivings on the subject, and my critical conscience would be far better satisfied if we could ascribe the Prātisākhya and all it presupposes to a much later date. But until that is done, the fact remains that the two divergent texts, the Pada and Samhitā, which we now possess, existed, as we now possess them, previous to the time of the Prātisākhya. They have not diverged nor varied since, and the vertex to which they point, starting from the distance of the two texts as measured by the Prātisākhya, carries us back far beyond the time of Saunaka, if we wish to determine the date of the first authorised collection of the hymns, both in their Pada and in their Samhitā form.

* The Prātisākhya takes into account both the Sākala and Bāṣkala sākhās, as may be seen from Sūtra 1057.

Instances abound, if we compare the Pada and Samhitā texts, where, if uniformity between the two texts had been the object of the scholars of the ancient Parishads, the lengthening or shortening of a vowel would at once have removed the apparent discordance between the two traditional texts. Nor should it be supposed that such minute discordances between the two, as the length or shortness of a vowel, were always rendered necessary by the requirements of the metre, and that for that reason the ancient students or the later copyists of the Veda abstained from altering the peculiar spelling of words, which seemed required by the exigencies of the metre in the Samhitā text, but not in the Pada text. Though this may be true in some cases, it is not so in all. There are short vowels in the Samhitā where, according to grammar, we expect long vowels, and where, according to metre, there was no necessity for shortening them. Yet in these very places all the MSS. of the Samhitā text give the irregular short, and all the MSS. of the Pada text the regular long vowel, and the authors of the *Prātisākhya*s bear witness that the same minute difference existed at their own time, nay, previous to their own time. In VII, 60, 12, the Samhitā text gives :

iyām deva purōhitir yuvābhyām yagnēshu mitrāvarunāv akāri.

This primacy, O (two) gods, was made for you two, O Mitra and Varuna, at the sacrifices !

Here it is quite clear that deva is meant for a dual, and ought to have been devā or devau. The metre does not require a short syllable, and yet all the Samhitā MSS. read devā, and all the Pada MSS. read devā ; and what is more important, the authors of the Prātisākhyā had to register this small divergence of the two texts, which existed in their time as it exists in our own *.

Nor let it be supposed, that the writers of our MSS. were so careful and so conscientious that they would, when copying MSS., regulate every consonant or vowel according to the rules of the Prātisākhyā. This is by no means the case. The writers of Vedic MSS. are on the whole more accurate than the writers of other MSS., but their learning does not seem to extend to a knowledge of the minute rules of the Prātisākhyā, and they will commit occasionally the very mistakes against which they are warned by the Prātisākhya. Thus the Prātisākhya (Sūtra 799) warns the students against a common mistake of changing vaiyasva into vayyasva, i. e. by changing ai to a, and doubling the semivowel y. But this very mistake occurs in S 2, and another MS. gives vaiyyasva. See p. lvi.

* See Prātisākhyā, Sūtra 309 seqq., where several more instances of the same kind are given. I should prefer to take devapurohiti as one word, but that was not the intention of the authors of the Samhitā and Pada texts.

If these arguments are sound, and if nothing can be said against the critical principles by which I have been guided mistakes.

Aufrecht's

in editing the text of the Rig-veda, if the fourfold check, described above, fulfils every requirement that could be made for restoring that text which was known to Sāyana, and which was known, probably 2000 years earlier, to the authors of the Prātisākhyas, what can be the motives, it may fairly be asked, of those who clamour for a new and more critical edition, and who imagine that the editio princeps of the Rig-veda will share the fate of most of the editiones principes of the Greek and Roman classics, and be supplanted by new editions founded on the collation of other MSS.? No one could have rejoiced more sincerely than I did at the publication of the Romanised transliteration of the Rig-veda, carried out with so much patience and accuracy by Professor Aufrecht. It showed that there was a growing interest in this, the only true Veda; it showed that even those who could not read Sanskrit in the original Devanāgarī, wished to have access to the original text of these ancient hymns; it showed that the study of the Veda had a future before it like no other book of Sanskrit literature. My learned friend Professor Aufrecht has been most unfairly charged with having printed this Romanised text me insciente vel invito. My edition is publici juris, like any edition of Homer or Plato, and anybody might, with proper acknowledgment, have reprinted it, either in Roman or Devanāgarī letters. But far from keeping me in ignorance of his plan, Professor Aufrecht applied to me for the loan of the MSS. of the two Mandalas which I had not yet published, and I lent them to him most gladly, because, by seeing them printed at once, I felt far less guilty in delaying the publication of the last volumes of my edition of the text and commentary. Nor could anything have been more honourable than the way in which Professor Aufrecht speaks of the true relation of his Romanised text to my edition. That there are misprints, and I, speaking for myself, ought to say mistakes also, in my edition of the Rig-veda, I know but too well; and if Professor Aufrecht, after carefully transcribing every word, could honestly say that their number is small, I doubt whether other scholars will be able to prove that their number is large. I believe I may with the same honesty return Professor Aufrecht's compliment, and considering the great difficulty of avoiding misprints in Romanised transcripts, I have always thought and I have always said that his reprint of the hymns of the Veda is remarkably correct and accurate. What, however, I must protest against, and what, I feel sure, Professor Aufrecht himself would equally protest against, is the supposition, and more than supposition of certain scholars, that wherever this later Latin transcript differs from my own Devanâgarî text, Professor Aufrecht is right, and I am wrong; that his various readings rest on the authority of new MSS., and constitute in fact a new recension of the Vedic hymns. Against this supposition I must protest most strongly, not for my own sake, but for the sake of the old book, and, still more, for the sake of the truth. No doubt it is natural to suppose that where a later edition differs from a former edition, it does so intentionally; and I do not complain of those who, without being able to have recourse to MSS. in order to test the authority of various readings, concluded that wherever the new text differed from the old, it was because the old text was at fault. In order to satisfy my own conscience on this point, I have collated a number of passages where Professor Aufrecht's text differs from my own, and I feel satisfied that in the vast majority of cases, I am right and he is wrong, and that his variations do not rest on the authority of MSS. I must not shrink from the duty of making good this assertion, and I therefore proceed to an examination of such passages as have occurred to me on occasionally referring to his text, pointing out the readings both where he is right, and where he is wrong. The differences between the two texts may appear trifling, but I shall not avail myself of that plea. On the contrary, I quite agree with those scholars who hold that in truly critical scholarship there is nothing trifling. Besides, it is in the nature of the case that what may, by a stretch of the word, be called various readings in the Veda, must be confined to single letters or accents, and can but seldom extend to whole words, and never to whole sentences. I must therefore beg my readers to have patience while I endeavour to show that the text of the Rig-veda, as first published by me, though by no means faultless, was nevertheless not edited in so perfunctory a manner as some learned critics seem to suppose, and that it will not be easy to supplant it either by a collation of new MSS., such as are accessible at present, or by occasional references to the Prâtisākhya.

I begin with some mistakes of my own, mistakes which I might have avoided, if I had always consulted the Prâtisākhya, where single words or whole passages of the Veda are quoted. Some of these mistakes have been removed by Professor Aufrecht, others, however, appear in his transcript as they appear in my own edition.

I need hardly point out passages where palpable misprints in my edition have been repeated in Professor Aufrecht's text. I mean by palpable misprints, cases where a glance at the Pada text or at the Samhitā text or a reference to Sāyana's commentary would show at once what was intended. Thus, for instance, in VI, 15, 3, vṛidhē, as I had printed in the Samhitā, was clearly a misprint for vṛidhó, as may be seen from the Pada, which gives vṛidhák, and from Sāyana. Here, though Professor Aufrecht repeats vṛidhē, I think it hardly necessary to show that the authority of the best MSS. (S 2 alone contains a correction of vṛidhó to vṛidhē) is in favour of vṛidhák, whatever we may think of the relative value of these two readings. One must be careful, however, in a text like that of the Vedic hymns, where the presence or absence of a single letter or accent begins to become the object of the most learned and painstaking discussions, not to claim too large an indulgence for misprints. A misprint in the Samhitā, if repeated in the Pada, or if admitted even in the commentary of Sāyana, though it need not be put down to the editor's deplorable ignorance, becomes yet a serious matter, and I willingly take all the blame which is justly due for occasional accidents of this character. Such are, for instance, II, 12, 14, sasamānām instead of sasamānām; I, 124, 4, sudhyúvaḥ, in the Pada, instead of sundhyúvaḥ; and the substitution in several places of a short u instead of a long ū in such forms as sūśávāma, when occurring in the Pada; cf. I, 166, 14; 167, 9.

It is clear from the Prātisākhya, Sūtra 819 and 163, 5, that the words ūtī́ndra in IV, 29, 1, should not be joined together, but that the hiatus should remain. Hence ūtī́ndra, as printed in my edition and repeated in Professor Aufrecht's, should be corrected, and the hiatus be preserved, as it is in the fourth verse of the same hymn, ūtī́ itthá. MSS. S 1, S 3 are right; in S 2 the words are joined.

It follows from Sūtra 799 that to double the y in vaiyasva is a mistake, but a mistake which had to be pointed out and guarded against as early as the time of the Prātisākhya. In VIII, 26, 11, therefore, vaiyyasváya, as printed in my edition and repeated in Professor Aufrecht's, should be changed to vaiyasváya. MSS. S 1, S 3 are right, likewise P 1, P 2; but S 2 has the double mistake vayyasváya, as described in the Prātisākhya; another MS. of Wilson's has vaiyy. The same applies to VIII, 23, 24, and VIII, 24, 23. P 1 admits the mistaken spelling vaiyasva.

Some corrections that ought to be made in the Pada-pāṭha only, as printed in my edition, are pointed out in a note to Sūtra 738 of the Prātisākhya. Thus, according to Sūtra 583, 6, srūyáḥ in the Pada text of II, 10, 2, should be changed to sruyáḥ. MSS. P 1, P 2 have the short u.

In V, 7, 8, I had printed súkiḥ shma, leaving the a of shma short in accordance with the Prâtisâkhyâ, Sûtra 514, where a string of words is given before which sma must not be lengthened, and where under No. 11 we find yâsmai. Professor Aufrecht has altered this, and gives the â as long, which is wrong. The MSS. S 1, S 2, S 3 have the short a.

Another word before which sma ought not to be lengthened is māvate. Hence, according to Sûtra 514, 14, I ought not to have printed in VI, 65, 4, shmâ māvate, but shma māvate. Here Professor Aufrecht has retained the long â, which is wrong. MSS. S 1, S 2, S 3 have the short a.

It follows from Sûtra 499 that in I, 138, 4, we should not lengthen the vowel of sú. Hence, instead of asyâ û shû na úpa sâtâye, as printed in my edition and repeated by Professor Aufrecht, we should read asyâ û shú na úpa sâtâye. S 1, S 2, S 3 have short u*.

In VII, 31, 4, I had by mistake printed viddhî instead of viddhî. The same reading is adopted by Professor Aufrecht (II, p. 24), but the authority of the Prâtisâkhyâ, Sûtra 445, can hardly be overruled. S 1, S 2, S 3 have viddhî.

While in cases like these, the Prâtisâkhyâ is an authority which, as far as I can judge, ought to overrule the authority of every MS., however ancient, we must in other cases depend either on the testimony of the best MSS. or be guided, in fixing on the right reading, by Sâyana and the rules of grammar. I shall therefore, in cases where I cannot consider Professor Aufrecht's readings as authoritative improvements, have to give my reasons why I adhere to the readings which I had originally adopted.

In V, 9, 4, I had printed by mistake purú yó instead of purî yó. I had, however, corrected this misprint in my edition of the Prâtisâkhyâ, 393, 532. Professor Aufrecht decides in favour of purú with a short u, but against the authority of the MSS., S 1, S 2, S 3, which have purî.

* In the same verse, I, 138, 4, the shu in ó shú tvâ should not be lengthened, for there is no rule, as far as I can see, in the Prâtisâkhyâ that would require the lengthening of sú before tvâ. See Prâtisâkhyâ, 491.

It was certainly a great mistake of mine, though it may seem more excusable in a Romanised transcript, that I did not follow the writers of the best MSS. in their use of the Avagraha, or, I should rather say, of that sign which, as far as the Veda is concerned, is very wrongly designated by the name of Avagraha. Avagraha, according to the Prâtisâkhya, never occurs in the Samhitâ text, but is the name given to that halt, stoppage, or pause which in the Pada text separates the component parts of compound words. That pause has the length of one short vowel, i.e. one mâtrâ. Of course, nothing is said by the Prâtisâkhya as to how the pause should be represented graphically, but it is several times alluded to as of importance in the recitation and accentuation of the Veda. What we have been in the habit of calling Avagraha is by the writers of certain MSS. of the Samhitâ text used as the sign of the Vivṛtti or hiatus. This hiatus, however, is very different from the Avagraha, for while the Avagraha has the length of one mâtrâ, the Vivṛtti or hiatus has the length of $\frac{1}{4}$ mâtrâ, if the two vowels are short; of $\frac{1}{2}$ mâtrâ, if either vowel is long; of $\frac{3}{4}$ mâtrâ, if both vowels are long. Now I have several times called attention to the fact that though this hiatus is marked in certain MSS. by the sign \ast , I have in my edition omitted it, because I thought that the hiatus spoke for itself and did not require a sign to attract the attention of European readers; while, on the contrary, I have inserted that sign where MSS. hardly ever use it, viz. when a short initial a is elided after a final e or o; (see my remarks on pp. 36, 39, of my edition of the Prâtisâkhya.) Although I thought, and still think, that this use of the sign \ast is more useful for practical purposes, yet I regret that, in this one particular, I should have deviated from the authority of the best MSS., and caused some misunderstandings on the part of those who have made use of my edition. If, for instance, I had placed the sign of the Vivṛtti, the \ast , in its proper place, or if, at least, I had not inserted it where, as we say, the initial a has been elided after e or o, Professor Bollensen would have seen at once that the authors of the Prâtisâkhyas fully agree with him in looking on this change, not as an elision, but as a contraction. If, as sometimes happens, final o or e remain unchanged before initial short a, this is called the Pañkâla and Prākya padavṛtti (Sûtra 137). If, on the contrary, final o or e become one (ekibhavati) with the initial short a, this is called the Abhinihita sandhi (Sûtra 138). While the former, the hiatus of the Pañkâla and Eastern schools, is marked by the writers of several MSS. by the sign *, the Abhinihita sandhi, being a sandhi, is not marked by any sign *.

I, 3, 12. râgati (Aufr. p. 2) instead of râgati (M. M. vol. i, p. 75) is wrong.

I, 7, 9. ya ékaḥ (Aufr. p. 5) should be yá ékaḥ (M. M. vol. i, p. 110), because the relative pronoun is never without an accent. The relative particle yathâ may be without an accent, if it stands at the end of a pâda; and though there are exceptions to this rule, yet in VIII, 21, 5, where Professor Aufrecht gives yáthâ, the MSS. are unanimous in favour of yathâ (M. M. vol. iv, p. 480). See Phit-sûtra, ed. Kielhorn, p. 54.

I, 10, 11. â tú (Aufr. p. 7) should be á tú (M. M. vol. i, p. 139), because â is never without the accent.

I, 10, 12. gúshṭâḥ, which Professor Aufrecht specially mentions as having no final Visarga in the Pada, has the Visarga in all the MSS., (Aufr. p. 7, M. M. vol. i, p. 140.)

I, 11, 4. kávir (Aufr. p. 7) should be kavír (M. M. vol. i, p. 143).

I, 22, 8, read râdhâmsi.

I, 40, 1 and 6. There is no excuse for the accent either on tvémahe or on vókema, while sákāñ in I, 51, 11, ought to have the accent on the first syllable.

I, 49, 3. Rosen was right in not eliding the a in divó ántebhyaḥ. S 1, S 2, S 3 preserve the initial a, nor does the Prâtisākhya anywhere provide for its suppression.

I, 54, 8. kshátram (Aufr. p. 46) is a mere misprint for kshatrám.

* As to the system or want of system, according to which the Abhinihita sandhi takes place in the Saṃhitâ, see p. xlviii seq.

I, 55, 7. vandanasrúd (Aufr. p. 47) instead of vandanasrud (M. M. vol. i, p. 514) is wrong.

I, 57, 2. samásita instead of samásita had been corrected in my reprint of the first Mandala, published at Leipzig. See Bollensen, Zeitschrift der D. M. G., vol. xxii, p. 626.

I, 61, 7, read vishnuh ; I, 64, 2, read súkayah ; I, 64, 5, read dhūtayah.

I, 61, 16. Rosen had rightly printed hāriyoganā with a long ā both in the Samhitā and Pada texts, and I ought not to have given the short a instead. All the MSS., S 1, S 2, S 3, P 1, and P 2, give the long ā. Professor Aufrecht gives the short a in the Pada, which is wrong.

I, 67, 2 (4). vidántim (M. M. vol. i, p. 595) is perfectly right, as far as the authority of the MSS. and of Sāyana is concerned, and should not have been altered to vindántim (Aufr. p. 57).

I, 72, 2, read vatsám ; I, 72, 6, read parśñ ; I, 76, 3, read dhákshy ; I, 82, 1, read yadá.

I, 83, 3. Rosen was right in giving ásamyattah. I gave ásamyatah on the authority of P 1, but all the other MSS. have tt.

I, 84, 1. indra (Aufr. p. 68) cannot have the accent on the first syllable, because it does not stand at the beginning of a pāda (M. M. vol. i, p. 677). The same applies to indra, VI, 41, 4, (Aufr. p. 429) instead of indra (M. M. vol. iii, p. 734) ; to ágne, I, 140, 12, (Aufr. p. 130) instead of agne (M. M. vol. ii, p. 133). In III, 36, 3, on the contrary, indra, being at the head of a pāda, ought to have the accent on the first syllable, indra (M. M. vol. ii, p. 855), not indra (Aufr. p. 249). The same mistake occurs again, III, 36, 10 (Aufr. p. 250) ; IV, 32, 7, (Aufr. p. 305) ; IV, 32, 12, (Aufr. p. 305) ; VIII, 3, 12, (Aufr. vol. ii, p. 86). In V, 61, 1, narah should have no accent ; whereas in VII, 91, 3, it should have the accent on the first syllable. In VIII, 8, 19, vipanyû should have no accent, and Professor Aufrecht gives it correctly in the notes, where he has likewise very properly removed the Avagraha which I had inserted.

I, 88, 1, read yâta (M. M. vol. i, p. 708), not yâtha (Aufr. p. 72).

I, 90, 1, read rigunítĩ; I, 94, 11, read yavasádo (M. M. vol. i, p. 766), not yayasádo (Aufr. p. 80).

I, 118, 9. abhibhūtim (Aufr. p. 105) instead of abhíbhūtim (M. M. vol. i, p. 957) cannot be right, considering that in all other passages abhíbhūti has the accent on the second syllable. S 1, S 2, S 3 have the accent on the i.

I, 128, 4. ghrītasrīr (Aufr. p. 117) instead of ghrītasrīr (M. M. vol. ii, p. 52) is wrong.

I, 144, 2, read pārivritāh (M. M. vol. ii, p. 155) instead of parīvritāh (Aufr. p. 133).

I, 145, 5. Professor Aufrecht (p. 134) gives upamasyām, both in the Saṃhitā and Pada texts, as having the accent on the last syllable. I had placed the accent on the penultimate, (Pada, upa-māsyām, vol. ii, p. 161,) and whatever may be the reading of other MSS., this is the only possible accentuation. S 1, S 2, S 3 have the right accent.

I, 148, 4. pūrūni (Aufr. p. 136) instead of purūni (M. M. vol. ii, p. 170) does not rest, as far as I know, on the authority of any MSS. S 1, S 2, S 3 have purūni.

I, 151, 7. gakkhatho (Aufr. p. 137) should be gákkhatho (M. M. vol. ii, p. 181).

I, 161, 12. All the Pada MSS. read prá ábravīt, separating the two words and accentuating each. Though the accent is irregular, yet, considering the peculiar construction of the verse, in which prá and pró are used as adverbs rather than as prepositions, I should not venture with Professor Aufrecht (p. 144) to write prá abravīt. The MSS. likewise have á ágagan, I, 161, 4; and prá ágáh, VIII, 48, 2, not prá agáh, as Aufrecht gives in his second edition.

I, 163, 11. dhrágīman (Aufr. p. 147) instead of dhrágīmān (M. M. vol. ii, p. 245) is wrong.

I, 163, 13. gamyā (Aufr. p. 148) instead of gamyā (M. M. vol. ii, p. 246) is wrong.

I, 164, 17, read párena (M. M. vol. ii, p. 259) instead of paréna (Aufr. p. 149).

I, 164, 38. The first kikyúh ought to have the accent, and has it in all the MSS., (Aufr. p. 151, M. M. vol. ii, p. 278.)

I, 165, 5. A mere change of accent may seem a small matter, yet it is frequently of the highest importance in the interpretation of the Veda. Thus in I, 165, 5, I had, in accordance with the MSS. S 1, S 2, S 3, printed étân (vol. ii, p. 293) with the accent on the first syllable. Professor Aufrecht alters this into etân (p. 153), which, no doubt, would be the right form, if it were intended for the accusative plural of the pronoun, but not if it is meant, as it is here, for the accusative plural of éta, the speckled deer of the Maruts.

I, 165, 15. yâsishṭa (Aufr. p. 154) instead of yâsishṭa (M. M. vol. ii, p. 298) is not supported by any MS.

I, 169, 7, instead of patayânta (Aufr. p. 158), read patáyanta (M. M. vol. ii, p. 322).

I, 174, 7. kúyâvâkam (Aufr. p. 162) should be kúyavâkam (M. M. vol. ii, p. 340).

I, 177, 1. yuktá, which I had adopted from MS. S 3 (prima manu), is not supported by other MSS., though P 2 reads yuttká. Professor Aufrecht, who had retained yuktá in the text, has afterwards corrected it to yuktvá, and in this he was right. In I, 177, 2, gâhi for yâhi is wrong.

I, 188, 4. astrinan (Aufr. p. 171) instead of astrinan (M. M. vol. ii, p. 395) can only be a misprint.

II, 29, 6. kártâd (Aufr. p. 203) instead of kartâd (M. M. vol. ii, p. 560) is wrong.

II, 40, 4. ḥakra (Aufr. p. 214) instead of ḥakrá (M. M. vol. ii, p. 614) is wrong.

III, 7, 7. guh (Aufr. p. 226) instead of gúh (M. M. vol. ii, p. 666) is wrong; likewise III, 30, 10, gáh (Aufr. p. 241) instead of gáh (M. M. vol. ii, p. 792).

III, 17, 1. igyate (Aufr. p. 232) instead of agyate (M. M. vol. ii, p. 722) is impossible.

III, 47, 1. Professor Aufrecht (p. 256) puts the nominative índro instead of the vocative indra, which I had given (vol. ii, p. 902). I doubt whether any MSS. support that change (S 1, S 2, S 3 have indra), but it is clear that Sâyana takes indra as a vocative, and likewise the Nirukta.

III, 50, 2. Professor Aufrecht (p. 258) gives asya, both in the Samhitâ and Pada, without the accent on the last syllable. But all the MSS. that I know (S 1, S 2, S 3, P 1, P 2) give it with the accent on the last syllable (M. M. vol. ii, p. 912), and this no doubt is right. The same mistake occurs again in III, 51, 10, (Aufr. p. 259); IV, 5, 11, (Aufr. p. 281); IV, 36, 2, (Aufr. p. 309); V, 12, 3, (Aufr. p. 337); while in VIII, 103, 9, (Aufr. vol. ii, p. 195) the MSS. consistently give asya as unaccented, whereas Professor Aufrecht, in this very passage, places the accent on the last syllable. On the same page (p. 259) amandan, in the Pada, is a misprint for ámandan.

III, 53, 18. asi (Aufr. p. 262) instead of ási (M. M. vol. ii, p. 934) is wrong, because hí requires that the accent should remain on ási. S 1, S 2, S 3, P 1, P 2 have ási.

IV, 4, 7. svá áyushe (Aufr. p. 279) instead of svá áyushi (M. M. vol. iii, p. 37) is not supported by any good MSS., nor required by the sense of the passage. S 1, S 2, S 3, P 1, P 2 have áyushi.

IV, 5, 7. árupitam, in the Pada, (Aufr. p. 280) instead of árupitam (M. M. vol. iii, p. 45) is right, as had been shown in the Prātisākhya Sūtra 179, though by a misprint the long ā of the Samhitā had been put in the place of the short a of the Pada.

IV, 5, 9. read gaúh (M. M. vol. iii, p. 46) instead of góh (Aufr. p. 281).

IV, 15, 2. yāti, with the accent on the first syllable, is supported by all MSS. against yāti (Aufr. p. 287). The same applies to yāti in IV, 29, 2, and to várante in IV, 31, 9.

IV, 18, 11. amī, without any accent (Aufr. p. 293), instead of amī (M. M. vol. iii, p. 105) is wrong, because amī is never unaccented.

IV, 21, 9. no, without an accent (Aufr. p. 296), instead of nó (M. M. vol. iii, p. 120) is wrong.

IV, 26, 3. átithigvam (Aufr. p. 300) instead of atithigvám (M. M. vol. iii, p. 140) and VI, 47, 22, átithigvasya (Aufr. p. 437) instead of atithigváśya (M. M. vol. iii, p. 776) are wrong, for atithigvá never occurs again except with the accent on the last syllable. The MSS. do not vary. Nor do they vary in the accentuation of kútsa: hence kútsam (Aufr. p. 300) should be kútsam (M. M. vol. iii. p. 139).

IV, 36, 6. Professor Aufrecht (p. 309) has altered the accent of āvishuḥ into āvishúḥ, but the MSS. are unanimous in favour of āvishuḥ (M. M. vol. iii, p. 181).

Again in IV, 41, 9, the MSS. support the accentuation of ágman (M. M. vol. iii, p. 200), while Professor Aufrecht (p. 313) has altered it to agman.

IV, 42, 9. ádâsat, being preceded by hí, ought to have the accent; (Aufrecht, p. 314, has adâsat without the accent.) For the same reason, V, 29, 3, ávindat (M. M. vol. iii, p. 342) ought not to have been altered to avindat (Aufr. p. 344).

IV, 50, 4. vyóman is a misprint for vyòman.

V, 15, 5. Professor Aufrecht (p. 338) writes dirghám instead of dógham (M. M. vol. iii, p. 314). This, no doubt, was done intentionally, and not by accident, as we see from the change of accent. But dógham, though it occurs but once, is supported in this place by all the best MSS., and has been accepted by Professor Roth in his Dictionary.

V, 34, 4. práyato (Aufr. p. 351) instead of práyatâ (M. M. vol. iii, p. 371) is wrong.

V, 42, 9. visármānam (Aufr. p. 358) instead of visarmānam (M. M. vol. iii, p. 402) is wrong.

V, 44, 4. parvané (Aufr. p. 360) instead of pravané (M. M. vol. iii, p. 415) is wrong.

V, 83, 4. vānti (Aufr. p. 389) instead of vānti (M. M. vol. iii, p. 554) is supported by no MSS.

V, 85, 6. āsiñkāntih (Aufr. p. 391) instead of āsiñkāntih (M. M. vol. iii, p. 560) is not supported either by MSS. or by grammar, as siñk belongs to the Tud-class. On the same grounds isháyantaḥ, VI, 16, 27 (M. M. vol. iii, p. 638), ought not to have been changed to ishayántaḥ (Aufr. p. 408), nor VI, 24, 7, avakarsáyanti (M. M. vol. iii, p. 687) into avakársayanti (Aufr. p. 418).

VI, 46, 10, read girvanas (M. M. vol. iii, p. 763) instead of gírvanas (Aufr. p. 435).

VI, 60, 10. krinoti (Aufr. p. 450) instead of krinóti (M. M. vol. iii, p. 839) is wrong.

VII, 40, 4. aryamá āpah (Aufr. vol. ii, p. 35), in the Pada, instead of aryamá āpaḥ (M. M. vol. iv, p. 81) is wrong.

VII, 51, 1. âdityânām (Aufr. vol. ii, p. 40) instead of adityânām (M. M. vol. iv, p. 103) is wrong.

VII, 64, 2. iām (Aufr. vol. ii, p. 50) instead of iām (M. M. vol. iv, p. 146) is wrong. In the same verse gopāk in the Pada should be changed in my edition to gopā.

VII, 66, 5. yó (Aufr. vol. ii, p. 51) instead of yé (M. M. vol. iv, p. 151) is indeed supported by S 3, but evidently untenable on account of atipíprati.

VII, 72, 3. In abudhran Professor Aufrecht has properly altered the wrong spelling abudhnan; and, as far as the authority of the best MSS. is concerned (S 1, S 2, S 3), he is also right in putting a final ñ, although Professor Bollensen prefers the dental n; (Zeitschrift der D. M. G., vol. xxii, p. 599.) The fact is that Vedic MSS. use the Anusvâra dot for final nasals before all class-letters, and leave it to us to interpret that dot according to the letter which follows. Before I felt quite certain on this point, I have in several cases retained the dot, as given by the MSS., instead of changing it, as I ought to have done according to my system of writing Devanâgarî, into the corresponding nasal, provided it represents an original n. In I, 71, 1, S 2, S 3 have the dot in agushran, but S 1 has dental n. In IX, 87, 5, asrigran has the dot; i. e. S 1 has the dot, and nkh, dental n joined to kh; S 2 has nkh without the dot before the n; S 3 has the dot, and then kh. In IV, 24, 6, the spelling of the Samhitâ âvivenam tám would leave it doubtful whether we ought to read âvivenan tám or âvivenam tám; S 1 and S 3 read âvivenam tám, but S 2 has âvivenan tám; P 2 has âvi-venan tám, and P 1 had the same originally, though a later hand changed it to âvi-venam tám. In IV, 25, 3, on the contrary, S 1 and S 3 write âvivenam; S 2, âvivenam; P 1 and P 2, âvi-venam. What is intended is clear enough, viz. âvi-venan in IV, 24, 6; âvi-venam in IV, 25, 3. [In the new edition âvivenam has been left in both passages.]

VII, 73, 1. arvinâ (Aufr. vol. ii, p. 56) instead of arvinâ (M. M. vol. iv, p. 176) is wrong. On the same page, dhîshnye, VII, 72, 3, should have the accent on the first syllable.

VII, 77, 1. In this verse, which has been so often discussed (see Kuhn, Beiträge, vol. iii, p. 472 ; Böhlingk and Roth, Dictionary, vol. ii, p. 968 ; Bollensen, Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 463), all the MSS. which I know, read karāyai, and not either karāthai nor garāyai.

VIII, 2, 29. kirīnam (Aufr. vol. ii, p. 84) instead of kārīnam (M. M. vol. iv, p. 308) does not rest on the authority of any MSS., nor is it supported by Sāyana.

VIII, 9, 9. Professor Aufrecht has altered the very important form ākukyuvimāhi (M. M. vol. iv, p. 389) to ākukyavimāhi (vol. ii, p. 98). The question is whether this was done intentionally and on the authority of any MSS. My own MSS. support the form ākukyuvimāhi, and I see that Professor Roth accepts this form.

VIII, 32, 14. āyāntāram (Aufr. vol. ii, p. 129) instead of āyantāram (M. M. vol. iv, p. 567) is wrong.

VIII, 47, 15. dushvāpnyam (Aufr. vol. ii, p. 151) is not so correct as duśshvāpnyam (M. M. vol. iv, p. 660), or, better, dushshvāpnyam (Prātisākhya, Sūtras 255 and 364), though it is perfectly true that the MSS. write dushvāpnyam.

[I ought to state that all these errata have been corrected by Professor Aufrecht in his second edition.]

In the ninth and tenth Mandalas I have not to defend myself, and I need not therefore give a list of the passages where I think that Professor Aufrecht's text is not supported by the best MSS. My own edition of these Mandalas will soon be published, and I need hardly say that where it differs from Professor Aufrecht's text, I am prepared to show that I had the best authorities on my side.

Professor Aufrecht writes in the second edition of his Romanised text of the Rig-veda (p. iv): 'Um den Herren, die diese Druckfehler in majorem gloriam suam mit so grosser Schonung hervor gehoben haben, einen Gegendienst zu erweisen, bemerke ich einige derselben.' Dieser Gegendienst, so gut er gemeint war, ist leider nicht sehr bedeutend ausgefallen, auch nicht immer in majorem gloriam Catonis.

In I, 161, 2, Professor Aufrecht objects to katuras krinotana. I felt doubtful about it, and in the commentary I printed katurah krinotana. In IV, 33, 5, the reading ātus kara is sanctioned by the authority of the Prātisākhya, Sūtra 281, 4.

In I, 181, 5, Aufrecht prefers mathrā; Sāyana, Böhtlingk and Roth, and I prefer mathnā.

In II, 11, 10, he has discovered that gûrvît was meant for gûrvât. Whitney still quotes gûrvît.

In III, 9, 4, he has discovered that apsu should be -psu; but this had been already corrected.

In III, 25, 2, the final a of vaha ought to be long in the Samhitā.

In IV, 19, 4, instead of drilhā ni read drilhāni.

In VII, 33, 2, instead of avrinītā read -vrinītā.

In VII, 35, 13, the Visarga in devagopāh should be deleted.

In VII, 42, 2, the Anusvāra in yumkshvā should be deleted.

In VIII, 2, 30, the anudāttatara should be shifted from the ultimate to the penultimate, dadhīré, not dadhīre.

In VIII, 51, 3, avishyanta was meant for arishyantam.

In VIII, 55, 5, for na read ā. The MSS. vary in both cases.

In IX, 108, 7, in vanakraksha, the kra was printed as ri. Professor Aufrecht might have seen it correctly printed in the index. Sāyana read vanarīksha.

In X, 28, 11, Professor Aufrecht thinks that the Pada should have godhāh instead of godhā. I think godhā is right, in spite of Professor Aufrecht's appeal to the silence of the Prātisākhya. The fact is that godhāh never occurs, while godhā occurs in the preceding verse, and again VIII, 69, 9.

After such a flourish of trumpets, we expected more from Professor Aufrecht; still we must learn to be grateful even for small mercies.

Having said so much in vindication of the text of the Rig-veda as published by me, and in defence of my principles of criticism which seem to me so self-evident as hardly to deserve the name of canones critici, I feel bound at the same time both to acknowledge some inaccuracies that have occurred in the index at the end of each volume, and to defend some entries in that index which have been challenged without sufficient cause.

It has been supposed that in the index at the end of my fourth volume, the seventeenth verse of the 34th hymn in the seventh Mandala has been wrongly assigned to Ahi Budhnya, and that one half only of that verse should have been reserved for that deity. I do not deny that we should be justified in deriving that sense from the words of the Anukramanikâ, but I cannot admit that my own interpretation is untenable. As Sâyana does not speak authoritatively on the subject, I followed the authority of Shadgurusishya. This commentator of the Anukramanikâ says: atra ka abgâm ukthair ahim grinisha ity ardharko • bganâmno * devasya stutiḥ; mâ no • hir budhnya ity ardharko • hribudhnyanâmno devasya ^b. Another commentator says: abgâm ukthair ardharko • hiḥ; uttaro mâ no • hir ity ahir budhnyah. From this we learn that both commentators looked upon the Dvipadâs as ardharkas or half-verses, and ascribed the whole of verse 16 to Ahir abgâh, the whole of verse 17 to Ahir budhnyah. It will be seen from an accurate examination of Sâyana's commentary on verse 17, that in the second interpretation of the second half of verse 17, he labours to show that in this portion, too, Ahir budhnyah may be considered as the deity.

It is perfectly right to say that the words of the Anukramanikâ, abgâm aheh, signify that the verse beginning with abgâm, belongs to Ahi. But there was no misprint in my index. It will be seen that Shadgurusishya goes even beyond me, and calls that deity simply Abga, leaving out Ahi altogether, as understood. I was anxious to show the distinction between Abgâ Ahiḥ and Ahir Budhnyah, as the deities of the two successive verses, and I did not expect that any reader could possibly misinterpret my entry ^c.

With regard to hymns 91 and 92 of the seventh Mandala, it is true, that in the index I did not mention that certain verses in which two deities are mentioned (91, 2 ;

* I find that Mr. Macdonell in his edition of the Sarvânukramanî reads ardharko • hinâmno. If this is right, part of my argument would fall.

^b MS. Wilson 379 has, ardharko nâmano daivatasya, and in the margin • hi. Ahirbudhnya seems to have been taken as one word.

^c The editor of the Bombay edition of the text of the Rig-veda assigns verse 16 to Ahi, verse 17 to Ahirbudhnya.

4-7; 92, 2), must be considered as addressed not to Vāyu alone, but to Vāyu and Indra. It will be seen from Sāyana's introduction to hymn 90, that he, too, wrongly limits the sentence of the Anukramanikā, aindryas ka yā dvivaduktāḥ, to the fifth and following verses of hymn 90, and that he never alludes to this proviso again in his introductory remarks to hymn 91 and 92, though, of course, he explains the verses, in which a dual occurs, as addressed to two deities, viz. Indra and Vāyu. The same omission, whether intentional or unintentional, occurs in Shadgurusishya's commentary. The other commentary, however, assigns the verses of the three hymns rightly. The subject has evidently been one that excited attention in very early days, for in the Aitareya-brāhmaṇa, V, 20, we actually find that the word vām which occurs in hymn 90, 1, and which might be taken as a dual, though Sāyana explains it as a singular, is changed into te *.

In hymn VII, 104, rakshohavau might certainly be added as an epithet of Indrā-Somau, and Shadgurusishya clearly takes it in that sense. The Anukramanikā says: indrāsomā paññādhikaindrāsomam rākshoghnām śāpābhisāpaprayam.

In hymn VIII, 67, it has been supposed that the readings Samada and Sāmada instead of Sammada and Sāmmada were due to a misprint. This is not the case. That I was aware of the other spelling of this name, viz. Sammada and Sāmmada, I had shown in my History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature (2nd ed.), p. 39, where I had translated the passage of the Sāṅkhāyana-sūtras in which Matsya Sāmmada occurs, and had also called attention to the Āsvalāyana-sūtras X, 7, and the Satapatha-brāhmaṇa XIII, 3, 1, 1,

* The interpunction of Dr. Haug's edition (p. 128) should be after te. Shadgurusishya says: ata eva brāhmaṇasūtrayoḥ praūge vāyavyatvāya prāvīraya sukāyo dadrire^b vām iti dvivātanasthāne ta ity ekavātanapāḥ/kaḥ kṛitah, vām ity uktam^b ked aindratvam ka syād iti. Possibly the same change should be made in Āsvalāyana's Śrauta Sūtras, VIII, 11, and it has been made by Rāma Nārāyaṇa Vidyāratna. The remark of the commentator, however, dadrire ta iti prayogapāḥ/kaḥ, looks as if vām might have been retained in the text. The MSS. I have collated are in favour of te.

^b Mr. Macdonell (Sarvānukramanī, p. 133) inserts ta iti after dadrire.

where the same passage is found. I there spelt the name Sâmmada, because the majority of the MSS. were in favour of that spelling. In the edition of the Āsvalāyana-sūtras, which has since been published by Rāma Nārāyaṇa Vidyāranya, the name is spelt Sāmada. My own opinion is that Sâmmada is the right spelling, but that does not prove that Sāyana thought so; and unless I deviated from the principles which I had adopted for a critical restoration of Sāyana's text, I could not but write Sāmada in our passage. B 1 and B 4 omit sāmada, but both give samadākhyasya; Ca. gives likewise samadākhyasya, and A. semadākhyasya. This, I believe, was meant by the writer for sammadākhyasya, for in the passage from the Anukramanī both A. and Ca. give sâmmado. I then consulted the commentary of Shadgurusishya, and there again the same MS. gave twice sâmmada, once sāmada, which is explained by samadākhyamahāmīnarāgaputra. A better MS. of Shadgurusishya, MS. Wilson 379, gives the readings sâmmado, sâmmada, and sammadākhyasya. The other commentary gives distinctly sāmāda. [I have adopted sammada in the new edition.]

In IX, 68, Professor Aufrecht adopts what he considers the bold reading Vatsapri; I prefer to be timid and allow Sāyana his own reading Vatsapri; see Sarvānukramanī, ed. Macdonell, pp. 34, 146.

It will be seen from these remarks that many things have to be considered before one can form an independent judgment as to the exact view adopted by Sāyana in places where he differs from other authorities, or as to the exact words in which he clothed his meaning. Such cases occur again and again. Thus in IX, 86, I find that Professor Aufrecht ascribes the first ten verses to the Akrishṭas, whereas Sāyana calls them Ākrishṭas. It is perfectly true that the best MSS. of the Anukramanīkā have Akrishṭa, it is equally true that the name of these Akrishṭas is spelt with a short a in the Harivamśa, 11,533, but an editor of Sāyana's work is not to alter the occasional mistakes of that learned commentator, and Sāyana certainly called these poets Ākrishṭas.

Verses 21-30 of the same hymn are ascribed by Professor Aufrecht to the Prisniyah. Here, again, several MSS. support that reading; and in Shadgurusishya's commentary, the correction of prisniyah into prisinayah is made by a later hand. But Sâyana clearly took prisinayah for a nominative plural of prisni, and in this case he certainly was right. The Dictionary of Böhtlingk and Roth quotes the Mahâbhârata, VII, 8728, in support of the peculiar reading of prisniyah, but the published text gives prisinayah. Professor Benfey, in his list of poets (Ind. Stud. vol. iii, p. 223), gives prisniyoga as one word, not prisniyogâ, as stated in the Dictionary of Böhtlingk and Roth, but this is evidently meant for two words, viz. prisinayo + gâh. However, whether prisniyah or prisinayah be the real name of these poets, an editor of Sâyana is bound to give that reading of the name which Sâyana believed to be the right one, i. e. prisinayah.*

Again, in the same hymn, Professor Aufrecht ascribes verses 31-40 to the Atris. We should then have to read tritiye + trayah. But Sâyana read tritiye trayah, and ascribes verses 31-40 to the three companies together of the Rishis mentioned before. On this point the MSS. admit of no doubt, for we read: katurthasya ka dasarkasya âkrishâtâ mâshâ ityâdiddvinâmânas trayo ganâ drashâtârah. I do not say that the other explanation is wrong; I only say that, whether right or wrong, Sâyana certainly read trayah, not atrayah; and an editor of Sâyana has no more right to correct the text, supported by the best MSS., in the first and second, than in the third of these passages, all taken from one and the same hymn.

But though I insist so strongly on a strict observance of the rules of diplomatic criticism with regard to the text of the Rig-veda, nay, even of Sâyana, I insist equally strongly on the right of independent criticism, which ought to begin where diplomatic criticism ends. Considering the startling antiquity which we can claim for every letter and accent of our MSS., so far as they are authenticated by the Prâtisâkhya, to say nothing of the passages of many hymns which are quoted verbatim in the Brâhmanas, the Kalpa-sûtras, the Nirukta, the Bṛihaddevatâ, and the Anukramanis, I should deem it reckless to alter one single letter or one single accent in an edition of the hymns of the Rig-veda. As the text has been handed down to us, so it should remain; and whatever alterations and corrections we, the critical Mlekkhas of the nineteenth century, have to propose, should be kept distinct from that time-hallowed inheritance. Unlikely as it may sound, it is true nevertheless that we, the scholars of the nineteenth century, are able to point out mistakes in the text of the Rig-veda which escaped the attention of the most learned among the native scholars of the sixth century B.C. No doubt, these scholars, even if they had perceived such mistakes, would hardly have ventured to correct the text of their sacred writings. The authors of the Prâtisâkhya had before their eyes or ears a text ready made, of which they registered every peculiarity, nay, in which they would note and preserve every single irregularity, even though it stood alone amidst hundreds of analogous cases. With us the case is different. Where we see a rule observed in 99 cases, we feel strongly tempted and sometimes justified in altering the 100th case in accordance with what we consider to be a general rule. Yet even then I feel convinced we ought not to do more than place our conjectural readings below the textus receptus of the Veda,—a text so ancient and venerable that no scholar of any historical tact or critical taste would venture to foist into it a conjectural reading, however plausible, nay, however undeniable.

* Professor Aufrecht in his new edition of the text (1877) adopts the more timid reading prisinayah. See also Bṛhat-Samhitâ, transl. by Kern, p. 2: Sikâtââ prisinayo gargâ vâ lakhilyâ marîtipââ bhrîgavo ângirasaḥ kaiva sūksmâs kânye maharshayah.

There can be no clearer case of corruption in the traditional text of the Rig-veda than, for instance, in I, 70, 4, where the Pada text reads :

vârdhân yâm pûrvîḥ kshapâḥ ví-rûpâḥ sthâtúḥ ka rátham rítâ-pravitam.

All scholars who have touched on this verse, Professors Benfey, Bollensen, Roth, and others, have pointed out that instead of ka rátham, the original poet must have said karátham. The phrase sthátúh karátham, what stands and moves, occurs several times. It is evidently an ancient phrase, and hence we can account for the preservation in it of the old termination of the nom. sing. of neuters in ri, which here, as in the Greek μάρ-τυρ or μάρ-τυς, masc., appears as ur or us, while in the ordinary Sanskrit we find ri only. This nom. sing. neut. in us, explains also the common genitives and ablatives, pituh, mātuḥ, &c., which stand for pitur-s, mátur-s. This phrase sthátúh karátham occurs :

I, 58, 5. sthátúh karátham bhayate patatrínah.

What stands and what moves is afraid of Agni.

I, 68, 1. sthátúh karátham aktún ví ūrnot.

He lighted up what stands and what moves during every night.

I, 72, 6. pasún ka sthâtrñ karátham ka páhi.

Protect the cattle, and what stands and moves !

Here it has been proposed to read sthátúh instead of sthâtrñ, and I confess that this emendation is very plausible. One does not see how pasú, cattle, could be called immobilia or fixtures, unless the poet wished to make a distinction between cattle that are kept fastened in stables, and cattle that are allowed to roam about freely in the homestead. This distinction is alluded to, for instance, in the Satapatha-brâhmaṇa, XI, 8, 3, 2. saurya evaisha pasuḥ syâd iti, tasmâd etasminn astamite paravo badhyante ; badhnanty ekân yathâgoshtam, eka upasamâyanti.

I, 70, 2. gârbhaḥ ka sthâtām gârbhaḥ karátham, (read sthâtrām, and see Bollensen, Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 462.)

He who is within all that stands and all that moves.

The word karátha, if it occurs by itself, means flock, movable property :

III, 31, 15. ât ít sâkhi-bhyaḥ karátham sám airat.

He brought together, for his friends, the flocks.

VIII, 33, 8. puru-trâ karátham dadhe.

He bestowed flocks on many people.

X, 92, 13. prâ naḥ pûshâ karátham—avatu.

May Pûshan protect our flock !

Another idiomatic phrase in which sthâtúh occurs is sthâtúh gágatah, and here sthâtúh is really a genitive :

IV, 53, 6. gágatah sthâtúh ubháyasya yáh vaś.

He who is lord of both, of what is movable and what is immovable.

VI, 50, 7. vísvasya sthâtúh gágatah gánitríh.

They who created all that stands and moves.

VII, 60, 2. vísvasya sthâtúh gágatah ka gopáh.

The guardians of all that stands and moves. Cf. X, 63, 8.

I, 159, 3. sthâtúh ka satyám gágatah ka dhármani pu-trásya páthah padám ádvayávinah.

Truly while you uphold all that stands and moves, you protect the home of the guileless son. Cf. II, 31, 5.

But although I have no doubt that in I, 70, 4, the original poet said sthâtúh karátham, I should be loath to suppress the evidence of the mistake and alter the Pada text from ka rátham to karátham. The very mistake is instructive, as showing us the kind of misapprehension to which the collectors of the Vedic text were liable, and enabling us to judge how far the limits of conjectural criticism may safely be extended.

A still more extraordinary case of misunderstanding on the part of the original compilers of the Vedic texts, and likewise of the authors of the *Prātisākhya*s, the Niruktas, and other Vedic treatises, has been pointed out by Professor Kuhn. In an article of his, 'Zur ältesten Geschichte der Indogermanischen Völker' (Indische Studien, vol. i, p. 351), he made the following observation: 'The Lithuanian laukas, Lett. lauks, Pruss. laukas, all meaning field, agree exactly with the Sk. lokas, world, Lat. locus, Low Germ. (in East-Frisia and Oldenburg) louch, lôch, village. All these words are to be traced back to the Sk. uru, Gr. εὐρύς, broad, wide. The initial u is lost, as in Goth. rûms, O. H. G. rûmi, rûmin (Low Germ. rûme, an open uncultivated field in a forest), and the r changed into l. In support of this derivation it should be observed that in the Veda loka is frequently preceded by the particle u, which probably was only separated from it by the Diaskeuastæ, and that the meaning is that of open space.' Although this derivation has met with little favour, I confess that I look upon this remark, excepting only the Latin *locus, i. e. stlocus, as one of the most ingenious of this eminent scholar. The fact is that this particle u before loka is one of the most puzzling occurrences in the Veda. Professor Bollensen says that loka never occurs without a preceding u in the first eight Mandalas, and this is perfectly true with the exception of one passage which he has overlooked, VIII, 100, 12, dyaúh dehí lokám vágrāya vi-skábhe, Dyu! give room for the lightning to step forth! Professor Bollensen (l. c. p. 603) reads vritráya instead of vágrāya, without authority. He objects to dyaúh as a vocative, which should be dyaŭh; but dyaúh may be dyóh, a genitive belonging to vágrāya, in which case we should translate, Make room for the lightning of Dyu to step forth!

But what is even more important is the fact that the occurrence of this unaccented u at the beginning of a pāda is against the very rules, or, at least, runs counter to the very observations which the authors of the Prātisākhya have made on the inadmissibility of an unaccented word in such a place, so that they had to insert a special provision, Prāt. 978, exempting the unaccented u from this observation: anudāttam tu pādādaṁ novargam vidyate padam, 'no unaccented word is found at the beginning of a pāda except u!' Although I have frequently insisted on the fact that such statements of the Prātisākhya are not to be considered as rules, but simply as more or less general statistical accumulations of facts actually occurring in the Veda, I have also pointed out that we are at liberty to found on these collected facts inductive observations which may assume the character of real rules. Thus, in our case, we can well understand why there should be none, or, at least, very few instances, where an unaccented word begins a pāda. We should not begin a verse with an enclitic particle in any other language either; and as in Sanskrit a verb at the beginning of a pāda receives ipso facto the accent, and as the same applies to vocatives, no chance is left for an unaccented word in that place, except it be a particle. But the one particle that offends against this general observation is u, and the very word before which this u causes this metrical offence, is loka. Can any argument be more tempting in favour of admitting an old form uloka instead of u loka? Lokám is preceded by u in I, 93, 6; II, 30, 6; (asmín bhayá-sthe kṛinutam u lokám, make room for us, grant an escape to us, in this danger!) IV, 17, 17; VI, 23, 3; 7 (with urúm); 47, 8 (urúm naḥ lokám, or ulokám ?); 73, 2; VII, 20, 2; 33, 5 (with urúm); 60, 9 (with urúm); 84, 2 (with urúm); 99, 4 (with urúm); IX, 92, 5; X, 13, 2; 16, 4 (sukṛtām u lokám); 30, 7; 104, 10; 180, 3 (with urúm). Loké is preceded by u in III, 29, 8; V, 1, 6; loka-kṛt, IX, 86, 21; X, 133, 1. In all remaining passages u loká is found at the beginning of a pāda: lokáḥ, III, 37, 11; lokám, III, 2, 9 (u lokám u dvé (īti) úpa gāmīm iyatuḥ); V, 4, 11; loka-kṛtnúm, VIII, 15, 4; IX, 2, 8. The only passages in which loka occurs without being preceded by u, are lokám, VI, 47, 8 (see above); VIII, 100, 12; X, 14, 9; 85, 20 (amṛtasya); lokáḥ, IX, 113, 9; lokán, X, 90, 14; loké, IX, 113, 7²; X, 85, 24.

* On locus, see Corssen, Krit. Beitr. p. 463, and Aussprache, 2nd ed., p. 810. Corssen does not derive it from a root stā or sthā, but identifies it with Goth. striks, Engl. stroke, strecke.

It should be remembered that in the Gāthās the u of words beginning with urv^o does not count metrically (Hübschmann, Ein Zoroastrisches Lied, p. 37), and that in Pāli also uru must be treated as monosyllabic, in such passages as Mahāv, p. 2, line 5. The same applies to passages in the Rīg-veda, such as I, 138, 3; VII, 39, 3, where the metre requires uru to be treated as one syllable. In IX, 96, 15, the original reading may have been urur iva, instead of uru-iva.

Considering all this, I feel as convinced as it is possible to be in such matters, that in all the passages where u loká occurs and where it means space, carrière ouverte, freedom, we ought to read uloká; but in spite of this I could never bring myself to insert this word, of which neither the authors of the Brāhmaṇas nor the writers of the Prātisākhya or even later grammarians had any idea, into the text. On the contrary, I should here, too, consider it most useful to leave the traditional reading, and to add the corrections in the margin, in order that, if these conjectural emendations are in time considered as beyond the reach of doubt, they may be used as evidence in support of conjectures which, without such evidence, might seem intolerable in the eyes of timid critics.

There remains one difficulty about this hypothetical word uloká, which it is but fair to mention. If it is derived from uru, or, as Professor Bollensen suggests, from urvaḥ or urvak, the change of va into o would require further support. Neither maghon for maghavan, nor durona for dura-vaṇa are strictly analogous cases, because in each we have an a preceding the va or u. Strictly speaking, uroka presupposes uravaka, as slóka presupposes sravaka, or óka, house, avaka (from av, not from uḥ). It should also be mentioned that a compound such as RV. X, 128, 2, urúlokam (scil. antáriksham) is strange, and shows how completely the origin of loka was forgotten at the time when the hymns of the tenth Mandala were composed. But all this does not persuade us to accept Ascoli's conjecture (Lezioni di Fonologia Comparata, p. 235), that as uloga (but not uloka) is a regular Tamil form of loka, uloka in the Veda might be due to a reaction of the aboriginal dialects on the Vedic Sanskrit. We want far more evidence before admitting such a reaction during the Vedic period.

The most powerful instrument that has hitherto been applied to the emendation of Vedic texts, is the metre.

Metrical criticism. Metre means measure, and uniform measure, and hence its importance for critical purposes, as second only to that of grammar. If our knowledge of the metrical system of the Vedic poets rests on a sound basis, any deviations from the general rule are rightly objected to; and if by a slight alteration they can be removed, and the metre be restored, we naturally feel inclined to adopt such emendations. Two safeguards, however, are needed in this kind of conjectural criticism. We ought to be quite certain that the anomaly is impossible, and we ought to be able to explain to a certain extent how the deviation from the original correct text could have occurred. As this subject has of late years received considerable attention, and as emendations of the Vedic texts, supported by metrical arguments, have been carried on on a very large scale, it becomes absolutely necessary to re-examine the grounds on which these emendations are supposed to rest. There are, in fact, but few hymns in which some verses or some words have not been challenged for metrical reasons, and I feel bound, therefore, at the very beginning of my translation of the Rîg-veda, to express my own opinion on this subject, and to give my reasons why in so many cases I allow metrical anomalies to remain which by some of the most learned and ingenious among Vedic scholars would be pronounced intolerable.

Even if the theory of the ancient metres had not been so carefully worked out by the authors of the *Prâtisākhya*s and the *Anukramanī*s, an independent study of the Veda would have enabled us to discover the general rules by which the Vedic poets were guided in the composition of their works. Nor would it have been difficult to show how constantly these general principles are violated by the introduction of phonetic changes which in the later Sanskrit are called the euphonic changes of Sandhi, and according to which final vowels must be joined with initial vowels, and final consonants adapted to initial consonants, until at last each sentence becomes a continuous chain of closely linked syllables.

It is far easier, as I remarked before, to discover the original and natural rhythm of the Vedic hymns by reading them in the Pada than in the Samhitā text, and after some practice our ear becomes sufficiently schooled to tell us at once how each line ought to be pronounced. We find, on the one hand, that the rules of Sandhi, instead of being generally binding, were treated by the Vedic poets as poetical licences only; and, on the other, that a greater freedom of pronunciation was allowed even in the body of words than would be tolerated in the later Sanskrit. If a syllable was wanted to complete the metre, a semivowel might be pronounced as a vowel, many a long vowel might be protracted so as to count for two syllables, and short vowels might be inserted between certain consonants, of which no trace exists in the ordinary Sanskrit. If, on the contrary, there were too many syllables, then the rules of Sandhi were observed, or two short syllables contracted by rapid pronunciation into one ; nay, in a few cases, a final m or s, it seems, was omitted. It would be a mistake to suppose that the authors of the *Prâtisākhya*s were not aware of this freedom allowed or required in the pronunciation of the Vedic hymns. Though they abstained from introducing into the text changes of pronunciation which even we ourselves would never tolerate, if inserted in the texts of Homer and Plautus, in the Pāli verses of Buddha, or even in modern English poetry, the authors of the Prâtisākhyā were clearly aware that in many places one syllable had to be pronounced as two, or two as one. They were clearly aware that certain vowels, generally considered as long, had to be pronounced as short, and that in order to satisfy the demands of the metre, certain changes of pronunciation were indispensable. They knew all this, but they did not change the text. And this shows that the text, as they describe it, enjoyed even in their time a high authority, that they did not make it, but that, such as it is, with all its incongruities, it had been made before their time. In many cases, no doubt, certain syllables in the hymns of the Veda had been actually lengthened or shortened in the Samhitā text in accordance with the metre in which they are composed. But this was done by the poets themselves, or, at all events, it was not done by the authors of the Prâtisākhyā. They simply register such changes, but they do not enjoin them, and in this we, too, should follow their example. It is, therefore, a point of some importance in the critical restoration and proper pronunciation of Vedic texts, that in the rules which we have to follow in order to satisfy the demands of the metre, we should carefully distinguish between what is sanctioned by ancient authority, and what is the result of our own observations. This I shall now proceed to do.

First, then, the authors of the Prâtisākhyā distinctly admit that, in order to uphold the rules they have themselves laid down, certain syllables are to be pronounced as two syllables.

We read in Sûtra 527: 'In a deficient pāda the right number is to be provided for by protraction of semivowels (which were originally vowels), and of contracted vowels (which were originally two independent vowels).' It is only by this process that the short syllable which has been lengthened in the Samhitā, viz. the sixth, or the eighth, or the tenth, can be shown to have occupied and to occupy that place where alone, according to a former rule, a short syllable is liable to be lengthened. Thus we read :

I, 161, 11. ūd̐vātsvasmā ākr̥iṇōtānā trīnam.

This would seem to be a verse of eleven syllables, in which the ninth syllable na has been lengthened. This, however, is against the system of the Prātisākhya. But if we protract the semivowel v in udvatsv, and change it back into u, which it was originally, then we gain one syllable, the whole verse has twelve syllables, na occupies the tenth place, and it now belongs to that class of cases which is included in a former Sûtra, 523.

The same applies to X, 103, 13, where we read :

pretā gāyātā nārāḥ.

This is a verse of seven syllables, in which the fifth syllable is lengthened, without any authority. Let us protract pretā by bringing it back to its original component elements pra itā, and we get a verse of eight syllables, the sixth syllable now falls under the general observation, and is lengthened in the Samhitā accordingly.

The same rules are repeated in a later portion of the Prātisākhya. Here rules had been given as to the number of syllables of which certain metres consist, and it is added (Sûtras 972, 973) that where that number is deficient, it should be completed by protracting contracted vowels, and by separating consonantal groups in which semivowels (originally vowels) occur, by means of their corresponding vowel.

The rules in both places are given in almost identically the same words, and the only difference between the two passages is this, that, according to the former, semivowels are simply changed back into their vowels, while, according to the latter, the semivowel remains, but is separated from the preceding consonant by its corresponding vowel.

These rules therefore show clearly that the authors of the Prātisākhya, though they would have shrunk from altering one single letter of the authorised Samhitā, recognised the fact that where two vowels had been contracted into one, they might yet be pronounced as two; and where a vowel before another vowel had been changed into a semivowel, it might either be pronounced as a vowel, or as a semivowel preceded by its corresponding vowel. More than these two modifications, however, the Prātisākhya does not allow, or, at least, does not distinctly sanction. The commentator indeed tries to show that by the wording of the Sūtras in both places, a third modification is sanctioned, viz. the vocalisation, in the body of a word, of semivowels which do not owe their origin to an original vowel. But in both places this interpretation is purely artificial. Some such rule ought to have been given, but it was not given by the authors of the Prātisākhya. It ought to have been given, for it is only by observing such a rule that in I, 61, 12, gōr nā pārvā vī rādā tīrāskā, we get a verse of eleven syllables, and thus secure for dā in radā the eighth place, where alone the short a could be lengthened. Yet we look in vain for a rule sanctioning the change of semivowels into vowels, except where the semivowels can rightly be called kshaipra-varṇa (Sūtra 974), i.e. semivowels that were originally vowels. The independent (svābhāvika) semivowels, as e.g. the v in parva, are not included; and to suppose that in Sūtra 527 these semivowels were indicated by varṇa is impossible, particularly if we compare the similar wording of Sūtra 974*.

* It will be seen from my edition of the Prātisākhya, particularly from the extracts from Uvaṣa, given after Sūtra 974, that the idea of making two syllables out of goḥ, never entered Uvaṣa's mind. M. Regnier was right, Professor Kuhn (Beiträge, vol. iv, p. 187) was wrong. Uvaṣa, no doubt, wishes to show that original (svābhāvika) semivowels are liable to vyūha, or at least

We look in vain, too, in the Prâtisâkhya for another rule according to which long vowels, even if they do not owe their origin to the coalescence of two vowels, are liable to be protracted. However, this rule, too, though never distinctly sanctioned, is observed in the Prâtisâkhya, for unless its author observed it, he could not have obtained in the verses quoted by the Prâtisâkhya the number of syllables which he ascribes to them. According to Sûtra 937, the verse, RV. X, 134, 1, is a Mahâpañkti, and consists of six pâdas, of eight syllables each. In order to obtain that number, we must read :

sāmragāṃ kārshāṇām.

We may therefore say that, without allowing any actual change in the received text of the Samhitā, the Prâtisâkhya distinctly allows a lengthened pronunciation of certain syllables, which in the Pada text form two syllables; and we may add that, by implication, it allows the same even in cases where the Pada text also gives but one instead of two syllables. Having this authority in our favour, I do not think that we use too much liberty if we extend this modified pronunciation, recognised in so many cases by the ancient scholars of India themselves, to other cases where it seems to us required as well, in order to satisfy the metrical rules of the Veda.

Secondly, I believe it can be proved that, if not the authors of the Prâtisâkhya, those at least who constituted Shortening of the Vedic text which was current in the long vowels. ancient schools and which we now have before us, were fully aware that certain long vowels and diphthongs could be used as short. The authors of the Prâtisâkhya remark that certain changes which can take place before a short syllable only, take place likewise before the word no, although the vowel of this 'no' is by them supposed to be long. After having stated in Sûtra 523 that the eighth syllable of hendecasyllabics and dodecasyllabics, if short, is lengthened, provided a short syllable to vyavâya; but though this is true in fact, Uvaṭa does not succeed in his attempt to prove that the rules of the Prâtisâkhya sanction it.

follows, they remark that for this purpose naḥ or no is treated as a short syllable :

X, 59, 4. dyū-bhīḥ hītaḥ gāṛimā sū naḥ āstū, (Samh. sū nō āstū.)

Again, in stating that the tenth syllable of hendecasyllabics and dodecasyllabics, if short, is lengthened, provided a short syllable follows, the same exception is understood to be made in favour of naḥ or no, as a short syllable :

VII, 48, 4. nū devāsāḥ vāṛivāḥ kārtaṇā nāḥ, (Samh. kartāṇā no, bhūta no, &c.)

With regard to e being shortened before a short a where, according to rule, the a should be elided, we actually find that the Samhitā gives a instead of e in RV. VIII, 72, 5. vēti stótave ambyām, Samh. vēti stótava ambyām. (Prātis. 177, 5.)

I do not ascribe very much weight to the authority which we may derive from these observations with regard to our own treatment of the diphthongs e and o as either long or short in the Veda, yet in answer to those who are incredulous as to the fact that the vowels e and o could ever be short in Sanskrit, an appeal to the authority of those who constituted our text, and in constituting it clearly treated o as a short vowel, may not be without weight. We may also appeal to the fact that in Pāli and Prākṛit every final o and e can be treated as either long or short*. Starting from this we may certainly extend this observation, as it has been extended by Professor Kuhn, but we must not extend it too far. It is quite clear that in the same verse e and o can be used both as long and short. I give the Samhitā text :

I, 84, 17. ka īshate | tugyate kō bibhāyā
ko mamsate | santam indrām kō āntī,
kas tokāya | ka ibhāyotā rāyē
adhi bravat | tanve kō gānāyā.

* See Lassen, Inst. Linguae Præcriticæ, pp. 145, 147, 151; Cowell, Vararuchi, Introduction, p. xvii. Kedārabhaṭṭa says: Pāṇinir bhagavān prākṛitalakṣhaṇam api vakti samskrīṭād anyat, dīrghākṣhaṇam ka kutraṭid ekām mātrām upaitīti. Secundum d'Alwisium commentator docet sermonem esse de litteris Sanscriticis e et o. Cf. Pischel, De Grammaticis prakriticis, 1874.

But although there can be no doubt that e and o, when final, or at the end of the first member of a compound, may be treated in the Veda as anceps, there is no evidence, I believe, to show that the same licence applies to a medial or initial e or o. In IV, 45, 5, we must scan usrāḥ garante prati vastōḥ āsvinā, ending the verse with an epitritus tertius instead of the usual dijambus^a.

Thirdly, the fact that the initial short a, if following upon a word ending in o or e, is frequently not to be elided, is clearly recognised by the authors of the Prātisākhya (see p. xlviii). Nay, that they wished it to be pronounced even in passages where, in accordance with the requirements of the Prātisākhya, it had to disappear in the Saṃhitā text, we may conclude from Sūtra 978. It is there stated that no pāda should ever begin with a word that has no accent. The exceptions to this rule are few, and they are discussed in Sūtras 978-987. But if the initial a were not pronounced in I, 1, 9, sāḥ naḥ pitā-iva sūnāve āgne su-upāyanāḥ bhava, the second pāda would begin with āgne, a word which, after the elision of the initial a, would be a word without an accent^b.

Fourthly, the fact that other long vowels, besides e and o, may under certain circumstances be used as short in the Veda, is not merely a modern theory, but rests on no less an authority than Pāṇini himself.

^a See Professor Weber's pertinent remarks in Kuhn's Beiträge, vol. iii, p. 394. I do not think that in the verses adduced by Professor Kuhn, in which final o is considered by him as an iambus or trochee, this scanning is inevitable. Thus we may scan the Saṃhitā text:

I, 88, 2. rūkmō na śītraḥ svadhītīvān.

I, 141, 8. rāthō na yātaḥ śikvabhiḥ krīto.

I, 174, 3. sīmho na damē apāmsi vastōḥ.

VI, 24, 3. aksho na śakryoḥ sūra brīhan

X, 3, 1. inō rāgann aratiḥ samiddho.

This leaves but one of Professor Kuhn's examples (Beiträge, vol. iv, p. 192) unexplained: I, 191, 1. kaṅkato na kaṅkato, where iva for na would remove the difficulty.

^b This subject, the shortness of e and o in the Veda, has been admirably treated by Mr. Maurice Bloomfield, 'Final as before Sonants,' Baltimore, 1882. Reprinted from the American Journal of Philology, vol. iii, No. 1.

Pāṇini says, VI, 1, 127, that i, u, ri (see RV. Bh. IV, 1, 12) at the end of a pada (but not in a compound*) may remain unchanged, if a different vowel follows, and that, if long, they may be shortened. He ascribes this rule, or, more correctly, the first portion of it only, to Śākalya, Prāṭisākhya 155 seq.^b Thus ḥakri atra may become ḥakri atra or ḥakry atra. Madhū atra may become madhū atra or madhv atra. In VI, 1, 128, Pāṇini adds that a, i, u, ri may remain unchanged before ri, and, if long, may be shortened, and this again according to the teaching of Śākalya, i. e. Prāṭisākhya 136°. Hence brahmā rishih becomes brahmā rishih or brahmarshih; kumārī risyah becomes kumārī risyah or kumāry risyah. This rule enables us to explain a number of passages in which the Samhitā text either changes the final long vowel into a semivowel, or leaves it unchanged, when the vowel is a pragṛhya vowel. To the first class belong such passages as I, 163, 12; IV, 38, 10, vāgī árvā, Samh. vāgyárvā; VI, 7, 3, vāgī agne, Samh. vāgyāgne; VI, 20, 13, pakthī arkaḥ, Samh. pakthyārkaḥ; IV, 22, 4, sushmī ā góh, Samh. sushmyā góh. In these passages i is the termination of a nom. masc. of a stem ending in in. Secondly, IV, 24, 8, pātnī ákkha, Samh. pātnyákkha; IV, 34, 1, devī áhnām, Samh. devyáhnām; V, 75, 4, vānikī ā-hitā, Samh. vānikyāhitā; VI, 61, 4, avitrī avatu, Samh. avitryāvatu. In these passages the i is the termination of feminines. In X, 15, 4, ūtī arvāk, Samh. ūtyārvāk, the final i of the instrumental ūtī ought not to have been changed into a semivowel, for, though not followed by iti, it is to be treated as pragṛhya; (Prātis. 163, 5.) It is, however,

* There are certain compounds in which, according to Professor Kuhn, two vowels have been contracted into one short vowel. This is certainly the opinion of Hindu grammarians, also of the compiler of the Pada text. But most of them would admit of another explanation. Thus dhānu-arnasaḥ, which is divided into dhānu-arnasaḥ, may be dhānu-arnasaḥ (RV. V, 45, 2). Dhānarṇam, divided into dhāna-arnam, may have been dhāna-riṇam (RV. X, 46, 5). Satārṇasam (RV. VII, 100, 3) may be taken as satā-riṇasam instead of satā-arnasam.

^b In the Prāṭisākhya the rule which allows vowel before vowel to remain unchanged, is restricted to special passages, and in some of them the two vowels are savarṇa; cf. Sūtra 163.

^c Cf. Vāgasan. Prāṭisākhya, IV, 48; Indische Studien, vol. ix, 309; vol. x, 406.

mentioned as an exception in Sûtra 174, 9. The same applies to II, 3, 4, védî iti asyām, Samh. védyasyām. The pragr̥hya î ought not to have been changed into a semivowel, but the fact that it had been changed irregularly, was again duly registered in Sûtra 174, 5. These two pragr̥hya î therefore, which have really to be pronounced short, were irregularly changed in the Samhitā into the semivowel; and as this semivowel, like all semivowels, may take vyavāya, the same object was attained as if it had been written by a short vowel. With regard to pragr̥hya û, no such indication is given by the Samhitā text; but in such passages as I, 46, 13, sambhû iti sam-bhû ā gatam, Samh. sambhû ā gatam; V, 43, 4, bāhû iti ādrim, Samh. bāhû ādrim, the pragr̥hya û of the dual can be used as short, like the û of madhû atra, given as an example by the commentators of Pāṇini.

To Professor Kuhn, I believe, belongs the merit of having extended this rule to final ā. That the ā of the dual may become short, was mentioned in the Prātisākhya, Sûtra 309, though in none of the passages there mentioned is there any metrical necessity for this shortening (see p. lii). This being the case, it is impossible to deny that where this ā is followed by a vowel, and where Sandhi between the two vowels is impossible, the final ā may be treated as short. Whether it must be so treated, depends on the view which we take of the Vedic metres, and will have to be discussed hereafter. I agree with Professor Kuhn when he scans:

VI, 63, 1. kṵā tyā vālgū pūru-hūtā ādyā, (Samh. purūhūtādyā); and not kṵā tyā vālgū pūruhūtādyā, although we might quote other verses as ending with an epitritus primus.

IV, 3, 13. mā vēsasyā prā-minātāḥ mā āpēḥ, (Samh. māpēḥ), although the dispondeus is possible.

I, 77, 1. kāthā dāsemā āgnāyē kâ āsmai, (Samh. kāsmāi.)

VI, 24, 5. āryāḥ vāsasya pāri-ētā asti.

Even in a compound like tvā-ūta, I should shorten the first vowel, e. g.

X, 148, 1. tmanā tanā sānūyāmā tvā-ūtāḥ, although the passage is not mentioned by the Prātisākhya among those where a short final vowel in the eighth place is not lengthened when a short syllable follows*.

But when we come to the second pāda of a Gāyatrī, and find there a long ā, and that long ā not followed by a vowel, I cannot agree with Professor Kuhn, that the long ā, even under such circumstances, ought to be shortened. We may scan :

V, 5, 7. vātāsyā patmān īlītā dāivyā hotārā mānūshāḥ.

The same choriambic ending occurs even in the last pāda of a Gāyatrī, and is perfectly free from objection at the end of the other pādas.

So, again, we may admit the shortening of au to o in sāno avye and sāno avyaye, as quoted in the Prātisākhya, 174 and 177, but this would not justify the shortening of au to av in Anuśtubh verses, such as

V, 86, 5. mārtaṃyā devāu ādabhā, āmsā-ivā devāu ārvātē,

while, with regard to the Trishṭubh and Gagatī verses, our views on these metres must naturally depend on the difficulties we meet with in carrying them out systematically.

There is no reason for shortening ā in V, 5, 10. devānām guhyā nāmānī.

It is the second pāda of a Gāyatrī here; and we shall see that, even in the third pāda, four long syllables occur again and again.

For the same reason I cannot follow Dr. Kuhn in a number of other passages where, for the sake of the metre, he proposes to change a long ā into a short one. Such passages are in the Pada text :

VI, 46, 11. dīdyāvāḥ tigma-mūrdhānāḥ, not mūrdhānāḥ.

I, 15, 6. rītunā yagñām āsāthe, not āsāthe.

V, 66, 2. sāmyak āsūryam āsāte, not āsāte.

V, 67, 1. vārshishām kshatram āsāthe, not āsāthe. See Beitrage, vol. iii, p. 122.

I, 46, 6. tām āsmē rāsāthām īshām, not rāsāthām īshām.

* I see that Professor Kuhn, vol. iv, p. 186, has anticipated this observation in esh/au, to be read ā-ish/au.

IV, 32, 23. bābhrū yāmeshū sōbhetē, not sōbhetē.

IV, 45, 3. ūtā priyām mādhunē yūṅgāthām rāthām, not yūṅgāthām rāthām.

V, 74, 3. kām ākkhā yūṅgāthē rāthām, not yūṅgāthē rāthām.

IV, 55, 1. dyāvābhūmī (iti) āditē trāsīthām nāh, not trāsīthām nāh.

V, 41, 1. r̥tasyā vā sādasi trāsīthām nāh, not trāsīthām nāh.

I must enter the same protest against shortening other long vowels in the following verses which Professor Kuhn proposes to make metrically correct by this remedy :

I, 42, 6. hīranyāvāsīmāt-tāmā, not vāsīmāt-tāmā.

Here the short syllable of ganasrī-bhih in V, 60, 8, cannot be quoted as a precedent, for the i in ganasrī, walking in companies, was never long, and could therefore not be shortened. Still less can we quote nāri-bhyaḥ as an instance of a long i being shortened, for nāri-bhyaḥ is derived from nārih, not from nāri, and occurs with a short i even when the metre requires a long syllable; I, 43, 6. nri-bhyaḥ nāri-bhyaḥ gāvē. The fact is, that in the Rig-veda the forms nārishu and nāri-bhyaḥ never occur, but always nārishu, nāri-bhyaḥ; while from vāsī we never find any forms with short i, but always vāsishu, vāsī-bhih.

Nor is there any justification for change in I, 25, 16. gāvāh nā gavyūtiḥ ānu, the second pāda of a Gâyatrī. Nor in V, 56, 3. rīkshāh nā vāh mārūtaḥ śimī-vān āmāh. In most of the passages mentioned by Professor Kuhn on p. 122, this peculiarity may be observed, that the eighth syllable is short, or, at all events, may be short, when the ninth is long :

VI, 44, 21. vr̥ishnē tē indūh vr̥ishabhā' pīpāyā.

I, 73, 1. syōnā-sīh ātithīh nā' prīnānāh.

VII, 13, 1. bharē haviḥ nā barhishī' prīnānāh.

II, 28, 7. ēnāh kr̥invāntām āsurā bhr̥ināntī.

Before, however, we can settle the question whether in these and other places certain vowels should be pronounced as either long or short, we must settle the more general

Metre and question, what authority we have for requiring a long or a short syllable in certain places of the Vedic metres.

If we declare ourselves free from all authority, either grammatical or metrical, we may either sacrifice all grammar to metre, or all metre to grammar. We may introduce the strictest rules of metre, determining the length or shortness of every syllable, and then ignore all rules of grammar and quantity, treat short syllables as long, or long ones as short, and thus secure the triumph of metre. Or, we may allow great latitude in Vedic metres, particularly in certain pādas, and thus retain all the rules of grammar which determine the quantity of syllables. It may be said even that the result would really be the same in either case, and that the policy of 'thorough' might perhaps prove most useful in the end. It may be so hereafter, but in the present state of Vedic scholarship it seems more expedient to be guided by native tradition, and to study the compromise which the ancient students of the Veda have tried to effect between grammar on one side and metre on the other.

Now it has generally been supposed that the Prātisākhya teaches that there must be a long syllable in the eighth or tenth place of Traishubha and Gāgata, and in the sixth place of Ānushubha pādas. This is not the case. The Prātisākhya, no doubt, says, that a short final vowel, but not any short syllable, occupying the eighth or tenth place in a Traishubha and Gāgata pāda, or the sixth place in a Gāyatra pāda, is lengthened, but it never says that it must be lengthened; on the contrary, it gives a number of cases where it is not so lengthened. But, what is even more important, the Prātisākhya distinctly adds a proviso which shows that the ancient critics of the Veda did not consider the trochee as the only possible foot for the sixth and seventh syllables of Gāyatra, or for the eighth and ninth, or tenth and eleventh syllables of Traishubha and Gāgata pādas. They distinctly admit that the seventh and the ninth and the eleventh syllables in such pādas may be long, and that in that case the preceding short vowel is not lengthened. We thus get the iambus in the very place which is generally occupied by the trochee. According to the Prātisākhya, the general scheme for the Gāyatra would be, not only

$$+ + + + | + \overset{6}{-} \overset{7}{\cup} +,$$

but also

$$+ + + + | + \overset{6}{\cup} \overset{7}{-} +;$$

and for the Traishṭubha and Gāgata, not only

$$+ + + + | + + + \overset{8}{-} \overset{9}{\cup} + + (+),$$

but also

$$+ + + + | + + + \overset{8}{\cup} \overset{9}{-} + + (+).$$

And again, for the same pādas, not only

$$+ + + + | + + + + | \overset{10}{+} \overset{11}{-} \cup (+),$$

but also

$$+ + + + | + + + + | \overset{10}{+} \overset{11}{\cup} - (+).$$

Before appealing, however, to the Prātisākhya for the establishment of such a rule as that the sixth syllable of Ānushṭubha and the eighth or tenth syllable of Traishṭubha and Gāgata pādas must be lengthened, provided a short syllable follows, it is indispensable that we should have a clear appreciation of the real character of the Prātisākhya. If we carefully follow the thread which runs through these books, we shall soon perceive that, even with the proviso that a short syllable follows, the Prātisākhya never teaches that certain final vowels must be lengthened. The object of the Prātisākhya, as I pointed out on a former occasion, is to register all the facts which possess a phonetic interest. In doing this, all kinds of plans are adopted in order to bring as large a number of cases as possible under general categories. These categories are purely technical and external, and they never assume, with the authors of the Prātisākhya, the character of general rules. Let us now, after these preliminary remarks, return to the Sūtras 523 to 535, which we discussed before. The Prātisākhya simply says that certain syllables which are short in the Pada, if occupying a certain place in a verse, are lengthened in the Samhitā, provided a short syllable follows. This looks, no doubt, like a general rule which should be carried out under all circumstances. But this idea never entered the minds of the authors of the Prātisākhya. They only give this rule as the most convenient way of registering the lengthening of certain syllables which have actually been lengthened in the text of the Samhitā, while they remain short in the Pada; and after having done this, they proceed to give a number of verses where the same rule might be supposed to apply, but where in the text of the Samhitā the short syllable has not been lengthened. After having given a long string of words which are short in the Pada and long in the Samhitā, and where no intelligible reason of their lengthening can be given, at least not by the authors of the Prātisākhya, the Prātisākhya adds in Sūtra 523, 'The final vowel of the eighth syllable is lengthened in pādas of eleven and twelve syllables, provided a syllable follows which is short in the Samhitā.' As instances the commentator gives (Samhitā text):

I, 32, 4. tādītñā sātṛum nā kīlā vivītse.

I, 94, 1. āgnē sākhyē mā rishāmā vāyām tāvā.

Then follows another rule (Sūtra 525) that 'The final vowel of the tenth syllable in pādas of eleven and twelve syllables is lengthened, provided a syllable follows which is short in the Samhitā.' As instances the commentator gives:

III, 54, 22. āhā vīsvā sumānā dīdihī nāh.

II, 34, 9. āva rudrā asāsō hantānā vādhaḥ.

Lastly, a rule is given (Sūtra 526) that 'The final vowel of the sixth syllable is lengthened in a pāda of eight syllables, provided a syllable follows which is short:'

I, 5, 10. īśānō yāvāyā vādham.

If the seventh syllable is long no change takes place:

IX, 67, 30. ā pāvāsvā devā sōmā.

While we ourselves should look upon these rules as founded in the very nature of the metre, which, no doubt, to a certain extent they are, the authors of the Prātisākhya use them simply as convenient nets for catching as many cases as possible of lengthened syllables actually occurring in the text of the Samhitā. For this purpose, and in order to avoid giving a number of special rules, they add in this place an observation, very important to us as throwing light on the real pronunciation of the Vedic hymns at the time when our Samhitā text was finally settled, but with them again a mere expedient for enlarging the preceding rules, and thus catching more cases of lengthening at one haul. They say in Sūtra 527, that in order to get the right number of syllables in such verses, we must pronounce sometimes one syllable as two. Thus only can the lengthened syllable be got into one of the places required by the preceding Sūtra, viz. the sixth, the eighth, or the tenth place, and thus only can a large number of lengthened syllables be comprehended under the same general rule of the Prātisākhya. In all this we ourselves can easily recognise a principle which guided the compilers of the Samhitā text, or the very authors of the hymns, in lengthening syllables which in the Pada text are short, and which were liable to be lengthened because they occupied certain places on which the stress of the metre would naturally fall. We also see quite clearly that these compilers, or those whose pronunciation they tried to perpetuate, must have pronounced certain syllables as two syllables, and we naturally consider that we have a right to try the same expedient in other cases where to us, though not to them, the metre seems deficient, and where it could be rendered perfect by pronouncing one syllable as two. Such thoughts, however, never entered the minds of the authors of the Prātisākhyas, who are satisfied with explaining what is, according to the authority of the Samhitā, and who never attempt to say what ought to be, even against the authority of the Samhitā. While in some cases they have ears to hear and to appreciate the natural flow of the poetical language of the Rishis, they seem at other times as deaf as the adder to the voice of the charmer.

A general rule, therefore, in our sense of the word, that the eighth syllable in hendecasyllabics and dodecasyllabics, the tenth syllable in hendecasyllabics and dodecasyllabics, and the sixth syllable in octosyllabics should be lengthened, rests in no sense on the authority of ancient grammarians. Even as a mere observation, they restrict it by the condition that the next syllable must be short, in order to provoke the lengthening of the preceding syllable, thereby sanctioning, of course, many exceptions; and they then proceed to quote a number of cases where, in spite of all, the short syllable remains short*. In some of these quotations they are no doubt wrong, but in most of them their statement cannot be disputed.

As to the eighth syllable being short in hendecasyllabics and dodecasyllabics, they quote such verses as,

VI, 66, 4. āntār (īti) śāntāḥ āvādyānī pūnānāḥ.

Thus we see that in VI, 44, 9, vārshīyāḥ vāyāḥ krīṇūhī śakībhīḥ, hi remains short; while in VI, 25, 3, gāhī vrīṣṇyānī krīṇūhī pārākāḥ, it is lengthened in the Samhitā, the only difference being that in the second passage the accent is on hī.

As to the tenth syllable being short in a dodecasyllabic, they quote

II, 27, 14. āditē mītrā vārūṇā ūtā mrīḷā.

As to the tenth syllable being short in a hendecasyllabic, they quote

II, 20, 1. vāyām tē vāyāḥ īndrā viddhī sū nāḥ.

As to the sixth syllable being short in an octosyllabic, they quote

VIII, 23, 26. māhāḥ vīśvān ābhī sātāḥ.

A large number of similar exceptions are collected from

* 'Wo die achtsilbigen Reihen mit herbeigezogen sind, ist es in der Regel bei solchen Liedern geschehen, die im Ganzen von der regelmässigen Form weniger abweichen, und für solche Fälle, wo auch das Prātisākhya die Längung der sechsten Silbe in achtsilbigen Reihen vorschreibt, nämlich wo die siebente von Natur kurz ist. Die achtsilbigen Reihen bedürfen einer erneuten Durchforschung, da es mehrfach schwer fällt, den Samhitāttext mit der Vorschrift der Prātisākhya in Übereinstimmung zu bringen.' Kuhn, Beiträge, vol. iii, p. 450; and still more strongly, p. 458.

528, 3 to 534, 94, and this does not include any cases where the ninth, the eleventh, or the seventh syllable is long, instead of being short, while it does include cases where the eighth syllable is long, though the ninth is not short, or, at least, is not short according to the views of the collectors of these passages. See Sûtra 522, 6.

Besides the cases mentioned by the Prâtisākhya itself, where a short syllable, though occupying a place which would seem to require lengthening, remains short, there are many others which the Prâtisākhya does not mention, because, from its point of view, there was no necessity for doing so. The Prâtisākhya has been blamed^a for omitting such cases as I, 93, 6, urum yagñāya kakrathūr u lokam; or I, 96, 1, devā agnim dhārayan drāvinodām. But though occupying the eighth place, and though followed by a short syllable, these syllables could never fall under the general observation of the Prâtisākhya, because that general observation refers to final vowels only, but not to short syllables in general. Similar cases are I, 107, 1^a; 122, 9; 130, 10; 152, 6; 154, 1; 158, 5^a; 163, 2; 167, 10^a; 171, 4; 173, 6; 179, 1^a; 182, 8^a; 186, 6, &c.

If, therefore, we say that, happen what may, these metrical rules must be observed, and the text of the Veda altered in order to satisfy the requirements of these rules, we ought to know at all events that we do this on our own responsibility, and that we cannot shield ourselves behind the authority of Saunaka or Kātyāyana. Now it is well known that Professor Kuhn^b has laid down the rule that the Traishṭubha pādas must end in a bacchius or amphibrachys $\cup - \cup$, and the Gāgata pādas in a dijambus or pæon secundus $\cup - \cup \cup$. With regard to Ānushṭubha pādas, he requires the dijambus or pæon secundus $\cup - \cup \cup$ at the end of a whole verse only, allowing greater freedom in the formation of the preceding pādas. In a later article, however, the final pāda, too, in Ânushṭubha metre is allowed greater freedom, and the rule, as above given, is strictly maintained with regard to the Traishṭubha and Gāgata pādas only.

^a 'Dazu kommt, dass der uns vorliegende *Samhitāt*ext vielfältig gar nicht mit Saunaka's allgemeiner Regel übereinstimmt, indem die Verlängerung kurzer Silben nicht unter den Bedingungen eingetreten ist, die er vorschreibt.' Kuhn, Beiträge, vol. iii, p. 459.

^b Beiträge zur Vergleichenden Sprachforschung, vol. iii, p. 118.

This subject is so important, and affects so large a number of passages in the Veda, that it requires the most careful examination. The Vedic metres, though at first sight very perplexing, are very simple, if reduced to their primary elements. The authors of the Prātisākhya have elaborated a most complicated system. Counting the syllables in the most mechanical manner, they have assigned nearly a hundred names to every variety which they discovered in the hymns of the Rig-veda^a. But they also observed that the constituent elements of all these metres were really but four, (Sûtras 988, 989):

1. The Gâyatra pāda, of eight syllables, ending in ॐ -.
2. The Vairāga pāda, of ten syllables, ending in --.
3. The Traishṭubha pāda, of eleven syllables, ending in --.
4. The Gāgata pāda, of twelve syllables, ending in ॐ -.

Then follows an important rule, Sûtra 990: 'The penultimate syllable,' he says, 'in a Gâyatra and Gāgata pāda is light (laghu), in a Vairāga and Traishṭubha pāda heavy (guru).' This is called their vr̥tta.

This word vr̥tta, which is generally translated by metre, had evidently originally a more special meaning. It meant the final rhythm, or if we take it literally, the turn of a line, for it is derived from vr̥t, to turn. Hence vr̥tta is the same word as the Latin versus, verse; but I do not wish to decide whether the connection between the two words is historical, or simply etymological. In Latin, versus is always supposed to have meant originally a furrow, then a line, then a verse. In Sanskrit the metaphor that led to the formation of vr̥tta, in the sense of final rhythm, has nothing to do with ploughing. If, as I have tried to prove (Chips from a German Workshop, vol. i, p. 84), the names assigned to metres and metrical language were derived from words originally referring to choregic movements, vr̥tta must have meant the turn, i. e. the last step of any given movement; and this turn, as determining the general character of the whole movement, would naturally be regulated by more severe rules, while greater freedom would be allowed for the rest.

^a See Appendix to my edition of the Prātisākhya, p. cccvi.

Having touched on this subject, I may add another fact in support of my view. The words Trishṭubh and Anushṭubh, names for the most common metres, are generally derived from a root stubh, to praise. I believe they should be derived from a root stubh, which is preserved in Greek, not only in στυφελός, hard, στυφελίζω, to strike hard, but in the root στεμφ, from which στέμφυλον, stamped or pressed olives or grapes, and ἀστεμφής, untrodden (grapes), then unshaken; and in στέμβω, to shake, to ram, στοβέω, to scold, &c. In Sanskrit this root is mentioned in the Dhātupāṭha X, 34, shtubhu stambhe, and it exists in a parallel form as stambh, lit. to stamp down, then to fix, to make firm, with which Bopp has compared the German stampfen, to stamp; (Glossarium, s. v. stambh.) I therefore look upon Trishṭubh as meaning originally tripudium, (supposing this word to be derived from tri and pes, according to the expression in Horace, pepulisse ter pede terram, Hor. Od. iii. 18,) and I explain its name ‘Three-step,’ by the fact that the three last syllables ṭubh, which form the characteristic feature of that metre, and may be called its real vr̥tta or turn, were audibly stamped at the end of each turn or strophe. I explain Anushṭubh, which consists of four equal pādas, each of eight syllables, as the ‘After-step,’ because each line was stamped regularly after the other, possibly by two choruses, each side taking its turn. There is one passage in the Veda where Anushṭubh seems to have preserved this meaning:

X, 124, 9. anu-stúbham ánu karkûryámānam índram ní kikyuh kaváyah manishá.

Poets by their wisdom discovered Indra dancing to an Anushṭubh.

In V, 52, 12, khandah-stúbhah kubhanyávaḥ útsam á kīrīṇaḥ nṛītuḥ, in measured steps (i.e. stepping the metre) and wildly shouting the gleemen have danced toward the spring.

Other names of metres which point to a similar origin, i.e. to their original connection with dances, are Pada-paṅkti, 'Step-row;' Nyāṅku-sāriṇī, 'Roe-step;' Abhisāriṇī, 'Contre-danse,' &c.

If now we return to the statement of the Prātisākhya in reference to the vṛittas, we should observe how careful its author is in his language. He does not say that the penultimate is long or short, but he simply states, that, from a metrical point of view, it must be considered as light or heavy, which need not mean more than that it must be pronounced with or without stress. The fact that the author of the Prātisākhya uses these terms, laghu and guru, instead of hrasva, short, and dīrgha, long, shows in fact that he was aware that the penultimate in these pādas is not invariably long or short, though, from a metrical point of view, it is always heavy or light.

It is perfectly true that if we keep to these four pādas, (to which one more pāda, viz. the half Vairāga, consisting of five syllables, might be added,) we can reduce nearly all the hymns of the Rig-veda to their simple elements which the ancient poets combined together, in general in a very simple way, but occasionally with greater freedom. The most important strophes, formed out of these pādas, are,

1. Three Gāyatra pādas=the Gāyatrī, (24 syllables.)
2. Four Gāyatra pādas=the Anuṣṭubh, (32 syllables.)
3. Four Vairāga pādas=the Virāg, (40 syllables.)
4. Four Traishṭubha pādas=the Trishṭubh, (44 syllables.)
5. Four Gāgata pādas=the Gagatī, (48 syllables.)

Between the Gāyatrī and Anuṣṭubh strophes, another strophe may be formed, by mixture of Gāyatra and Gāgata pādas, consisting of 28 syllables, and commonly called Uṣṇih; likewise between the Anuṣṭubh and the Virāg, a strophe may be formed, consisting of 36 syllables, and commonly called Bṛīhatī.

In a collection of hymns, however, like that of the Rig-veda, where poems of different ages, different places, and different families have been put together, we must be prepared for exceptions to many rules. Thus, although the final turn of the hendecasyllabic Traishṭubha is, as a rule, the bacchius, ◡ — —, yet if we take, for instance, the 77th hymn of the tenth Maṇḍala, we clearly perceive another hendecasyllabic pāda of a totally different structure, and worked up into one of the most beautiful strophes by an ancient poet. Each line is divided into two halves, the first consisting of seven syllables, being an exact counterpart of the first member of a Saturnian verse (fate Romae Metelli); the second a dijambus, answering boldly to the broken rhythm of the first member*. We have, in fact, a Trishṭubh where the turn or the three-step, ◡ — —, instead of being at the end, stands in the middle of the line.

X, 77, 1-5, in the Pada text :

1. ābhṛā-prūṣhāḥ nā vākā' prūṣhā vāsū,
hāvishmāntāḥ nā yāgñāḥ' vī-gānūṣhāḥ | &c.

Another strophe, the nature of which has been totally misapprehended by native metricians, occurs in IV, 10. It is there called Padapañkti and Mahāpadapañkti; nay, attempts have been made to treat it even as an Ushnih, or as a kind of Gāyatrī. The real character of that strophe is so palpable that it is difficult to understand how it could have been mistaken. It consists of two lines, the first embracing three or four feet of five syllables each, having the ictus on the first and the fourth syllables, and resembling the last line of a Sapphic verse. The second line is simply a Trishūbh. It is what we should call an asynartete strophe, and the contrast of the rhythm in the first and second lines is very effective. I am not certain whether Professor Bollensen, who has touched on this metre in an article just published (Zeitschrift der D. M. G., vol. xxii, p. 572), shares this opinion. He has clearly seen that the division of the lines, as given in the MSS. of the Samhitā text, is wrong; but he seems inclined to admit the same rhythm throughout, and to treat the strophe as consisting of four lines of five syllables each, and one of six syllables, which last line is to submit to the prevailing rhythm of the preceding lines. If we differ, however, as to the internal architecture of this strophe, we agree in condemning the interpretation proposed by the Prātisākhya; and I should, in connection with this, like to call attention to two important facts: first, that the Samhitā text, in not changing, for instance, the final t of martāt, betrays itself as clearly later than the elaboration of the ancient theory of metres, later than the invention of such a metre as the Padapañkti; and secondly, that the accentuation, too, of the Samhitā is thus proved to be posterior to the establishment of these fanciful metrical divisions, and hence cannot throughout claim so irrefragable an authority as certainly belongs to it in many cases. I give the Samhitā text:

* Professor Kuhn (vol. iii, p. 450) is inclined to admit the same metre as varying in certain hymns with ordinary Traishṭubha pādas, but the evidence he brings forward is hardly sufficient. Even if we object to the endings ◡ — ◡ — and — — ◡ —, V, 33, 4, may be a Gāgata, with vyūha of dāsa, the remark quoted from the Prātisākhya being of no consequence on such points; and the same remedy would apply to V, 41, 5, with vyūha of eshe. In VI, 47, 31, vyūha of arvaparnaiḥ; in I, 33, 9, vyūha of indra and rodasī; in II, 24, 5, vyūha of mād̥bhiḥ would produce the same effect; while in I, 121, 8, we must either admit the Traishṭubha vṛtta — ◡ — or scan dhukshān. In III, 58, 6, I should admit vyūha for narā; in IV, 26, 6, for māṇḍram; in I, 100, 8, for gṛyotīḥ, always supposing that we consider the ending — — ◡ — incompatible with a Trishṭubh verse.

1. Āgnē tam ādyā | āsvām nā stōmāiḥ | krātūm nā bhādrām, hrīdisprīṣām rīdhīyāmā tā ōhaiḥ.
2. Ādhā hy āgnē | krātōr bhādrāsyā | dākshāsyā sādhoḥ, rāthīr rītāsyā brīhātō bābhūtha, &c.

Now it is perfectly true that, as a general rule, the syllables composing the vṛtta or turn of the different metres, and described by the Prātisākhya as heavy or light, are in reality long or short. The question, however, is this, have we a right, or are we obliged, in cases where that syllable is not either long or short, as it ought to be, so to alter the text, or so to change the rules of pronunciation, that the penultimate may again be what we wish it to be?

If we begin with the Gāyatra pāda, we have not to read long before we find that it would be hopeless to try to crush the Gāyatrī verses of the Vedic R̥ṣhis on this Procrustean bed. Even Professor Kuhn very soon perceived that this was impossible. He had to admit that in the Gāyatrī the two first pādas, at all events, were free from this rule, and though he tried to retain it for the third or final pāda, he was obliged after a time to give it up even there. Again, it is perfectly true, that in the third pāda of the Gāyatrī, and in the second and fourth pādas of the Anushūbh strophe, greater care is taken by the poets to secure a short syllable for the penultimate, but here, too, exceptions cannot be entirely removed. We have only to take such a single hymn as I, 27, and we shall see that it would be impossible to reduce it to the uniform standard of Gāyatrī pādas, all ending in a dijambus.

But what confirms me even more in my view that such strict uniformity must not be looked for in the ancient hymns of the R̥ṣhis, is the fact that in many cases it would be so very easy to replace the irregular by a regular dipodia. Supposing that the original poets had restricted themselves to the dijambus, who could have put in the place of that regular dijambus an irregular dipodia? Certainly not the authors of the Prātisākhya, for their ears had clearly discovered the general rhythm of the ancient metres; nor their predecessors, for they had in many instances preserved the tradition of syllables lengthened in accordance with the requirements of the metre. I do not mean to insist too strongly on this argument, or to represent those who handed down the tradition of the Veda as endowed with anything like apaurusheyatva. Strange accidents have happened in the text of the Veda, but they have generally happened when the sense of the hymns had ceased to be understood; and if anything helped to preserve the Veda from greater accidents, it was due, I believe, to the very fact that the metre continued to be understood, and that oral tradition, however much it might fail in other respects, had at all events to satisfy the ears of the hearers. I should have been much less surprised if all irregularities in the metre had been smoothed down by the flux and reflux of oral tradition, a fact which is so apparent in the text of Homer, where the gaps occasioned by the loss of the digamma, were made good by the insertion of unmeaning particles; but I find it difficult to imagine by what class of men, who must have lived between the original poets and the age of the Prātisākhyas, the simple rhythm of the Vedic metres should have been disregarded, and the sense of rhythm, which ancient people possess in a far higher degree than we ourselves, been violated through crude and purposeless alterations. I shall give a few specimens only. What but a regard for real antiquity could have induced people in VIII, 2, 8, to preserve the defective foot of a Gāyatrī verse, śāmānē ādhī bhārmān? Any one acquainted with Sanskrit would naturally read śāmānē ādhī bhārmānī. But who would have changed bhārmāni, if that had been there originally, to bhārmān? I believe we must scan śāmānē ādhī bhārmān, or śāmānē ādhī bhārmān, the pæon tertius being a perfectly legitimate foot at the end of a Gāyatrī verse. In X, 158, 1, we can understand how an accident happened. The original poet may have said : Śūryō nō dīvas pātu pātu vātō āntārikshāt, āgnīr nāḥ pārthivēbhyaḥ. Here one of the two pātu was lost. But if in the same hymn we find in the second verse two feet of nine instead of eight syllables each, I should not venture to alter this except in pronunciation, because no reason can be imagined why any one should have put these irregular lines in the place of regular ones.

In V, 41, 10, grīṇīte āgnīr ētarī nā sūshaiḥ, sōḥīshkēso nī rīṇātī vanā, every modern Pandit would naturally read vanāni instead of vanā, in order to get the regular Trishubh metre. But this being the case, how can we imagine that even the most ignorant member of an ancient Parishad should wilfully have altered vanāni into vanā? What surprises one is, that vanā should have been spared, in spite of every temptation to change it into vanāni, for I cannot doubt for one moment that vanā is the right reading, only that the ancient poets pronounced it vāṇā. Wherever we alter the text of the Rig-veda by conjecture, we ought to be able, if possible, to give some explanation how the mistake which we wish to remove came to be committed. If a passage is obscure, difficult to construe, if it contains words which occur in no other place, then we can understand how, during a long process of oral tradition, accidents may have happened. But when everything is smooth and easy, when the intention of the poet is not to be mistaken, when the same phrase has occurred many times before, then to suppose that a simple and perspicuous sentence was changed into a complicated and obscure string of words, is more difficult to understand. I know there are passages where we cannot as yet account for the manner in which an evidently faulty reading found its way into both the Pada and Samhitā texts, but in those very passages we cannot be too circumspect. If we read VIII, 40, 9, pūrvīṣh ṛā īndrō-pamātāyāh pūrvīr ūtā prāsastāyāh, nothing seems more tempting than to omit indra, and to read pūrvīṣh ṛā ūpamātāyāh. Nor would it be difficult to account for the insertion of indra; for though one would hardly venture to call it a marginal gloss that crept into the text—a case which, as far as I can see, has never happened in the hymns of the Rig-veda—it might be taken for an explanation given by an Ātārya to his pupils, in order to inform them that the ninth verse, different from the eighth, was addressed to Indra. But however plausible this may sound, the question remains whether the traditional reading could not be maintained, by admitting synizesis of opa, and reading pūrvīṣh ṛā īndropamātāyāh. For a similar synizesis of — u, see III, 6, 10. prākī adhvarēva tasthātūh, unless we read prākya adhvarēva.

Another and more difficult case of synizesis occurs in

VII, 86, 4. āvā tvānēnā nāmāsā tura(h) iyām.

It would be easy to conjecture tvareyām instead of tura iyām, but tvareyām, in the sense of 'let me hasten,' is not Vedic. The choriambic ending, however, of a Trishubh can be proved to be legitimate, and if that is the case, then even the synizesis of tura, though hard, ought not to be regarded as impossible.

In II, 18, 5, ā vimsatyā trimsatā yāh̄y ārvān̄, ā k̄atvārim̄satā haribh̄ir yūgān̄aḥ,
ā pāṇk̄asatā sūrathebh̄ir īndrā,
ā shash̄tyā sap̄tatyā sōmap̄eyām,

Professor Kuhn proposes to omit the ā at the beginning of the second line, in order to have eleven instead of twelve syllables. By doing so he loses the uniformity of the four pādas, which all begin with ā, while by admitting synizesis of haribhiḥ all necessity for conjectural emendation disappears.

If the poets of the Veda had objected to a pæon quartus (— — — —) at the end of a Gâyatrī, what could have been easier than to change IV, 52, 1, divo adarsī duh̄itā, into adarsī duh̄itā divāḥ? or X, 118, 6, ādābhyām gr̄ih̄apātīm, into gr̄ih̄apātīm ādābhyām?

If an epitritus secundus (— — —) had been objectionable in the same place, why not say VI, 61, 10, stōmyā bhūt sārāsvatī, instead of sārāsvatī stōmyā bhūt? Why not VIII, 2, 11, rēvantām hī sr̄inōmī tvā, instead of rēvantām hī tvā sr̄inōmī?

If an ionicus a minore (— — —) had been excluded from that place, why not say I, 30, 10, gar̄itr̄ibhyaḥ sakh̄e vāso, instead of sakh̄e vāso gar̄itr̄ibhyaḥ? or I, 41, 7, vārun̄asyā mah̄i psārāḥ, instead of mah̄i psārō vārun̄asyā?

If a dispondeus (— — —) was to be avoided, then V, 68, 3, māh̄i vām kshātrām devēshū, might easily have been replaced by deveshu vām kshātrām māh̄i, and VIII, 2, 10, sukrā āsirām yāḥantē, by sukrā yāḥantā āsirām.

If no epitritus primus (— — —) was allowed, why not say VI, 61, 11, nīdās pātū sārāsvatī, instead of sārāsvatī nīdās pātū, or VIII, 79, 4, dvēshō yāvīr āghāsyā k̄it, instead of yāvīr āghāsyā k̄id dvēshāḥ?

Even the epitritus tertius (— — —) might easily have been avoided by dropping the augment of apām in X, 119, 1-13, kuvit somasyāpām itī. It is, in fact, a variety of less frequent occurrence than the rest, and might possibly be eliminated with some chance of success.

Lastly, the choriambus (— — —) could have been removed in III, 24, 5, śīśīhī nāh sūnūmātāh, by reading sūnūmātāh śīśīhī nāh, and in VIII, 2, 31, sānād āmrīktō dayātē, by reading āmrīktō dayātē sānāt.

But I am afraid the idea that regularity is better than irregularity, and that in the Veda, where there is a possibility, the regular metre is to be restored by means of conjectural emendations, has been so ably advocated by some of the most eminent scholars, that a merely general argument would now be of no avail. I must therefore give as much evidence as I can bring together in support of the contrary opinion; and though the process is a tedious one, the importance of the consequences with regard to Vedic criticism leaves me no alternative. With regard, then, to

Seven the final dipodia of Gāyatrī verses, I still Gāyatra Vṛttas. hold and maintain, that, although the dijambus is by far the most general metre, the following seven varieties have to be recognised in the poetry of the Veda*:

1. — — —, 2. — — —, 3. — — —, 4. — — —, 5. — — —,
6. — — —, 7. — — —, 8. — — —.

I do not pretend to give every passage in which these varieties occur, but I hope I shall give a sufficient number in support of every one of them. I have confined myself almost entirely to the final dipodia of Gāyatrī verses, as the Ānushṭubha verses would have swelled the lists too much.

§ 2. — — — —.

I, 12, 9. tasmai pāvakaṁ mṛīṣyā. (Instead of mṛīlaya, it has been proposed to read mardaya.)

I, 18, 9. divo na sadmāmākṣāṣām.

I, 42, 4; 46, 2; 97, 1-8; III, 11, 3; 27, 10; IV, 15, 7;

* See some important remarks on these varieties in Mr. J. Boxwell's article 'On the Triśṭubh Metre,' Journal Asiat. Soc. Beng., 1885, p. 79.

32, 4; 52, 1; V, 5, 9; 7, 4; 7, 5; 7, 7; 9, 4; 53, 12; 61, 3;
61, 11; 64, 5; 65, 4; 82, 9; VI, 16, 17; 16, 18; 16, 45;
45, 17; 61, 4; VII, 15, 14; 66, 2; VIII, 6, 35; 6, 42;
32, 10; 44, 28; 45, 31; 72, 6; 72, 13; 80, 1; 83, 3; 93,
27; IX, 61, 5; 64, 1; X, 118, 6.

§ 3. — ∪ — —.

I, 22, 11. akkhinnapatrāḥ sākāntām.

I, 30, 13. kshumanto yābhīr mādēmā.

I, 41, 8; 90, 1; 90, 4; 120, 1; V, 19, 1; 70, 3; VI, 61,
10; VIII, 2, 2; 2, 4; 2, 5; 2, 11; 2, 12; 2, 13; 2, 14;
2, 15; 2, 16; 2, 17; 2, 29; 2, 30; 2, 32; 2, 33; 2, 36;
2, 37; 7, 30; 7, 33; 11, 2; 11, 3; 11, 4; 16, 3; 16, 4; 16, 5; 16, 7; 46, 2; 71, 2; 81, 1; 81, 3; 81, 4; 81, 7;
81, 9; 94, 2; IX, 62, 5; X, 20, 4; 20, 7.

§ 4. ∪ ∪ — —.

I, 3, 8. usrā iva svāsārāṇī.

I, 27, 4. agne deveshū prā vōkāḥ.

I, 30, 10; 30, 15; 38, 7; 38, 8; 41, 7; 43, 7; II, 6, 2;
III, 27, 3; V, 82, 7; VI, 16, 25; 16, 26; 61, 12; VIII, 2, 1; 2, 3; 2, 8; 2, 18; 2, 19; 2, 21; 2, 22; 2, 23; 2, 26;
2, 35; 16, 2; 16, 6; 16, 8; 71, 9; 79, 3; IX, 21, 5; 62, 6;
66, 21; X, 20, 5; 185, 1; 185, 2; 185, 3.

§ 5. — — — —.

I, 2, 7. dhiyam ghrītākīm sādhanā.

I, 3, 4. anvibhis tanā pūtāsāḥ.

I, 27, 3; 90, 2; II, 6, 4; III, 41, 8; V, 68, 3; 68, 4;
VIII, 2, 10; 2, 24; 16, 1; 16, 12; 79, 2; IX, 66, 17; X, 20, 6; 20, 8.

§ 6. ∪ — — —.

I, 15, 6. ritunā yagnām āsāthē.

I, 38, 2. kva vo gāvo nā rānyānti (see note to I, 38, 2).

I, 38, 9; 86, 9; III, 27, 2; 41, 3; IV, 32, 23; V, 68, 5; 70, 2; VI, 61, 11; VIII, 2, 20; 2, 25; 7, 32; 26, 19; 79, 4;
79, 5; 81, 6; X, 158, 4.

§ 7. — — — —.

I, 10, 8. sām gā āsmābhyām dhūnuhī.

I, 12, 5. āgnē tvām rakshasvināh.

I, 37, 15; 43, 8; 46, 6; III, 62, 7; IV, 30, 21; V, 86, 5; VIII, 5, 32; 5, 35; X, 119, 1-13; 144, 4.

§ 8. — — — —.

I, 2, 9. daksham dadhātē āpāsām (or § 2).

I, 6, 10. indram maho vā rāgasāh.

I, 27, 6; 30, 21; 41, 9; 90, 5; III, 24, 5; V, 19, 2; 70, 1; 70, 4; 82, 8; VIII, 2, 27; 2, 31; 16, 9; 55, 4; 67, 19; 81, 5; 81, 8; IX, 47, 2.

But although with regard to the Gāyatra, and I may add, the Ānushūbha pādas, the evidence as to the variety Traishūbha and of their vr̥ttas is such that it can hardly be Gāyata Pādas.

resisted, a much more determined stand has been made in defence of the vr̥tta of the Traishūbha and Gāyata pādas. Here Professor Kuhn and those who follow him maintain that the rule is absolute, that the former must end in — —, the latter in — — —, and that the eighth syllable, immediately preceding these syllables, ought, if possible, to be long. Nor can I deny that Professor Kuhn has brought forward powerful arguments in support of his theory, and that his emendations of the Vedic text recommend themselves by their great ingenuity and simplicity. If his theory could be carried out, I should readily admit that we should gain something. We should have throughout the Veda a perfectly uniform metre, and wherever we found any violation of it, we should be justified in resorting to conjectural criticism.

The only question is at what price this strict uniformity can be obtained. If, for instance, in order to have the regular vr̥ttas at the end of Traishūbha and Gāyata lines, we were obliged to repeal all rules of prosody, to allow almost every short vowel to be used as long, and every long vowel to be used as short, whether long by nature or by position, we should have gained very little, we should have robbed Peter to pay Paul, we should have removed no difficulty, but only ignored the causes which created it. Now, if we examine the process by which Professor Kuhn establishes the regularity of the vr̥ittas or final syllables of Traishṭubha and Gāgata pādas, we find, in addition to the rules laid down before, and in which he is supported, as we saw, to a great extent by the Prātisākhya and Pāṇini, viz. the anceps nature of e and o, and of a long final vowel before a vowel, the following exceptions or metrical licences, without which that metrical uniformity at which he aims, could not be obtained :

Prosodial
Licences. 1. The vowel o in the body of a word is to be treated as optionally short :

II, 39, 3. prāṭi vāstor ūsrā (see Trishṭ. § 5).

Here the o of vasto is supposed to be short, although it is the Guṇa of u, and therefore very different from the final e of sarve or āste, or the final o of sarvo for sarvas or mano for manas *. It should be remarked that in Greek, too, the final diphthongs corresponding to the e of sarve and āste are treated as short, as far as the accent is concerned. Hence ἀποικοι, τύπτεται, and even γνώμαι, nom. plur. In Latin, too, the old terminations of the nom. sing. o and u, instead of the later us, are short. (Neue, Formenlehre, § 23 seq.)

VI, 51, 15. gopā āmā.

Here the o of gopā is treated as short, in order to get o—o— instead of —o—, which is perfectly legitimate at the end of an Ushnih.

2. The long ī and ū are treated as short, not only before vowels, which is legitimate, but also before consonants.

VII, 62, 4. dyāvābhūmī ādīte trāsīthām nāh (see Trishṭ. § 5).

The forms īsiyā and rāsiyā in VII, 32, 18, occur at the end of octosyllabic or Gāyatra pādas, and are therefore perfectly legitimate, yet Professor Kuhn would change them too, into īṣiṃyā and rāṣiṃyā. In VII, 28, 4, even māyī is treated as māyī (see Trishṭ. § 5); and in VII, 68, 1, vītām as vītām. If, in explanation of this shortening of vītām, vīhi is quoted, which is identified with vīhi, this can hardly be considered as an argument, for vīhi occurs where no short syllable is required, IV, 48, 1; II, 26, 2; and where, therefore, the shortening of the vowel cannot be attributed to metrical reasons.

* A very strong divergence of opinion is expressed on this point by Professor Bollensen. He says: 'O und E erst später in die Schrifttafel aufgenommen, bewahren ihre Länge durch das ganze indische Schriftenthum bis ins Apabhramsa hinab. Selbstverständlich kann kurz o und e im Veda erst recht nicht zugelassen werden.' Zeitschrift der D. M. G., vol. xxii, p. 574.

3. Final m followed by an initial consonant is allowed to make no position, and even in the middle of a word a nasal followed by a liquid is supposed to make positio debilis. Several of the instances, however, given in support, are from Gāyatra pādas, where Professor Kuhn, in some of his later articles, has himself allowed greater latitude; others admit of different scanning, as for instance,

I, 117, 8. māhāh kshōṃasyā āsvinā kāṇvāyā.

Here, even if we considered the dispondeus as illegitimate, we might scan kāṇvāyā, for this scanning occurs in other places, while to treat the first a as short before nv seems tantamount to surrendering all rules of prosody.

4. Final n before semivowels, mutes, and double n before vowels make no position^a. Ex. III, 49, 1. yāsmiṃ vīṣvā (Trishṭ. § 5); I, 174, 5. yāsmiṃ kākān; I, 186, 4. sāsmiṃ(n) ūdhan^b.

5. Final Visarga before sibilants makes no position^c. Ex. IV, 21, 10. sātyāh sāmṛāt (Trishṭ. § 5). Even in I, 63, 4.

^a Professor Kuhn has afterwards (Beiträge, vol. iv, p. 207) modified this view, and instead of allowing a final nasal vowel followed by a mute to make positio debilis, he thinks that the nasal should in most cases be omitted altogether.

^b Here a distinction should be made, I think, between an n before a consonant, and a final n following a short vowel, which, according to the rules of Sandhi, is doubled, if a vowel follows. In the latter case, the vowel before the n remains, no doubt, short in many cases, or, more correctly, the doubling of the n does not take place, e.g. I, 63, 4; 186, 4. In other places, the doubling seems preferable, e.g. I, 33, 11, though Professor Kuhn would remove it altogether. Kuhn, Beiträge, vol. iii, p. 125.

^c Here, too, according to later researches, Professor Kuhn would rather omit the final sibilant altogether, loc. cit. vol. iv, p. 207.

kōdīh sakhā (probably a Gāgata), and V, 82, 4. sāvīh sāubhāgam (a Gāy. § 7), the long i is treated as short, and the short a of sakhā is lengthened, because an aspirate follows.

6. S before mutes makes no position. Ex. VI, 66, 11. ūgrā āspridhran (Trishṭ. § 3).

7. S before k makes no position. Ex. vīsvāskāndrāh, &c.

8. Mutes before s make no position. Ex. rākshās, according to Professor Kuhn, in the seventh Mandala only, but see I, 12, 5; kūtsa, &c.

9. Mutes before r or v make no position. Ex. sūṣiprā, dīrghāsrūt.

10. Sibilants before y make no position. Ex. dāsyūn.

11. R followed by mutes or sibilants makes no position. Ex. āyūr gīvase, kārdīh, vārshishthām.

12. Words like smāddishān, &c. retain their vowel short before two following consonants.

We now proceed to consider a number of prosodial rules which Professor Kuhn proposes to repeal in order to have a long syllable where the MSS. supply a short :

1. The vowel ri is to be pronounced as long, or rather as ar. Ex. I, 12, 9. tāsmāi pāvākā mrīḷyā is to be read mārdāyā; V, 33, 10. sāmvāranāsyā rishēh is to be read arsheh. But why not sāmvāranāsyā rishēh (i. e. siarsheh)?

2. The a privativum may be lengthened. Ex. āgārāh, āmritāh.

3. Short vowels before liquids may be long. Ex. nārah, tārutā, tāratī, mārutām, hāriṣāh, ārushi, dadhur iha, sūvitā (p. 471).

4. Short vowels before nasals may be lengthened. Ex. ganān, sanitar, tānūh, ūpā nāh.

5. Short vowels before the ma of the superlative may be lengthened. Ex. nrītama.

6. The short a in the roots sam and yam, and in am (the termination of the accusative) may be lengthened.

7. The group $\check{a}v\check{a}$ is to be pronounced $\bar{a}u\bar{a}$. Ex. $\check{a}v\check{a}s\bar{e}$ becomes $\bar{a}u\bar{a}s\bar{e}$; $\check{s}a\check{v}i\check{t}\bar{a}$ becomes $\bar{s}a\bar{u}i\bar{t}\bar{a}$; $\check{n}a\check{v}\bar{a}$ becomes $\bar{n}a\bar{u}\bar{a}$.

8. The group $\check{a}y\check{a}$ is to be changed into $\bar{a}i\bar{a}$ or $\bar{e}\bar{a}$. Ex. $\check{n}a\check{y}\check{a}s\bar{i}$ becomes $\bar{n}a\bar{i}\bar{a}s\bar{i}$.

9. The group $v\check{a}$ is to be changed into ua , and this ua to be treated as a kind of diphthong and therefore long. Ex. $\check{k}a\check{r}v\check{a}t\bar{a}m\check{a}h$ becomes $\bar{k}a\bar{u}\bar{a}t\bar{a}m\check{a}h$; $\check{v}\bar{a}r\check{u}\check{n}\bar{a}h$ becomes $\bar{u}\bar{a}r\check{u}\bar{n}\bar{a}h$.

10. The short vowel in the reduplicated syllable of perfects is to be lengthened. Ex. $\check{t}\bar{a}t\bar{a}\check{n}\bar{a}h$, $\check{d}\bar{a}d\check{h}i\bar{r}\bar{e}$.

11. Short vowels before all aspirates may be lengthened. Ex. $\check{r}\bar{a}th\bar{a}h$ becomes $\bar{r}\bar{a}th\bar{a}h$; $\check{s}\bar{a}kh\bar{a}$ becomes $\bar{s}\bar{a}kh\bar{a}$.

12. Short vowels before h and all sibilants may be lengthened. Ex. $\check{m}\bar{a}h\check{n}i$ becomes $\bar{m}\bar{a}h\check{n}i$; $\check{u}\check{s}\check{g}\bar{a}m$ becomes $\bar{u}\bar{s}\check{g}\bar{a}m$; $\check{r}i\check{s}h\bar{a}t\bar{e}$ becomes $\bar{r}i\check{s}h\bar{a}t\bar{e}$; $\check{d}\bar{a}s\bar{a}t$ becomes $\bar{d}\bar{a}s\bar{a}t$.

13. The short vowel before t may be lengthened. Ex. $\check{v}\bar{a}g\check{a}v\bar{a}t\bar{a}h$ becomes $\bar{v}\bar{a}g\bar{a}v\bar{a}t\bar{a}h$; $\check{a}t\check{ith}i\check{h}$ becomes $\bar{a}t\check{ith}i\check{h}$.

14. The short vowel before d may be lengthened. Ex. $\check{u}d\bar{a}r\bar{a}m$ becomes $\bar{u}d\bar{a}r\bar{a}m$; $\check{u}d\bar{a}v\bar{a}$ becomes $\bar{u}d\bar{a}v\bar{a}$.

15. The short vowel before p may be lengthened. Ex. $\check{a}p\bar{a}m$ becomes $\bar{a}p\bar{a}m$; $\check{t}\bar{a}p\check{u}shim$ becomes $\bar{t}\bar{a}p\check{u}shim$; $\check{g}r\check{i}h\bar{a}p\bar{a}tim$ becomes $\bar{g}r\check{i}h\bar{a}p\bar{a}tim$.

16. The short vowel before g and g may be lengthened. Ex. $\check{s}\bar{a}n\check{u}sh\bar{a}g\bar{a}sat$ becomes $\bar{s}\bar{a}n\check{u}sh\bar{a}g\bar{a}sat$; $\check{y}u\check{n}\bar{a}g\bar{a}n$ becomes $\bar{y}u\check{n}\bar{a}g\bar{a}n$.

Let us now turn back for one moment to look at the slaughter which has been committed! Is there one single rule of prosody that has been spared? Is there one single short syllable that must always remain short, or a long syllable that must always remain long? If all restrictions of prosody are thus removed, our metres, no doubt, become perfectly regular. But it should be remembered that these metrical rules, for which all this carnage has been committed, are not founded upon any a priori principles, but deduced by ancient or modern metricians from those very hymns which seem so constantly to violate them. Neither ancient nor modern metricians had, as far as we know, any evidence to go upon besides the hymns of the Rig-veda ; and the philosophical speculations as to the origin of metres in which some of them indulge, and from which they would fain derive some of their unbending rules, are, as need hardly be said, of no consequence whatever. I cannot understand what definite idea even modern writers connect with such statements as that, for instance, the Trishṭubh metre sprang from the Gāgati metre, that the eleven syllables of the former are an abbreviation of the twelve syllables of the latter. Surely, metres are not made artificially, and by addition or subtraction. Metres have a natural origin in the rhythmic sentiment of different people, and they become artificial and arithmetical in the same way as language with its innate principles of law and analogy becomes in course of time grammatical and artificial. To derive one metre from another is like deriving a genitive from a nominative, which we may do indeed for grammatical purposes, but which no one would venture to do who is at all acquainted with the natural and independent production of grammatical forms. Were we to arrange the Trishṭubh and Gāgati metres in chronological order, I should decidedly place the Trishṭubh first, for we see, as it were before our eyes, how sometimes one foot, sometimes two and three feet in a Trishṭubh verse admit an additional syllable at the end, particularly in set phrases which would not submit to a Trishṭubh ending. The phrase sam no bhava dvipade sam katushpade is evidently a solemn phrase, and we see it brought in without hesitation, even though every other line of the same strophe or hymn is Trishṭubh, i.e. hendecasyllabic, not dodecasyllabic. See, for instance, VI, 74, 1; VII, 54, 1; X, 85, 44; 165, 1. However, I maintain by no means that this was the actual origin of Gāgati metres; I only refer to it in order to show the groundlessness of metrical theories which represent the component elements, a foot of one or two or four syllables as given first, and as afterwards compounded into systems of two, three or four such feet, and who therefore would wish us to look upon the hendecasyllabic Trishṭubh as originally a dodecasyllabic Gāgati, only deprived of its tail. If my explanation of the name of Trishṭubh, i. e. Three-step, is right, its origin must be ascribed to a far more natural process than that of artificial amputation. It was to accompany a choros, i. e. a dance, which after advancing freely for eight steps in one direction, turned back (vṛtta) with three steps, the second of which was strongly marked, and would therefore, whether in song or recitation, be naturally accompanied by a long syllable. It certainly is so in the vast majority of Trishṭubhs which have been handed down to us. But if among these verses we find a small number in which this simple and palpable rhythm is violated, and which nevertheless were preserved from the first in that imperfect form, although the temptation to set them right must have been as great to the ancient as it has proved to be to the modern students of the Veda, are we to say that nearly all, if not all, the rules that determine the length and shortness of syllables, and which alone give character to every verse, are to be suspended? Or, ought we not rather to consider, whether the ancient choregic poets may not have indulged occasionally in an irregular movement? We see that this was so with regard to Gâyatrî verses. We see the greater freedom of the first and second pādas occasionally extend to the third; and it will be impossible, without intolerable violence, to remove all the varieties of the last pāda of a Gâyatrî of which I have given examples above, pages civ seqq.

It is, of course, impossible to give here all the evidence that might be brought forward in support of similar freedom Traishṭubha Vṛtta. in Trishṭubh verses, and I admit that the number of real varieties with them is smaller than with the Gâyatrîs. In order to make the evidence which I have to bring forward in support of these varieties as unassailable as possible, I have excluded nearly every pāda that occurs only in the first, second, or third line of a strophe, and have restricted myself, with few exceptions, and those chiefly referring to pādas that had been quoted by other scholars in support of their own theories, to the final pādas of Trishṭubh verses. Yet even with this limited evidence, I think I shall be able to establish at least three varieties of Trishṭubh. Preserving the same classification which I adopted before for the Gāyatrī, so as to include the important eighth syllable of the Trishṭubh, which does not properly belong to the vṛtta, I maintain that class 4. ॐ — —, class 5. — — —, and class 8. — ॐ — must be recognised as legitimate endings in the hymns of the Veda, and that by recognising them we are relieved from nearly all, if not all, the more violent prosodial licences which Professor Kuhn felt himself obliged to admit in his theory of Vedic metres.

§ 4. ॐ ॐ — —.

The verses which fall under § 4 are so numerous that after those of the first Mandala, mentioned above, they need not be given here in full. They are simply cases where the eighth syllable is not lengthened, and they cannot be supposed to run counter to any rule of the Prātisākhya, for the simple reason that the Prātisākhya never gave such a rule as that the eighth syllable must be lengthened, if the ninth is short. Examples will be found in the final pāda of Trishṭubhs: II, 30, 6; III, 36, 4; 53, 15; 54, 12; IV, 1, 16; 2, 7; 9; 11; 4, 12; 6, 1; 2; 4; 7, 7; 11, 5; 17, 3; 23, 6; 24, 2; 27, 1; 28, 5; 55, 5; 57, 2; V, 1, 2; VI, 17, 10; 21, 8; 23, 7; 25, 5; 29, 6; 33, 1; 62, 1; 63, 7; VII, 21, 5; 28, 3; 42, 4; 56, 15; 60, 10; 84, 2; 92, 4; VIII, 1, 33; 96, 9; IX, 92, 5; X, 61, 12; 13; 74, 3; 117, 7.

In support of § 5. — — —, the number of cases is smaller, but it should be remembered that it might be considerably increased if I had not restricted myself to the final pāda of each Trishṭubh, while the first, second, and third pādas would have yielded a much larger harvest:

§ 5. — — — —.

I, 89, 9. mā no madhyā rīrīshatāyūr gāntōh.

I, 92, 6. supratikā saumanasāyāgīgāh.

I, 114, 5; 117, 2; 122, 1; 122, 8; 186, 3; II, 4, 2; III, 49, 2; IV, 3, 9; 26, 6; V, 41, 14; VI, 25, 2; 66, 11; VII, 8, 6; 28, 4; 68, 1; 71, 2; 78, 1; 93, 7^b; IX, 90, 4; X, 11, 8.

I do not wish to deny that in several of these lines it would be possible to remove the long syllable from the ninth place by conjectural emendation. Instead of áyur in I, 89, 9, we might read áyu; in I, 92, 6, we might drop the augment of agár; in II, 4, 2, we might admit synizesis in áratir, and then read gírā-āsvāh, as in I, 141, 12. In VI, 25, 2, after eliding the a of ava, we might read dāsīh. But even if, in addition to all this, we were to admit the possible suppression of final m in asmabhyam, mahyam, and in the accusative singular, or the suppression of s in the nominative singular, both of which would be extreme measures, we should still have a number of cases which could not be righted without even more violent remedies. Why then should we not rather admit the occasional appearance of a metrical variation which certainly has a powerful precedent in the dispondeus of Gāyatrī? I am not now acquainted with the last results of metrical criticism in Virgil, but, unless some new theories now prevail, I well recollect that spondaic hexameters, though small in number, much smaller than in the Veda, were recognised by the best scholars, and no emendations attempted to remove them. If then in Virgil we read,

‘Cum patribus populoque, penatibusque et magnis dis,’
why not follow the authority of the best MSS. and the tradition of the Prātisākhyas and admit a dispondeus at the end of a Trishūbh rather than suspend, in order to meet this single difficulty, some of the most fundamental rules of prosody?

I now proceed to give a more numerous list of Traishūbha pādas ending in a choriambus, — ∪ ∪ —, again confining myself, with few exceptions, to final pādas:

§ 8. — ∪ ∪ —.

I, 62, 3. sam usriyābhir vāvasāntā nārāh.

I, 103, 4. yad dha sūnuh sravase nāmā dādhe.

I, 121, 9; 122, 10^b; 173, 8; 186, 2; II, 4, 3; 19, 1; 33, 14; IV, 1, 19^a; 25, 4; 39, 2; V, 30, 12; 41, 4; 41, 15;

* ‘Nur eine Stelle habe ich mir angemerkt, wo das Metrum āam verlangt.’

VI, 4, 7; 10, 5; 11, 4; 13, 1^b; 13, 1^d; 20, 1^b; 20, 1^d; 29, 4; 33, 3; 33, 5; 44, 11; 49, 12; 68, 5; 68, 7; VII, 19, 10; 62, 4; IX, 97, 26; X, 55, 8; 99, 9; 108, 6; 169, 1.

It is perfectly true that this sudden change in the rhythm of Trishūbh verses, making their ending iambic instead of trochaic, grates on our ears. But, I believe, that if we admit a short stop after the seventh syllable, the intended rhythm of these verses will become intelligible. We remarked a similar break in the verses of hymn X, 77, where the sudden transition to an iambic metre was used with great effect, and the choriambic ending, though less effective, is by no means offensive. It should be remarked also, that in many, though not in all cases, a cæsura takes place after the seventh syllable, and this is, no doubt, a great help towards a better delivery of these choriambic Trishūbhs.

While, however, I contend for the recognition of these three varieties of the normal Trishūbh metre, I am quite willing to admit that other variations besides these, which occur from time to time in the Veda, form a legitimate subject of critical discussion.

§ 2. ∪ ∪ ∪ —.

Trishūbh verses, the final pāda of which ends in ∪ ∪ ∪ —, I should generally prefer to treat as ending in a Gāgata pāda, in which this ending is more legitimate. Thus I should propose to scan:

I, 122, 11. prāsastāyē māhinā[~] rāthāvātē.

III, 20, 5. vāsūn rūdrāñ ādityāñ[~] ihā hūvē.

V, 2, 1. pūrā[~] pāsyānti nīhitām[~] (tām) āratāu.

VI, 13, 5. vāyō vrīkāyārayē[~] gāsūrayē.

§ 1. ∪ — ∪ —.

I should propose the same medela for some final pādas of Trishūbhs apparently ending in ∪ — ∪ —. We might indeed, as has been suggested, treat these verses as single instances of that peculiar metre which we saw carried out in the whole of hymn X, 77, but at the end of a verse the admission of an occasional Gāgata pāda is more in accordance with the habit of the Vedic poets. Thus I should scan :

Kuhn, Beiträge, vol. iv, p. 180; Bollensen, Zeitschrift der D. M. G., vol. xxii, p. 587.

V, 33, 4. *vṛṣhā sāmat̥sū dāsāsyā nāmā kīt̥.

V, 41, 5^b. rāyā ēshe vāse dādhitā dhīh.

After what I have said before on the real character of the teaching of the Prātisākhya, I need not show again that the fact of Uvata's counting ta of dadhīta as the tenth syllable is of no importance in determining the real nature of these hymns, though it is of importance, as Professor Kuhn remarks (Beiträge, vol. iii, p. 451), in showing that Uvata considered himself at perfect liberty in counting or not counting, for his own purposes, the elided syllable of avase.

VII, 4, 6. māpsavāh pari shādāmā mādūvāh.

§ 6. ∪ — — —.

Final pādas of Trishṭubhs ending in ∪ — — — are very scarce. In VI, 1, 4, bhadrāyām te ranayantā samdrīshṭau, it would be very easy to read bhadrāyām te samdrīshṭau rānāyāntā; and in X, 74, 2, dṵaur nā vārebhīh krīṇavāntā svāih,

we may either recognise a Gāgata pāda, or read

dṵaur nā vārebhīh krīṇavāntā svāih,

which would agree with the metre of hymn X, 77.

§ 7. — — ∪ —.

Pādas ending in — — ∪ — do not occur as final in any Traishṭubha hymn, but as many Gāgata pādas occur in the body of Traishṭubha hymns, we have to scan them as dodecasyllabic :

I, 63, 4^a. tṵām hā tyād īndrā kōdīh sakhā.

IV, 26, 6^b. pārāvātāh sakunō māndram mādām.

The adjective pāvaka which frequently occurs at the end of final and internal pādas of Trishṭubh hymns has always to be scanned ṣāvākā. Cf. IV, 51, 2; VI, 5, 2; 10, 4; 51, 3; VII, 3, 1; 9; 9, 1^b; 56, 12; X, 46, 7^b.

* Professor Kuhn has finally adopted the same scanning, Beiträge, vol. iv, p. 184.

I must reserve what I have to say about other metres of the Veda for another opportunity, but I cannot leave this subject without referring once more to a Omission of final m and s. metrical licence which has been strongly advocated by Professor Kuhn and others, and by the admission of which there is no doubt that many difficulties might be removed, I mean the occasional omission of a final m and s, and the subsequent contraction of the final and initial vowels. The arguments that have been brought forward in support of this are very powerful. There is the general argument that final s and m are liable to be dropt in other Aryan languages, and particularly for metrical purposes. There is the stronger argument that in some cases final s and m in Sanskrit may or may not be omitted, even apart from any metrical stress. In Sanskrit we find that the demonstrative pronoun sa appears most frequently as sa (sa dadāti), and if followed by liquid vowels, it may coalesce with them even in later Sanskrit. Thus we see saisha for sa esha, sendraḥ for sa indraḥ sanctioned for metrical purposes even by Pāṇini, VI, 1, 134. We might refer also to feminines which have s in the nominative singular after bases in ū, but drop it after bases in ī. We find in the Samhitā text, V, 7, 8, svādhitiva, instead of svādhitīḥ-iva in the Pada text, sanctioned by the Prātisākhya 259; likewise IX, 61, 10, Samhitā, bhūmy ā dade, instead of Pada, bhūmiḥ ā dade. But before we draw any general conclusions from such instances, we should consider whether they do not admit of a grammatical instead of a metrical explanation. The nominative singular of the demonstrative pronoun was sa before it was sas; by the side of bhūmiḥ we have a secondary form bhūmī; and we may conclude from svādhitī-vān, I, 88, 2, that the Vedic poets knew of a form svādhitī, by the side of svādhitīḥ.

As to the suppression of final m, however, we see it admitted by the best authorities, or we see at least alternate forms with or without m, in túbhya, which occurs frequently instead of túbhyam^a, and twice, at least, without apparently any metrical reason^b. We find asmáka instead of asmákam (I, 173, 10), yushmáka instead of yushmákam (VII, 59, 9-10), yágadhva instead of yágadvam (VIII, 2, 37) sanctioned both by the Samhitâ and Pada texts^c.

If then we have such precedents, it may well be asked why we should hesitate to adopt the same expedient, the omission of final m and s, whenever the Vedic metres seem to require it. Professor Bollensen's remark, that Vedic verses cannot be treated to all the licences of Latin scanning^d, is hardly a sufficient answer; and he himself, though under a slightly different form, would admit as much, if not more, than has been admitted on this point by Professors Kuhn and Roth. On a priori grounds I should by no means feel opposed to the admission of a possible elision of final s or m, or even n; and my only doubt is whether it is really necessary for the proper scanning of Vedic metres.

My own opinion has always been, that if we admit on a larger scale what in single words can hardly be doubted by anybody, viz. the pronunciation of two syllables as one, we need not fall back on the elision of final consonants in order to arrive at a proper scanning of Vedic metres. On this point I shall have to say a few words in conclusion, because I shall frequently avail myself of this licence, for the purpose of righting apparently corrupt verses in the hymns of the Rig-veda; and I feel bound to explain, once for all, why I avail myself of it in preference to other emendations which have been proposed by scholars such as Professors Benfey, Kuhn, Roth, Bollensen, and others.

The merit of having first pointed out some cases where

^a I, 54, 9; 135, 2; III, 42, 8; V, 11, 5; VII, 22, 7; VIII, 51, 9; 76, 8; 82, 5; IX, 62, 27; 86, 30; X, 167, 1.

^b II, 11, 3; V, 30, 6.

^c See Bollensen, Orient und Occident, vol. iii, p. 459; Kuhn, Beiträge, vol. iv, p. 199.

^d Orient und Occident, vol. iv, p. 449.

two syllables must be treated as one, belongs, I believe, to Professor Bollensen in his article, 'Zur Herstellung des Veda,' published in Benfey's Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 461. He proposed, for instance, to write hyāná instead of hiyāná, IX, 13, 6; dhyānó instead of dhiyānó, VIII, 49, 5; sáhyase instead of sáhiyase, I, 71, 4; yānó instead of iyānó, VIII, 50, 5, &c. The actual alteration of these words seems to me unnecessary; nor should we think of resorting to such violent measures in Greek where, as far as metrical purposes are concerned, two vowels have not unfrequently to be treated as one.

That iva counts in many passages as one syllable is admitted by everybody. The only point on which I differ is that I do not see why iva, when monosyllabic, should be changed to va, instead of being pronounced quickly, or, to adopt the terminology of Greek grammarians, by synizesis^a. Synizesis is well explained by Greek scholars as a quick pronunciation of two vowels so that neither should be lost, and as different thereby from synalœphe, which means the contraction of two vowels into one^b. This synizesis is by no means restricted to iva and a few other words, but seems to me a very frequent expedient resorted to by the ancient Rishis.

Originally it may have arisen from the fact that language allows in many cases alternate forms of one or two syllables. As in Greek we have double forms like ἀλγεινός and ἀλγεινός, γαλακτοφάγος and γλακτοφάγος, πηγνός and πηγνός, πυκνός and πυκνός^c, and as in Latin we have the shortening

^a Synizesis in Greek applies only to the quick pronunciation of two vowels, if in immediate contact; and not, if separated by consonants. Samprasāraṇa might seem a more appropriate term, but though the grammatical process designated in Sanskrit by Samprasāraṇa offers some analogies, it could only by a new definition be applied to the metrical process here intended.

^b A. B. p. 835, 30. ἐστὶ δὲ ἐν τοῖς κοινοῖς μέτροις καὶ ἡ καλουμένη συνεκφώνησις ἢ καὶ συνίησις λέγεται. Ὅταν γὰρ φωνηέντων ἐπ' ἀλλήλους γένηται ἡ προφορά, τότε γίνεται ἡ συνίησις εἰς μίαν συλλαβὴν. Διαφέρει δὲ συναλοιφῆς· ἡ μὲν γὰρ γραμμάτων ἐστὶ κλοπή, ἡ δὲ χρόνων· καὶ ἡ μὲν συναλοιφή, ὡς λέγεται, φαίνεται, ἡ δὲ οὐ. Mehlhorn, Griechische Grammatik, § 101. Thus in Ἄσπετόλεμος we have synizesis, in Ἄσπετόλεμος synæresis.

^c Cf. Mehlhorn, Griechische Grammatik, § 57.

or suppression of vowels carried out on the largest scale*, we find in Sanskrit, too, such double forms as pr̥ithvi or pr̥ithivī, adhi and dhi, api and pi, ava and va. The occurrence of such forms which have nothing to do with metrical considerations, but are perfectly legitimate from a grammatical point of view, would encourage a tendency to treat two syllables—and particularly two short syllables—as one, whenever an occasion arose. There are, besides, in the Vedic Sanskrit a number of forms where, as we saw, a long syllable has to be pronounced as two. In some of these cases this pronunciation is legitimate, i.e. it preserves an original dissyllabic form which in course of time had become monosyllabic. In other cases the same process takes place through a mistaken sense of analogy, where we cannot prove that an original dissyllabic form had any existence even in a prehistoric state of language. The occurrence of a number of such alternate forms would naturally leave a general impression in the minds of poets that two short syllables and one long syllable were under certain circumstances interchangeable. So considerable a number of words in which a long syllable has to be pronounced as two syllables has been collected by Professors Kuhn, Bollensen, and others, that no doubt can remain on this subject. Vedic poets, being allowed to change a semivowel into a vowel, were free to say nāsātyā and nāsātṡyā, VIII, 5, 32; pr̥ithivyās and pr̥ithivṡyāḥ; pitrōḥ and pitrōḥ, I, 31, 4. They could separate compound words, and pronounce ghr̥itānnāḥ or ghr̥itā-ānnāḥ, VII, 3, 1. They could insert a kind of shewa or svarabhakti in words like sāmne or sāmṡne, VIII, 6, 47; dhāmne or dhāmṡne, VIII, 92, 25; ārāvnāḥ and ārāvṡnāḥ, IX, 63, 5. They might vary between pānti and pānti, I, 41, 2; yāthana and yāthana, I, 39, 3; nidhātōḥ and nidhātōḥ, I, 41, 9; tredhā and tredhā, I, 34, 8; dēvāḥ and dēvāḥ (besides devāsaḥ), I, 23, 24; rōdasī and rōdasī, I, 33, 9; 59, 4; 64, 9; and rōdāsyōḥ, I, 33, 5; 59, 2; 117, 10;

* See the important chapters on 'Kürzung der Vokale' and 'Tilgung der Vokale' in Corssen's 'Ausprache des Lateinischen,' and more especially his remarks on the so-called irrational vowels in Plantus, ibid. vol. ii, p. 70.

VI, 24, 3; VII, 6, 2; X, 74, 1^a. Need we wonder then if we find that, on the other hand, they allowed themselves to pronounce pr̥thivī as pr̥thivī, I, 191, 6; VII, 34, 7; 99, 3; dhr̥ishṇāvā as dhr̥ishṇāva, V, 52, 14; śuvānā as śuvānā? There is no reason why we should change the spelling of śuvānā into svānā. The metre itself tells us at once where śuvānā is to be pronounced as two or as three syllables. Nor is it possible to believe that those who first handed down and afterwards wrote down the text of the Vedic hymns, should have been ignorant of that freedom of pronunciation. Why, there is not one single passage in the whole of the ninth Māṇḍala, where, as far as I know, śuvānā should not be pronounced as dissyllabic, i.e. as śuvānā; and to suppose that the scholars of India did not know how that superfluous syllable should be removed, is really taking too low an estimate of men like Vyāḍi or Saunaka.

But if we once admit that in these cases two syllables separated by a single consonant were pronounced as one and were metrically counted as one, we can hardly resist the evidence in favour of a similar pronunciation in a large number of other words, and we shall find that by the admission of this rapid pronunciation, or of what in Plautus we should call irrational vowels, many verses assume at once their regular form without the necessity of admitting the suppression of final s, m, n, or the introduction of other prosodial licences. To my mind the most convincing passages are those where, as in the Atyashī and similar hymns, a poet repeats the same phrase twice, altering only one or two words, but without endeavouring to avoid an excess of syllables which, to our mind, unless we resort to synizesis, would completely destroy the uniformity of the metre. Thus we read:

I, 133, 6. āpūr̥ṣhāghno • pratītā sūrā sātvaḥhī, trīsāptaiḥ sūrā sātvaḥhī.

* Professor Bollensen in some of these passages proposes to read rodasios. In I, 96, 4, no change is necessary if we read vīrām. Zeitschrift der D. M. G., vol. xxii, p. 587.

Here no *pra must be pronounced with one ictus only, in order to get a complete agreement between the two iambic diameters.

I, 134, 5. ūgrā īṣhānāntā bhurvāni, āpām īshāntā bhurvāni.

As ishanta never occurs again, I suspect that the original reading was ishānanta in both lines, and that in the second line ishānanta, pronounced rapidly, was mistaken for ishanta. Is not bhurvāni a locative, corresponding to the datives in vāne which are so frequently used in the sense of infinitives? See note to I, 6, 8, page 47 seq. In I, 138, 3, we must read :

āheṭāmānā ūrusāmsā sārī bhāvā, vāge-vāge sārī bhāvā.

In I, 129, 11,

ādḥā hī tvā gānitā gīganād vāsō, rākshōhanām tvā gīganād vāsō,

we might try to remove the difficulty by omitting vāsō at the end of the refrain, but this would be against the general character of these hymns. We want the last word vāsō, if possible, at the end of both lines. But, if so, we must admit two cases of synizesis, or, if this seems too clumsy, we must omit tvā.

I shall now proceed to give a number of other examples in which the same consonantal synizesis seems necessary in order to make the rhythm of the verses perceptible to our ears as it was to the ears of the ancient Rishis.

The preposition anu takes synizesis in

I, 127, 1. ghrītasyā vibhrāshñm ānu vāshñ sōkīshā. Cf. X, 14, 1.

The preposition abhi :

I, 91, 23. rāyō bhāgam sāhasāvān abhi yūdhyā.

Here Professor Kuhn changes sahasāvan into sahasvaḥ, which, no doubt, is a very simple and very plausible emendation. But in altering the text of the Veda many things have to be considered, and in our case it might be objected that sahasvaḥ never occurs again as an epithet of Soma.

As an invocation sahasvaḥ refers to no deity but Agni, and even in its other cases it is applied to Agni and Indra only. However, I do not by any means maintain that sahasvaḥ could not be applied to Soma, for nearly the same arguments could be used against sahasāvan, if conjecturally put in the place of sahasvaḥ; I only wish to point out how everything ought to be tried first, before we resort in the Veda to conjectural emendations. Therefore, if in our passage there should be any objection to admitting the synizesis in abhi, I should much rather propose synizesis of sahasāvan, than change it into sahasvaḥ. There is synizesis in maha, e.g. I, 133, 6. āvār māha īndrā dādrīḥi sṛdhī nāḥ. Although this verse is quoted by the Prātisākhya, Sūtra 522, as one in which the lengthened syllable dhī of sṛdhī does not occupy the tenth place, and which therefore required special mention, the original poet evidently thought otherwise, and lengthened the syllable, being a syllable liable to be lengthened, because it really occupied the tenth place, and therefore received a peculiar stress.

The preposition pari:

VI, 52, 14. mā vō vākāmsi parīkākshyāni vōkām, sūmneshv īd vō āntāmā mādēmā.

Here Professor Kuhn (Beiträge, vol. iv, p. 197) begins the last pāda with vōkām, but this is impossible, unless we change the accent of vōkām, though even then the separation of the verb from mā and the accumulation of two verbs in the last line would be objectionable.

Hārī is pronounced as hārī:

VII, 32, 12. yā īndrō harivān nā dābhānti tām ripāḥ.

II, 18, 5. ā kātvarīmsatā haribhīr yugānāḥ.

Hence I propose to scan the difficult verse I, 167, 1, as follows:

sāhasrām tā īndrā-ūtāyō nāḥ,
*sāhasrām īshō harivō gūrtātāmāḥ,

* As to the scanning of the second line see p. cxiv.

sāhāsraṁ rāyo mādayādhyai, sāhāsriṇā ūpā nō yāntu vāgāk.

That the final o instead of as is treated as a short syllable we saw before, and in I, 133, 6, we observed that it was liable to synizesis. We see the same in

I, 175, 6. māyā ivāpō na trīshyātē bābhūthā.

V, 61, 16. ā yāgñiyāso vavṛittānā.

The pragrīhya ī of the dual is known in the Veda to be liable in certain cases to Sandhi. If we extend this licence beyond the limits recognised by the Prātisākhya, we might scan

VI, 52, 14. ūbhē rōdāsy āpām nāpāk kā mānmā, or we might shorten the ī before the a, and admitting synizesis, scan :

ubhē rōdāsī āpām nāpāk kā mānmā.

In III, 6, 10, we must either admit Sandhi between prākī and adhvaréva, or contract the first two syllables of adhvaréva.

The o and e of vocatives before vowels, when changed into av or a(y), are liable to synizesis :

IV, 48, 1. vāyav ā kandrēnā rāthēnā (Anushubh, c.)

IV, 1, 2. sā bhrātārām varuṇām āgna ā vāvṛitsvā.

The termination avaḥ also, before vowels, seems to count as one syllable in V, 52, 14, divō vā dhrīshnāvā ōgasā, which would render Professor Bollensen's correction (Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 480), dhrīshnúogasā, unnecessary.

Like ava and iva, we find aya and iya, too, in several words liable to be contracted in pronunciation ; e.g. vayam, VI, 23, 5 ; ayam, I, 177, 4 ; iyam, VII, 66, 8² ; I, 186, 11 (unless we read vo+sme) ; X, 129, 6. Professor Bollensen's proposal to change iyam to im, and ayam to am (Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 461), would only cause obscurity, without any adequate gain, while other words would by a similar suppression of vowels or consonants become simply irrecongnisable. In I, 169, 6, for instance, ádha has to be pronounced with one ictus; in VI, 26, 7, sādhāvīrā is trisyllabic. In VI, 10, 1, we must admit synizesis in adhvaré; in I, 161, 8, either in udakām or in abravītana; I, 110, 9, in ṛibhumān; VIII, 79, 4, in diváh; V, 4, 6, in nṛitama (unless we read so-gne); I, 164, 17, in paráh; VI, 15, 14, in pāvaka; I, 191, 6; VII, 34, 7; 99, 3, in prithivī; II, 20, 8, in púraḥ; VI, 10, 1, in prayatí; VI, 17, 7, in brīhát; IX, 19, 6, in bhiyásam; I, 133, 6, in maháh; II, 28, 6; IV, 1, 2; VI, 75, 18, in varuna; III, 30, 21, in vṛishabha; VII, 41, 6, in vágínah; II, 43, 2, in sísumatíḥ; VI, 51, 2, in sanutár; VI, 18, 12, in sthávirasya, &c.

These remarks will, I hope, suffice in order to justify the principles by which I have been guided in my treatment of the text and in my translation of the Rig-veda. I know I shall seem to some to have been too timid in retaining whatever can possibly be retained in the traditional text of these ancient hymns, while others will look upon the emendations which I have suggested as unpardonable temerity. Let everything be weighed in the just scales of argument. Those who argue for victory, and not for truth, can have no hearing in our court. There is too much serious work to be done to allow time for wrangling or abuse. Any dictionary will supply strong words to those who condescend to such warfare, but strong arguments require honest labour, sound judgment, and, above all, a genuine love of truth.

The second volume, which I am now preparing for Press, will contain the remaining hymns addressed to the Maruts. The notes will necessarily have to be reduced to smaller dimensions, but they must always constitute the more important part in a translation or, more truly, in a deciphering of Vedic hymns.

F. MAX MÜLLER.

PARKS END, OXFORD:
March, 1869.

VEDIC HYMNS.

VEDIC HYMNS.

MANDALA X, HYMN 121.

ASHTAKA VIII, ADHYĀYA 7, VARGA 3-4.

TO THE UNKNOWN GOD.

1. In the beginning there arose the Golden Child (Hiranya-garbha¹); as soon as born, he alone was the lord of all that is. He established the earth and this heaven:—Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

2. He who gives breath, he who gives strength, whose¹ command all the bright gods revere, whose shadow² is immortality, whose shadow is death:—Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

3. He who through his might became the sole king of the breathing and twinkling¹ world, who governs all this, man and beast:—Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

4. He through whose might¹ these snowy mountains are, and the sea, they say, with the distant river (the Rasâ²), he of whom these regions are indeed the two arms:—Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

5. He through whom the awful heaven and the earth were made fast¹, he through whom the ether was established, and the firmament; he who measured the air in the sky²:—Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

6. He to whom heaven and earth¹, standing firm by his will, look up, trembling in their mind; he over whom the risen sun shines forth:—Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

7. When the great waters¹ went everywhere, holding the germ (Hiranya-garbha), and generating light, then there arose from them the (sole²) breath of the gods:—Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

8. He who by his might looked even over the waters which held power (the germ) and generated the sacrifice (light¹), he who alone is God above all gods²:—Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

9. May he not hurt us, he who is the begetter of the earth, or he, the righteous, who begat the heaven; he who also begat the bright and mighty waters:—Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

[10¹. Pragâpati, no other than thou embraces all these created things. May that be ours which we desire when sacrificing to thee: may we be lords of wealth!]

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Hiranyagarbha Prāgāpatya, and is supposed to be addressed to Ka, Who, i.e. the Unknown God.

First translated in my History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, 1859, p. 569; see also Hibbert Lectures, 1882, p. 301; Muir, Original Sanskrit Texts, IV, p. 15.

Verse 1=VS. XIII, 4; XXIII, 1; XXV, 10; TS. IV, 1, 8, 3; 2, 8, 2; AV. IV, 2, 7.

Verse 2=VS. XXV, 13; TS. IV, 1, 8, 4; VII, 5, 17, 1; AV. IV, 2, 1; XIII, 3, 24.

Verse 3=VS. XXIII, 3; XXV, 11; TS. IV, 1, 8, 4; VII, 5, 16, 1; AV. IV, 2, 2.

Verse 4=VS. XXV, 12; TS. IV, 1, 8, 4; AV. IV, 2, 5.

Verse 5=VS. XXXII, 6; TS. IV, 1, 8, 5; AV. IV, 2, 4.

Verse 6=VS. XXXII, 7; TS. IV, 1, 8, 5; AV. IV, 2, 3.

Verse 7=VS. XXVII, 25; XXXII, 7; TS. II, 2, 12, 1; IV, 1, 8, 5; TA. I, 23, 8; AV. IV, 2, 6.

Verse 8=VS. XXVII, 26; XXXII, 7; TS. IV, 1, 8, 6.

Verse 9=VS. XII, 102; TS. IV, 2, 7, 1.

Verse 10=VS. X, 20; XXIII, 65; TS. I, 8, 14, 2; III, 2, 5, 6; TB. II, 8, 1, 2; III, 5, 7, 1; AV. VII, 79, 4; 80, 3.

This is one of the hymns which has always been suspected as modern by European interpreters. The reason is clear. To us the conception of one God, which pervades the whole of this hymn, seems later than the conception of many individual gods, as recognised in various aspects of nature, such as the gods of the sky, the sun, the storms, or the fire. And in a certain sense we may be right, and language also confirms our sentiment. In our hymn there are several words which do not occur again in the Rig-veda, or which occur in places only which have likewise been suspected to be of more modern date. Hiranyagarbhā itself is an ἀπαξ λεγόμενον. Sám avartata is found only in the last Mandāla, X, 90, 14; 129, 4. Bhûtá also, in the sense of what is, occurs in the tenth Mandāla only. It is used three times (X, 55, 2; 58, 12; 90, 2) as opposed to bhávya, i. e. what is and what will be; and once more in the sense of all that is (X, 85, 17). Ātmadāh, in the sense of giving life, is another ἀπαξ λεγόμενον. Prasísh is restricted to Mandālas I (I, 145, 1), IX (IX, 66, 6; 86, 32), and our passage. Himávat, ἀπαξ λεγόμενον. The repetition of the relative pronoun in verses 2 and 4 is unusual. In the tenth verse the compound yát-kāmaḥ is modern, and the insertion of etāni between tvát and anyáḥ is at all events exceptional. The passage V, 31, 2 is not parallel, because in tvát indra vásyah anyát, the ablative tvát is governed by vásyah. In VI, 21, 10, ná tvāvān anyáḥ amṛita tvát asti, anyáḥ is separated from tvát by a vocative only, as in VIII, 24, 11.

But when we say that a certain hymn is modern, we must carefully consider what we mean. Our hymn, for instance, must have existed not only previous to the Brāhmaṇa period, for many Brāhmaṇas presuppose it, but previous to the Mantra period also. It is true that no verse of it occurs in the Sāma-veda, but in the Sāma-veda-brāhmaṇa IX, 9, 12, verse 1 at least is mentioned^a. Most of its verses, however, occur in the Vāgasaneyi-samhitā, in the Taittirīya-samhitā, and in the Atharva-veda-samhitā, nay, the last verse, to my mind the most suspicious of all, occurs most frequently in the other Samhitās and Brāhmaṇas.

But though most of the verses of our hymn occur in other Samhitās, they do not always occur in the same order.

In the Vāg. Samh. we have the first verse in XIII, 4, but no other verse of our hymn follows. We have the first verse again in XXIII, 1, but not followed by verse 2, but by verse 3 (XXIII, 3)^b. Then we have verse 1 once more in XXV, 10, followed by verse 3 (XXV, 11), by verse 4 (XXV, 12), and then by verse 2 (XXV, 13).

^a The last line is here, tasmai ta indo havishā vidhema, let us sacrifice to him with thy oblation, O Soma!

^b Var. lect. nimeshatāḥ.

We have verses 5, 6, 7, 8 in VS. XXXII, 6 and 7, and verses 7 and 8 in VS. XXVII, 25 and 26, while verse 9 is found in XII, 102 only^a, and the last verse in X, 20^b, and XXIII, 65.

In the Taitt. Samhitā the verses follow more regularly, still never quite in the same order as in the Rig-veda. In TS. IV, 1, 8, 3^c, we have verses 1 to 8, but verse 3 before verse 2, and verse 6 before verse 5, while verse 9 follows in IV, 2, 7, 1.

In TS. v. 3 stands before v. 2, in VII, 5, 16, 1, and VII, 5, 17, 1.

In TS. II, 2, 12, the pratikas of verses 1, 7, 10 are quoted in succession.

Verse 7 occurs with important various readings in TA. I, 23, 8, āpo ha yād brīhatīr gārbham āyan dāksham dādhanā ganāyantiḥ svayambhūm, tāta imé-dhyāsrigyaṇta sargāḥ.

Lastly in the AV. we find verses 1 to 7 from IV, 2, 1, to IV, 2, 7, but arranged in a different order, viz. as 2, 3, 6, 5, 4, 7, 1, and with important various readings.

Verse 2, yó 3 syése dvipádo yás kátushpadaḥ, as third páda; also in XIII, 3, 24.

Verse 3, ekó rāgā; yásya khāyāmrītam yásya mrityúḥ, as third páda.

Verse 4, yásya vísrve; samudré yásya rasām id āhúḥ; imās ka.

Verse 5, yásya dyaúr urvī prīthivī ka mahī yasyādá urvá-1 ntáriksham, yasyāsaú sūro vítato mahitvā.

Verse 6, ávatas kaskabhāné bhiyāsāne ródasī áhvayethām (sic), yasyāsaú panthā rāgaso vimānaḥ.

Verse 7, āpo ágre vísvam áván gārbham dādhanā amrītā ritaḡñāḥ, yāsu devīshv ádhi devā ásit.

Verse 10, vísvā rūpāni paribhūr gagāna, see VII, 79, 4, and 80, 3.

We are justified, therefore, in looking upon the verses, composing this hymn, as existing before the final arrangement of the four Samhitās, and if we persist in calling a hymn, dating from that period, a modern hymn, we must make it quite clear that, according to the present state of our knowledge, such a hymn cannot well be more modern than 1000 B.C. Besides the variations in the arrangement of the verses of our hymn, the very considerable various readings which we find in the VS., TS., and AV. are highly instructive, as showing the frequent employment of our hymn for sacrificial purposes. In several cases these various readings are of great importance, as we shall see.

^a Var. lect. mā mā, satyádharma vyānaḥ, prathamó for brīhatīḥ.

^b Var. lect. rūpāni for bhūtāni.

^c Var. lect., ver. 5, dridhé, dual for drīhā; ver. 6, úditau vyéti for údito vibhāti; ver. 8, agnīm for yagnām.

Verse 1.

MUIR: Hiranyagarbha arose in the beginning; born, he was the one lord of things existing. He established the earth and this sky: to what god shall we offer our oblation?

LUDWIG: Hiranyagarbha hat zuerst sich gebildet, er ward geboren als einziger herr alles gewordenen, diese erde und diesen himel hält er; Ka, dem gotte, möchten wir mit havis aufwarten.

Note 1. Hiranyagarbha^a has been translated in different ways, and it would perhaps be best to keep it as a proper name, which it is in later times. It means literally the golden embryo, the golden germ or child, or born of a golden womb, and was no doubt an attempt at naming the sun. Soon, however, that name became mythological. The golden child was supposed to have been so called because it was Pragâpati, the lord of creation, when dwelling as yet in the golden egg, and Hiranyagarbha became in the end a recognised name of Pragâpati, see Sây. on X, 121, 1. All this is fully explained by Sâyana, TS. IV, 1, 8, 3; IV, 2, 8, 2; by Mahîdhara, VS. XIII, 4.

Verse 2.

MUIR: He who gives breath, who gives strength, whose command all, [even] the gods, reverence, whose shadow is immortality, whose shadow is death: to what god shall we offer our oblation?

^a M. M., India, What can it teach us? pp. 144, 162.

LUDWIG: Geber des lebendigen hauches, geber der kraft, zu des unterweisung alle götter sich einfinden, des glanz die unsterblichkeit, dessen der tod ist, Ka, dem gotte, möchten wir mit havis aufwarten.

Note 1. In order to account for the repetition of yasya, Sâyana and Mahidhara take visve for men, and devâh for gods.

Note 2. It is difficult to say what is meant by khâyâ, shadow. I take it in the sense of what belongs to the god, as the shadow belongs to a man, what follows him, or is determined by him. In that sense Sâyana also takes it, TS. IV, 1, 8, 4, yasya pragâpates khâyâvat svâdhînam amṛitam, moksharûpam, mṛityuh, prâninâm maranam api, yasya khâyeva svâdhînah; and, though not quite so clearly, in RV. X, 121, 2. Mahidhara on the contrary takes khâyâ in the sense of refuge, and says, whose shadow, i.e. whose worship, preceded by knowledge, is amṛita, immortality, a means of deliverance^a, while ignorance of him is death, or leads to samsâra.

Verse 3.

MUIR: Who by his might became the sole king of the breathing and winking world, who is the lord of this two-footed and four-footed [creation]: to what god shall we offer our oblation?

LUDWIG: Der des atmenden, augenbewegenden lebendigen durch seine grösze der einzige könig geworden; der verfügt über disz zwei- und vier-füszige, Ka, dem gotte, möchten wir mit havis aufwarten.

Note 1. It is difficult to say whether nimishatah means twinkling or sleeping. It has both meanings as to wink has in English. Sâyana (X, 121, 3; TS. IV, 1, 8, 4) and Mahidhara (VS. XXIII, 3^b) explain it by winking. This may be right as expressing sensuous perception, in addition to mere breathing. In X, 190, 2, visvasya mishatô vaś means, lord of all that winks, i.e.

^a muktihetu, not yuktihetu, as Weber prints.

^b Is nimeshâto in XXIII, 3, a varia lectio, or an arudha? In XXV, 13, we read nimishato.

lives. The later idea, that the gods do not wink, has nothing to do with our passage.

Verse 4.

MUIR: Whose greatness these snowy mountains, and the sea with the Rasâ (river), declare,—of whom these regions, of whom they are the arms: to what god shall we offer our oblation?

LUDWIG: Dessen die schneebedeckten (berge, die Hima-vân) vermöge seiner grösze, als des eigentum man ocean und Rasâ nennt, des dise himelsgegenden, des arme sie, Ka, dem gotte, möchten wir mit havis aufwarten.

Note 1. Muir's translation, which suggests itself very naturally to a European mind, is impossible, because mahitvâ cannot be either mahitvâm (as Sâyana also and Mahîdhara suggest), or mahitvâni; and because âhúh does not mean declare. Otherwise nothing could be better than his rendering: 'Whose greatness these snowy mountains, and the sea with the Rasâ (river), declare.'

Mahitvâ, as Sâyana also rightly perceives, TS. IV, 1, 8, 4, is a very common instrumental (see Lanman, Noun-inflection, pp. 335-6), and the same mahitvâ must be supplied for samudrâm. We might make the whole sentence dependent on âhuh without much change of meaning. The Atharva-veda text supplies a lectio faciliior, but not therefore melior.

Note 2. The Rasâ is a distant river, in some respects like the Greek Okeanos. Dr. Aufrecht takes it as a name of the milky way, Z. D. M. G. XIII, 498: see Muir, S. T. II, p. 373, n. 19.

Verse 5.

MUIR: By whom the sky is fiery, and the earth fixed, by whom the firmament and the heaven were established, who in the atmosphere is the measurer of the aerial space: to what god shall we offer our oblation?

LUDWIG: Durch den gewaltig der himel und fest die erde, durch den gestützt Svar, und das gewölbe, der die räume im mittelgebiete ausgemessen, Ka, dem gotte, möchten wir mit havis aufwarten.

Note 1. In this verse I decidedly prefer the reading of the Atharva-veda, yena dyaus ugrâ prithivî ka drilhe. It seems not a lectio faciliior, and we avoid the statement that the heaven has been made ugrâ. Ugrâ, as applied to dyaus, means awful and grand, as an inherent quality rather, and not simply strong. See Ludwig, Notes, p. 441.

Note 2. Rágaso vimānaḥ has been fully discussed by Muir, S. T. IV, p. 71, but it is difficult to find a right translation for it, because the cosmography of the Veda is so different from our own (see I, 6, 9, note 1, and I, 19, 3, note 1). I think we may translate it here by the air, or even by space, particularly the bright air in the sky, the sky (antariksha or nabhas) being between heaven (dyu) and earth (prithivî), while svaḥ and nāka are still higher than the heaven (dyu), svaḥ being sometimes explained as the abode of the sun, the ether, or empyrean, nāka, the firmament, as svarga (Mahīdhara); or svaḥ as svarga, and nāka as āditya (Sāyana). Vimāna is here simply the measurer, though vimā, from meaning to measure, is apt to take the meaning of to make, which is an excuse for Sāyana's rendering, 'who makes the rain in the sky.'

The Atharva-veda rendering is very free, and certainly no improvement.

Verse 6.

MUIR: To whom two contending armies, sustained by his succour, looked up, trembling in mind; over whom the risen sun shines: to what god shall we offer our oblation?

LUDWIG: Auf den die beiden Schlachtreihen durch (ihre) Begriffe aufgestellt in Ordnung ihren Blick richten, zitternd, im Geiste, wo darüber hin aufgegangen Sûra ausstrahlt, Ka, dem Gotte, möchten wir mit Havis aufwarten.

Note 1. It would be well to read ródasî for krándasî (which B. R. explain by 'two armies'), and the various reading in AV. IV, 2, 3 decidedly points in that direction. But even if krándasî stands, it must be taken in the same sense as ródasî. Uditau vyeti in TS. IV, 1, 8, 5 is explained by udayavishaye vividham gakkhati.

Verse 7.

MUIR: When the great waters pervaded the universe containing an embryo, and generating fire, thence arose the one spirit (asu) of the gods: to what god shall we offer our oblation?

LUDWIG: Als die groszen waszer kamen, die allen keim in sich faszten, zeugend den Agni, da kam zu stande der götter einziger lebensgeist; Ka, dem gotte, möchten wir mit havis aufwarten.

Note 1. The waters here referred to have to be understood as the waters in the beginning of the creation, where, as we read (RV. X, 129, 3), 'everything was like a sea without a light,' or, as the Satapatha-brāhmaṇa (XI, 1, 6, 1) says, 'everything was water and sea.' These waters held the germ^a, and produced the golden light, the sun^b, whence arose the life of all the gods, viz. Pragāpati. The Atharva-veda adds a verse which repeats the same idea more clearly: āpo vatsām ganāyantīr gārbham āgre sāmairayan, tāsytotā gāyamānasyólba āsīd dhiranyāya, 'In the beginning the waters, producing a young, brought forth an embryo, and when it was being born, it had a golden covering.' The sunrise serves here as elsewhere as an image of the creation.

Note 2. Grassmann proposes to omit eka, because it is absent in the Maitráyaṇī Sākhā. The metre shows the same.

Verse 8.

MUIR: He who through his greatness beheld the waters which contained power, and generated sacrifice, who was the one god above the gods: to what god shall we offer our oblation?

LUDWIG: Der in seiner grösze sogar die waszer über-schaute, wie sie die fähigkeit besitzend erzeugten das opfer, der der einzige gott war über den göttern, Ka, dem gotte, möchten wir mit havis aufwarten.

Note 1. In dāksham dādhanā ganāyantīr yagnām, we have a repetition of what was said in the preceding verse, dáksham standing for gárbham, yagnám for agním, which is actually the reading of TS. The Atharva-veda does not contain this verse, which is used as an anyâ vikalpitâ yâgyâ in TS.

^a See RV. X, 82, 5-6.

^b See RV. X, 72, 7.

Note 2. It is curious that one of the most important sentences in the Rig-veda, yo deveshv adhi deva eka âsīt, should have been changed in the Atharva-veda IV, 2, 6 into yâsu devishv adhi deva âsīt, 'over which divine waters there was the god.' See Ludwig, Notes, p. 441.

Verse 9.

MUIR: May he not injure us, he who is the generator of the earth, who, ruling by fixed ordinances, produced the heavens, who produced the great and brilliant waters: to what god shall we offer our oblation?

LUDWIG: Nicht schädige uns, der der erde erzeuger, oder der den himel bereitet mit warhafter satzung, der auch die wasser, die hellen, die mächtigen erzeugt hat, Ka, dem gotte, möchten wir mit havis aufwarten.

Verse 10.

MUIR: Pragâpati, no other than thou is lord over all these created things: may we obtain that, through desire of which we have invoked thee: may we become masters of riches.

LUDWIG: Pragâpati, kein anderer als du hat umfasst die wesen alle, der wunsch, um deswillen wir dir opfern, der werde uns zu teil, besitzer von reichthümern mögen wir sein.

Note 1. This verse is certainly extremely weak after all that preceded, still, to judge from its frequent occurrence, we cannot well discard it. All we can say is that nowhere, except in the Rig-veda, does it form the final verse of our hymn, and thus spoil its whole character.

That character consists chiefly in the burden of the nine verses, Kasmai devâya havishâ vidhema, 'To what god shall we offer sacrifice?' This is clearly meant to express a desire of finding out the true, but unknown god, and to do so, even after all has been said that can be said of a supreme god. To finish such a hymn with a statement that Pragâpati is the god who deserves our sacrifice, may be very natural theologically, but it is entirely uncalled for poetically. The very phrase Kasmai devâya havishâ vidhema must have been a familiar phrase, for we find in a hymn addressed to the wind, X, 168, 4, after all has been said that can be said of him, the concluding line: ghóshâ/ it asya srinvire ná rûpâm tásmâi vâtâya havishâ vidhema, 'his sound indeed is heard, but he is not seen—to that Vâta let us offer sacrifice.'

But more than this, on the strength of hymns like our own in which the interrogative pronoun ka, 'who,' occurs, the Brâhmanas actually invented a god of the name of Ka. I pointed this out many years ago in my History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature (1860, p. 433), where I said: 'In accordance with the same system, we find that the authors of the Brâhmanas had so completely broken with the past that, forgetful of the poetical character of the hymns, and the yearning of the poets after the unknown god, they exalted the interrogative pronoun into a deity, and acknowledged a god 'Ka, or Who.' In the Taittiriya-samhitâ (I, 7, 6, 6), in the Kaushîtaki-brâhmana (XXIV, 4), in the Tândya-brâhmana (XV, 10), and in the Satapatha-brâhmana ^a, whenever interrogative verses occur, the author states, that Ka is Pragâpati, or 'the Lord of Creatures' (Pragâpatir vai Ka/). Nor did they stop there. Some of the hymns in which the interrogative pronoun occurred were called Kadvat, i.e. having kad or quid. But soon a new adjective was formed, and not only the hymns, but the sacrifices also, offered to the god, were called Kâya, or who-ish ^b. This word, which is not to be identified with the Latin cujus, cuja, cujum, but is merely the artificial product of an effete mind, is found in the Taittiriya-samhitâ (I, 8, 3, 1), and in the Vâgasaneyi-samhitâ (XXIV, 15). At the time of Pânini this word had acquired such legitimacy as to call for a separate rule explaining its formation (Pân. IV, 2, 25). The commentator there explains Ka by Brahman. After this we can hardly wonder that in the later Sanskrit literature of the Purâṇas, Ka appears as a recognised god, as the supreme god, with a genealogy of his own, perhaps even with a wife; and that in the Laws of Manu, one of the recognised forms of marriage, generally known by the name of Pragâpati-marriage, occurs under the monstrous title of 'Kâya.' Stranger still, grammarians who know that ka forms the dative kasmai only if it is an interrogative pronoun, consider kasmai in our hymn as irregular, because, as a proper name, Ka ought to form the dative Kâya.

^a Satap. Brâhm. I, 1, 1, 13; II, 5, 2, 13; IV, 5, 6, 4; also Aitar. Brâhm. III, 21.

^b Ârv. Sr. Sûtra II, 17, 14; Kâty. Sr. Sûtra V, 4, 23; Vait. Sûtra VIII, 22, ed. Garbe.

MANDALA I, HYMN 6.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYĀYA 1, VARGA 11-12.

TO INDRA AND THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Those who stand around ² him while he moves on, harness the bright red (steed)¹; the lights in heaven shine forth³.

2. They harness to the chariot on each side his (Indra's)¹ two favourite bays, the brown, the bold, who can carry the hero.

3. Thou who createst light where there was no light, and form, O men¹! where there was no form, hast been born together with the dawns².

4. Thereupon¹ they (the Maruts), according to their wont², assumed again the form of new-born babes³, taking their sacred name.

5. Thou, O Indra, with the swift Maruts¹, who break even through the stronghold², hast found even in their hiding-place the bright ones³ (days or clouds).

6. The pious singers¹ (the Maruts) have, after their own mind², shouted towards the giver of wealth, the great, the glorious (Indra).

7. Mayest thou¹ (host of the Maruts) be verily seen² coming together with Indra, the fearless: you are both happy-making, and of equal splendour.

8. With the beloved hosts of Indra, with the blameless, hasting² (Maruts), the sacrificer¹ cries aloud.

9. From yonder, O traveller (Indra), come hither, or from the light^a of heaven¹; the singers all yearn for it;—

10. Or we ask Indra for help from here, or from heaven, or from above the earth, or from the great sky.

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Kaṇva, the son of Ghora. The metre is Gâyatrî throughout.

Verse 1=SV. II, 818; VS. XXIII, 5; AV. XX, 26, 4; 47, 10; 69, 9; TS. VII, 4, 20, 1; TB. III, 9, 4, 1.

Verse 2=SV. II, 819; VS. XXIII, 6; AV. XX, 26, 5; 47, 11; 69, 10; TS. VII, 4, 20, 1.

Verse 3=SV. II, 820; VS. XXIX, 37; AV. XX, 26, 6; 47, 12; 69, 11; TS. VII, 4, 20, 1; TB. III, 9, 4, 3.

Verse 4=SV. II, 101; AV. XX, 40, 3; 69, 12.

Verse 5=SV. II, 202; AV. XX, 70, 1.

Verse 6=AV. XX, 70, 2.

Verse 7=SV. II, 200; AV. XX, 40, 1; 70, 3.

Verse 8=AV. XX, 40, 2; 70, 4.

Verse 9=AV. XX, 70, 5.

Verse 10=AV. XX, 70, 6.

Verse 1.

WILSON: The circumstationed (inhabitants of the three worlds) associate with (Indra), the mighty (Sun), the indestructive (fire), the moving (wind), and the lights that shine in the sky.

BENFEY: Die rothe Sonne schirr'n sie an, die wandelt um die stehenden, Strahlen strahlen am Himmel auf.

LUDWIG: Sie spannen an den hellen, den roten, den vom feststehenden hinwegwandelnden; heller glanz erstrahlt am Himmel.

Note 1. The poet begins with a somewhat abrupt description of a sunrise. Indra is taken as the god of the bright day, whose steed is the sun, and whose companions the Maruts, or the storm-gods. Arushá, meaning originally red, is used as a proper name of the horse or of the rising sun, though it occurs more frequently as the name of the red horses or flames of Agni, the god of fire, and also of the morning light. In our passage, Arushá, a substantive, meaning the red of the morning, has taken bradhná as an adjective,—bradhná meaning, as far as can be made out, bright in general, though, as it is especially applied to the Soma-juice, perhaps bright-brown or yellow. Names of colour are difficult to translate from one language into another, for their shades vary, and withdraw themselves from sharp definition. We shall meet with this difficulty again and again in the Veda; see RV. X, 20, 9.

As it has actually been doubted whether bradhná arushá can be meant for the sun, and whether the Vedic poets ever looked upon the sun as a horse, I may quote Vāg. Samh. XXIII, 4, where the same verse occurs and is declared to be addressed to the sun; and Satap. Br. XIII, 2, 6, 1, where we read, yuñgānti bradhnām arushām karan-tam iti, asau vā ādityo bradhno-rusho-mum evāsmā ādityam yunakti svargasya lokasya samashṭyai. Ludwig remarks justly that the sun has been conceived as a chariot also, and that bradhná arushá may have been thus understood here. Delbrück translates quite boldly: Sie schirren die rothe Sonne an. See also Tait. Br. III, 7, 7, 4; Tāndya Br. XXIII, 3, 5; Sāṅkh. Br. II, 17, 3; Ludwig, Comm. ii. p. 173. M. Bergaigne (Rél. Ved. iii. p. 324) remarks very truly: 'Le soleil est tantôt une roue, tantôt un char, tantôt un cheval, trainant le char, tantôt un héros monté sur le char et dirigeant les chevaux.'

The following passages will illustrate the principal meaning of arushá, and justify the translation here adopted.

ARUSHÁ, AS AN ADJECTIVE.

Arushá is used as an adjective in the sense of red:

VII, 97, 6. tām sagmāsah arushāsah āsvāh brīhaspátim saha-vāhah vahanti,—nábhah ná rūpām arushám vásānāh.

Powerful red horses, drawing together draw him, Brīhaspati: horses clothed in red colour, like the sky.

III, 1, 4. svetām gaghānām arushām mahi-tvā.

Agni, the white, when born; the red, by growth.

III, 15, 3. krishnāsu agne arushāh ví bhāhi.

Shine, O Agni, red among the dark ones.

III, 31, 21; VI, 27, 7.

VII, 75, 6. prāti dyutânām arushāsah āsvāh kitrāh adri-sran ushāsam vāhantaḥ.

The red horses, the beautiful, were seen bringing to us the bright dawn.

V, 43, 12; I, 118, 5; IV, 43, 6; V, 73, 5; I, 36, 9; VII, 3, 3; 16, 3; X, 45, 7; I, 141, 8.

II, 2, 8. sáh idhánáh ushāsah rāmyāh ānu svāh ná dīdet arushéna bhânúnā.

He (Agni), lit after the lovely dawns, shone like the sky with his red splendour.

III, 29, 6; IV, 58, 7; I, 114, 5; V, 59, 5; 12, 2; 12, 6; VI, 8, 1.

VI, 48, 6. syāvāsu arusháh vrīshā.

In the dark (nights) the red hero (Agni). Cf. III, 7, 5.

In one passage vrīshan arushá is intended for fire in the shape of lightning.

X, 89, 9. nī amítreshu vadhám indra túmram vrīshan vrīshānam arushám sīsihi.

Whet, O strong Indra, the heavy strong red weapon, against the enemies.

X, 43, 9. út gāyatām parasúh gyótishā sahā—vī rokatām arusháh bhânúnā súkīh.

May the axe (the thunderbolt) appear with the light—may the red one blaze forth, bright with splendour.

X, 1, 6; VI, 3, 6.

X, 20, 9. krīshnāh svetáh arusháh yāmaḥ asya bradhnáh rigráh utá sōnah.

His (Agni's) path is black, white, red, bright, reddish, and yellow.

Here it is extremely difficult to keep all the colours distinct.

Arushá is frequently applied to Soma, particularly in the 9th Māṇḍala. There we read :

IX, 8, 6. arusháh hárīh. IX, 71, 7. arusháh diváh kavīh vrīshā. IX, 74, 1. vāgī arusháh. IX, 82, 1. arusháh vrīshā hárīh. IX, 89, 3. hárīm arushám.

IX, 111, 1. arusháh hárīh. See also IX, 25, 5; 61, 21. In IX, 72, 1, arushá seems used as a substantive in the sense of red-horse.

Professor Spiegel, in his important review of my translation (Heidelberger Jahrbücher, 1870, p. 104), points out that aurusha in Zend means white, so that it would seem as if the original meaning of arusha had been bright, bright like fire, and thus red.

ARUSHÁ, AS AN APPELLATIVE.

Arushá is used as an appellative, and in the following senses :

1. The one red-horse of the Sun, the two or more red-horses of Agni.

I, 6, 1. yuñgānti bradhnám arushám.

They yoke the bright red-horse (the Sun).

I, 94, 10. yát áyuktháh arusháh róhitá ráthe.

When thou (Agni) hadst yoked the two red-horses and the two ruddy horses to the chariot. I, 146, 2.

II, 10, 2. srúyáh agníh—hávam me—syávā rátham vaha-táh róhitá vā utá arusháh.

Mayest thou, Agni, hear my call, whether the two black, or the two ruddy, or the two red-horses carry you.

Here three kinds of colours are clearly distinguished, and an intentional difference is made between róhita and arushá. IV, 2, 3.

IV, 6, 9. táva tyé agne harítah—róhitásah—arushāsah vríshanaḥ.

To thee (Agni) belong these bays, these ruddy, these red-horses, the stallions.

Here, again, three kinds of horses are distinguished—Haríts, Róhitas, and Arushás.

VIII, 34, 17. yé rigráh vāta-ramhasah arushāsah raghu-syádah.

Here arushá may be the subject, and the rest adjectives ; but it is also possible to take all the words as adjectives, referring them to áśú in the next verse. The fact that rigrá likewise expresses a peculiar red colour, is no objection, as may be seen from I, 6, 1 ; 94, 10.

VII, 42, 2. yuñkshvá—harítah róhitah ka yé vā sádman arusháh.

Yoke (O Agni) the bays, and the ruddy horses, or the red-horses which are in thy stable. VII, 16, 2.

2. The cloud, represented as one of the horses of the Maruts.

I, 85, 5. utá arushásya ví syanti dhārāk.

(When you go to the battle, O Maruts), the streams of the red (horse) flow off.

V, 56, 7. utá syāh vāgī arushāk.

This strong red-horse,—meant for one of the horses of the Maruts, but, at the same time, as sending rain.

ARUSHÁ, AS THE PROPER NAME OF A SOLAR DEITY.

Besides the passages in which arushá is used either as an adjective, in the sense of red, or as an appellative, meaning some kind of horse, there are others in which, as I pointed out in my Essay on Comparative Mythology^a, Arushá occurs as a proper name, as the name of a solar deity, as the bright deity of the morning (Morgenroth). My interpretation of some of these passages has been contested, nor shall I deny that in some of them a different interpretation is possible, and that in looking for traces of Arushá, as a Vedic deity, representing the morning or the rising sun, and containing, as I endeavoured to show, the first germs of the Greek name of Eros, I may have seen more indications of the presence of that deity in the Veda than others would feel inclined to acknowledge. Yet in going over the same ground again, I think that even verses which for a time I felt inclined to surrender, yield a better sense, if we take the word arushá, which occurs in them as a substantive, as the name of a matutinal deity, than if we look upon it as an adjective or a mere appellative. It might be said that wherever this arushá occurs, apparently as the name of a deity, we ought to supply Agni or Indra or Sūrya. This is true to a certain extent, for the sun, or the light of the morning, or the bright sky form no doubt the substance and subject-matter of this deity. But the same applies to many other names originally intended for these conceptions, but which, nevertheless, in the course of time, became independent names of independent deities. In our passage I, 6, 1, yuṅgānti bradhnám arushám, we may retain for arushá the appellative power of steed or red-steed, but if we could ask the poet what he meant by this red-steed, or if we ask ourselves what we can possibly understand by it, the answer would be, the morning sun, or the light of the morning. In other passages, however, this meaning of red-steed is really no longer applicable, and we can only translate Arushá by the Red, understanding by this name the deity of the morning or of the morning sun, the later Aruṇa.

^a Chips from a German Workshop, 2nd ed., vol. ii, p. 137 seq. Selected Essays, vol. i, p. 444.

VII, 71, 1. ápa svásuḥ ushásaḥ nák gihíte rinákti krishnā arushāya pánthām.

The Night retires from her sister, the Dawn; the Dark one yields the path to the Red one, i. e. the red morning.

Here Arushá shares the same half-mythological character as Ushas. Where we should speak of dawn and morning as mere periods of time, the Vedic poet speaks of them as living and intelligent beings, half human, half divine, as powers of nature capable of understanding his prayers, and powerful enough to reward his praises. I do not think therefore that we need hesitate to take Arushá in this passage as a proper name of the morning, or of the morning sun, to whom the dark goddess, the Night, yields the path when he rises in the East.

VI, 49, 2. diváh śísum sáhasaḥ sūnúm agním yagñásya ketúm arushám yágadhyai.

To worship the child of Dyu, the son of strength, Agni, the light of the sacrifice, the Red one (Arushá).

In this verse, where the name of Agni actually occurs, it would be easier than in the preceding verse to translate arushá as an adjective, referring it either to Agni, the god of fire, or to yagñásya ketúm, the light of the sacrifice. I had myself yielded* so far to these considerations that I gave up my former translation, and rendered this verse by 'to worship Agni, the child of the sky, the son of strength, the red light of the sacrifice^a.' But I return to my original translation, and I prefer to see in Arushá an independent name, intended, no doubt, for Agni, as the representative of the rising sun and, at the same time, of the sacrificial fire of the morning, but nevertheless as having in the mind of the poet a personality of his own. He is the child of Dyū, originally the offspring of heaven. He is the son of strength, originally generated by the strong rubbing of the aravis, i. e. the wood for kindling fire. He is the light of the sacrifice, whether as reminding man that the time for the morning sacrifice has come, or as himself lighting the sacrifice on the Eastern altar of the sky. He is Arushá, originally as clothed in bright red colour, but gradually changed into the representative of the morning. We see at once, if examining these various expressions, how some of them, like the child of Dyū, are easily carried away into mythology, while others, such as the son of strength, or the light of the sacrifice, resist that unconscious metamorphosis. That Arushá was infected by mythology, that it had approached at least that point where nomina become changed into numina, we see by the verse immediately following:

* Chips from a German Workshop, vol. ii, p. 139.

VI, 49, 3. arushásya duhitārā vīrūpe (iti vī-rūpe) str/bhiḥ anyā pipisē sūrah anyā.

There are two different daughters of Arushá; the one is clad in stars, the other belongs to the sun, or is the wife of Svar.

Here Arushá is clearly a mythological being, like Agni or Savitar or Vaisvânara; and if Day and Night are called his daughters, he, too, can hardly have been conceived otherwise than as endowed with human attributes, as the child of Dyū, as the father of Day and Night, and not as a mere period of time, not as a mere cause or effect.

IV, 15, 6. tām árvantam ná sânasīm arushám ná diváh śsum marmṛigyānte divé-dive.

^a Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1867, p. 204.

They trim the fire day by day, like a strong horse, like Arushá, the child of Dyu.

Here, too, Arushá, the child of Dyu, has to be taken as a personal character, and, if the ná after arushám is right, a distinction is clearly made between Agni, the sacrificial fire, to whom the hymn is addressed, and Arushá, the child of heaven, the pure and bright morning, here used as a simile for the cleaning or trimming of the fire on the altar.

V, 47, 3. arusháh su-parnáh.

Arushá, the morning sun, with beautiful wings.

THE FEMININE ÁRUSHÎ, AS AN ADJECTIVE.

Árushî, like arushá, is used as an adjective, in the same sense as arushá, i. e. red :

III, 55, 11. syávi ka yát árushî ka svásárau.

As the dark and the red are sisters.

I, 92, 1 and 2. gávah árushîh and árushîh gáh.

The red cows of the dawn.

I, 92, 2. rúrantam bhânúm árushîh asirayuh.

The red dawns obtained bright splendour.

Here ushása^h, the dawns, occur in the same line, so that we may take árushîh either as an adjective, referring to the dawns, or as a substantive, as a name of the dawn or of her cows.

I, 30, 21. ásve ná kître arushi.

Thou beautiful red dawn, thou, like a mare.

Here, too, the vocative arushi is probably to be taken as an adjective, particularly if we consider the next following verse :

IV, 52, 2. ásvá-iva kitrā árushî mātā gávām ritá-vari sákhā abhūt arvíno^h ushā^h.

The dawn, beautiful and red, like a mare, the mother of the cows (days), the never-failing, she became the friend of the Asvins.

X, 5, 5. saptá svásrîh árushîh.

The seven red sisters.

THE FEMININE ÁRUSHÎ, AS A SUBSTANTIVE.

If used as a substantive, árushî seems to mean the dawn. It is likewise used as a name of the horses of Agni, Indra, and Soma ; also as a name for mare in general.

It means dawn in X, 8, 3, though the text points here so clearly to the dawn, and the very name of dawn is mentioned so immediately after, that this one passage seems hardly sufficient to establish the use of árushî as a recognised name of the dawn. Other passages, however, would likewise gain in perspicuity, if we took árushî by itself as a name of the dawn, just as we had to admit in several passages arushá by itself as a name of the morning. Cf. I, 71, 1.

Árushî means the horses of Agni, in I, 14, 12 :

yukshvá hí árushîḥ ráthe harítaḥ deva rohítaḥ.

Yoke, O god (Agni), the red-horses to the chariot, the bays, the ruddy.

I, 72, 10. prá nṛkîḥ agne árushîḥ agānan.

They knew the red-horses, Agni, coming down. VIII, 69, 5.

Soma, as we saw, was frequently spoken of as arusháḥ háriḥ.

In IX, 111, 2, tridhātubhiḥ árushîbhiḥ seems to refer to the same red-horses of Soma, though this is not quite clear.

The passages where árushî means simply a mare, without any reference to colour, are VIII, 68, 18, and VIII, 55, 3.

It is curious that Arushá, which in the Veda means red, should, as pointed out before, in its Zend form aurusha, mean white. That in the Veda it means red, and not white, is shown, for instance, by X, 20, 9, where svetá, the name for white, is mentioned by the side of arushá. Most likely arushá meant originally brilliant, and became fixed with different shades of brilliancy in Sanskrit and Persian. Arushá presupposes a form ar-vas, and is derived from a root ar in the sense of running or rushing. See Chips from a German Workshop, vol. ii, pp. 135, 137.

Having thus explained the different meanings of arushá and árushí in the Rig-veda, I feel it incumbent, at least for once, to explain the reasons why I differ from the classification of Vedic passages as given in the Dictionary published by Boehtlingk and Roth. Here, too, the passages in which arushá is used as an adjective are very properly separated from those in which it appears as a substantive. To begin with the first, it is said that 'arushá means ruddy, the colour of Agni and his horses; he (Agni) himself appears as a red-horse.' In support of this, the following passages are quoted:

III, 1, 4. ávardhayan su-bhágam saptá yahvī́h svetám gagā́nām arushám mahi-tvā́, ś́srum ná gátám abhí áruh árvā́h. Here, however, it is only said that Agni was born brilliant-white^a, and grew red, that the horses came to him as they come to a new-born foal. Agni himself is not called a red-horse.

III, 7, 5. Here, again, vr̥shnah arushásya is no doubt meant for Agni. But vr̥shan by itself does not mean horse, though it is added to different names of horses to qualify them as male horses; cf. VII, 69, 1, ā́ vām ráthah vr̥shabhih yātu árvaih, may your chariot come near with powerful horses, i. e. with stallions. See note to I, 85, 12. We are therefore not justified in translating arushá vr̥shan by red-horse, but only by the red male, or the red hero.

In III, 31, 3, agníh gagā́e guhvā́ régamānah maháh putrán arushásya pra-yákshe, I do not venture to say who is meant by the maháh putrán arushásya, whether Ādityas or Maruts, but hardly the sons of Agni, as Agni himself is mentioned as only born. But, even if it were so, the father of these sons (putra) could hardly be intended here for a horse.

IV, 6, 9. táva tyé agne harítah ghríta-snā́h róhitāsah rigu-ā́ñkah su-ā́ñkah, arushāsah vr̥shanah rigu-mushkā́h. Here, so far from Agni being represented as a red-horse, his different horses, the Haríts or bays, the Róhitas or ruddy, and the arushāsaḥ vrīṣhanah, the red stallions, are distinctly mentioned. Here vrīṣhan may be translated by stallion, instead of simply by male, because arushā is here a substantive, the name of a horse.

^a See V, 1, 4. svetáh vā́gī gāyate ágre áhnam. X, 1, 6. arusháh gátáh padé ś́lāyā́h.

V, 1, 5. gānishṭa hí gēnyaḥ āgre áhnām hitáh hitēshu arusháh vāneshu. Here arusháh is simply an adjective, red, referring to Agni, who is understood throughout the hymn to be the object of praise. He is said to be kind to those who are kind to him, and to be red in the woods, i. e. brilliant in the wood which he consumes; cf. III, 29, 6. Nothing is said about his equine nature.

In V, 12, 2 and 6, VI, 48, 6, we have again simply arushā vrīṣhan, which does not mean the red-horse, but the red male, the red hero, i. e. Agni.

In VI, 49, 2, diváh śśum sáhasaḥ sūnúm agním yagñásya ketúm arushám yágadhyai, there is no trace of Agni being conceived as a horse. He is called the child of the sky or of Dyū, the son of strength (who is produced by strong rubbing of wood), the light or the beacon of the sacrifice, and lastly Arushā, which, for reasons stated above, I take to be used here as a name.

Next follow the passages in which, according to Professor Roth, arushā, as an adjective, is said to be applied to the horses, cows, and other teams of the gods, particularly of the dawn, the Asvins, and Bṛihaspati.

I, 118, 5. pári vām ásváh vāpushaḥ patangāḥ váyaḥ vahantu arushāḥ abhīke. Here we find the váyah arushāḥ of the Asvins, which it is better to translate by red birds, as immediately before the winged horses are mentioned. In fact, whenever arushā is applied to the vehicle of the Asvins, it is to be understood of these red birds, IV, 43, 6.

In I, 92, 1 and 2 (not 20), árushī occurs three times, referring twice to the cows of the dawn, once to the dawn herself.

In IV, 15, 6, tám árvantam ná sânasīm arushám ná diváh śśum marmṛigyānte divé-dive, arushā does not refer to the horse or any other animal of Agni. The verse speaks of a horse by way of comparison only, and says that the sacrificers clean or trim Agni, the fire, as people clean a horse. We cannot join arushám in the next páda with árvantam in the preceding páda, for the second ná would then be without any construction. The construction is certainly not easy, but I think it is safer to translate: they trim him (Agni), day by day, as they clean a strong horse, as they clean Arushá, the child of Dyu. In fact, as far as I know, arushá is never used as the name of the one single horse belonging to Agni, but always of two or more.

In III, 31, 21, antár (íti) krishnān arushaḥ dhāma bhiḥ gāt, dhāma bhiḥ is said to mean flames of lightning. But dhāman in the Rig-veda does not mean flames, and it seems better to translate, with thy red companies, scil. the Maruts.

That arushá in one or two passages means the red cloud, is true. But in X, 43, 9, arushá refers to the thunderbolt mentioned in the same verse; and in I, 114, 5, everything refers to Rudra, and not to a red cloud, in the proper sense of the word.

Further on, where the meanings attributable to árushî in the Veda are collected, it is said that árushî means a red mare, also the teams of Agni and Ushas. Now, here, surely, a distinction should have been made between those passages in which árushî means a real horse, and those where it expresses the imaginary steeds of Agni. The former, it should be observed, occur in one Mandala only, and in places of somewhat doubtful authority, in VIII, 55, 3, a Váľakhilya hymn, and in VIII, 68, 18, a dānastuti or panegyric. Besides, no passage is given where árushî means the horses of the dawn, and I doubt whether such a passage exists, while the one verse where árushî is really used for the horses of Indra, is not mentioned at all. Lastly, two passages are set apart where árushî is supposed to mean flames. Now, it may be perfectly true that the red-horses of Agni are meant for flames, just as the red-horses of Indra may be the rays of the sun. But, in that case, the red-horses of Agni should always have been thus translated, or rather interpreted, and not in one passage only. In IX, 111, 2, árushî is said to mean flames, but no further light is thrown upon that very difficult passage.

Note 2. Pári tasthúshaḥ. I take this form as a nominative plural like ábibhyushaḥ, I, 11, 5, tvām devāḥ ábibhyushaḥ tugyámânâsaḥ ávishuḥ, 'the gods, stirred up, came to thee, not fearing ;' and like dadúshaḥ, I, 54, 8, yé te indra dadúshaḥ vardháyanti máhi kshatrám, 'who giving or by their gifts increase thy great power, O Indra.' Here we might possibly take it as a gen. sing. referring to te, but dadivân is far more appropriate as an epithet of the sacrificer than of the god. (See Benfey, Vocativ, p. 24; and Hermes, p. 16.) It is well known among Sanskrit scholars that Professor Whitney, in reviewing my translation, declared that the participial form tasthushaḥ had no right to be anything but an accusative plural or a genitive or ablative singular. (See Chips from a German Workshop, vol. iv, p. 508.) Dr. Kern, however, in his translation of the Bṛihat-Samhitâ had shown long before that nom. plur. such as vidushaḥ are by no means rare, even in the Mahâbhârata and kindred works. Dr. Lanman (Journ. Americ. Or. Soc. X, p. 513) has now entered abibhyushaḥ as a nom. plur., but he prefers to take tasthushaḥ as an acc. plural, so that we should have to translate kárantam pári tasthúshaḥ by 'walking round those who stand.' This may be grammatically possible; but who could be meant by tasthushaḥ, standing ones? And, secondly, is it usual in Vedic Sanskrit to say karati pári tam, 'he walks round him?' We find pari tam yâti, or tam pari yâti, but hardly yâti pari tam, 'he goes round him,' except when pari stands independent of the verb and means 'around,' e.g. IX, 72, 8, pavasva pári pârthivam rágat. It is more difficult to decide whether we should adopt Ludwig's interpretation, who takes pari tasthushaḥ in the sense of 'away from what is firm.' This is correct grammatically, and tasthivat, as opposed to gágat, is often used in the sense of what is immovable. But is it ever used in that sense by itself? I doubt it, though I may add in support of it such a passage as I, 191, 9, út apaptat asaú sūryaḥ . . . âdityáḥ párvatebhyāḥ, a verse where the expression visvâdrishṭaḥ adrishṭahā is analogous to our ketúm krinván aketáve. I therefore retain pari tasthushaḥ as a nom. plural in the sense of standing around, circumstantes, possibly of parikara, attendants. Parishthāna or sthāna comes to mean an abode, and paritasthivantas would be bystanders, attendants, the people, in fact, who are supposed to harness the horse.

Though I do not assign great weight to interpretations of hymns, as given by the Brāhmanas, I may mention that in the Taitt. Br. III, 9, 4, 1, paritasthushaḥ is explained as a nom. plur., ime vai lokāḥ paritasthushaḥ, while Sāyana in his commentary (Sāma-veda II, 6, 3, 12, 1) has parito-va-sthitā lokatrayavartināḥ prāninaḥ.

Note 3. Rōkante rokāṇā. A similar expression occurs III, 61, 5, where it is said of Ushas, the dawn, that she lighted the lights in the sky, prā rokāṇā ruruke ranvā-sandrīk.

Verse 2.

WILSON: They (the charioteers) harness to his car his two desirable coursers, placed on either hand, bay-coloured, high-spirited, chief-bearing.

BENFEY: Die lieben Falben schirren sie zu beiden Seiten des Wagens an, braune, kühne, held-tragende.

LUDWIG: Sie spannen seine lieblichen falben an den wagen mit auseinandergehenden seiten, die blutroten, mutigen, helden-bringenden.

Note 1. Although no name is given, the pronoun asya clearly refers to Indra, for it is he to whom the two bays belong. The next verse, therefore, must likewise be taken as addressed to Indra, and not to the sun or the morning-red, spoken of as a horse or a chariot in the first verse.

Vipakshasā is well explained by Sāyana, vividhe pakshasā rathasya pārsvau yayos tau vipakshasau, rathasya dvayor pārsvayor yogitāv ity arthaḥ. The only doubt is whether it refers to the two sides of the chariot, or of the principal horse. That horses were sometimes yoked so that one should act as leader, and two should be harnessed on each side, we see in I, 39, 6, note.

Verse 3.

WILSON: Mortals, you owe your (daily) birth (to such an Indra), who, with the rays of the morning, gives sense to the senseless, and to the formless, form.

BENFEY: Licht machend—Männer!—das Dunkele und kenntlich das Unkenntliche, entsprangst du mit dem Morgenroth.

LUDWIG: Sichtbarkeit schaffend dem unsichtbaren, gestalt o schmuckreiche (Marut) dem gestaltlosen, wurdet ihr mit den Ushas zusammen geboren.

Note 1. In the TB. III, 9, 4, several of these mantras are enjoined for the Asvamedha. When the banner (dhvaga) is fastened, this verse is to be used, because ketu was supposed to mean a banner. The vocative maryâh, which I have translated by O men, had evidently become a mere exclamation at a very early time. Even in our passage it is clear that the poet does not address any men in particular, for he addresses Indra, nor is marya used in the general sense of men. It means males, or male offspring. It sounds more like some kind of asseveration or oath, like the Latin mehercle, or like the English O ye powers, and it is therefore quoted as a nipâta or particle in the Vâg. Prâtis. II, 16. It can hardly be taken here as addressed to the Maruts, though the Maruts are the subject of the next verse. Kluge in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xxv, p. 309, points out that maryâh as an interjection does not occur again in the Rig-veda. But the Rig-veda contains many words which occur once only, and the author of Vâg. Prâtisâkhya is no mean authority. See also Tândya Brâhm. VII, 6, 5. If Dr. Kluge proposes to read mâryâi as a dative (like λύκῳ) he knows, of course, that such a form does not only never occur again in the Rig-veda, but never in the whole of Sanskrit literature. Grassmann and Lanman (N. I., p. 339) both seem to imagine that the Pada text has marya, but it has maryâh, and no accent. If maryâh had the accent, we might possibly translate, 'the youths, i. e. the Maruts, made,' taking krinvan for akrinvan, or the more usual akurvan; but in that case the transition to agâyathâh would be very sudden. See, however, I, 6, 7.

Sāyana explains it maryāh, manushyāh ! idam āstaryam paryata. Another explanation of this verse, which evidently troubled the ancient commentators as much as us, is, 'O mortal, i. e. O sun (dying daily), thou hast been born with the dawn.'

Note 2. Ushādbhih, an instrumental plural which attracted the attention of the author of the Vārttika to Pān. VII, 4, 48. It occurs but, once, but the regular form, ushobhih, does not occur at all in the Rig-veda. The same grammarian mentions mās, month, as changing the final s of its base into d before bhis. This, too, is confirmed by RV. II, 24, 5, where mādbhih occurs. Two other words, svavas, offering good protection, and svatavas, of independent strength, mentioned together as liable to the same change, do not occur with bhih in the Rig-veda, but the forms svavadbhih and svatavadbhih probably occurred in some other Vedic writings. Svatavadbhyaḥ has been pointed out by Professor Aufrecht in the Vāgasan. Samhitā XXIV, 16, and svatavobhyaḥ in Satap. Br. II, 5, 1, 14. That the nom. svavān, which is always trisyllabic, is not to be divided into sva-vān, as proposed by Sākalya, but into su-avān, is implied by Vārttika to Pān. VIII, 4, 48, and distinctly stated in the Siddhānta-Kaumudī. That the final n of the nom. su-avān disappeared before semi-vowels is confirmed by the Sākala-prātisākhya, Sūtra 287; see also Vāgasan. Prātis. III, Sūtra 135 (Weber, Ind. Stud. vol. iv, p. 206). On the proper division of su-avas, see Aufrecht, Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft, vol. xiii, p. 499.

Verse 4.

WILSON: Thereafter, verily, those who bear names invoked in holy rites (the Maruts), having seen the rain about to be engendered, instigated him to resume his embryo condition (in the clouds).

BENFEY: Sodann von freien Stücken gleich erregen wieder Schwangerschaft die heiligen Namen tragenden.

LUDWIG: Da haben nämlich in ihrer göttlichen weise dise der Prisni leibesfrucht gebracht, opfer verdienenden namen erwerbend.

Note 1. Āt must here take vyūha and be pronounced as an iambus. This is exceptional with āt, but there are at least two other passages where the same pronunciation is necessary. I, 148, 4, āt rokate vāne ā vi-bhā-vā, though in the line immediately following it is monosyllabic. Also in V, 7, 10, āt agne āprinatah.

Note 2. Svadhā, literally one's own place, afterwards, one's own nature. It was a great triumph for the science of Comparative Philology that, long before the existence of such a word as svadhā in Sanskrit was known, it should have been postulated by Professor Benfey in his Griechisches Wurzellexicon, published in 1839, and in the appendix of 1842. Svadhā was known, it is true, in the ordinary Sanskrit, but there it only occurred as an exclamation used on presenting an oblation to the manes. It was also explained to mean food offered to deceased ancestors, or to be the name of a personification of Māyā or worldly illusion, or of a nymph. But Professor Benfey, with great ingenuity, postulated for Sanskrit a noun svadhā, as corresponding to the Greek ἔθος and the German sitte, O. H. G. sit-u, Gothic sid-u. The noun svadhā has since been discovered in the Veda, where it occurs very frequently; and its true meaning in many passages where native tradition had entirely misunderstood it, has really been restored by means of its etymological identification with the Greek ἔθος or ἦθος. See Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. ii, p. 134; vol. xii, p. 158.

The expressions ānu svadhām ānu and svadhām ānu are of frequent occurrence. They mean, according to the nature or character of the persons spoken of, and may be translated by as usual, or according to a person's wont. Thus in our passage we may translate, The Maruts are born again, i. e. as soon as Indra appeared with the dawn, according to their wont; they are always born as soon as Indra appears, for such is their nature.

I, 165, 5. indra svadhām ānu hī naḥ babhūtha.

For, Indra, according to thy wont, thou art with us.

VIII, 20, 7. svadhām ānu srīyam nāraḥ—vāhante.

According to their wont, the men (the Maruts) carry splendour.

Thou hast grown (Indra) according to thy nature.

IV, 33, 6. ánu svadhā́m rībhávaḥ gāgmukḥ eṭām.

According to their nature, the Rībhus went to her, scil. the cow; or, according to this their nature, they came.

IV, 52, 6; I, 33, 11; I, 88, 6; VII, 56, 13; III, 51, 11.

In all these passages svadhā́ may be rendered by manner, habit, usage, and ánu svadhā́m would seem to correspond to the Greek ἐξ ἑθους. Yet the history of these words in Sanskrit and Greek has not been exactly the same. First of all we observe in Greek a division between ἑθός and ἦθος, and whereas the former comes very near in meaning to the Sanskrit svadhā́, the latter shows in Homer a much more primitive and material sense. It means in Homer, not a person's own nature, but the own place, for instance, of animals, the haunts of horses, lions, fish; in Hesiod, also of men. Hom. Il. XV, 268, μετὰ τ' ἦθεα καὶ νομόν ἱππων, loca consueta et pascua. Svadhā́ in the Veda does not occur in that sense, although etymologically it might take the meaning of one's own place: cf. dhā-man, familia, &c. Whether in Greek ἦθος, from meaning lair, haunt, home, came, like νόμος and νόμος, to mean habit, manner, character, which would be quite possible, or whether ἦθος in that meaning represents a second start from the same point, which in Sanskrit was fixed in svadhā́, is impossible to determine. In Sanskrit svadhā́ clearly shows the meaning of one's own nature, power, disposition. It does not mean power or nature in general, but always the power of some one, the peculiarity, the individuality of a person. This will appear from the following passages:

II, 3, 8. tīsrāḥ devīḥ svadháyā barhīḥ ā́ idám ákṣhidram pántu.

May the three goddesses protect by their power the sacred pile unbroken.

IV, 13, 5. káyā yāti svadháyā.

By what inherent power does he (the Sun) move on?

IV, 26, 4. ā́kṣkráyā svadháyā.

By a power which requires no chariot, i.e. by himself without a chariot.

The same expression occurs again X, 27, 19.

In some places the verb mad, to delight, joined with svadháyâ, seems to mean to revel in his strength, to be proud of his might.

V, 32, 4. svadháyâ mādantam.

Vṛitra who delights in his strength.

VII, 47, 3. svadháyâ mādantiḥ.

The waters who delight in their strength. See X, 124, 8.

In other passages, however, as we shall see, the same phrase (and this is rather unusual) requires to be taken in a different sense, so as to mean to rejoice in food.

I, 164, 38; III, 17, 5.

III, 35, 10. Indra pība svadháyâ kīṭ sutásya agnéḥ vā pāhi gihváyâ yagatra.

Indra drink of the libation by thyself (by thy own power), or with the tongue of Agni, O worshipful.

To drink with the tongue of Agni is a bold but not unusual expression. V, 51, 2. agnéḥ pibata gihváyâ. X, 15, 3.

I, 165, 6. kvā syā vaḥ marutaḥ svadhā́śīt yát mām ékam sam-ádhatta ahi-hátye.

Where was that custom of yours, O Maruts, when you left me alone in the killing of Ahi?

VII, 8, 3. káyâ naḥ agne ví vasaḥ su-vrīktīm kām ūm (īti) svadhām rinavaḥ sasyámānaḥ.

In what character dost thou light up our work, and what character dost thou assume, when thou art praised?

IV, 58, 4; IV, 45, 6.

I, 64, 4. sākám gagāire svadháyâ.

They (the Maruts) were born together, according to their nature; very much like ánu svadhām, I, 6, 4. One can hardly render it here by 'they were born by their own strength,' or 'by spontaneous generation.'

In other passages, however, svadháyâ, meaning originally by its own power, or nature, comes to mean, by itself, sponte suâ.

VII, 78, 4. ā asthāt rátham svadháyâ yugyámānam.

She, the dawn, mounted the chariot which was harnessed by itself, by its own power, without requiring the assistance of people to put the horses to.

X, 129, 2. ānīt avātām svadháyā tát ékam.

That only One breathed breathlessly (or freely) by its own strength, i. e. by itself.

In the same sense svadhābhiḥ is used in several passages :

I, 113, 13. amṛitā karati svadhābhiḥ.

The immortal Dawn moves along by her own strength, i. e. by herself.

VIII, 10, 6. yāt vā svadhābhiḥ adhi-tīshṭhathaḥ rátham.

Or whether ye mount your chariot by your own strength, ye Asvins.

I, 164, 30. gíváḥ mṛitásya karati svadhābhiḥ ámartyaḥ mártvena sá-yoniḥ.

The living moves by the powers of the dead, the immortal is the brother of the mortal. III, 26, 8 ; V, 60, 4.

There are doubtful passages, such as I, 180, 6, in which the meaning of svadhābhiḥ, too, is doubtful. In VI, 2, 8, svadhā looks like an adverb, instead of svadháyā, and would then refer to párigmā. The same applies to VIII, 32, 6.

But svadhā means also food, lit. one's own portion, the sacrificial offering due to each god, and lastly, food in general.

I, 108, 12. yāt indrágnī (íti) út-itā sūryasya mádhya diváḥ svadháyā mādáyethe (íti).

Whether you, Indra and Agni, delight in your food at the rising of the sun or at midday.

X, 15, 12. tvám agne īlitāḥ gāta-vedaḥ ávāt havyāni surabhīni kṛitvī, prá adāḥ pitṛi-bhyaḥ svadháyā té akshan addhī tvám deva prá-yatā havīmshi. 13. yé ka ihā pitāraḥ yé ka ná ihā yān ka vidmā yān ūm (íti) ka ná pra-vidmā, tvám vettha yāti té gāta-vedaḥ svadhābhiḥ yagnām sú-kṛitam gushasva. 14. yé agni-dagdhāḥ yé ágni-dagdhāḥ mádhya diváḥ svadháyā mādáyante, tébhiḥ sva-rāt ásunītim etām yathā-vasām tanvām kalpayasva.

12. Thou, O Agni Gātavedas, hast carried, when implored, the offerings which thou hast rendered sweet : thou hast given them to the fathers, they fed on their share. Eat thou, O god, the proffered oblations. 13. Our fathers who are here, and those who are not here, our fathers whom we know and those whom we do not know, thou knowest how many they are, O Gâtavedas, accept the well-made sacrifice with the sacrificial portions. 14. They who, whether burnt by fire or not burnt by fire, rejoice in their offering in the midst of heaven, give to them, O king, that life, and thy (their) own body, according to thy will.

III, 4, 7. saptá prikskhāsaḥ svadhāyā madanti.

The seven horses delight in their food.

X, 14, 7. ubhā rāgānā svadhāyā mādantā.

The two kings delighting in their food.

IX, 113, 10. yātra kāmāḥ ni-kāmāḥ ka, yātra bradhnāsyā vishrāpam, svadhā ka yātra trīptiḥ ka tātra mām amṛitam kridhī.

Where wishes and desires are, where the cup of the bright Soma is (or, where the highest place of the sun is), where there is food and rejoicing, there make me immortal.

I, 154, 4. yāsyā trī pūrṇā mādhunā padāni ākshīyamānā svadhāyā mādanti.

He (Vishnu) whose three places, full of sweet, imperishable, delight or abound in food.

V, 34, 1; II, 35, 7; I, 168, 9; I, 176, 2.

In the tenth book svadhā is used very much as it occurs in the later Sanskrit, as the name of a peculiar sacrificial rite.

X, 14, 3. yān ka devāḥ vavridhūḥ ye ka devān svāhā anye svadhāyā anye madanti.

Those whom the gods cherish, and those who cherish the gods, the one delight in Svāhā, the others in Svadhā; or, in praise and food.

NOTE 3. The expression garbha-tvām ā-irire is matched by that of III, 60, 3, saudhanvanāsaḥ amṛita-tvām ā-irire, the Saudhanvanas (the Ribhus) obtained immortality, or became immortal. I do not think that punar erire can mean, as Ludwig supposes, they pushed away their state of garbha. The idea that the Maruts assumed the form of a garbha, lit. of an embryo or a new-born child, is only meant to express that they were born, or that the storms burst forth from the womb of the sky as soon as Indra arises to do battle against the demon of darkness. Thus we read, I, 134, 4, āganayaḥ marūtaḥ vakshānābhyah, Thou, Vāyu, hast produced the Maruts from the bowels (of the sky).

As assisting Indra in this battle, the Maruts, whose name retained for a long time its purely appellative meaning of storms, attained their rank as deities by the side of Indra, or, as the poet expresses it, they assumed their sacred name. This seems to be the whole meaning of the later legend that the Maruts, like the R̥ibhus, were not originally gods, but became deified for their works. See also Kern, Translation of Bṛihat-saṃhitā, p. 117, note.

Other explanations are: they made that which was born within the cloud into a garbha or embryo; or, they arose with Āditya, proceeded with Savitar, and when Savitar set, they became again garbhas; see Sāma-veda II, 2, 7, 2, comm.

VÁHNI.

Verse 5.

WILSON: Associated with the conveying Maruts, the traversers of places difficult of access, thou, Indra, hast discovered the cows hidden in the cave.

BENFEY: Mit den die Festen brechenden, den Stürmenden fandst, Indra, du die Kühe in der Grotte gar.

LUDWIG: Und mit denen, die das feste sogar anbrechen, selbst im versteck, o Indra, mit den priesterlichen, fandest du die morgenstralen auf.

Note 1. Sāyana explains vāhni in the sense of Marúdbhiḥ, and he tells the oft-repeated story how the cows were carried off by the Paṇis from the world of the gods, and thrown into darkness, and how Indra with the Maruts conquered them and brought them back. Everybody seems to have accepted this explanation of Sāyana, and I myself do not venture to depart from it. Yet it should be stated that the use of vāhni as a name of the Maruts is by no means well established. Vāhni is in fact a most difficult word in the Veda. In later Sanskrit it means fire, and is quoted also as a name of Agni, the god of fire, but we do not learn why a word which etymologically means carrier, from vah, to carry, should have assumed the meaning of fire. It may be that vah, which in Sanskrit, Greek, and Latin means chiefly to carry, expressed originally the idea of moving about (the German be-wegen), in which case váh-ni, fire, would have been formed with the same purpose as ag-ní, ig-nis, fire, from Sk. ag, âγ-ω, ag-o. In Alvis-mal, V, 94, we read, kalla Vág Vanir, the Wanæs call fire Vág, i.e. wavy. But in Sanskrit Agni is so constantly represented as the carrier of the sacrificial oblation, that something may also be said in favour of the Indian scholastic interpreters who take váhni, as applied to Agni, in the sense of carrier. However that may be, it admits of no doubt that váhni, in the Veda, is distinctly applied to the bright fire or light. In some passages it looks very much like a proper name of Agni, in his various characters of terrestrial and celestial light. It is used for the sacrificial fire :

V, 50, 4. yátra váhniḥ abhí-hitaḥ.

Where the sacrificial fire is placed.

It is applied to Agni :

VII, 7, 5. ásâdi vritáḥ váhniḥ â-gaganvân agniḥ brahmâ.

The chosen light came nigh, and sat down, Agni, the priest.

Here Agni is, as usual, represented as a priest, chosen like a priest, for the performance of the sacrifice. But, for that very reason, váhni may here have the meaning of priest, which, as we shall see, it has in many places, and the translation would then be more natural : He, the chosen minister, came near and sat down, Agni, the priest.

VIII, 23, 3. váhniḥ vindate vásu.

Agni finds wealth (for those who offer sacrifices?).

More frequently váhni is applied to the celestial Agni, or other solar deities, where it is difficult to translate it in English except by an adjective :

III, 5, 1. ápa dvârâ támasaḥ váhniḥ âvar (ity âvaḥ).

Agni opened the two doors of darkness.

I, 160, 3. sáḥ váhniḥ putráḥ pitróḥ pavitra-vân punâti dhîraḥ bhúvanâni mâyáyâ.

That light, the son of the two parents, full of brightness, the wise, brightens the world by his power.

Agni is even called váhni-tama (IV, 1, 4), which hardly means more than the brightest.

II, 17, 4. āt ródasī (īti) gyótishā váhniḥ ā atanot.

Then the bright (Indra) stretched out or filled heaven and earth with his light.

II, 38, 1. út ūm (īti) syáh deváh savitā—váhniḥ asthāt.

The divine Savitar, the luminous, arose.

Besides this meaning of light or fire, however, there are clearly two other meanings of váhni which must be admitted in the Veda, first that of a carrier, vehicle, and, it may be, horse; secondly that of minister or priest.

VI, 57, 3. agāḥ anyásya váhnayaḥ hárī (īti) anyásya sám-bhrítā.

The bearers of the one (Pūshan) are goats, the bays are yoked for the other (Indra).

I, 14, 6. ghritá-prishthāḥ manaḥ-yúgaḥ yé tvā váhanti váhnayaḥ.

The horses with shining backs, obedient to thy will, which carry thee (Agni).

VIII, 3, 23. yásmai anyé dása práti dhúram váhanti váhnayaḥ.

A horse against whom other ten horses carry a weight; i. e. it requires ten horses to carry the weight which this one horse carries. (See X, 11, 7. vāhamānaḥ āsvaiḥ.)

II, 37, 3. médyantu te váhnayaḥ yébhiḥ ŷyase.

May thy horses be fat on which thou goest. II, 24, 13.

I, 44, 13. srudhī srut-karna váhni-bhiḥ.

Agni, who hast ears to hear, hear, on thy horses. Unless váhni-bhiḥ is joined with the words that follow, devaḥ sayāva-bhiḥ.

III, 6, 2. vaḥyántām te váhnayaḥ saptá-gihvāḥ^a.

May thy seven-tongued horses be called. Here váhna-yaḥ is clearly meant for the flames of Agni, yet I doubt whether we should be justified in dropping the simile, as the plural of váhni is nowhere used in the bald sense of flames.

In one passage váhni is supposed to be used as a feminine, or at all events applied to a feminine subject:

VIII, 94, 1. yuktā váhniḥ ráthânām.

^a Cf. I, 58, 7. saptá guhvāḥ.

She is yoked as the drawer of the chariots. Probably, however, váhniḥ should here be changed into váhni.

The passages in which váhni is applied to Soma in the ninth and tenth Mandalas throw little light on the subject. (IX, 9, 6; 20, 5; 6; 36, 2; 64, 19; 89, 1; X, 101, 10.)

Instead of visām vispátih, lord of men (VII, 7, 4), we find IX, 108, 10. visām váhniḥ ná vispátih. One feels inclined to translate here váhniḥ by leader, but it is more likely that váhni is here again the common name of Soma, and that it is inserted between visām ná vispátih, which is meant to form one phrase.

In IX, 97, 34. tisráḥ vākaḥ śrayati prá váhniḥ, we may take váhni as the common appellation of Soma. But it may also mean minister or priest, as in the passages which we have now to examine. Cf. X, 11, 6.

For besides these passages in which váhni clearly means vector, carrier, drawer, horse, there is a large class of verses in which it can only be translated by minister, i. e. officiating minister, and, as it would seem, chiefly singer or reciter*.

The verb vah was used in Sanskrit in the sense of carrying out (ud-vah, ausführen), or performing a rite, particularly as applied to the reciting of hymns. Hence such compounds as ukthá-vâhas or stóma-vâhas, offering hymns of praise, and yagnâ-vâhas. Thus we read:

V, 79, 4. abhí yé tvâ vibhâ-vari stómairḥ grínānti váhnayah.

The ministers who praise thee, splendid Dawn, with hymns.

I, 48, 11. yé tvâ grínānti váhnayah.

The ministers who praise thee.

VII, 75, 5. ushâḥ ukkhati váhni-bhiḥ grínānā.

The dawn lights up, praised by the ministers.

VI, 39, 1. mandráśya kavéh divyásya váhneh.

Of the sweet poet, of the heavenly priest . . .

VII, 82, 4. yuvām ít yut-sú prítanâsu váhnayah yuvām kshémasya pra-savé mitá-gñavah, śrānā vásvah ubháyasya kârávah indrâvarunâ su-hávâ havâmahe.

* See Taitt. Brâhm. I, 1, 6, 10. vahnir vâ anadvân, vahnir adhvaryuḥ.

We, as ministers, invoke you only in fights and battles; we, as suppliants, (invoke) you for the granting of treasure; we, as poets, (invoke) you, the lords of twofold wealth, you, Indra and Varuṇa, who listen to our call.

VI, 32, 3. sáh váhni-bhiḥ ríkva-bhiḥ góshu sásvat mitá-gñu-bhiḥ puru-krítvā gígāya.

He (Indra) was victorious often among the cows, always with celebrating and suppliant ministers.

I have placed these two passages together because they seem to me to illustrate each other, and to show that although in the second passage the celebrating and suppliant ministers may be intended for the Maruts, yet no argument could be drawn from this verse in favour of váhni by itself meaning the Maruts. See also VIII, 6, 2; 12, 15; X, 114, 2.

IV, 21, 6. hótā yáh naḥ mahān sam-várāṇeshu váhniḥ.

The Hotar who is our great priest in the sanctuaries.

I, 128, 4. váhniḥ vedhāḥ ágāyata.

Because the wise priest (Agni) was born.

The same name which in these passages is applied to Agni, is in others, and, as it will be seen, in the same sense, applied to Indra.

II, 21, 2. tuvi-gráye váhnaye.

To the strong-voiced priest or leader.

The fact that váhni is followed in several passages by ukthaḥ would seem to show that the office of the váhni was chiefly that of recitation or of addressing prayers to the gods.

III, 20, 1. agním ushásam asvínā dadhi-krām ví-usháishu havate váhniḥ ukthaḥ.

The priest at the break of day calls with his hymns Agni, Ushas, the Asvins, and Dadhikrá.

I, 184, 1. tā vām adyá tau aparám huvema ukhāntyām ushási váhniḥ ukthaḥ.

Let us invoke the two Asvins to-day and to-morrow, the priest with his hymns is there when the dawn appears.

In a similar sense, it would seem, as váhniḥ ukthaḥ, the Vedic poets frequently use the words váhniḥ áśā. This áśā is the instrumental singular of ás, mouth, and it is used in other phrases also of the mouth as the instrument of praise.

VI, 32, 1. vagrīne sām-tamāni vākāmsi āsā sthāvīrāya taksham.

I have shaped with my mouth blessed words to the wielder of the thunderbolt, the strong Indra.

X, 115, 3. āsā vāhniṃ nā sokīśhā vi-rapsīnam.

He who sings with his flame as the poet with his mouth. See also I, 38, 14. mimīhī ślókam āsyē, make a song in thy mouth.

Thus we find vāhniḥ āsā in the same place in the sixth and seventh Mandalas (VI, 16, 9 ; VII, 16, 9), in the phrase vāhniḥ āsā vidúh-tarah, applied to Agni in the sense of the priest wise with his mouth, or taking vāhniḥ āsā as it were one word, the wise poet.

I, 129, 5. vāhniḥ āsā, vāhniḥ nah ākkha.

Indra, as a priest by his lips, as a priest coming towards us.

From the parallelism of this passage it would seem that Professor Roth concluded the meaning of *āsā to be near,

* Ās, mouth, the Latin os, oris, has been derived from a root as, to breathe, preserved in the Sanskrit as-u, spirit, asu-ra, endowed with spirit, living, the living god. Though I agree with Curtius in admitting a primitive root as, to breathe, from which as-u, breath, must have sprung, I have always hesitated about the derivation of ās and āsyā, mouth, from the same root. I do not think, however, that the lengthening of the vowel in ās is so great a difficulty as has been supposed (Kuhn, Zeitschrift, vol. xvii, p. 145). Several roots lengthen their vowel a, when used as substantives without derivative suffixes. In some cases this lengthening is restricted to the Āṅga base, as in anaḍvāh; in others to the Āṅga and Pada base, as in visvavāh, visvavād̥bhiḥ, &c.; in others again it pervades the whole declension, as in turāśhāt: (see Sanskrit Grammar, §§ 210, 208, 175.) Among ordinary words vāk offers a clear instance of a lengthened vowel. In the Veda we find rūtīśhāham, VI, 14, 4, and rūtīśhāham (Samhitā), I, 64, 15. In X, 71, 10 the Samhitā has sabhāśahéna, the Pada sabhāśahéna. We find vāh in apsu-vāh (Sām. Ved.), indra-vāh, havya-vāh. Sah at the end of compounds, such as nri-sah, prītanā-sah, bhūri-sah, satrā-sah, vibhā-sah, sadā-sah, varies between a long and short ā: (see Regnier, Étude sur l'idiome du or coram. In the Nighantū, II, 16, the right reading is evidently âsât, not âsâ; see Nirukta, ed. Satyavrata Sâma-srami, vol. i, p. 264. Âsâ, however, is an old variant, as may be seen from Rig-veda-bhâshya I, 127, 8; X, 115, 3.

I, 76, 4. pragâ-vatâ vâkasâ vâhniâ âsâ â ka huvé ní ka satsi ihâ devaiâ.

With words in which my people join, I, the poet, invoke, and thou (Agni) sittest down with the gods.

VI, 11, 2. pâvakâyâ guhvâ vâhniâ âsâ.

Thou, a poet with a bright tongue, O Agni!

Grassmann thinks that vahnir âsâ can always be translated by 'vor das Angesicht bringend,' but this does not appear to be the case in his translation.

The question now arises in what sense vâhni is used when applied without further definition to certain deities. Most deities in the Veda are represented as driving or driven, and many as poets or priests. When the Asvins are called vâhni, VIII, 8, 12; VII, 73, 4, it may mean riders. But when the Viśve Devâs are so called, I, 3, 9, or the Rîbhus, the exact meaning is more doubtful. The Maruts are certainly riders, and whatever other scholars may say to the contrary, it can be proved that they were supposed to sit astride on horseback, and to have the bridle through the horse's nostrils (V, 61, 2). But if in our verse I, 6, 5, we translate vâhni as an epithet, rider, and not only as an epithet, but as a name of the Maruts, we cannot support our translation by independent evidence, but must rely partly on the authority of Sâyana, partly on the general tenor of the text before us, where the Maruts are mentioned in the preceding verse, and, if I am right, in the verse following also. On the other hand, if vâhni can thus be used as a name of Vêdas, p. 111.) At all events no instance has yet been pointed out in Sanskrit, showing the same contraction which we should have to admit if, as has been proposed, we derived âs from av-as, or from an-as. From 'an' we have in the Veda ânâ, mouth or face, I, 52, 15. From as, to breathe, the Latin omen, originally os-men, a whisper, might likewise be derived. See Bopp, Comp. Gr. par. 909; Kuhn in Ind. Stud. I, 333.

the Maruts, there is at least one other passage which would gain in clearness by the admission of that meaning, viz.

X, 138, 1. táva tyé indra sakhyéshu váhnayaḥ—ví adar-diruḥ valám.

In thy friendship, Indra, these Maruts tore asunder the cloud.

Note 2. I have translated viśú by stronghold, though it is only an adjective, meaning firm. Dr. Oscar Meyer, in his able essay Quaestiones Homericae, specimen prius, Bonnae, 1867, has tried to show that this viśú is the original form of ῥῆϊος, and he has brought some further evidence to show that the siege and conquest of Troy, as I pointed out in my Lectures on the Science of Language, vol. ii, p. 470, was originally described in language borrowed from the siege and conquest of the dark night by the powers of light, or from the destruction of the cloud by the weapons of Indra. It ought to be considered, however, that viśú in the Veda has not dwindled down as yet to a mere name, and that therefore it may have originally retained its purely appellative power in Greek as well as in Sanskrit, and from meaning a stronghold in general, have come to mean the stronghold of Troy.

Note 3. The bright cows are here the cows of the morning, the dawns, or the days themselves, which are represented as rescued at the end of each night by the power of Indra, or similar solar gods. Indra's companions in that daily rescue are here the Maruts, the storms, the same companions who act even a more prominent part in the battle of Indra against the dark clouds. These two battles are often mixed up together, so that possibly usríyāḥ may have been meant for clouds.

Verse 6.

WILSON: The reciters of praises praise the mighty (troop of Maruts), who are celebrated, and conscious of the power of bestowing wealth in like manner as they (glorify) the counsellor (Indra).

BENFEY: Nach ihrer Einsicht verherrlichend besingen Sänger den Schätzeheern, den berühmten, gewaltigen.

LUDWIG : Als fromme heran zum liede haben die sänger ihn, der trefliches findet, berühmten gesungen.

Note 1. The reasons why I take gírah as a masculine in the sense of singer or praiser, may be seen in a note to I, 37, 10.

Note 2. yáthâ matím, lit. according to their mind, according to their heart's desire. Cf. II, 24, 13.

Verse 7.

WILSON : May you be seen, Maruts, accompanied by the undaunted (Indra); both rejoicing, and of equal splendour.

BENFEY : So lass mit Indra denn vereint, dem furchtlosen, erblicken dich, beide erfreu'nd und glanzesgleich.

LUDWIG : Mit Indra zusammen wirst du gesehn zusammengehend mit dem furchtlosen, mild ihr zwei, von gleichem glanze.

Note 1. The sudden transition from the plural to the singular is strange, but the host of the Maruts is frequently spoken of in the singular, and nothing else can here be intended. It may be true, as Professor Benfey suggests, that the verses here put together stood originally in a different order, or that they were taken from different sources. Yet though the Sâma-veda would seem to sanction a small alteration in the order of the verses, the alteration of verses 7, 4, 5, as following each other, would not help us much. The Atharva-veda sanctions no change in the order of these verses.

The transition to the dual at the end of the verse is likewise abrupt, not more so, however, than we are prepared for in the Veda. The suggestion of the Nirukta (IV, 12) that these duals might be taken as instrumentals of the singular, is of no real value.

Note 2. Dr̥kshase, a very valuable form, well explained by dr̥isyethâh, a second person singular conjunctive of the First Aorist Âtmanepada, the termination 'sase' corresponding to Greek ση, as the conjunctive takes the personal terminations of the present in both languages. Similar forms, viz. prīkshase, X, 22, 7, mamsase, X, 27, 10; Ath. Veda VII, 20, 2-6, and possibly vīvakshase, X, 21, 1-8, 24, 1-3, 25, 1-11, will have to be considered hereafter. (Nirukta, ed. Roth, p. 30, Notes.) As Ludwig has pointed out, the Tāndya-brāhmaṇa XII, 2, 6, 7, reads drikshuse, and explains it by ime lokā dadṛisire. Sāyana, however, explains dṛisidhātoḥ karmāṇi madhyamaikavaṭane vyatyayena sepratyaye drikshusa iti rūpam. See Delbrück, Syntaktische Forschungen, I, p. 111. The story of Indra's being forsaken by all the gods in his battle against Vṛitra, but being helped by the Maruts, is often mentioned; see RV. VIII, 96, 7; SV. I, 4, 1, 4, 2; Ait. Br. III, 20.

Verse 8.

WILSON: This rite is performed in adoration of the powerful Indra, along with the irreproachable, heavenward-tending, and amiable bands (of the Maruts).

BENFEY: Durch Indra's liebe Schaaren, die untadligen, himmelstürmenden, strahlet das Opfer mächtiglich.

LUDWIG: Mit den tadellosen, morgens erscheinenden singt der kämpfer sighaft, mit des Indra zu liebenden scharen.

NOTE 1. Arkati, which I have here translated by he cries aloud, means literally, he celebrates. I do not know of any passage where arkati, when used, as here, without an object, means to shine, as Professor Benfey translates it. The real difficulty, however, lies in makhá, which Sāyana explains by sacrifice, and which I have ventured to translate by priest or sacrificer. Makhá, as an adjective, means, as far as we can judge, strong or vigorous, and is applied to various deities, such as Pūshan I, 138, 1, Savitṛi VI, 71, 1, Soma XI, 20, 7, Indra III, 34, 2, the Maruts I, 64, 11; VI, 66, 9. By itself, makhá is never used as the name of any deity, and it cannot therefore, as Professor Roth proposes, be used in our passage as a name of Indra, or be referred to Indra as a significant adjective. In I, 119, 3, makhá is applied to men or warriors, but it does not follow that makhá by itself means warriors, though it may be connected with the Greek μαχος in σύμμαχος. See Curtius, Grundzüge, p. 293 ; Grassmann, in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xvi, p. 164.

There are two passages where makhá refers to an enemy of the gods, IX, 101, 13 ; X, 171, 2.

Among the remaining passages there is one where makhá is used in parallelism with váhni, X, 11, 6. vívakti váhniḥ, su-apasyáte makháḥ. Here I propose to translate, The poet speaks out, the priest works well. The same meaning seems applicable likewise to the phrase makhásya dāvane, to the offering of the priest, though I should prefer to translate 'to share in the sacrifice.'

I, 134, 1. ā yāhi dāvane, vāyo (iti), makhásya dāvane.

Come, Vāyu, to the offering, to the offering of the priest.

VIII, 7, 27. ā naḥ makhásya dāvane—dévāsaḥ úpa gan-tana.

Come, gods, to the offering of our priest.

Professor Roth proposes to render makhá in these passages by 'attestation of joy, celebration, praise,' and he takes dāvane as a dative of dāván, a nomen actionis, meaning, the giving. There are some passages where one feels inclined to admit a noun dāvāna, and to take dāvane as a locative sing.

VI, 71, 2. devásya vayám savitúḥ sávīmani sréshṭhe syāma vásunaḥ ka dāvane.

May we be in the favour of the god Savitar, and in the best award of his treasure.

In II, 11, 1, and II, 11, 12, the locative would likewise be preferable ; but there is a decided majority of passages in which dāvane occurs and where it is to be taken as a dative*, nor is there any other instance in the Veda of a nomen actionis being formed by vana. It is better, therefore, in VI, 71, 2, to refer sréshṭhe to sávīmani, and to make allowance in the other passages for the idiomatic use of such phrases as dāvane vásūnām or rāyāḥ dāvane, whether from dā or from do. See De Infinitivi forma et usu, by E. Wilhelm, 1873, p. 17.

* RV. I, 61, 10 ; 122, 5 ; 134, 2 ; 139, 6 ; II, 1, 10 ; IV, 29, 5 ; 32, 9 ; V, 59, 1 ; 4 ; 65, 3 ; VIII, 25, 20 ; 45, 10 ; (92, 26) ; 46, 25 ; 27 ; 63, 5 ; 69, 17 ; 70, 12 ; IX, 93, 4 ; X, 32, 5 ; 44, 7 ; 50, 7.

The termination váne explains, as has been shown by Professor Benfey, Greek infinitives such as δοῦναι, i. e. δοεναί or δοφεναι = Sanskrit dā-váne. The termination mane in dā-mane, for the purpose of giving, explains, as the same scholar has proved, the ancient infinitives in Greek, such as δό-μεναι. It may be added that the regular infinitives in Greek, ending in εναί, as λελοιπ-έναι, are likewise matched by Vedic forms such as IX, 61, 30. dhūrv-ane, or VI, 61, 13. vibhv-áne, and turv-áne (Delbrück in K. Z. XVIII, p. 82 ; Bopp, Accent, §§ 106, 113, 117). It is hardly right to say that vibhváne in VI, 61, 13, should be taken as an instrumental, for it does not refer to the chariot, but to Sarasvatī. In the termination ευ, which stands for ενι, like εις for εσι, we have, on the contrary, not a dative, but a locative of an abstract noun in an, both cases, as we see from their juxta-position in VI, 71, 2, being equally applicable to express the relation which we are accustomed to call infinitive. See RV. I, 134, 5. ugrāḥ ishananta bhurváni, apām ishanta bhurváni.

Note 2. Abhidyu I now translate by hastening, and derive it from div, dīvyati, in its original meaning of to throw forth, to break forth, to shine. As from this root we have didyú, weapon, what is thrown, pl. didyavaḥ, and possibly didyut, the weapon, particularly Indra's weapon or thunderbolt, abhidyu might mean breaking forth, rushing forth towards us, something like prakṛiḥ/naḥ, another name of the Maruts. How abhidyu could mean conquérant, maître du jour, as M. Bergaigne maintains, I do not see. Abhidyūn, I, 33, 11 ; 190, 4, does not differ much from ānu-dyūn, i. e. it is used vipsāyām.

Verses 9, 10.

WILSON: Therefore circumambient (troop of Maruts), come hither, whether from the region of the sky, or from the solar sphere ; for, in this rite, (the priest) fully recites your praises.

BENFEY: Von hier, oder vom Himmel komm ob dem Æther, Umkreisender ! zu dir streben die Lieder all.

LUDWIG: Von hierher, o Parigman, kom, oder von des himels glanzfirmamente her; zu disem streben unsere lieder auf.

WILSON: We invoke Indra,—whether he come from this earthly region, or from the heaven above, or from the vast firmament,—that he may give (us) wealth.

BENFEY: Von hier, oder vom Himmel ob der Erde begehren Spende wir, oder, Indra! aus weiter Luft.

LUDWIG: Von hier zu empfangen verlangen wir, oder vom himel, oder vom irdischen raume her, oder aus dem grossen luftkreis den Indra.

Note 1. Although the names for earth, sky, and heaven vary in different parts of the Veda, yet the expression diváh roṇánám occurs so frequently that we can hardly take it in this place in a sense different from its ordinary meaning. Professor Benfey thinks that roṇáná may here mean ether, and he translates 'come from heaven above the ether;' and in the next verse, 'come from heaven above the earth.' At first, every reader would feel inclined to take the two phrases, diváh vá roṇánāt ádhi, and diváh vá páṛthivát ádhi, as parallel; yet I believe they are not quite so.

The following passages will show that the two words roṇánám diváh belong together, and that they signify the light of heaven, or the bright place of heaven.

VIII, 98, 3. ágakṣhah roṇánám diváh.

Thou (Indra) wentest to the light of heaven. I, 155, 3.

III, 6, 8. uraú vá yé antárikṣhe—diváh vá yé roṇané.

In the wide sky, or in the light of heaven.

VIII, 82, 4. upamé roṇané diváh.

In the highest light of heaven.

IX, 86, 27. trīṣṭhe prishṭhé ádhi roṇané diváh.

On the third ridge, in the light of heaven. See also I, 105, 5; VIII, 69, 3.

The very phrase which we find in our verse, only with ṛit instead of vá, occurs again, I, 49, 1; VIII, 8, 7; and the same sense must probably be assigned to VIII, 1, 18, ádha gṃáh ádha vá diváh brīhatáh roṇánāt ádhi.

Either from the earth, or from the light of the great heaven, increase, O Indra!

Roṇáná also occurs in the plural:

I, 146, 1. vísṡá diváh roṇánā.

All the bright regions of heaven.

Sáyana: 'All the bright palaces of the gods.' See III, 12, 9.

The same word roṇáná, and in the same sense, is sometimes joined with sūrya and nāka.

Thus, I, 14, 9. sūryasya roṇánāt vísṡān devān—hótā ihá vakshati.

May the Hotar bring the Visve Devas hither from the light of the sun, or from the bright realm of the sun.

III, 22, 3. yáh roṇané parástāt sūryasya.

The waters which are above, in the bright realm of the sun, and those which are below.

I, 19, 6. yé nākasya ádhi roṇané, diví devāsaḥ āsate.

They who in the light of the firmament, in heaven, are enthroned as gods.

Here diví, in heaven, seems to be the same as the light of the firmament, nākasya roṇané.

Thus roṇáná occurs also frequently by itself, when it clearly has the meaning of heaven.

It is said of the dawn, I, 49, 4; of the sun, I, 50, 4; and of Indra, III, 44, 4.

vísṡam ā bhāti roṇánám, he lights up the whole sky.

We also read of three roṇanas, where, though it is difficult to say what is really meant, we must translate, the three skies. The cosmography of the Veda is, as I said before, somewhat vague and varying. There is, of course, the natural division of the world into heaven and earth (dyú and bhūmí), and the threefold division into earth, sky, and heaven, where sky is meant for the region intermediate between heaven and earth (pr̥thivī, antáríksha, dyú). There is also a fourfold division, for instance,

VIII, 97, 5. yát vā ási roṇané diváh samudrásya ádhi vishṡápi, yát p̥r̥thive sádane vr̥trahan-tama, yát antáríkshe ā gahi.

Whether thou, O greatest killer of Vṛitra, art in the light of heaven, or in the basin of the sea, or in the place of the earth, or in the sky, come hither!

V, 52, 7. yé vavridhánta pārthiváh yé uráu antárikshe ā, vrigāne vā nadīnām sadhá-sthe vā maháh diváh.

The Maruts who grew, being on the earth, those who are in the wide sky, or in the realm of the rivers, or in the abode of the great heaven.

But very soon these three or more regions are each spoken of as threefold. Thus,

I, 102, 8. tisráh bhūmih tríni rokanā.

The three earths, the three skies.

II, 27, 9. trī rokanā divyā dhārayanta.

The Ādityas support the three heavenly skies.

V, 69, 1. trī rokanā varuna trīn utá dyūn tríni mitra dhārayathaḥ rágāmsi.

Mitra and Varuna, you support the three lights, and the three heavens, and the three skies.

Here there seems some confusion, which Sāyana's commentary makes even worse confounded. What can rokanā mean as distinct from dyú and rágas? The fourth verse of the same hymn throws no light on the subject, and I should feel inclined to take divyā-pārthivasya as one word, though even then the cosmic division here adopted is by no means clear. However, there is a still more complicated division alluded to in IV, 53, 5:

trīh antáriksham savitā mahi-tvanā trī rágāmsi pari-bhūh tríni rokanā, tisráh diváh prithivīh tisráh invati.

Here we have the sky thrice, three welkins, three lights, three heavens, three earths.

A careful consideration of all these passages will show, I think, that in our passage we must take diváh vā rokanāt ádhi in its usual sense, and that we cannot separate the two words.

In the next verse, on the contrary, it seems equally clear that diváh and pārthivāt must be separated. At all events there is no passage in the Rig-veda where pārthiva is joined as an adjective with dyú. Pārthiva as an adjective is frequently joined with rágas, never with dyú. See I, 81,

5; 90, 7; VIII, 88, 5; IX, 72, 8: in the plural, I, 154, 1; V, 81, 3; VI, 31, 2; 49, 3.

Pārthivāni also occurs by itself, when it refers to the earth, as opposed to the sky and heaven.

X, 32, 2. vī indra yāsi divyāni roṇāṇā vī pārthivāni rāgasā.

Indra thou goest in the sky between the heavenly lights and the earthly.

VIII, 94, 9. ā yé vīsvā pārthivāni paprāthan roṇāṇā divāḥ.

The Maruts who stretched out all the earthly lights, and the lights of heaven.

VI, 61, 11. ā-paprūshī pārthivāni urú rāgaḥ antáriksham.

Sarasvatī filling the earthly places, the wide welkin, the sky. This is a doubtful passage.

Lastly, pārthivāni by itself seems to signify earth, sky, and heaven, if those are the three regions which Vishṇu measured with his three steps; or east, the zenith, and west, if these were intended as the three steps of that deity. For we read:

I, 155, 4. yāḥ pārthivāni tri-bhūḥ it vīgāma-bhīḥ urú krá-mishā.

He (Vishṇu) who strode wide with his three strides across the regions of the earth.

These two concluding verses might also be taken as containing the actual invocation of the sacrificer, which is mentioned in verse 8. In that case the full stop at the end of verse 8 should be removed.

MANDALA I, HYMN 19.

ASHṬAKA I, ADHYĀYA 1, VARGA 36-37.

TO AGNI (THE GOD OF FIRE) AND THE MARUTS
(THE STORM-GODS).

1. Thou art called forth to this fair sacrifice for a draught of milk¹; with the Maruts come hither, O Agni!

2. No god indeed, no mortal, is beyond the might¹ of thee, the mighty one; with the Maruts come hither, O Agni!

3. They who know of the great sky¹, the Visve Devas² without guile³; with those Maruts come hither, O Agni!

4. The strong ones who sing their song¹, unconquerable by force; with the Maruts come hither, O Agni!

5. They who are brilliant, of terrible designs, powerful, and devourers of foes; with the Maruts come hither, O Agni!

6. They who in heaven are enthroned as gods, in the light of the firmament¹; with the Maruts come hither, O Agni!

7. They who toss the clouds¹ across the surging sea²; with the Maruts come hither, O Agni!

8. They who shoot with their darts (lightnings) across the sea with might; with the Maruts come hither, O Agni!

9. I pour out to thee for the early draught¹ the sweet (juice) of Soma; with the Maruts come hither, O Agni!

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Medhâtithi, of the family of Kaṇva. Verse I=SV. I, 16.

Verse 1.

WILSON : Earnestly art thou invoked to this perfect rite, to drink the Soma juice ; come, Agni, with the Maruts.

BENFEY : Zu diesem schönen Opfer wirst du gerufen, zum Trank der Milch!—Mit diesen Marut's, Agni! komm!

LUDWIG : Her zu diesem schönen opfer, gerufen wirst zum milchtrank du, mit den Marut, Agni, kom.

Note 1. Gopîthá is explained by Yâska and Sâyana as drinking of Soma. I have kept to the literal signification of the word, a draught of milk. In the last verse of our hymn the libation offered to Agni and the Maruts is said to consist of Soma, but Soma was commonly mixed with milk. The other meaning assigned to gopîthá, protection, would give the sense : 'Thou art called for the sake of protection.' But pîtha has clearly the sense of drinking in soma-pîthá, RV. I, 51, 7, and may therefore be taken in the same sense in gopîthá.

Verse 2.

WILSON : No god nor man has power over a rite (dedicated) to thee, who art mighty : come, Agni, with the Maruts.

BENFEY : Denn nicht ein Gott, kein Sterblicher ragt über dein, des Grossen, Macht—Mit diesen Marut's, Agni! komm!

LUDWIG : Es überragt kein gott, kein sterblicher die einsicht dein des grossen, mit den Marut, Agni, kom.

Note 1. The Sanskrit krátu expresses power both of body and mind. Paraś governs the accusative.

Verse 3.

WILSON : Who all are divine, and devoid of malignity, and who know (how to cause the descent) of great waters : come, Agni, with the Maruts.

BENFEY: Die guten Götter, welche all bestehen in dem weiten Raum—Mit diesen Marut's, Agni! komm!

LUDWIG: Die wissen um den grossen raum, alle götter truges bar, mit den Marut, Agni, kom.

Note 1. The sky or welkin (rāgas) is the proper abode of the Maruts, and 'they who know of' means simply 'they who dwell' in the great sky. The Vedic poets distinguish commonly between the three worlds, the earth, pr̥thivī, f., or pārthiva, n.; the sky, rāgas; and the heaven, dyú: see I, 6, 9, note 1. The phrase mahāh rāgasah occurs I, 6, 10; 168, 6, &c. Sāyana takes rāgas for water or rain: see on this my article in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xii, p. 28. In some passages rāgas means 'darkness,' and might be identified with the Greek ἑρεβος; Ath. Veda VIII, 2, 1. pārāyāmi tvā rāgasa út tvā mr̥tyór apīparam, 'I bring thee out of darkness, out of death I brought thee.' The identification of rāgas with ἑρεβος (Leo Meyer, in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. vi, p. 19) must however remain doubtful, until stronger evidence has been brought forward in support of a Greek β representing a Sanskrit g, even in the middle of a word. See my article in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xv, p. 215; Curtius, Grundzüge (fifth edition), p. 480.

Note 2. The appellation Vīśve devāḥ, all gods together, or, more properly, host-gods, is often applied to the Maruts; cf. I, 23, 8; 10. Benfey connects this line with the preceding verse, considering Vīśve devāḥ, it seems, inappropriate as an epithet of the Maruts.

Note 3. On adrūh, without guile or deceit, without hatred, see Kuhn's excellent article, Zeitschrift für die Vergleichende Sprachforschung, vol. i, pp. 179, 193. Adrūh is applied to the Maruts again in VIII, 46, 4, though in connection with other gods. It is applied to the Vīśve Devas, RV. I, 3, 9; IX, 102, 5: the Ādityas, RV. VIII, 19, 34; 67, 13: the Rudras, RV. IX, 73, 7: to Heaven and Earth, RV. II, 41, 21; III, 56, 1; IV, 56, 2; VII, 66, 18: to Mitra and Varuna, RV. V, 68, 4: to Agni, RV. VI, 15, 7; VIII, 44, 10. The form adhrūk occurs in the sixth Mandala only.

Verse 4.

WILSON: Who are fierce, and send down rain, and are unsurpassed in strength: come, Agni, with the Maruts.

BENFEY: Die schrecklich-unbesiegbaren, die mächtiglich Licht angefacht—Mit diesen Marut's, Agni! komm!

LUDWIG: Die singen, die gewaltigen, ihr lied unange-griffen durch (ihre) kraft, mit den Marut, Agni, kom.

Note 1. Sâyana explains arká by water. Hence Wilson: 'Who are fierce and send down rain.' But arká has only received this meaning of water in the artificial system of interpretation first started by the authors of the Brâhmanas, who had lost all knowledge of the natural sense of the ancient hymns. The passages in which arká is explained as water in the Brâhmanas are quoted by Sâyana, but they require no refutation. On the singing of the Maruts, see note to I, 38, 15; also Bergaigne, Journ. As. 1884, p. 194. The perfect in the Veda, like the perfect in Homer, has frequently to be rendered in English by the present.

Verse 5.

WILSON: Who are brilliant, of terrific forms, who are possessors of great wealth, and are devourers of the malevolent: come, Agni, with the Maruts.

BENFEY: Die glänzend-grau'ngestaltigen, hochherrschend feindvernichtenden — Mit diesen Marut's, Agni! komm!

LUDWIG: Die glanzvollen, von schrecklicher gestalt, von grosser herschaft, feindverzerer, mit den Marut, Agni, kom.

Verse 6.

WILSON: Who are divinities abiding in the radiant heaven above the sun: come, Agni, with the Maruts.

BENFEY: Die Götter die im Himmel sind ob dem Lichtkreis des Göttersitz's—Mit diesen Marut's, Agni! komm!

LUDWIG: Die ob der himmelswölbung glanz, am himel die götter sitzen, mit den Marut, Agni, kom.

Note 1. Nâka must be translated by firmament, as there is no other word in English besides heaven, and that is wanted to render dyú. Like the Jewish firmament, the Indian nāka, too, is adorned with stars; cf. I, 68, 10. pipésa nākam str̥bhiḥ. Dyú, heaven, is supposed to be above the rāgas, sky or welkin. Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xii, p. 28.

Sāyana: 'In the radiant heaven above the sun.' See note 1 to I, 6, 9; p. 49.

Verse 7.

WILSON: Who scatter the clouds, and agitate the sea (with waves): come, Agni, with the Maruts.

BENFEY: Welche über das wogende Meer hinjagen die Wolkenschaar—Mit diesen Marut's, Agni! komm!

LUDWIG: Die die berge wiegend hindurch durchs wogenmeer bewegen, mit den Marut, Agni, kom.

Note 1. That pārvata (mountain) is used in the sense of cloud, without any further explanation, is clear from many passages:

I, 57, 6. tvám tám indra pārvatam mahāṁ urúm vāgreṇa vagrin parva-sāḥ kakartitha.

Thou, Indra, hast cut this great broad cloud to pieces with thy lightning. Cf. I, 85, 10.

We actually find two similes mixed up together, such as V, 32, 2. ūdhāḥ pārvatasya, the udder of the cloud. All we can do is to translate pārvata by mountain, but always to remember that mountain means cloud. In the Edda, too, the rocks, said to have been fashioned out of Ymir's bones, are supposed to be intended for clouds. In Old Norse klakkr means both cloud and rock; nay, the English word cloud itself has been identified with the Anglo-Saxon clūd, rock. See Justi, Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 62. See Grimm, Deutsche Grammatik, I³, 398, 424; also Kuhn, Weisse Frau, p. 12.

Note 2. Whether the surging sea is to be taken for the sea or for the air, depends on the view which we take of the earliest cosmography of the Vedic Rishis. Sāyana explains: 'They who make the clouds to go, and stir the watery sea.' Wilson remarks that the influence of the winds upon the sea, alluded to in this and the following verse, indicates more familiarity with the ocean than we should have expected from the traditional inland position of the early Hindus, and it has therefore been supposed by others that, even in passages like our own, samudrá was meant for the sky, the waters above the firmament. But although there are passages in the Rig-veda where samudrá must be taken to mean the welkin (RV. I, 95, 3. samudrá ékam diví ékam ap-sú), this word shows in by far the larger number of passages the clear meaning of ocean. There is one famous passage, VII, 95, 2, which proves that the Vedic poets, who were supposed to have known the upper courses only of the rivers of the Penjáb, had followed the greatest and most sacred of their rivers, the Sarasvatî, as far as the Indian ocean. It is well known that, as early as the composition of the laws of the Mānavas, and possibly as early as the composition of the Sūtras on which these metrical laws are based, the river Sarasvatî had changed its course, and that the place where that river disappeared under ground was called Vinasana^a, the loss. This Vinasana forms, according to the laws of the Mānavas, the western frontier of Madhyadesa, the eastern frontier being formed by the confluence of the Gangā and Yamunā. Madhyadesa is a section of Āryāvarta, the abode of the Āryas in the widest sense. Āryāvarta shares with Madhyadesa the same frontiers in the north and the south, viz. the Himālaya and Vindhya mountains, but it extends beyond Madhyadesa to the west and east as far as the western and eastern seas. A section of Madhyadesa, again, is the country described as that of the Brahmarshis, which comprises only Kurukshetra, the countries of the Matsyas, Pañkālās (Kānyakubga, according to Kullūka), and Sūrasenas (Mathurā, according to Kullūka). The most sacred spot of all, however, is that section of the Brahmarshi country which lies between the rivers Drishadvatî and Sarasvatî, and which in the laws of the Mānavas is called Brahmāvarta. In the Sūtras which supplied the material to the authors of the metrical law-books, the Vinasana is mentioned for the first time in the Baudhāyana Sūtras, I, 2, 9, 'Āryāvarta lies to the east of the region where (the Sarasvatī) disappears, to the west of the Black-forest, to the north of the Pāripātra (mountains), to the south of the Himālaya.' The name of the Sarasvatī is not mentioned, but no other river can be understood. What is curious, however, is, that in the Vasishṭha Sūtras where the same frontiers of Āryāvarta are given (I, 8), the MSS. read originally prāḡ ādarsāt, i. e. east of the Ādarsa mountains, which was afterwards changed into prāḡ adarsanāt, and interpreted 'east of the invisibility, or of the disappearance of the Sarasvatī.' Vasishṭha quotes another authority, a Gāthā of the Bhāllavins, which says : 'In the west the boundary river,' i. e. sindhur vidhārāṇī. This sindhur vidhārāṇī is another name of the old Sarasvatī, and in Baudhāyana I, 2, 12, the same verse is quoted, though the reading of vidhārāṇī varies with viṭarāṇī and visarāṇī. See Bühler, l. c. Madhyadesa is mentioned in one of the Parisishṭas (MS. 510, Wilson) as a kind of model country, but it is there described as lying east of Dasārṇa^a, west of Kāmpilya^b, north of Pāriyātra^c, and south of the Himavat, or again, in a more general way, as the Duāb of the Gangā and Yamunā^d.

^a Mentioned in Lāṭy. Śrauta Sūtras, X, 15, 1; Pañkavimsa Brāhm. XXV, 10, 1; see Hist. A. S. L., p. 12.

It is 'very curious that while in the later Sanskrit lite-

^a See Wilson's Vishṇu-purāṇa, ed. Hall, pp. 154, 155, 159, 160.

^b See Wilson's Vishṇu-purāṇa, ed. Hall, p. 161.

^c L. c., pp. 123, 127. Instead of Pāriyātra, other MSS. read Pāripātra; see Bühler, Vasishṭha I, 8.

^d Prāḡ dasārṇāt pratyak kāmpilyād udak pāriyātrād, dakshinena himavataḥ. Gangāyamunayor antaram eke madhyadesam ity ātakshate. Medhātithi says that Madhyadesa, the middle country, was not called so because it was in the middle of the earth, but because it was neither too high nor too low. Albiruny, too, remarks that Madhyadesa was between the sea and the northern mountains, between the hot and the cold countries, equally distant from the eastern and western frontiers. See Reinaud, Mémoire sur l'Inde, p. 46.

rature the disappearance of the Sarasvatî in the desert is a fact familiar to every writer, no mention of it should occur during the whole of the Vedic period, and it is still more curious that in one of the hymns of the Rig-veda we should have a distinct statement that the Sarasvatî fell into the sea :

VII, 95, 1-2. prá kshódasâ dhāyasâ sasre eshā sárasvatî dharúnam āyasi pūh, pra-bābadhānā rathyā-iva yāti vísvāh apāh mahinā sīndhuh anyāh. ékā aketat sárasvatî nadīnām rúkih yati giri-bhyaḥ ā samudrāt, rāyāh kētantī bhūvanasya bhūreḥ ghrítam páyah duduhe nāhushāya.

1. 'With her fertilising stream this Sarasvatî comes forth— (she is to us) a stronghold, an iron gate. Moving along as on a chariot, this river surpasses in greatness all other waters. 2. Alone among all rivers Sarasvatî listened, she who goes pure from the mountains as far as the sea. She who knows of the manifold wealth of the world, has poured out to man her fat milk.'

Here we see samudrá used clearly in the sense of sea, the Indian sea, and we have at the same time a new indication of the distance which separates the Vedic age from that of the later Sanskrit literature. Though it may not be possible to determine by geological evidence the time of the changes which modified the southern area of the Penjáb and caused the Sarasvatî to disappear in the desert, still the fact remains that the loss of the Sarasvatî is later than the Vedic age, and that at that time the waters of the Sarasvatî reached the sea. Professor Wilson had observed long ago in reference to the rivers of that part of India, that there have been, no doubt, considerable changes here, both in the nomenclature and in the courses of the rivers, and this remark has been fully confirmed by later observations. I believe it can be proved that in the Vedic age the Sarasvatî was a river as large as the Sutlej, that it was the last of the rivers of the Penjáb, and therefore the iron gate, or the real frontier against the rest of India. At present the Sarasvatî is so small a river that the epithets applied to the Sarasvatî in the Veda have become quite inapplicable to it. The Vedic Rishis, though acquainted with numerous rivers, including the Indus and Ganges, call the Sarasvatî the mother of rivers (VII, 36, 6. sârasvatî saptâthî sîndhu-mâtâ), the strongest of rivers (VI, 61, 13. apâsâm apâh-tamâ), and in our passage, VII, 95, 2, we have, as far as I can judge, conclusive evidence that the old Sarasvatî reached in its course the Indian sea, either by itself, or united with the Indus^a.

But this passage, though important as showing the application of samudrâ, i. e. confluviæ, to the Indian sea, and proving the acquaintance of the Vedic Rishis with the southern coast of India, is by no means the only one in which samudrâ must be translated by sea. Thus we read, VII, 49, 2 :

yâh âpah divyâh utâ vâ srâvanti khanîtrimâh utâ vâ yâh svayam-gâh, samudrâ-arthâh yâh sûtayaâh pâvakâh tâh âpah devîh ihâ mām avantu.

The waters which are from heaven, or those which flow after being dug, or those which spring up by themselves, the bright, pure waters that tend to the sea, may those divine waters protect me here !

I, 71, 7. agnîm vîsvâh abhî prîkshaâh sakante samudrâm nâ sravâtaâh saptâ yahvîh.

All kinds of food go to Agni, as the seven rivers go to the sea.

Cf. I, 190, 7. samudrâm nâ sravâtaâh ródha-kakrâh.

V, 78, 8. yâthâ vâtaâh yâthâ vânam yâthâ samudrâh égati.

As the wind moves, as the forest moves, as the sea moves (or the sky).

In hymn X, 58, the same expression occurs which we have in our hymn, and samudrâm arnavâm there as here admits but of one explanation, the surging sea.

Samudrâ in many passages of the Rig-veda has to be taken as an adjective, in the sense of watery or flowing :

VI, 58, 3. yâ te pûshan nâvaâh antâh samudré hiranyâyîh antârikshe kâranti.

Thy golden ships, O Pûshan, which move within the watery sky.

^a See 'India, what can it teach us?' pp. 170, 171.

VII, 70, 2. yáh vâm samudrân sarítaḥ píparti.

He who carries you across the watery rivers.

I, 161, 14. at-bhíḥ yâti várunaḥ samudraíḥ.

Varuṇa moves in the flowing waters.

In both these passages samudrá, as an adjective, does not conform to the gender of the noun. See Bollensen, Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 467.

II, 16, 3. ná samudraíḥ párvataiḥ indra te ráthaḥ (ná pari-bhvē).

Thy chariot, O Indra, is not to be overcome by the watery clouds.

Verse 8.

WILSON: Who spread (through the firmament), along with the rays (of the sun), and, with their strength, agitate the ocean: come, Agni, with the Maruts.

BENFEY: Die mit Blitzen schleudern mächtig über das Meer hinaus—Mit diesen Marut's, Agni! komm!

LUDWIG: Die mit stralen ihre richtung nemen mit gewalt durchs mer, mit den Marut, Agni, kom.

Verse 9.

WILSON: I pour out the sweet Soma juice for thy drinking, (as) of old: come, Agni, with the Maruts.

BENFEY: Ich giesse zu dem ersten Trank für dich des Soma Honig aus—Mit diesen Marut's, Agni! komm!

LUDWIG: Ich giesze dir zum ersten trunk madhu mit dem soma zu; mit den Marut, Agni, kom.

Note 1. Pûrvapîti, the early draught, implies at the same time the priority of the god to whom it is given.

MANDALA I, HYMN 37.

ASHṬAKA I, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 12-14.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Sing forth, O Kaṁvas, to the sportive host of your Maruts, brilliant on their chariots, and unscathed¹,—

2. They who were born together, self-luminous, with the spotted deer (the clouds)¹, the spears, the daggers, the glittering ornaments².

3. I hear their¹ whips, almost close by, when they crack them in their hands; they gain splendour² on their way³.

4. Sing forth the god-given prayer to the wild¹ host of your Maruts, endowed with terrible vigour² and strength.

5. Celebrate the bull among the cows (the storm among the clouds)¹, for it is the sportive host of the Maruts; he grew as he tasted the rain².

6. Who, O ye men, is the strongest among you here, ye shakers of heaven and earth, when you shake them like the hem of a garment¹?

7. At your approach the son of man holds himself down; the gnarled cloud¹ fled at your fierce anger.

8. They at whose racings¹ the earth, like a hoary king, trembles for fear on their ways,

9. Their birth is strong indeed: there is strength to come forth from their mother, nay, there is vigour twice enough for it¹.

10. And these sons, the singers¹, stretched out the fences in their racings²; the cows had to walk knee-deep.

11. They cause this long and broad unceasing rain¹ to fall on their ways.

12. O Maruts, with such strength as yours, you have caused men to tremble¹, you have caused the mountains to tremble.

13. As the Maruts pass¹ along, they talk together on the way : does any one hear them?

14. Come fast on your quick steeds ! there are worshippers¹ for you among the Kaṇvas : may you well rejoice among them.

15. Truly there is enough for your rejoicing. We always are their servants, that we may live even the whole of life.

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Kaṇva, the son of Ghora.

Verse 1=TS. IV, 3, 13, 6.

Verse 3=SV. I, 135.

Verse 10=SV. I, 221.

Verse 1.

WILSON: Celebrate, Kaṇvas, the aggregate strength of the Maruts, sportive, without horses, but shining in their car.

BENFEY: Kaṇviden, auf! begrüsst mit Sang, die muntre Heerschaar der Marut's, die rasch'ste, wagenglänzende.

LUDWIG: Eurer spilenden schar, der Marutschar, der unangreifbaren, die auf wagen glänzt, der singt, o Kaṇvās, zu.

Note 1. Wilson translates anarvānam by without horses, though the commentator distinctly explains the word by without an enemy. A Brāhmaṇa passage explains: bhrātrivyo vā arvā, ity śrutyantarāt. See TS. IV, 3, 13, 6. Wilson considers it doubtful whether arvan can ever mean enemy. The fact is, that in the Rig-veda an-arvān never means without horses, but always without hurt or free from enemies; and the commentator is perfectly right, as far as the sense is concerned, in rendering the word by without an enemy, or unopposed (apraty-rīta). An-arvān is not formed from arvat, horse, racer, but from arvan; and this is derived from the same root which yields arus, n. a wound, rīti (see I, 64, 15, note), &c. The accusative of anarvat, without a horse, would be anarvantam, not anarvānam.

The root ar, in the sense of hurting, is distantly connected with the root mar: see Lectures on the Science of Language, Second Series, p. 323. It exists in the Greek ἄλλυμι, corresponding to Sanskrit rinomi, i. e. arnomi, I hurt, likewise in ούλη, wound, which cannot be derived from δλη; in ούλος, ούλιος, hurtful, and δλοός, destructive : see Curtius, Grundzüge der Griechischen Etymologie (fünfte Ausgabe), p. 372. In the Veda ar has the sense of offending or injuring, particularly if preceded by upa.

X, 164, 3. yát â-sásâ nih-sásâ abhi-sásâ upa-ârimâ gâ-gratah yát svapántah, agnîh vîsvâni âpa duk-kritâni âgushâtâni âré asmât dadhâtu.

If we have offended, or whatever fault we have committed, by bidding, blaming, or forbidding, while waking or while sleeping, may Agni remove all wicked misdeeds far from us.

Hence upârâ, injury, VII, 86, 6. âsti gyâyan kântiyasah upa-aré, the older man is there to injure, to offend, to mislead, the young : (History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, second edition, p. 541.) Roth translates upârâ by Verfehlung, missing. Ari, enemy, too, is best derived from this root, and not from râ, to give, with the negative particle, as if meaning originally, as Sâyana supposes, a man who does not give. In ârarivân, gen. ârarushah, hostile, Rosen recognised many years ago a participle of a really reduplicated perfect of ar, and he likewise traced arâru, enemy, back to the same root : see his note to I, 18, 3.

From this root ar, to hurt, ârvan, hurting, as well as ârus, wound, are derived in the same manner as both dhânvan and *dhânu*s, bow, are formed from dhan; yâgvân and yâgus from yag, pârvan and pârus from par. See Kuhn, Zeitschrift, vol. ii, p. 233.

Anarvân, then, is the same as ânarus, Sat. P. Brâhmaṇa III, 1, 3, 7; and from meaning originally without a wound or without one who can wound, it takes the more general sense of uninjured, invulnerable, perfect, strong, (cf. integer, intact, and entire.) This meaning is applicable to I, 94, 2; 136, 5; II, 6, 5; V, 49, 4; VII, 20, 3; 97, 5; X, 61, 13; 65, 3. In I, 116, 16, anarvân seems to be used as an adverb; in I, 51, 12, as applied to slôka, it may have the more general meaning of irresistible, powerful.

There are two passages in which the nom. sing. ârvân, and one in which the acc. sing. ârvânam, occur, apparently meaning horse. But in I, 163, 13, and IX, 97, 25, árvān stands in the Pada text only, the Samhitā has árvā ákka and árvā iva. In X, 46, 5, the text hlri-smasrum ná árvānam dhāna-arkam is too doubtful to allow of any safe induction, particularly as the Sāma-veda gives a totally different reading. I do not think, therefore, that árvat, horse, admits in the nom. and acc. sing. of any forms but árvā and árvan-tam^a. Pāṇini (VI, 4, 127) allows the forms arvān and arvānam, but in anarvan only, which, as we saw, has nothing in common with árvat, horse. Benfey: 'die rascheste (keinen Renner habend, uneinholbar),' the quickest (having no racer, hence not to be reached). M. Bergaigne (Journ. As. 1884, p. 188) tries to defend anarvan in the sense of anasva, without considering the grammatical objections. In VI, 66, 7 (not I, 6, 7) anasváḥ does not refer to yāmah.

The masculine anarvānam after the neuter sárdhas is curious; sárdhas means might, but it is here used to express a might or an aggregate of strong men or gods, and the nom. plur. yé, who, in the next verse, shows the same transition of thought, not only from the singular to the plural, but also from the neuter to the masculine, which must be admitted in anarvānam^b. It would be possible, if necessary, to explain away the irregularity of anarvānam by admitting a rapid transition from the Maruts to Indra, the eldest among the Maruts (cf. I, 23, 8. Indra-gyeshthāḥ mārut-ganāḥ), and it would be easier still to alter sárdhas into sárdham, as an accusative singular of the masculine noun sárdha, which has the same meaning as the neuter sárdhas. There is one passage, V, 56, 9, which would seem to give ample countenance to such a conjecture:

tām vaḥ sárdham rathe-rúbham—ā huve.

I call hither this your host, brilliant on chariots.

Again, II, 30, 11, we read:

tām vaḥ sárdham mārutam—girā úpa bruve.

I call with my voice on this your host of Maruts.

^a See Bugge, K. Z. XIX, p. 403.

^b Bollensen (Z. D. M. G. XXII, 603) calls it a vulgar Donatus; see, however, Lanman, Noun-Inflection, pp. 330, 526.

VIII, 93, 16. srutám vaḥ vrítrahán-tamam prá sárdham
karshanínām, ā sushe.

I pant for the glorious, victorious, host of the quick Maruts.

From this sárdha we have also the genitive sárdhasya, VII, 56, 8 (4):

subhráh vaḥ sūshmaḥ krúdhmī mánāmsi dhúniḥ múnī-iva sárdhasya dhrishnóḥ.

Your prowess is brilliant, your minds furious; the shout of the daring host is like one possessed.

We have likewise the dative sárdhāya, the instrumental sárdhena, and the acc. plur. sárdhān; and in most cases, except in two or three where sárdha seems to be used as an adjective, meaning strong, these words are applied to the host of the Maruts.

But the other word sárdhas is equally well authenticated, and we find of it, not only the nominative, accusative, and vocative sing. sárdhas, but likewise the nom. plur. sárdhāmsi.

The nominative singular occurs in our very hymn:

I, 37, 5. kríám yát sárdhaḥ mǎrutam.

Which is the sportive host of the Maruts.

I, 127, 6. sáḥ hí sárdhaḥ ná mǎrutam tuvi-svániḥ.

For he (Agni) is strong-voiced like the host of the Maruts.

IV, 6, 10. tuvi-svanásaḥ mǎrutam ná sárdhaḥ.

Thy flames (Agni) are strong-voiced like the host of the Maruts.

V, 46, 5. utá tyát naḥ mǎrutam sárdhaḥ ā gamat.

May also that host of the Maruts come to us.

II, 1, 5. tvám narām sárdhaḥ asi puru-vásuḥ.

Thou (Agni), full of riches, art the host of the men.

This host of men seems to me intended again for the Maruts, although it is true that in thus identifying Agni with different gods, the poet repeats himself in the next verse:

II, 1, 6. tvám sárdhaḥ mǎrutam.

Thou art the host of the Maruts.

If this repetition seems offensive, the first narām sárdhas might be taken for some other company of gods. Thus we find:

VII, 44, 5. srinótu naḥ daśvyam sárdhaḥ agníḥ srinvántu víśve mahishāḥ ámûrāḥ.

May the divine host, may Agni, hear us, may the Visve hear us, the strong, the wise.

Or III, 19, 4. sáḥ ā vaha devá-tātim yavishtha sárdhaḥ yát adyá divyám yágâsi.

Bring thou hither, O Agni, the gods, that you may sacrifice to-day to the divine host.

Or I, 139, 1. ā nú tát sárdhaḥ divyám vrinímahe.

We chose for us now that divine host.

As in these last, so in many other passages, sárdhas is used as a neuter in the accusative. For instance,

I, 106, 1; II, 11, 14. mārutam sárdhaḥ.

II, 3, 3; VI, 3, 8. sárdhaḥ marútām.

The vocative occurs,

V, 46, 2. ágne índra váruṇa mítra dévāḥ sárdhaḥ prá yanta māruta utá vishṇo (iti).

Agni, Indra, Varuṇa, Mitra, gods, host of the Maruts, come forth, and Vishṇu!

We see how throughout all these passages those in which sárdha and sárdhas are applied to the Maruts, or to some other company of gods, preponderate most decidedly. Yet passages occur in the Rig-veda where both sárdha and sárdhas are applied to other hosts or companies. Thus V, 53, 10, sárdha refers to chariots, while in I, 133, 3, sárdhas is applied to evil spirits.

If the passages hitherto examined were all that occur in the Rig-veda, we might still feel startled at the construction of our verse, where sárdhas is not only followed by masculine adjectives in the singular, but, in the next verse, by a pronoun in the plural. But if we take the last irregularity first, we find the same construction, viz. sárdhas followed by yé, in III, 32, 4:

índrasya sárdhaḥ marútaḥ yé āsan.

The host of Indra, that was the Maruts.

As to the change of genders, we find adjectives in the masculine after sárdhas, in V, 52, 8. sárdhaḥ mārutam út samsa satyá-savasam r/bh-vasam.

Celebrate the host of the Maruts, the truly vigorous, the brilliant.

Here, too, the poet afterwards continues in the plural, though as he uses the demonstrative, and not, as in our passage, the relative pronoun, we cannot quote this in support of the irregularity which has here to be explained. Anyhow the construction of our verse, though bold and unusual, is not so unusual as to force us to adopt conjectural remedies. In V, 58, 2, we find yé after ganáh. On the Umbrian Çerfo Martio, as possibly the same as sárdha-s máruta-s, see Grassman, Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xvi, p. 190. The Zend saredha, kind, species, is the same word.

Verse 2.

WILSON: Who, borne by spotted deer, were born self-radiant, with weapons, war-cries, and decorations.

BENFEY: Die mit Hirschen und Speeren gleich mit Donnern und mit Blitzen auch—selbststrahlende—geboren sind.

LUDWIG: Die mit vilfarbigen speeren, mit der schwerter glanze, sichtbar wurden mit eigenem leuchten.

Note 1. The spotted deer (prīshatī) are the recognised animals of the Maruts, and were originally, as it would seem, intended for the rain-clouds. Sāyana is perfectly aware of the original meaning of prīshatī, as clouds. The legendary school, he says, takes them for deer with white spots, the etymological school for many-coloured lines of clouds: (RV. BH. I, 64, 8.) This passage shows that although prīshatī, as Roth observes, may mean a spotted cow or a spotted horse,—the Maruts, in fact, are called sometimes prīshat-asvāh, having piebald horses, or, having prīshats for their horses, VII, 40, 3,—yet the later tradition in India had distinctly declared in favour of spotted deer. The Vedic poets, however, admitted both ideas, and they speak in the same hymn, nay, in the same verse, of the fallow deer and of the horses of the Maruts. Thus V, 58, 1, the Maruts are called āśú-asvāh, possessed of quick horses; and in V, 58, 6, we read yát prá áyāsishta prīshatībhiḥ āsvaiḥ—ráthebhiḥ, where the gender of prīsha- tībhiḥ would hardly allow us to join it with ásvaiḥ, but where we must translate: When you come with the deer, the horses, the chariots, or with your deer, as horses. Ludwig joins prishatībhiḥ with rishābhiḥ, and again in I, 64, 8; see note 1 to I, 87, 4.

Note 2. The spears and daggers of the Maruts are meant for the thunderbolts, and the glittering ornaments for the lightning. Sāyana takes vāśī in this passage for war-cries on the authority of the Nirukta, where vāśī is given among the names of the voice. From other passages, however, it becomes clear that vāśī is a weapon of the Maruts; and Sāyana, too, explains it sometimes in that sense: cf. V, 53, 4; 57, 2. Thus I, 88, 3, the vāśīs are spoken of as being on the bodies of the Maruts. In V, 53, 4, the Maruts are said to shine in their ornaments and their vāśīs. Here Sāyana, too, translates vāśī rightly by weapon; and in his remarks on I, 88, 3, he says that vāśī was a weapon commonly called ārā, which is a shoemaker's awl. See Dhammapada, ver. 401. This reminds one of framea, which at one time was supposed to be connected with the German pfrieme. See, however, Grimm (Deutsche Grammatik, vol. i, p. 128) and Leo Meyer (Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. vi, p. 424). In VIII, 29, 3, the god Tvashṭar is said to carry an iron vāśī in his hand. Grassman (Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xvi, p. 163) translates vāśī by axe. That aṅgī is to be taken in the sense of ornament, and not in the sense of ointment, is shown by passages like VIII, 29, 1, where a golden ornament is mentioned, aṅgī aṅkte hiraṇyāyam. Sākām, together, is used with reference to the birth of the Maruts; see I, 64, 4. It should not be connected with vāśībhiḥ.

Verse 3.

WILSON: I hear the cracking of the whips in their hands, wonderfully inspiring (courage) in the fight.

BENFEY: Schier hier erschallt der Peitsche Knall, wenn sie in ihrer Hand erklingt; leuchtend fahr'n sie im Sturm herab.

LUDWIG: Als wäre es hier, so hört man es, wenn die geisseln in ihren händen knallen; wunderbar strecken sie auf ihrer fart sich nieder.

Note 1. Eshâm should be pronounced as a creticus; also in verses 9, 13, 15. This is a very common vyûha. On the whips as lightning, see Grimm, Donner, p. 27.

Note 2. I should have taken kitrâm as an adverb, like Benfey, if ni riñg were not usually construed with an accusative. Riñg in the 3rd pers. plur. pres. Âtm. is treated like a verb of the Ad-class. The SV. seems to read yâmam, and the commentator explains it by ratham.

Note 3. The locative yâman is frequently used of the path on which the gods move and approach the sacrifice; hence it sometimes means, as in our passage, in the sky. Yâmam in BR., s. v. arg, is wrong.

We might also translate: 'Here, close by, I hear what the whips in their hands say; they drive forth the beautiful (chariot) on the road.' See SV. I, 2, 1, 5, 1, comm.

Verse 4.

WILSON: Address the god-given prayer to those who are your strength, the destroyers of foes, the powerful, possessed of brilliant reputation.

BENFEY: Singt eurer Schaar, der wühlenden, der strahlenreichen, kräftigen ein gotterfülltes Gebet!

LUDWIG: Eurer kûnen schar, von blendender herlichkeit, der kraftvollen, soll ein von den gôttern eingegebenes brahma gesungen werden.

Note 1. Benfey translates ghrîshvi by burrowing, and refers it to the thunderbolt that uproots the earth. He points out that ghrîshvi means also, for the same reason, the boar, as proved by Kuhn (Die Herabkunft des Feuers, S. 202). Ghrîshî is evidently a common name for boar, the Norse gríss, and the god of the wind, Grimnir or Grimr, is conceived as a boar, shaking the cornfield, in such phrases as 'Der Eber geht ins Korn' (Gentha, l. c. p. 14). I prefer, however, in this place the general sense assigned to the adjective ghrîshu and ghrîshvi, exuberant, brisk, wild. See Kuhn in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xi, p. 385. Wilson, after Sâyana, translates destroyers of foes. On the representation of the clouds as boars, see Nir. V, 4.

Note 2. Tveshá-dyumna is difficult to render. Both tveshá and dyumná are derived from roots that mean to shine, to be bright, to glow. Derivatives from tvish express the idea of fieriness, fierceness, and fury. In IV, 17, 2, tvish is used correlatively, with manyú, wrath. Derivatives from dyu convey the idea of brightness and briskness. Both qualities are frequently applied to the Maruts.

Verse 5.

WILSON: Praise the sportive and resistless might of the Maruts, who were born amongst kine, and whose strength has been nourished by (the enjoyment of) the milk.

BENFEY: Preist hoch die muntre Marutschaar die unbesiegbar in den Küh'n, im Schlund des Safts wuchs sie heran.

LUDWIG: Preise wie unter kühlen den stier, (so) der Marut spilende schar, beim verschlingen des saftes ist sie grosz geworden.

Note 1. This translation is merely conjectural. I suppose that the wind driving the clouds before him, is here compared to a bull among cows, cf. V, 52, 3:

té syandrāśaḥ ná ukshānaḥ áti skandanti sárvarīḥ.

They, the Maruts, like rushing bulls, mount on the dark cows.

The last sentence states that the wind grows even stronger after it has tasted the rain (I, 85, 2. té ukshitāśaḥ mahimānam ārata).

Note 2. I take gāmbhe in the sense of gāmbhane. (On the root gabh and its derivatives, see Kuhn, Zeitschrift für vergleichende Sprachwissenschaft, vol. i, p. 123 seq.) It would be better to read mukhe, instead of sukhe, in the commentary. The Maruts were not born of milk for Prisni, as Wilson says in a note, but from the milk of Prisni. Prisni is called their mother, Rudra their father: (V, 52, 16; 60, 5.)

Benfey takes the cows for clouds in which the lightnings dwell; and the abyss of the sap is by him supposed to be again the clouds.

Verse 6.

WILSON : Which is chief leader among you, agitators of heaven and earth, who shake all around, like the top (of a tree)?

BENFEY : Wer, Helden ! ist der erste euch—ihr Erd- und Himmel-schütterer !—wenn ihr sie schüttelt Wipfeln gleich ?

LUDWIG : Wer ist der grösste bei euch, helden, wenn vom himel und der erde, schütteler, ihr am saume gleichsam rüttelt !

Note 1. Āntam ná, literally, like an end, is explained by Sāyana as the top of a tree. Wilson, Langlois, and Benfey accept that interpretation. Roth proposes, like the hem of a garment, which I prefer ; for vastrānta, the end of a garment, is a common expression in later Sanskrit, while anta is never applied to a tree in the sense of the top of a tree. Here agra would be more appropriate.

Verse 7.

WILSON : The householder, in dread of your fierce and violent approach, has planted a firm (buttress) ; for the many-ridged mountain is shattered (before you).

BENFEY : Vor eurem Gange beuget sich, vor eurem wilden Zorn der Mann ; der Hügel weicht und der Berg.

LUDWIG : Vor eurem anzug, eurem gewaltigen eifer, niederduckte sich der mensch, wich der festgeknotete [wolken]berg.

Note 1. Sāyana translates : 'Man has planted a firm buttress to give stability to his dwelling.' The reading ná for ní, which Aufrecht adopted, is untenable, as Ludwig shows. It has been altered in the second edition. See also VIII, 7, 5, ní yemiré. Nidadhré is the perfect Ātmanepada, and expresses the holding down of the head or the cowering attitude of man. I have taken ugrāya manyāve over to gṛhīta, because these words could hardly form an apposition to yāmāya. As the Vedic poets speak of the very mountains as shaken by the storms, we might translate pārvato girīḥ by the gnarled or rocky mount ;

but there is no authority for translating gñhita by it is shattered, and we should have to translate, the mountain yielded or bent before your anger. Cf. V, 57, 3 :

ní vañ vāñā gihate yāmanāñ bhiyāñ.

The forests get out of your way from fear.

V, 60, 2. vāñā kit ugrāñ gihate ní vañ bhiyāñ prithivī kit regate pārvatañ kit.

Even the forests, ye fearful Maruts, yield from fear of you ; even the earth trembles, even the mountain.

In I, 166, 5, yāt tveshā-yāmāñ nadāyanta pārvatāñ, we may translate 'when they on their fiery course made the parvatas (clouds) to sound or thunder,' but it is more likely that nādayati here means to cause to shake or vibrate, and that parvata stands for mountain. We ought to remember such poetical expressions as I Kings xix. 11, 'and a great, strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord.'

Verse 8.

WILSON : At whose impetuous approach earth trembles ; like an enfeebled monarch, through dread (of his enemies).

BENFEY : Bei deren Lauf bei deren Sturm die Erde zittert voller Furcht, wie ein altergebeugter Mann.

LUDWIG : Bei deren märschen zitterte wie ein gealtet stammeshaupt die erd vor furcht auf ihren wegen.

Note 1. Āgma seems to express the act of racing or running (like āgi, race, battle), while yāma is the road itself where the racing takes place. A very similar passage occurs in I, 87, 3. The comparison of the earth (fem.) to a king (masc.) would be considered a grave offence in the later Sanskrit literature. In I, 87, 3, vithurāñ takes the place of vispāti.

Verse 9.

WILSON : Stable is their birthplace, (the sky) ; yet the birds (are able) to issue from (the sphere of) their parent : for your strength is everywhere (divided) between two (regions,—or, heaven and earth).

BENFEY: Kaum geboren sind sie so stark, dass ihrer Mutter sie entfliehn: ist ja doch zwiefach ihre Kraft.

LUDWIG: Denn fest ist ihr geburtsort, vögel (sind sie) von der mutter fortzugehn, nach dem, wie von altersher ihre kraft.

Oder, Denn fest ist ihre kraft geworden von der mutter sich zu trennen, da schon von alters her ihre kraft diss wollte.

Note 1. A very difficult verse. The birth of the Maruts is frequently alluded to, as well as their surpassing strength, as soon as born. Hence the first sentence admits of little doubt. But what follows is very abrupt. Váyas may be the plural of vi, bird, or it may be váyas, the neuter, meaning vital strength: see Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xv, p. 217. The Maruts are frequently compared to birds (cf. I, 87, 2; 88, 1), but it is usual to indicate the comparison by ná or iva. I therefore take váyas as a nom. sing. neut., in the sense of vigour, life. They are called br̥hadvayasaḥ in a Nivid; see Ludwig, p. 226. Nir-i is used with particular reference to the birth of a child (cf. V, 78, 7; 9).

Verse 10.

WILSON: They are the generators of speech: they spread out the waters in their courses: they urge the lowing (cattle) to enter (the water), up to their knees, (to drink.)

BENFEY: In ihrem Lauf erheben dann diese Söhne Getös und Fluth, die bis zum Knie den Kühen geht.

LUDWIG: Und dise söne, die sänger, denten auf ihren zügen ihre banen aus, so dass brüllend sie uns ganz nahe kamen.

Note 1. If we could take sûnávaḥ gíraḥ in the sense of the sons of voice, i. e. of thunder, which would remove many difficulties, the accent of gíraḥ would have to be changed. The commentator takes sûnu in the sense of utpádaka, producers of sound. Gíraḥ, however, occurs at least once more, in the sense of singers or poets, IX, 63, 10, where gíraḥ can only be a vocative, O ye singers! In I, 6, 6, the translation of gíraḥ by singers, i. e. the Maruts, may be contested, but if we consider that gíraḥ, in the sense of hymns, is feminine, and is followed by the very word which is here used, viz. devayántaḥ, as a feminine, viz. devayántīḥ, VII, 18, 3, we can hardly doubt that in I, 6, 6, gṛāḥ is a masculine and means singers. The same applies to VI, 63, 10. In VI, 52, 9, úpa naḥ sūnávaḥ gṛāḥ srinvantu amṛtasya yé, the construction is, of course, quite different.

Note 2. The expression that the Maruts enlarged or extended the fences of their race-course (RV. IV, 58, 7), can only mean that they swept over the whole sky, and drove the clouds away from all the corners. Kāshṭhā may mean the wooden enclosures (carceres) or the wooden poles that served as turning and winning-posts (metae). The Sāma-veda has yagñeshu instead of agmeshu. That the translation of this verse is purely tentative, and far from satisfactory, was known to all Vedic scholars, but I doubt whether they will consider the interpretation which M. Bergaigne proposes with so much assurance, as less tentative and more satisfactory. He translates (Journ. As. 1884, p. 239), 'des fils ont, dans leur marche, allongé leurs chants comme des chemins, pour y marcher à genoux (sur les genoux) en mugissant (en chantant).' I shall content myself with shortly pointing out the misgivings which every Vedic scholar would feel at once in proposing such a rendering. First as to the conception itself. Can a poet say, 'The Maruts have stretched out their songs in order to march on them on their knees?' 'The roads,' as M. Bergaigne shows himself, are only a simile, and no one walks on a simile. Secondly, the idea that these Maruts widened the roads on which they march, is common enough, but that they lengthened their songs, like paths, is never said by the Vedic Rishis, nor would they in such a case have left out the particle na or iva. Lastly, though many things are said of the Maruts, I do not remember that they ever appear on their knees. I do not think, therefore, that M. Bergaigne's infallible method helps us much beyond where we were before. Conjectures are easy, but for that very reason, one does not like to bring them forward. One might propose to read sūnávaḥ diváḥ, a very common name of the Maruts. One might go a step further, identify gih with bhâratî, and point out that the Maruts are called the sons of Bharata, II, 36, 2. But all this leaves us in utter uncertainty, and where a scholar feels the ground so uncertain beneath his feet, he hesitates to speak with papal authority. M. Bergaigne's strong point is that abhigñû means on their knees, not up to their knees. Here again, I ask, does abhi in prepositional compounds ever mean on? If abhigñû is used in the same sense in which we use 'on our knees,' it would in Sanskrit mean only 'bowing up to the knees.' Now in I, 72, 5, abhigñû seems to express a positive expression of reverence. With regard to the other passages where abhigñû occurs, M. Bergaigne has not shown how they ought to be translated so as to give a clear sense. I do not pretend to solve the difficulties, but I think it is better to confess our difficulties than to hide them under the veil of a so-called systematic interpretation. Abhigñû, like mitagñû, may have expressed a position of the knees, expressive of strength, but on such points very little information is to be gained from Indian commentators.

The last sentence expresses the result of this race, viz. the falling of so much rain that the cows had to walk up to their knees in water. This becomes still clearer from the next verse.

SÂYANA: These, the producers of speech, have spread water in their courses, they cause the cows to walk up to their knees in order to drink the water.

Verse 11.

WILSON: They drive before them, in their course, the long, vast, uninjurable, rain-retaining cloud.

BENFEY: Dann treiben sie im Sturm heran jenen langen und breiten Spross der Wolke unerschöpflichen.

LUDWIG: Sogar diesen langen, breiten, das kind der wolke, den unfeindlichen, schleudern auf ihren zügen sie vorwärts.

Note 1. Rain is called the offspring of the cloud, mihó nápât, and is then treated as a masculine; cf. apâm nápât, &c.

Verse 12.

WILSON: Maruts, as you have vigour, invigorate mankind: give animation to the clouds.

BENFEY: O Marut's! mit der Kraft, die ihr besitzt, werft ihr Geschöpfe um, die Berge werft ihr um sogar.

LUDWIG: O Marut, so wie eure kraft ist, warft ihr die leute nieder, warft ihr die berge nieder.

Note 1. In VIII, 72, 8, akūkyavit is explained by vyā-dārayat, he tore open. Akūkyavitana is the Vedic form of the 2nd pers. plur. of the reduplicated aorist.

Verse 13.

WILSON: Wherever the Maruts pass, they fill the way with clamour: every one hears their (noise).

BENFEY: Wenn die Marut's des Weges ziehn, dann sprechen mit einander sie und mancher mag sie hören.

LUDWIG: Wenn die Marut wandern, sprechen auf dem weg sie mit einander, es höret sie ein jeder.

Note 1. Yānti has to be pronounced as an amphibrachys.

Verse 14.

WILSON: Come quickly, with your swift (vehicles). The offerings of the Kaṇvas are prepared. Be pleased with them.

BENFEY: Auf schnellen kommet schnell herbei, bei Kaṇva's Spross sind Feste euch: da wollt euch schön ergötzen.

LUDWIG: Brecht rasch auf mit raschen rossen, bei den Kaṇva's ist euer dienst, dort eben erfreuet euch.

Note 1. Benfey supposes that dúvaḥ stands in the singular instead of the plural. But why should the plural have been used, as the singular (asti) would have created no kind of difficulty? It is better to take dúvaḥ as a nominative plural of a noun dū, worshipper, derived from the same root which yielded dúvaḥ, worship. We certainly find á-duvaḥ, as a nom. plur., in the sense of not-worshipping:

VII, 4, 6. mā tvā vayām sahasā-van avīrāḥ mā āpsavaḥ pāri sadāma mā āduvaḥ.

May we not, O hero, sit round thee like men without strength, without beauty (cf. VIII, 7, 7), without worship.

Here Sâyana explains āduvaḥ very well by parikarāṇa-hīnāḥ, which seems better than Roth's explanation 'zögernd, ohne Eifer.'

Verse 15.

WILSON : The offering is prepared for your gratification : we are your (worshippers), that we may live all our life.

BENFEY : Gerüstet ist für euren Rausch und wir gehören, traun ! euch an für unser ganzes Lebelang.

LUDWIG : Er ist euch zur trunkesfreude, und wir gleichfalls euer hier, dass unsere ganze dauer wir erleben.

MANDALA I, HYMN 38.

ASHṬAKA I, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 15-17.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. What then now? When¹ will you take (us) as a dear father takes his son by both hands, O ye gods, for whom the sacred grass has been trimmed²?

2. Where now? On what errand of yours are you going, in heaven, not on earth¹? Where are your cows sporting?

3. Where are your newest favours¹, O Maruts? Where the blessings? Where all delights?

4. If you, sons of Prisni, were mortals, and your praiser an immortal¹,—

5. Then never¹ should your praiser be unwelcome, like a deer in pasture grass², nor should he go on the path of Yama³.

6. Let not one sin¹ after another, difficult to be conquered, overcome us; may it depart² together with greed.

7. Truly they are terrible and powerful; even to the desert the Rudriyas bring rain that is never dried up¹.

8. The lightning lows like a cow, it follows as a mother follows after her young, when the shower (of the Maruts) has been let loose¹.

9. Even by day the Maruts create darkness with the water-bearing cloud¹, when they drench the earth.

10. Then from the shouting of the Maruts over the whole space of the earth¹, men reeled forward.

11. Maruts on your strong-hoofed never-wearying³

steeds¹ go after those bright ones (the clouds), which are still locked up².

12. May your fellies be strong, the chariots, and their horses, may your reins¹ be well-fashioned.

13. Speak forth for ever with thy voice to praise the Lord of prayer¹, Agni, who is like a friend², the bright one.

14. Fashion a hymn in thy mouth! Expand like the cloud¹! Sing a song of praise.

15. Worship the host of the Maruts, the terrible, the glorious, the musical¹. May they be magnified here among us².

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Kaṁva, the son of Ghora. The metre is Gâyatrî throughout. Several verses, however, end in a spondee instead of the usual iambus. No attempt should be made to improve such verses by conjecture, for they are clearly meant to end in spondees. Thus in verses 2, 7, 8, and 9, all the three pâdas alike have their final spondee. In verse 7, the ionicus a minore is with an evident intention repeated thrice. No verse of the hymn occurs in SV., VS., AV.; but verse 8 = TS. III, 1, 11, 5; verse 9 = TS. II, 4, 8, 1.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Kadha-priya is taken in the Padapāṭha as one word, and Sâyana explains it by delighted by or delighting in praise, a nominative plural. A similar compound, kadha-priya, occurs in I, 30, 20, and there too the vocative sing. fem., kadhapriye, is explained by Sâyana as fond of praise. In order to obtain this meaning, kadha has to be identified with kathâ, story, which is simply impossible. There is another compound, adha-priyâ, nom. dual, which occurs VIII, 8, 4, and which Sâyana explains either as delighted here below, or as a corruption of kadha-priyâ.

In Boehtlingk and Roth's Dictionary, kadha-priya and kadha-prî are both taken as compounds of kadha, an interrogative adverb, and priya or prî, to love or delight, and they are explained as meaning kind or loving to whom? In the same manner adha-priya is explained as kind then and there.

It must be confessed, however, that a compound like kadha-prî, kind to whom?, is somewhat strange, and it seems preferable to separate the words, and to write kâdha priyâ and âdha priyâ.

It should be observed that the compounds kadha-prî and kadha-priya occur always in sentences where there is another interrogative pronoun. The two interrogatives kât—kâdha, what—where, and kâs—kâdha, who—where, occurring in the same sentence, an idiom so common in Greek, may have puzzled the author of the Pada text, and the compound being once sanctioned by the authority of Sākalya, Sāyana would explain it as best he could. But if we admit the double use of the interrogative in Sanskrit, as in Greek, then, in our passage, priyāk would be an adjective belonging to pitā, and we might translate: 'What then now? When will you take (us), as a dear father takes his son by both hands, O ye Maruts?' In the same manner we ought to translate I, 30, 20:

kāk te ushāk kādha priye bhugé márta amartye.

Who and where was there a mortal to be loved by thee, O beloved, immortal Dawn?

In VIII, 7, 31, where the same words are repeated as in our passage, it is likewise better to write:

kát ha nūnám kādha priyāk yát índram ágahātana, kāk va sakhi-tvé ohate.

What then now? Where is there a friend, now that you have forsaken Indra? Who watches for your friendship?

Why in VIII, 8, 4, adha priyā should have been joined into one word is more difficult to say, yet here, too, the compound might easily be separated.

Kādha does not occur again, but would be formed in analogy with ádha. It occurs in Zend as kadha.

Kuhn, Beiträge IV, p. 186, has shown that kūshthak (RV. V, 74, 1) is a similar monster, and stands for ku shthak.

The words kát ha nūnám commonly introduce an interrogative sentence, literally, What then now? cf. X, 10, 4.

Note 2. Vrikta-barhis is generally a name of the priest, so called because he has to trim the sacrificial grass. 'The sacred Kusa grass (Poa cynosuroides), after having had the roots cut off, is spread on the Vedi or altar, and upon it the libation of Soma-juice, or oblation of clarified butter, is poured out. In other places, a tuft of it in a similar position is supposed to form a fitting seat for the deity or deities invoked to the sacrifice. According to Mr. Stevenson, it is also strewn over the floor of the chamber in which the worship is performed.'

Cf. VI, 11, 5. vriṅgé ha yát námasā barhík agnau, áyāmi srúk ghritá-vatī su-vrīktík.

When I reverentially trim the truss for Agni, when the well-trimmed ladle, full of butter, is stretched forth.

In our passage, unless we change the accent, it must be taken as an epithet of the Maruts, they for whom the grass-altar has been prepared. They are again invoked by the same name, VIII, 7, 20 :

kvā nūnām su-dānavaḥ mādatha vṛikta-barhishaḥ.

Where do ye rejoice now, you gods for whom the altar is trimmed?

Otherwise, vṛikta-barhishaḥ might, with a change of accent, supply an accusative to dadhidhve: 'Will you take the worshippers in your arms?' This, though decidedly better, is not absolutely necessary, because to take by the hand may be used as a neuter verb.

WILSON: Maruts, who are fond of praise, and for whom the sacred grass is trimmed, when will you take us by both hands as a father does his son?

BENFEY: Wo weilt ihr gern? was habt ihr jetzt—gleichwie ein Vater seinen Sohn—in Händen, da das Opfer harrt?

Verse 2.

Note 1. The idea of the first verse, that the Maruts should not be detained by other pursuits, is carried on in the second. The poet asks, what they have to do in the sky, instead of coming down to the earth. The last sentence seems to mean 'where tarry your herds?' viz. the clouds. Sâyana translates: 'Where do worshippers, like lowing cows, praise you?' Wilson: 'Where do they who worship you cry to you, like cattle?' Benfey: 'Wo jauchzt man euch, gleich wie Stiere? (Ihre Verehrer brüllen vor Freude über ihre Gegenwart, wie Stiere.)' The verb ranyati, however, when followed by an accusative, means to love, to accept with pleasure. The gods accept the offerings and the prayers:

V, 18, 1. visvāni yāḥ āmartyaḥ havyā mārteshu ranyati.

The immortal who deigns to accept all offerings among mortals.

V, 74, 3. kāśya brāhmāni ranyathaḥ.

Whose prayers do ye accept?

Followed by a locative raṇyati means to delight in. Both the gods are said to delight in prayers (VIII, 12, 18; 33, 16), and prayers are said to delight in the gods (VIII, 16, 2). I therefore take raṇyanti in the sense of tarrying, disporting, and ná, if it is to be retained, in the sense of not; where do they not sport? meaning that they are to be found everywhere, except where the poet desires them to be. We thus get rid of the simile of singing poets and lowing cows, which, though not too bold for Vedic bards, would here come in too abruptly. It would be much better, however, if the negative particle could be omitted altogether. If we retain it, we must read: kvā váh | gāvāh | na rán | yantí | . But the fact is that through the whole of the Rig-veda kvā has always to be pronounced as two syllables, kuva. There is only one passage, V, 61, 2, where, before a vowel, we have to read kva: kuva vo 'svāh, kvābhisavaḥ. In other passages, even before vowels, we always have to read kuva, e.g. I, 161, 4. kuvet=kva it; I, 105, 4. kuvartam=kva rītam. In I, 35, 7, we must read either kuvedānīm sūryaḥ, making sūryaḥ trisyllabic, or kuva idānīm, leaving a hiatus. In I, 168, 6, kvāvaram is kuvāvaram: Sākalya, forgetting this, and wishing to improve the metre, added na, thereby, in reality, destroying both the metre and the sense. Kva occurs as dissyllabic in the Rig-veda at least forty-one times.

Verse 3.

Note 1. The meanings of sumná in the first five Mandalas are well explained by Professor Aufrecht in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. iv, p. 274. As to suvitā in the plural, see X, 86, 21, and VIII, 93, 29, where Indra is said to bring all suvitas. It frequently occurs in the singular:

X, 148, 1. ā naḥ bhara suvitām yāsya kākān.

Verse 4.

Note 1. One might translate: 'If you, sons of Prisni, were mortals, the immortal would be your worshipper.' But this seems almost too deep and elaborate a compliment for a primitive age. Langlois translates: 'Quand vous ne seriez pas immortels, (faites toutefois) que votre panégyriste jouisse d'une longue vie.' Wilson's translation is obscure : 'That you, sons of Prisni, may become mortals, and your panegyrist become immortal.' Sâyana translates : 'Though you, sons of Prisni, were mortal, yet your worshipper would be immortal.' Ludwig has, 'Wenn ihr, o kinder der Prisni, sterbliche wäret, der unsterbliche wäre euer sänger dann. Nicht werde euch unlieb der sänger, wie ein wildes tier auf der weide, nicht des Yama Pfad betrete er.' I think it best to connect the fourth and fifth verses, and I feel justified in so doing by other passages where the same or a similar idea is expressed, viz. that if the god were the poet and the poet the god, then the poet would be more liberal to the god than the god is to him. Whether syât should have the udâtta, I cannot tell. Thus I translated a passage, VII, 32, 18, in my History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, p. 545 : 'If I were lord of as much as thou, I should support the sacred bard, thou scatterer of wealth, I should not abandon him to misery. I should award wealth day by day to him who magnifies, I should award it to whosoever it be.' Another parallel passage is pointed out by Mr. J. Muir, (On the Interpretation of the Veda, p. 79 ; see also Sanskrit Texts, V, 303.) VIII, 19, 25 : 'If, Agni, thou wert a mortal, and I were an immortal, I should not abandon thee to malediction or to wretchedness ; my worshipper should not be miserable or distressed.' Still more to the point is another passage, VIII, 44, 23 : 'If I were thou, and thou wert I, then thy wishes should be fulfilled.' See also VIII, 14, 1, 2.

As to the metre it is clear that we ought to read martāsaḥ syātāna.

Verse 5.

Note 1. Mā, though it seems to stand for nā, retains its prohibitive sense.

Note 2. Yávasa is explained by Sâyana as grass, and Wilson's Dictionary, too, gives to it the meaning of meadow or pasture grass, whereas yava is barley. The Greek ζῆα or ζεία is likewise explained as barley or rye, fodder for horses. See I, 91, 13. gāvaḥ ná yāvaseshu, like cows in meadows.

Note 3. The path of Yama can only be the path first followed by Yama, or that leads to Yama, as the ruler of the departed.

X, 14, 8. sám gakkhasva pitṛī-bhiḥ sám yaména.

Meet with the fathers, meet with Yama (X, 14, 10; 15, 8).

X, 14, 7. yamám paryâsi várūnam ka devám.

Thou wilt see (there) Yama and the divine Varuna.

X, 165, 4. tásmāi yamāya námaḥ astu mrityáve.

Adoration to that Yama, to Death!

WILSON: Never may your worshipper be indifferent to you, as a deer (is never indifferent) to pasture, so that he may not tread the path of Yama.

BENFEY: Wer euch besingt, der sei euch nicht gleichgültig, wie das Wild im Gras, nicht wandl' er auf des Yama Pfad.

Āgoshya is translated insatiable by Professor Goldstücker.

Verse 6.

Note 1. One of the meanings of nīrrīti is sin. It is derived from the same root which yielded ritá, in the sense of right. Nīrrīti was conceived, it would seem, as going away from the path of right, the German Vergehen. Nīrrīti was personified as a power of evil and destruction.

VII, 104, 9. áhaye vā tñ pra-dádātu sómaḥ ā vā dadhātu nīh-riteh upá-sthe.

May Soma hand them over to Ahi, or place them in the lap of Nīrrīti.

I, 117, 5. susupvāmsam ná nīh-riteh upá-sthe.

Like one who sleeps in the lap of Nīrrīti.

Here Sāyana explains Nīrrīti as earth, and he attaches the same meaning to the word in other places which will have to be considered hereafter. Cf. Lectures on the Science of Language, Second Series, p. 562.

Wilson treats Nīrrīti as a male deity, and translates the last words, 'let him perish with our evil desires.'

Note 2. Padīshṭá is formed as an optative of the Ātmanepada, but with the additional s before the t, which, in the ordinary Sanskrit, is restricted to the so-called benedictive (Grammar, § 385; Bopp, Kritische Grammatik, ed. 1834, § 329, note). Pad means originally to go. Thus RV. IX, 73, 9, átra kartám áva padâti áprabhuḥ, may the impotent go down into the pit. In certain constructions it gradually assumed the meaning of to perish, and native commentators are inclined to explain it by pat, to fall. One can watch the transition of meaning from going into perishing in such phrases as VS. XI, 46, mâ pâdy áyushaḥ purâ, literally, 'may he not go before the time,' but really intended for 'may he not die before the time.' In the Rig-veda padîshṭá is generally qualified by some words to show that it is to be taken in malam partem. Thus in our passage, and in III, 53, 21; VII, 104, 16; 17. In I, 79, 11, however, padîshṭá sáḥ is by itself used in a maledictory sense, pereat, may he perish! In another, VI, 20, 5, pâdi by itself conveys the idea of perishing. This may have some weight in determining the origin of the Latin pestis (Corssen, Kritische Beiträge, p. 396), for it shows that, even without prepositions, such as á or vi, pad may have an ill-omened meaning. In the Aitareya-bráhmaṇa VII, 14 (History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, p. 471), pad, as applied to a child's teeth, means to go, to fall out. With sam, however, pad has always a good meaning, and this shows that originally its meaning was neutral. Another translation, suggested by Ludwig, might be: 'Let not one dreadful Nirṛiti (sin) after another strike us.'

Verse 7.

Note 1. The only difficult word is avâtām. Sâyana explains it, 'without wind.' But it is hardly possible to understand how the Maruts, themselves the gods of the storm, the sons of Rudra, could be said to bring clouds without wind. Langlois, it is true, translates without any misgivings: 'Ces dieux peuvent sur un sol desséché faire tomber la pluie sans l'accompagner de vent.' Wilson: 'They send down rain without wind upon the desert.' Benfey saw the incongruous character of the epithet, and explained it away by saying that the winds bring rain, and after they have brought it, they moderate their violence in order not to drive it away again; hence rain without wind. Yet even this explanation, though ingenious, and, as I am told, particularly truthful in an eastern climate, is somewhat too artificial. If we changed the accent, ávâtâm, unchecked, unconquered, would be better than avâtām, windless. But ávâta, unconquered, does not occur in the Rig-veda, except as applied to persons. It occurs most frequently in the phrase vanván ávâtáḥ, which Sâyana explains well by himsan ahimsitáḥ, hurting, but not hurt: (VI, 16, 20; 18, 1; IX, 89, 7.) In IX, 96, 8, we read prít-sú vanván ávâtáḥ, in battles attacking, but not attacked, which renders the meaning of ávâta perfectly clear. In VI, 64, 5, where it is applied to Ushas, it may be translated by unconquerable, intact.

There are several passages, however, where avâta occurs with the accent on the last syllable, and where it is accordingly explained as a Bahuvrihi, meaning either windless or motionless, from vâta, wind, or from vâta, going (I, 62, 10). In some of these passages we can hardly doubt that the accent ought to be changed, and that we ought to read ávâta. Thus in VI, 64, 4, avâte is clearly a vocative applied to Ushas, who is called ávâtâ, unconquerable, in the verse immediately following. In I, 52, 4, the Maruts are called avâtáḥ, which can only be ávâtáḥ, unconquerable; nor can we hesitate in VIII, 79, 7, to change avâtáḥ into ávâtáḥ, as an epithet applied to Soma, and preceded by ádriptakratuḥ, of unimpaired strength, unconquerable.

But even then we find no evidence that ávâta, unconquered, could be applied to rain or to a cloud, and I therefore propose another explanation, though equally founded on the supposition that the accent of avâtâm in our passage should be on the first syllable.

I take vâta as a Vedic form instead of the later vâna, the past participle of vai, to wither. Similarly we find in the Veda gîta, instead of gîna, the latter form being sanctioned by Pāṇini. Vâ means to get dry, to flag, to get exhausted; ávâta therefore, as applied to a cloud, would mean not dry, not withered, as applied to rain, not dried up, but remaining on the ground. It is important to remark that in one passage, VI, 67, 7, Sâyana, too, explains ávâta, as applied to rivers, by asushka, not dry; and the same meaning would be applicable to avâtām in I, 62, 10. In this sense of not withered, not dry, avâtām in our passage would form a perfectly appropriate epithet of the rain, while neither windless nor unconquered would yield an appropriate sense. In the famous passage, X, 129, 2, ānīt avâtām svadháyâ tát ékam, that only One breathed breathless by itself, avâtām might be taken, in accordance with its accent, as windless or breathless, and the poet may have wished to give this antithetical point to his verse. But avâtām, as an adverb, would here be equally appropriate, and we should then have to translate, 'that only One breathed freely by itself.' Ludwig translates, 'Als treue die blendenden, die stürmenden Rudriya auf öder fläche sogar, als brunnen die wolke schaffen.' This presupposes the conjectural reading ava-tām.

Verse 8.

Note 1. The peculiar structure of the metre in the seventh and eighth verses should be noted. Though we may scan

-----uú--- | ---u---ú--- | u-----uú--- |
 ---u---ú--- | ---u---ú--- | u-----uú---

by throwing the accent on the short antepenultimate, yet the movement of the metre becomes far more natural by throwing the accent on the long penultimate, thus reading

---ú---úuú--- | ---úuúuú--- | uú---úuú--- ---úuú---uú--- | ---úuú---u--- | uú---úuú---

SÂYANA : Like a cow the lightning roars, (the lightning) attends (on the Maruts) as the mother cow on her calf, because their rain is let loose at the time of lightning and thunder.

WILSON : The lightning roars like a parent cow that bellows for its calf, and hence the rain is set free by the Maruts.

BENFEY : Es blitzt—wie eine Kuh brüllt es—die Mutter folgt dem Kalb gleichsam—wenn ihr Regen losgelassen. (Der Donner folgt dem Blitz, wie eine Kuh ihrem Kalbe.)

Vāsrā as a masculine means a bull, and it is used as a name of the Maruts in some passages, VIII, 7, 3 ; 7. As a feminine it means a cow, particularly a cow with a calf, a milch cow. Hence also a mother, X, 119, 4. The lowing of the lightning must be intended for the distant thunder, and the idea that the lightning goes near or looks for the rain is not foreign to the Vedic poets. See I, 39, 9: 'Come to us, Maruts, with your entire help, as lightnings (come to, i. e. seek for) the rain!'

Verse 9.

Note 1. That pargánya here and in other places means cloud has been well illustrated by Dr. Bühler, Orient und Occident, vol. i, p. 221. It is interesting to watch the personifying process which is very palpable in this word, and by which Parganya becomes at last a friend and companion of Indra. See now, 'India, what can it teach us?' p. 183 seq.

Verse 10.

Note 1. Sádma, as a neuter, means originally a seat, and is frequently used in the sense of altar: IV, 9, 3. sáh sádma pári niyate hótâ; VII, 18, 22. hótâ-iva sádma pári emi rébhan. It soon, however, assumed the more general meaning of place, as X, 1, 1. agnih bhânúnâ rúsatâ vísvâ sádmâni aprâh.

Agni with brilliant light thou filledst all places.

It is lastly used with special reference to heaven and earth, the two sádmanî, I, 185, 6; III, 55, 2. In our passage sádma pârthivam is the same as pârthive sádane in VIII, 97, 5. Here the earth is mentioned together with heaven, the sea, and the sky. Sâyana takes sádma as 'dwelling,' so do Wilson and Langlois. Benfey translates 'der Erde Sitz,' and makes it the subject of the sentence, which may be right: 'From the roaring of the Maruts the seat of the earth trembles, and all men tremble.' Sadman, with the accent on the last syllable, is also used as a masculine in the Rig-veda, I, 173, 1; VI, 51, 12. sadmānam divyām.

Verse 11.

Note 1. I have translated vi/ṇu-pāṇibhiḥ, as if it were vi/ṇupāṇibhiḥ, for this is the right accent of a Bahuvrīhi compound. Thus the first member retains its own accent in prithú-pāni, bhūri-pāni, vṛsha-pāni, &c. It is possible that the accent may have been changed in our passage, because the compound is used, not as an adjective, but as a kind of substantive, as the name of a horse. Pāni, hand, means, as applied to horses, hoof :

II, 31, 2. prithivyāḥ sánau gághananta pāni-bhiḥ.

When they strike with their hoofs on the summit of the earth.

This meaning appears still more clearly in such compounds as dravát-pāni :

VIII, 5, 35. hiranyáyena ráthena dravátpāni-bhiḥ ásvaiḥ.

On a golden chariot, on quick-hoofed horses.

The horses of the Maruts, which in our verse are called vīu-pāni, strong-hoofed, are called VIII, 7, 27. híraya-pāni, golden-hoofed :

ásvaiḥ hírayapāni-bhiḥ dévásaḥ úpa gantana.

On your golden-hoofed horses come hither, O gods.

Those who retain the accent of the MSS. ought to translate, 'Maruts, with your strong hands go after the clouds.'

Note 2. Ródhasvatī is explained by Sâyana as river. It does not occur again in the Rig-veda. Ródhas is enclosure or fence, the bank of a river ; but it does not follow that ródhasvat, having enclosures or banks, was applicable to rivers only. II, 15, 8, it is said that he emptied or opened the artificial enclosures of Bala, these being the clouds conquered by Indra. Hence I take ródhasvatī in the sense of a cloud yet unopened, which is followed or driven on by the Maruts.

Kitrá, bright or many-coloured, is applied to the clouds, V, 63, 3. kitrébhiḥ abhráḥ.

Note 3. Roth and Ludwig take ákhidrayāman for a name of horse, which seems right. The word does not occur again in the Rig-veda.

WILSON: Maruts, with strong hands, come along the beautifully-embanked rivers with unobstructed progress.

BENFEY: Mit euren starken Händen folgt den hehren eingeschlossnen nach in unermüd'tem Gang, Maruts.

Verse 12.

Note 1. Abhîsu, rein, does not mean finger in the Rig-veda, though Sâyana frequently explains it so, misled by Yâska, who gives abhîsu among the names of finger. Wilson: 'May your fingers be well skilled (to hold the reins).'

Verse 13.

Note 1. Agni is frequently invoked together with the Maruts, and is even called marût-sakhâ, the friend of the Maruts, VIII, 92, 14. It seems better, therefore, to refer brâhmanas pátim to Agni, than, with Sâyana, to the host of the Maruts (marúdganam). Brâhmanaspáti and Br̥has-páti are both varieties of Agni, the priest and purohita of gods and men, and as such he is invoked together with the Maruts in other passages, I, 40, 1. Tánâ is an adverb, meaning constantly, always, for ever. Cf. II, 2, 1; VIII, 40, 7.

WILSON: Declare in our presence (priests), with voice attuned to praise Brahmanaspati, Agni, and the beautiful Mitra.

BENFEY: Lass schallen immerfort das Lied zu grüssen Brahmanaspati, Agni, Mitra, den herrlichen.

Note 2. Mitra is never, as far as I know, invoked together with the Maruts, and it is better to take mitráam as friend. Besides ná cannot be left here untranslated. Ludwig translates, 'beautiful like Mitra,' that is, bright like the sun.

Verse 14.

Note 1. The second sentence is obscure. Sâyana translates: 'Let the choir of priests make a hymn of praise, let them utter or expand it, like as a cloud sends forth rain.' Wilson similarly: 'Utter the verse that is in your mouth, spread it out like a cloud spreading rain.' Benfey: 'Ein Preislied schaffe in dem Mund, ertöne dem Parganya gleich.' He takes Parganya for the god of thunder, and supposes the hymn of praise to be compared to it on account of its loudness. Tatanañ can only be the second person singular of the conjunctive of the reduplicated perfect, of which we have also tatánat, tatánâma, tatánan, and tatánanta. Tatana can be addressed either to the host of the Maruts, or to the poet. I take it in the latter sense, for a similar verse occurs VIII, 21, 18. It is said there of a patron that he alone is a king, that all others about the river Sarasvatî are only small kings, and the poet adds: 'May he spread like a cloud with the rain,' giving hundreds and thousands (par-gányah-iva tatánat hí vṛishṭyā). Ludwig takes tan in the sense of thundering; thunder like Parganya!

Verse 15.

Note 1. It is difficult to find an appropriate rendering for arkín. It means praising, celebrating, singing, and it is in the last sense only that it is applicable to the Maruts. Wilson translates, 'entitled to adoration'; Benfey, 'flaming.' Boehtlingk and Roth admit the sense of flaming in one passage, but give to arkín in this place the meaning of praising. If it simply meant, possessed of arká, i. e. songs of praise, it would be a very lame epithet after panasyú. But other passages, like I, 19, 4; 52, 15, show that the conception of the Maruts as singers was most familiar to the Vedic Rishis (I, 64, 10; Kuhn, Zeitschrift, vol. i, p. 521, note); and arká is the very name applied to their songs (I, 19, 4). In the Edda, too, 'storm and thunder are represented as a lay, as the wondrous music of the wild hunt. The dwarfs and Elbs sing the so-called Alb-leich which carries off everything, trees and mountains.' See Justí in Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 62; Genthe, Windgottheiten, p. 4; 11. There is no doubt therefore that arkín here means musician, and that the arká of the Maruts is the music of the winds.

Note 2. Vṛiddhá, literally grown, is used in the Veda as an honorific epithet, with the meaning of mighty, great, or magnified:

III, 32, 7. yágâma it námasâ vṛiddhám índram bṛihántam rishvám agáram yúvânam.

We worship with praise the mighty Indra, the great, the exalted, the immortal, the vigorous.

Here neither is vṛiddhá intended to express old age, nor yúvan young age, but both are meant as laudatory epithets. See Darmesteter, Ormazd et Ahriman, p. 91 seq.

Asan is the so-called Let of as, to be. This Let is properly an imperative, which gradually sinks down to a mere subjunctive, and is generally called so. Of as, we find the following Let forms: belonging to the present, we have ásasi, II, 26, 2; ásati, VI, 23, 9; ásathaḥ, VI, 63, 1; and ásatha, V, 61, 4: belonging to the imperfect, ásaḥ, VIII, 100, 2; ásat, I, 9, 5; ásâma, I, 173, 9; ásan, I, 89, 1. Ásam, a form quoted by Roth from Rig-veda X, 27, 4, is really ásam.

We find, for instance, ásaḥ, with an imperative or optative meaning, in

VIII, 100, 2. ásaḥ ka tvám dakshinatáḥ sákhâ me ádha vritráṇi gaṅghanâva bhûri.

And be thou my friend on my right hand, and we shall kill many enemies.

Here we see the transition of meaning from an imperative to the conditional. In English, too, we may say, 'Do this and you shall live,' which means nearly the same as, 'If you do this, you will live.' Thus we may translate this passage: 'And if thou be my friend on my right side, then we shall kill many enemies.'

X, 124, 1. imám naḥ agne úpa yagñám â ihi—ásaḥ havya-vât utá naḥ purah-gâḥ.

Here we have the imperative ihi and the Let ásaḥ used in the same sense.

Far more frequently, however, ásaḥ is used in relative sentences, such as,

VI, 36, 5. ásaḥ yáthâ naḥ sávasâ kakánâḥ.

That thou mayest be ours, delighting in strength.

VII, 24, 1. ásaḥ yáthâ naḥ avitâ vridhé ka.

That thou mayest be our helper and for our increase.

See also X, 44, 4; 85, 26; 36.

WILSON: May they be exalted by this our worship.

BENFEY: Mögen die Hohen hier bei uns sein.

MANDALA I, HYMN 39.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYĀYA 8, VARGA 18-19.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. When you thus from afar cast forwards your measure¹, like a blast of fire, through whose wisdom is it, through whose design²? To whom do you go, to whom, ye shakers (of the earth)?

2. May your weapons be firm to attack, strong also to withstand. May yours be the more glorious power, nor that of the deceitful mortal.

3. When you overthrow what is firm, O ye men, and whirl about what is heavy, you pass¹ through the trees of the earth, through the clefts of the rocks².

4. No real foe of yours is known in heaven, nor on earth, ye devourers of foes! May power be yours, together with your race¹! O Rudras, can it be defied²?

5. They make the rocks tremble, they tear asunder the kings of the forest¹. Come on, Maruts, like madmen, ye gods, with your whole tribe.

6. You have harnessed the spotted deer to your chariots, a red one draws as leader¹; even the earth listened² at your approach, and men were frightened,

7. O Rudras, we quickly desire your help for our race. Come now to us with help, as of yore; thus now for the sake of the frightened *Kaṇva*¹.

8. Whatever fiend, roused by you or roused by men, attacks us, deprive him of power, of strength, and of your favours¹.

9. For you, chasing and wise Maruts, have wholly protected¹ Kanva. Come to us, Maruts, with your whole favours, as lightnings² (go in quest of) the rain.

10. Bounteous givers, you carry whole strength, whole power, ye shakers (of the world). Send, O Maruts, against the wrathful enemy of the poets an enemy, like an arrow¹.

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Kaṁva, the son of Ghora. The metre varies between Bṛihatī and Satobṛihatī, the odd verses being composed in the former, the even verses in the latter metre. Each couple of such verses is called a Bārḥata Pragātha. The Bṛihatī consists of 8+8+12+8, the Satobṛihatī of 12+8+12+8 syllables. No verse of this hymn occurs in SV., VS., AV.; verse 5=TB. II, 4, 4, 3.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Māna, which I translate by measure, is explained by Sāyana as meaning strength. Wilson: 'When you direct your awful vigour downwards from afar, as light (descends from heaven).' Benfey: 'Wenn ihr aus weiter Ferne so wie Strahlen schleudert euren Stolz (das worauf ihr stolz seid: euren Blitz).' Langlois: 'Lorsque vous lancez votre souffle puissant.' I doubt whether māna is ever used in the Rig-veda in the sense of pride, which no doubt it has, as a masculine, in later Sanskrit: cf. Halāyudha, ed. Aufrecht, iv, 37. Māna, as a masculine, means frequently a poet in the Rig-veda, viz. a measurer, a thinker or maker; as a neuter it means a measure, or what is measured or made. Thus V, 85, 5, we read:

mānena-iva tasthi-vān antárikṣhe ví yáḥ mamé prithivīm sūryena.

He (Varuṇa) who standing in the welkin has measured the earth with the sun, as with a measure.

In this passage, as well as in ours, we must take measure, not in the abstract sense, but as a measuring line, which is cast forward to measure the distance of an object,—a simile, perfectly applicable to the Maruts, who seem with their weapons to strike the trees and mountains when they themselves are still far off. Another explanation might be given, if māna could be taken in the sense of measure, i. e. shape or form, but this is doubtful.

Note 2. Várpas, which has generally been translated by body or form, is here explained by praise. Benfey puts Werk (i.e. Gesang, Gebet); Langlois, maison. Várpas, which, without much reason, has been compared to Latin corpus, must here be taken in a more general sense. Thus VI, 44, 14, asyá máde purú várpāmsi vidvān, is applied to Indra as knowing many schemes, many thoughts, many things, when he is inspired by the Soma-juice; see I, 19, 5.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Benfey takes ví yāthana in a causative sense, you destroy, you cause the trees to go asunder. But even without assigning to yā a causative meaning, to go through, to pierce, would convey the idea of destruction. In some passages, however, vi-yā is certainly used in the simple sense of passing through, without involving the idea of destruction:

VIII, 73, 13. ráthaḥ viyāti ródasi (iti).

Your chariot which passes through or between heaven and earth.

In other passages the mere passing across implies conquest and destruction:

I, 116, 20. vi-bhindúnā . . . ráthena ví párvatān . . . ayātam.

On your dissevering chariot you went across, or, you rent, the mountains (the clouds).

In other passages, however, a causative meaning seems equally, and even more applicable:

VIII, 7, 23. ví vṛitrám parva-sáḥ yayuḥ ví párvatān.

They passed through Vṛitra piecemeal, they passed through the mountains (the clouds); or, they destroyed Vṛitra, cutting him to pieces, they destroyed the clouds.

Likewise I, 86, 10. ví yāta vīsvam atrīnam.

Walk athwart every evil spirit, or destroy every evil spirit! See before, I, 19, 7; 37, 7.

We must scan ví yāthana vanināḥ prīthivyāḥ.

Note 2. It might seem preferable to translate āsāḥ párvatānām by the spaces of the clouds, for párvata means clouds in many places. Yet here, and still more clearly in verse 5, where párvata occurs again, the object of the poet is to show the strength of the Maruts. In that case the mere shaking or bursting of the clouds would sound very tame by the side of the shaking and breaking of the forest trees. Vedic poets do not shrink from the conception that the Maruts shake even mountains, and Indra is even said to have cut off the mountain tops : IV, 19, 4. áva abhinat kakú-bhaḥ párvatânām. In the later literature, too, the same idea occurs : Mahābh. Vana-parva, ver. 10974, dyauḥ svit patati kim bhūmir dīryate parvato nu kim, does the sky fall? is the earth torn asunder, or the mountain?

Verse 4.

Note 1. Sāyana was evidently without an authoritative explanation of tánā yugā. He tries to explain it by 'through the union of you may strength to resist be quickly extended.' Wilson : 'May your collective strength be quickly exerted.' Benfey takes tánā as adverb and leaves out yugā : 'Zu allen Zeiten, O Furchtbare!—sei im Nu zu überwält'gen euch die Macht.' Yugā, an instrumental, if used together with another instrumental, becomes in the Veda a mere preposition : cf. VII, 43, 5; 95, 4. rāyā yugā; X, 83, 3. tápasā yugā; X, 102, 12. vádhriṇā yugā; VII, 32, 20. púram-dhyā yugā; VI, 56, 2. sákhyā yugā; VIII, 68, 9. tvā yugā. As to the meaning of tán, see B. R. s. v., where tán in our passage is explained as continuation. The offspring or race of the Maruts is mentioned again in the next verse.

Note 2. I take nú kit á-dhr̥she as an abrupt interrogative sentence, viz. Can it be defied? Can it be resisted? See V, 87, 2 :

tát vaḥ marutaḥ ná á-dhr̥she sávaḥ.

Your strength, O Maruts, is not to be defied.

Verse 5.

Note 1. Large trees of the forest are called the kings or lords of the forest. Instead of pró ārata, the Taitt. Br. II, 4, 4, 2, reads pró varata, which Sāyana explains by pro, prakarsheṇa, avārata dhāvata.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Práshñi is explained by Sâyana as a sort of yoke in the middle, when three horses or other animals are harnessed to a car; róhita as a kind of red deer. Hence Wilson remarks that the sense may be, 'The red deer yoked between them aids to drag the car.' But he adds that the construction of the original is obscure, and apparently rude and ungrammatical. Benfey translates, 'Sie führt ein flammenrothes Joch,' and remarks against Wilson that Sâyana's definition of práshñi as yoke is right, but that of róhita as deer, wrong. If Sâyana's authority is to be invoked at all, one might appeal from Sâyana in this place to Sâyana VIII, 7, 28, where práshñi is explained by him either by quick or by pramukhe yugyamānaḥ, harnessed in front. The verse is yát eshām prishatīḥ ráthe práshñīḥ váhati róhitaḥ.

When the red leader draws or leads their spotted deer in the chariot.

VI, 47, 24. práshñīḥ is explained as tripada ādhāraḥ; tadvad vahantīti prashñayo=svāḥ. In I, 100, 17, práshñibhiḥ, as applied to men, means friends or supporters, or, as Sâyana explains, pārsvasthair anyair rishibhiḥ.

Ludwig (IV, ad 25, 8) adds some useful information. He quotes from the comm. on Taitt. S. I, 7, 8; vāmadakshinayor asvayor madhya ishādvayam prasārya tayor madhye saptyākhyagātivisheshopetam asvam yuñgyāt. The right horse is said to be the arvā, the left vāgī, the middle saptīḥ. Lātyāyana II, 7, 23, calls the two side-horses prashñi. According to Sâyana (Taitt. S. I, 7, 8, p. 1024) prashñi means originally a tripod for holding a pot (see above), and afterwards a chariot with three horses. In that case we should have to translate, the red chariot moves along.

Note 2. Aufrecht derives asrot from sru, to shake, without necessity, however; see Muir's Sanskrit Texts, IV, p. 494.

Ludwig also remarks that asrot might be translated by the earth trembled or vibrated. Similar passages occur RV. I, 127, 3. vílú kīṭ yásya sám-ritau srúvat vánā-iva yát sthirám, at whose approach even what is firm and strong will shake, like the forests. Roth translates, the earth yielded, got out of your way.

Verse 7.

Note 1. Kaṇva, the author of the hymn.

Verse 8.

Note 1. The abhva, fiend, or, as Benfey translates it very happily, Ungethüm, may have been sent by the Maruts themselves, or by some mortal. With reference to yushmé-shita it is said afterwards that the Maruts are to withdraw their help from him. I have adopted Wilson's and Ludwig's interpretation of vi yuyota, with the instrumental.

Verse 9.

Note 1. The verb dadá is the second pers. plur. of the perfect of dá, and is used here in the sense of to keep, to protect, as is well shown by B. and R. s. v. dá 4, base dad. Śāyana did not understand the word, and took it for an irregular imperative; yet he assigned to the verb the proper sense of to keep, instead of to give. Hence Wilson: 'Uphold the sacrificer Kaṇva.' Benfey, less correctly, 'Den Kaṇva gabt ihr,' as if Kaṇva had been the highest gift of the Maruts.

Note 2. The simile, as lightnings go to the rain, is not very telling. It may have been suggested by the idea that the lightnings run about to find the rain, or the tertium comparationis may simply be the quickness of lightning. Wilson: 'As the lightnings bring the rain.' Benfey: '(So schnell) gleichwie der Blitz zum Regen kömmt.' Lightning precedes the rain, and may therefore be represented as looking about for the rain. Ludwig proposes some bold conjectures. He would change káṇvam to raṇvam, and take the words from asāmibhiḥ to ganta as a parenthesis. He translates: 'For nothing imperfect, you highly to be revered Maruts, no, something delightful you gave—(with perfect aids, Maruts, come to us)—as lightnings give rain.'

Verse 10.

Note 1. Wilson: 'Let loose your anger.' Śāyana: 'Let loose a murderer who hates.'

Pari-manyú, which occurs but once in the Rig-veda, corresponds as nearly as possible to the Greek περίθυμος. Manyú, like θυμός, means courage, spirit, anger; and in the compound parimanyú, as in περίθυμος, the preposition pári seems to strengthen the simple notion of the word. That pári is used in that sense in later Sanskrit is well known; for instance, in parilaghu, perlevis, parikshâma, withered away: see Pott, Etymologische Forschungen, second edition, vol. i, p. 487. How pári, originally meaning round about, came to mean excessive, is difficult to explain with certainty. It may have been, because what surrounds exceeds, but it may also have been because what is done all around a thing is done thoroughly. See Curtius, Grundzüge, fifth edition, p. 274. Thus we find in the Veda, VIII, 75, 9, pári-dveshas, lit. one who hates all around, then a great hater:

mā naḥ . . . pári-dveshasaḥ amhatíḥ, ūrmíḥ ná nāvam ā vadhīt.

May the grasp of the violent hater strike us not, as the wave strikes a ship.

Again, pari-sprídh means literally one who strives round about, then an eager enemy, a rival (fem.):

IX, 53, 1. nudásva yāḥ pari-sprídhah.

Drive away those who are rivals.

Pari-krosá means originally one who shouts at one from every side, who abuses one roundly, then an angry reviler. This word, though not mentioned in B. R.'s Dictionary, occurs in

I, 29, 7. sárvam pari-krosám gahi.

Kill every reviler!

The same idea which is here expressed by pari-krosá, is in other places expressed by pari-ráp, lit. one who shouts round about, who defies on every side, a calumniator, an enemy, one who 'be-rattles.'

II, 23, 3. ā vi-bādhya pari-rápah.

Having struck down the enemies.

II, 23, 14. ví pari-rápah ardaya.

Destroy the enemies.

In the same way as the words meaning to hate, to oppose, to attack, are strengthened by this preposition, which conveys the idea of round about, we also find words expressive of love strengthened by the same preposition. Thus from prítāḥ, loved, we have pári-prītaḥ, lit. loved all round, then loved very much: I, 190, 6. pári-prītaḥ ná mitráḥ; cf. X, 27, 12. We also find IX, 72, 1. pari-prīyaḥ, those who love fully or all around, which may mean great lovers, or surrounding friends.

In all these cases the intensifying power of pári arises from representing the action of the verb as taking place on every side, thoroughly, excessively; but in other cases, mentioned by Professor Pott, particularly where this preposition is joined to a noun which implies some definite limit, its magnifying power is no doubt due to the fact that what is around, is outside, and therefore beyond. Thus in Greek περίμετρος expresses the same idea as ὑπέρμετρος (loc. cit. p. 488), but I doubt whether pári ever occurs in that sense in Sanskrit compounds.

MANDALA I, HYMN 64.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYĀYA 5, VARGA 6-8.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. For the manly host, the joyful, the wise, for the Maruts bring thou, O Nodhas¹, a pure offering². I prepare songs, like as a handy priest³, wise in his mind, prepares the water, mighty at sacrifices.

2. They are born, the tall bulls of Dyū¹ (heaven), the manly youths² of Rudra, the divine, the blameless, pure, and bright like suns; scattering rain-drops, full of terrible designs, like giants³.

3. The youthful Rudras, they who never grow old, the slayers of the demon¹, have grown irresistible like mountains. They throw down with their strength all beings, even the strongest, on earth and in heaven.

4. They deck themselves with glittering ornaments¹ for a marvellous show; on their chests they fastened gold (chains) for beauty²; the spears on their shoulders pound to pieces³; they were born together by themselves⁴, the men of Dyū.

5. They who confer power¹, the roarers², the devourers of foes, they made winds and lightnings by their powers. The shakers milk the heavenly udders (clouds), they sprinkle the earth all round with milk (rain).

6. The bounteous¹ Maruts pour forth² water, mighty at sacrifices, the fat milk (of the clouds). They seem to lead³ about the powerful horse, the cloud, to make it rain; they milk the thundering, unceasing spring⁴.

7. Mighty they are, powerful, of beautiful splendour, strong in themselves¹ like mountains, (yet) swiftly gliding along;—you chew up forests, like wild elephants², when you have assumed your powers among the red flames³.

8. Like lions they roar, the wise Maruts, they are handsome like gazelles¹, the all-knowing. By night² with their spotted deer (rain-clouds) and with their spears (lightnings) they rouse the companions together, they whose ire through strength is like the ire of serpents.

9. You who march in companies, the friends of man, heroes, whose ire through strength is like the ire of serpents¹, salute heaven and earth²! On the seats on your chariots, O Maruts, the lightning stands, visible like light³.

10. All-knowing, surrounded with wealth, endowed with powers, singers¹, men of endless prowess, armed with strong rings², they, the archers, have taken the arrow in their fists.

11. The Maruts who with the golden tires of their wheels increase the rain, stir up the clouds like wanderers on the road. They are brisk, indefatigable¹, they move by themselves; they throw down what is firm, the Maruts with their brilliant spears make (everything) to reel².

12. We invoke with prayer¹ the offspring of Rudra, the brisk, the pure, the worshipful², the active. Cling³ for happiness-sake to the strong company of the Maruts, the chasers of the sky⁴, the powerful, the impetuous⁵.

13. The mortal whom ye, Maruts, protected, he indeed surpasses people in strength through your protection. He carries off booty with his horses, treasures with his men; he acquires honourable¹ wisdom, and he prospers².

14. Give, O Maruts, to our lords strength glorious, invincible in battle, brilliant, wealth-acquiring, praiseworthy, known to all men¹. Let us foster our kith and kin during a hundred winters.

15. Will¹ you then, O Maruts, grant unto us wealth, durable, rich in men, defying all onslaughts²?—wealth a hundred and a thousand-fold, always increasing?—May he who is rich in prayers³ (the host of the Maruts) come early and soon!

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Nodhas, of the family of Gotama. No verse of this hymn occurs in SV., VS., AV.; but verse 6=TS. III, I, 11, 7.

Verse 1.

Note 1. The first line is addressed by the poet to himself.

Note 2. Suvṛikṭi is generally explained by a hymn of praise, and it cannot be denied that in this place, as in most others, that meaning would be quite satisfactory. Etymologically, however, suvṛikṭi means the cleaning and trimming of the grass on which, as on a small altar, the oblation is offered: cf. vṛikṭabarhis, I, 38, 1, note 2, page 84. Hence, although the same word might be metaphorically applied to a carefully trimmed, pure, and holy hymn of praise, yet wherever in the Veda the primary meaning is applicable, it seems safer to retain it: cf. III, 61, 5; VI, 11, 5.

Prof. Roth, in the Mélanges Asiatiques, vii, p. 612, calls the derivation, which he himself discovered, a 'Columbus-Egg.' He derives suvṛikṭi from su + vṛikṭi, and translates it by excellent praise. He supports the insertion of v, by the analogy of su-v-ita, for su-ita. This derivation is certainly very ingenious, but there are some difficulties which have still to be accounted for. That the substantive vṛikṭi does not occur by itself would not be fatal, because other words in the Veda occur as uttarapadas only. But there is the compound námovṛikṭi in X, 131, 2, which shows that vṛikṭi existed as a substantive, though it is true that the Vāgasaneyins (X, 32) read namaukti instead. Taitt. S. I, 8, 21; Taitt. Br. II, 6, 1, 3; and Ath. V. XX, 125, 2, have all namovṛikṭi. There is also the compound svāvṛikṭi in RV. X, 21, 1. Are these to be separated from su-vṛikṭi, and ought we not to take into consideration also the Zend hvarsta, as pointed out by M. Darmesteter (Ormazd,

p. 10, note), meaning well performed, perfect in a liturgical sense?

Note 3. Apás, with the accent on the last syllable, is the accusative plural of ap, water, and it is so explained by Sáyana. He translates: 'I show forth these hymns of praise, like water, i. e. everywhere, as Parganya sends down rain at once in every place.' Benfey explains: 'I make these hymns smooth like water, i. e. so that they run smooth like water.' He compares ῥυθμός, as derived from ῥέω. Ludwig translates: 'Als ein kunstfertiger das werk im geiste, auch geschickt mit der hand mach ich schön die in der opferversammlungen mächtig wirkenden lieder.' I thought formerly that we ought either to change the accent, and read ápaḥ, or the last vowel, and read apāḥ. In the former case the meaning would be, 'As one wise in mind and clever performs his work, so do I compose these hymns.' In the second case we should translate: 'Like a workman, wise in mind and handy, I put together these hymns.'

Still there is one point which has hitherto been overlooked by all translators, namely, that apāḥ vidátheshu ábhúvaḥ, occurring in the first and sixth verses, ought to be taken in the same sense in both passages. Now apāḥ vidátheshu ábhúvaḥ seems to mean water efficacious at sacrifices. In the sixth verse I now translate: 'The bounteous Maruts pour down water, mighty or efficacious at sacrifices, the fat milk (of the clouds).' Hence in the first verse I should now like to translate: 'I prepare my songs, like as a handy priest, wise in his mind, prepares the water mighty or efficacious at sacrifices.' Roth assigns to vidátha a too exclusively political meaning. Vidátha may be an assembly, a public meeting, a witenagemot, or an ἐκκλησία, but public meetings at that time had always a religious character, so that vidátha must often be translated by sacrifice.

Verse 2.

Note 1. It is difficult to say in passages like this, whether Dyu should be taken as heaven or as a personified deity. When the Maruts are called Rudrásya máryāḥ, the boys of Rudra (VII, 56, 1), the personification is always preserved. Hence if the same beings are called Diváh máryáh, this too, I think, should be translated the boys of Dyu (III, 54, 13; V, 59, 6), not the sons of heaven. The bulls of Dyu is a more primitive and more vigorous expression for what we should call the fertilising winds of heaven.

Note 2. Márya is a male, particularly a young male, a young man, a bridegroom (I, 115, 2; III, 33, 10; IV, 20, 5; V, 61, 4, with vira).

The Maruts have grown strong like well-grown manly youths. See also V, 59, 3.

V, 59, 5. máryáh-iva su-vrídhaḥ vavridhuḥ nárah.

The men have grown strong like well-grown stallions.

In some passages it has simply the meaning of man :

I, 91, 13. máryáh-iva své okyě.

Like a man in his own house.

Note 3. The simile, like giants, is not quite clear. Sátvan means a strong man, but it seems intended here to convey the idea of supernatural strength. Benfey translates, 'like brave warriors;' Wilson, 'like evil spirits.' Ghorávarpas is an adjective belonging to the Maruts rather than to the giants, and may mean of awful aspect, I, 19, 5, or of cruel mind; cf. I, 39, 1, note 2.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Abhog-ghánaḥ, the slayers of the demon, are the slayers of the clouds, viz. of such clouds as do not yield rain. Abhog, not nurturing, seems to be a name of the rainless cloud, like Námuḥi (na-muḥ, not delivering rain), the name of another demon, killed by Indra; see Benfey, Glossar, s. v. The cloud which sends rain is called bhugmán :

VIII, 50, 2. girlḥ ná bhugmāḥ maghávāt-su pinvate.

Like a feeding cloud he showers his gifts on the worshippers.

Verse 4.

Note 1. The ornaments of the Maruts are best described V, 54, 11 :

āmseshu vah rishtāyah pat-sú khādāyah vākshah-su rukmāh.

On your shoulders are the spears, on your feet rings, on your chests gold ornaments. See also I, 166, 10, &c.

Rukmā as a masc. plur. is frequently used for ornaments which are worn on the breast by the Maruts. The Maruts are actually called rukmāvākshasaḥ, gold-breasted (II, 34, 2; V, 55, 1; 57, 5). In the Āsval. Srauta-sūtra IX, 4, rukma is mentioned as an ornament to be given to the Hotri priest; it is said to be round.

Note 2. Vāpushe and subhé, as parallel expressions, occur also VI, 63, 6. Cf. Delbrück, K. Z. xviii, 96.

Note 3. Ni mimrikshur does not occur again in the Rig-veda, and Roth has suggested to read ni mimikshur instead; see ni + marg. He does not, however, give our passage under myak, but under mraksh, and this seems indeed preferable. No doubt, there is ample analogy for mimikshuh, and the meaning would be, their spears stick firm to their shoulders. But as the MSS. give mimrikshuh, and as it is possible to find a meaning for this, I do not propose to alter the text. The question is only, what does mimrikshuh mean? Mraksh means to grind, to rub, and Roth proposes to render our passage by 'the spears rub together on our shoulders.' The objections to this translation are the preposition ni, and the active voice of the verb. I take mraksh in the sense of grinding, pounding, destroying, which is likewise appropriate to mraksha-kṛtvān (VIII, 61, 10), and tuvi-mrakshā (VI, 18, 2), and I translate, 'the spears on their shoulders pound to pieces.'

Note 4. The idea that the Maruts owe everything, if not their birth, at least their strength (svā-tavasaḥ, svā-bhānavah, sva-sṛtaḥ), to themselves is of frequent occurrence in these hymns. See verse 7, note 1.

Verse 5.

Note 1. They are themselves compared to kings (I, 85, 8), and called isānā, lords (I, 87, 4).

Note 2. Dhūni is connected with root dhvan, to dun or to din. Sāyana explains it by bending or shaking, and Benfey, too, translates it by Erschütterer. Roth gives the right meaning.

Verse 6.

Note 1. I translate sudānavaḥ by bounteous, or good givers, for, if we have to choose between the two meanings of bounteous or endowed with liquid drops or dew, the former is the more appropriate in most passages. We might, of course, admit two words, one meaning, possessed of good water, the other, bounteous; the former derived from dānu, neuter, water, or rain, the other from dānú, giving. It cannot be denied, for instance, that whenever the Maruts are called sudānavaḥ, the meaning, possessed of good rain, would be applicable: I, 40, 1; 44, 14; 64, 6; 85, 10; II, 34, 8; III, 26, 5; V, 52, 5; 53, 6; 57, 5; VIII, 20, 18; X, 78, 5; I, 15, 2; 23, 9; 39, 10. Yet, even in these passages, while sudānavaḥ in the sense of possessed of good rain is possible throughout, that of good giver would sometimes be preferable, for instance, I, 15, 2, as compared with I, 15, 3. Though sudānu, in the sense of possessed of good water, sounds as strange as would suvrishṭi in the sense of possessed of good rain, or sumegha, possessed of good clouds, yet it is difficult to separate sudānavaḥ and gīrádānavaḥ, both epithets of the Maruts.

When the same word is applied to Indra, VII, 31, 2; X, 23, 6; to Vishṇu, VIII, 25, 12; to the Asvins, I, 112, 11; to Mitra and Varuṇa, V, 62, 9; to Indra and Varuṇa, IV, 41, 8, the meaning of giver of good rain might still seem natural. But with Agni, VI, 2, 4; the Ādityas, V, 67, 4; VIII, 18, 12; 19, 34; 67, 16; the Vasus, I, 106, 1; X, 66, 12; the Viśve, X, 65, 11, such an epithet would not be appropriate, while sudānavaḥ, in the sense of bounteous givers, is applicable to all. The objection that dānu, giver, does not occur in the Veda, is of no force, for many words occur at the end of compounds only, and we shall see passages where sudānu must be translated by good giver. Nor would the accent of dānú, giver, be an obstacle, considering that the author of the Unādi-sūtras had no Vedic authority to guide him in the determination of the accent of dānú. Several words in nu have the accent on the first syllable. But one might go even a step further, and find a more appropriate meaning for sudānu by identifying it with the Zend hudānu, which means, not a good giver, but a good knower, wise. True, this root dā, to know, does not occur in the ordinary Sanskrit; and Hübschmann (Ein Zoroastrisches Lied, 1872, p. 48) tries to prove that the root dā, to know, does not exist in Zend either. But even thus we might have the derivation in Sanskrit and Zend, while the root was kept alive in Greek only (δάημι, δαίς). This, however, is only a conjecture; what is certain is this, that apart from the passages where sudānu is thus applied to various deities, in the sense of bounteous or wise, it also occurs as applied to the sacrificer, where it can only mean giver. This is clear from the following passages:

I, 47, 8. su-kr̥te su-dānave.

To him who acts well and gives well.

VII, 96, 4. gani-yántaḥ nú ágravaḥ putri-yántaḥ su-dāna-vaḥ, sárasvantam havāmahe.

We, being unmarried, and wishing for wives and wishing for sons, offering sacrifices, call now upon Sarasvat.

VIII, 103, 7. su-dānavaḥ deva-yávaḥ.

Offering sacrifices, and longing for the gods. Cf. X, 172, 2; 3; VI, 16, 8.

IV, 4, 7. sáḥ ít agne astu su-bhágaḥ su-dānuḥ yáḥ tvā nītyena havíṣhā yáḥ ukthaḥ píprīshati.

O Agni, let the liberal sacrificer be happy, who wishes to please thee by perpetual offerings and hymns. See also VI, 16, 8; 68, 5; X, 172, 2, 3.

It must be confessed that even the meaning of dānu is by no means quite clear. It is clear enough where it means demon, II, 11, 18; 12, 11; IV, 30, 7; X, 120, 6, the seven demons. In I, 32, 9; III, 30, 8, dānu, demon, is applied to the mother of Vṛtra, the dark cloud. From this dānu we have the derivative dānavá, meaning again demon. Why the demons, conquered by Indra, were called dānu, is not clear, unless they were conceived originally as dark clouds, like Dānu, the mother of Indra. Dānu might mean wise, or even powerful, for this meaning also is ascribed to dānu by the author of the Unādi-sūtras. If the latter meaning is authentic, and not only deduced ex post from the name of Dānu and Dānava, it might throw light on the Celtic dána, fortis, from which Zeuss derives the name of the Danube.

Sometimes dānu, as a neuter, is explained as Soma :

X, 43, 7. āpaḥ ná sīndhum abhī yāt sam-áksharan sómāsaḥ
īndram kulyāḥ-iva hradām, vārdhanti víprāḥ máhaḥ asya sádane yávam ná vṛishṭíḥ divyéna dānunā.

When the Somas run together to Indra, like water to the river, like channels to the lake, then the priests increase his greatness in the sanctuary, as rain the corn, by the heavenly Soma-juice, or by heavenly moisture.

In the next verse gīrádānu is explained as the sacrificer whose Soma is always alive, always ready.

In VI, 50, 13, however, dānu pápriḥ is doubtful. As an epithet to Apām nápāt, it may mean he who wishes for Soma, or he who grants Soma ; but in neither case is there any tangible sense, unless Soma is taken as a name of the fertilising rain or dew. Again, VIII, 25, 5, Mitra and Varuṇa are called sriprá-dānū, which may mean possessed of flowing rain. And in the next verse, sám yā dānūni yemáthuḥ may be rendered by Mitra and Varuṇa, who brought together rain.

The fact that Mitra-Varuṇau and the Asvins are called dānunaspatī does not throw much more light on the subject, and the one passage where dānu occurs as a feminine, I, 54, 7, dānuḥ asmai úparā pivate diváḥ, may be translated by rain pours forth for him, below the sky, but the translation is by no means certain.

Dānuḥitra, applied to the dawn, the water of the clouds, and the three worlds (V, 59, 8 ; 31, 6 ; I, 174, 7), means most likely bright with dew or rain ; and dānumat vásu, the treasure conquered by Indra from the clouds, can be translated by the treasure of rain. Taking all the evidence together, we can hardly doubt that dānu existed in the sense of liquid, rain, dew, and also Soma ; yet it is equally certain that dānu existed in the sense of giver, if not of gift, and that from this, in certain passages, at all events, sudānu must be derived, as a synonym of sudāvan, sudāman, &c.

Spiegel admits two words dānu in the Veda and Avesta, the one meaning enemy, the other river. Darmesteter (Ormazd, p. 220) takes dānu as a cloud, water, or river. Ludwig translates sudānu by possessed of excellent gifts.

Note 2. I thought formerly that pinvanti was here construed with two accusatives, in the sense of 'they fill the water (with) fat milk.'

Cf. VI, 63, 8. dhenúm naḥ ísham pinvatam ásakrām.

You filled our cow (with) constant food.

Similarly duh, to milk, to extract, is construed with two accusatives : Pāṇ. I, 4, 51. gām dogdhi payaḥ, he milks the cow milk.

RV. IX, 107, 5. duhánáḥ ūdhaḥ divyám mádhu priyám.

Milking the heavenly udder (and extracting from it) the precious sweet, i. e. the rain.

But I now prefer to translate pínvanti apáḥ by they pour out water, and I take páyaḥ ghrítavat as a description of the water, namely, the fat milk of the clouds. After that parenthesis, vidátheshu ábhúvaḥ is again an epithet of apáḥ, as it was in the first verse.

Note 3. The leading about of the clouds is intended, like the leading about of horses, to tame them, and make them obedient to the wishes of their riders, the Maruts. Átyaḥ vâgī is a strong horse, possibly a stallion; but this horse is here meant to signify the clouds. Thus we read :

V, 83, 6. diváḥ naḥ vrishṭīm marutaḥ raridhvam prá pinvata vrishnaḥ ásvasya dhārāḥ.

Give us, O Maruts, the rain of heaven, pour forth the streams of the stallion (the cloud).

In the original the simile is quite clear, and no one required to be told that the átyaḥ vâgī was meant for the cloud. Vâgín by itself means a horse, as I, 66, 2; 69, 3. vâgī ná prítáḥ, like a favourite horse; I, 116, 6. paidváḥ vâgī, the horse of Pedu. But being derived from vâga, strength, vâgín retained always something of its etymological meaning, and was therefore easily and naturally transferred to the cloud, the giver of strength, the source of food. Even without the ná, i. e. as if, the simile would have been understood in Sanskrit, while in English it is hardly intelligible without a commentary. Benfey discovers some additional idea in support of the poet's comparison: 'Ich bin kein Pferdekennner,' he says, 'aber ich glaube bemerkt zu haben, dass man Pferde, welche rasch gelaufen sind, zum Uriniren zu bewegen sucht. So lassen hier die Maruts die durch ihren Sturm rasch fortgetriebenen Wolken Wasser herab strömen.'

Note 4. Útsa, well, is meant again for cloud, though we should hardly be justified in classing it as a name of cloud, because the original meaning of útsa, spring, is really retained, as much as that of avatá, well, in I, 85, 10-11. The adjectives stanáyantam and ákshitam seem more applicable to cloud, yet they may be applied also to a spring. Yáska derives utsa from ut-sar, to go forth; ut-sad, to go out; ut-syand, to well out; or from ud, to wet. In V, 32, 2, the wells shut up by the seasons are identified with the udder of the cloud.

Verse 7.

Note 1. Svátavas means really having their own independent strength, a strength not derived from the support of others. The yet which I have added in brackets seems to have been in the poet's mind, though it is not expressed. In I, 87, 4, the Maruts are called sva-srít, going by themselves, i. e. moving freely, independently, wherever they list. See I, 64, 4, note 4.

Note 2. Mrigāh hastínah, wild animals with a hand or a trunk, must be meant for elephants, although it has been doubted whether the poets of the Veda were acquainted with that animal. Hastín is the received name for elephant in the later Sanskrit, and it is hardly applicable to any other animal. If they are said to eat the forests, this may be understood in the sense of crushing or chewing, as well as of eating.

Note 3. The chief difficulty of the last sentence has been pointed out in B. and R.'s Dictionary, s. v. āruṇi. Āruṇi does not occur again in the whole of the Rig-veda. If we take it with Sáyana as a various reading of aruṇi, then the Arūṇīs could only be the ruddy cows of the dawn or of Indra, with whom the Maruts, in this passage, can have no concern. Nor would it be intelligible why they should be called āruṇī in this one place only. If, as suggested by B. and R., the original text had been yadā aruṇīshu, it would be difficult to understand how so simple a reading could have been corrupted.

Another difficulty is the verb áyugdhvam, which is not found again in the Ríg-veda together with távishī. Távishī, vigour, is construed with dhâ, to take strength, V, 32, 2. adhatthâh; V, 55, 2. dadhidhve; X, 102, 8. adhâtta; also with vas, IV, 16, 14; with pat, X, 113, 5, &c. But it is not likely that to put vigour into the cows could be expressed in Sanskrit by 'you join vigour in the cows.' If távishī must be taken in the sense which it seems always to possess, viz. vigour, it would be least objectionable to translate, 'when you joined vigour, i. e. when you assumed vigour, while being among the Āruṇīs.' The Āruṇīs being the cows of the dawn, āruṇīshu might simply mean in the morning. Considering, however, that the Maruts are said to eat up forests, āruṇī, in this place, is best taken in the sense of red flames, viz. of fire or forest-fire (dāvāgni), so that the sense would be, 'When you, Storms, assume vigour among the flames, you eat up forests, like elephants.' Benfey: 'Wenn mit den rothen eure Kraft ihr angeschirrt. Die rothen sind die Antilopen, das Vehikel der Maruts, wegen der Schnelligkeit derselben.'

Verse 8.

Note 1. As píśā does not occur again in the Ríg-veda, and as Sáyana, without attempting any etymological arguments, simply gives it as a name of deer, it seems best to adopt that sense till something better can be discovered. Supís, too, does not occur again. In VII, 18, 2, píś is explained by gold, &c.; VII, 57, 3, the Maruts are called visvapís.

Note 2. Kshápaḥ can only be the accusative plural, used in a temporal sense. It is so used in the expression kshápaḥ usráḥ ka, by night and by day, lit. nights and days (VII, 15, 8). In VI, 52, 15, we find kshápaḥ usráḥ in the same sense.

IV, 53, 7. kshapābhiḥ āha-bhiḥ, by night and by day. I, 44, 8, the loc. plur. vyúshṭishu, in the mornings, is followed by kshāpaḥ, the acc. plur., by night, and here the genitive kshapāḥ would certainly be preferable, in the sense of at the brightening up of the night. The acc. plur. occurs again in I, 116, 4, where tisráḥ is used as an accusative (II, 2, 2; VIII, 41, 3). Kshapāḥ, with the accent on the last, must be taken as a genitivus temporalis, like the German Nachts (I, 79, 6). In VIII, 19, 31. kshapāḥ vástushu means at the brightening up of the night, i. e. in the morning. Thus, in III, 50, 4, Indra is called kshapām vastā ganitā sūryasya, the lighter up of nights, the parent of the sun. In VIII, 26, 3, āti kshapāḥ, the genitive may be governed by āti. In IV, 16, 19, however, the accusative kshāpaḥ would be more natural, nor do I see how a genitive could here be accounted for:

dyāvaḥ ná dyumnāḥ abhi sántaḥ aryāḥ kshapāḥ madema sarādaḥ ka pūrvīḥ.

May we rejoice many years, overcoming our enemies as the days overcome the nights by splendour.

The same applies to I, 70, 4, where kshapāḥ occurs with the accent on the last syllable, whereas we expect kshāpaḥ as nom. or acc. plural. Here B. and R. in the Sanskrit Dictionary, s. v. kshap, rightly, I believe, suppose it to be a nom. plur. in spite of the accent.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Āhimanyu comes very near to Angra-mainyu; cf. Darmesteter, Ormazd, p. 94.

Note 2. Ródasī, a dual, though frequently followed by ubhé (I, 10, 8; 33, 9; 54, 2), means heaven and earth, excluding the antáriksha or the air between the two. Hence, if this is to be included, it has to be added: I, 73, 8. āpatri-vān ródasī antáriksham. Cf. V, 85, 3. We must scan ródasī. See Kuhn, Beiträge, vol. iv, p. 193. Should rodasī stand for rodasīm, as elsewhere? She is certainly intended by what follows in the next line.

Note 3. The comparison is not quite distinct. Amāti means originally impetus, then power, e. g. V, 69, 1:

vavṛidhānāu amátim kshatríyasya.

Increasing the might of the warrior.

But it is most frequently used of the effulgence of the sun, (III, 38, 8; V, 45, 2; 62, 5; VII, 38, 1; 2; 45, 3.) See also V, 56, 8, where the same companion of the Maruts is called Rodasī. The comparative particle ná is used twice.

Verse 10.

Note 1. See I, 38, 14, p. 95.

Note 2. In vṛśha-khādi the meaning of khādi is by no means clear. Sāyana evidently guesses, and proposes two meanings, weapon or food. In several passages where khādi occurs, it seems to be an ornament rather than a weapon, yet if derived from khad, to bite, it may originally have signified some kind of weapon. Roth translates it by ring, and it is certain that these khādis were to be seen not only on the arms and shoulders, but likewise on the feet of the Maruts. There is a famous weapon in India, the ṭakra or quoit, a ring with sharp edges, which is thrown from a great distance with fatal effect. Bollensen (Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 46) suggests for vṛśhan the meaning of hole in the ear, and then translates the compound as having earrings in the hole of the ear. But vṛśhan does not mean the hole in the lap of the ear, nor has vṛśhabhá that meaning either in the Veda or elsewhere. Wilson gives for vṛśhabha, not for vṛśhan, the meaning of orifice of the ear, but this is very different from the hole in the lap of the ear. Benfey suggests that the khādis were made of the teeth of wild animals, and hence their name of biters. Vṛśhan conveys the meaning of strong, though possibly with the implied idea of rain-producing, fertilising. See p. 138. In RV. V, 87, 1, Osthoff translates sukhādāye by jucunde praeibenti, Benfey by schönverzehrendem; Muir, Sanskrit Texts, IV, 70, has the right rendering. Cf. note to I, 166, 9.

Verse 11.

Note 1. Formerly explained as 'zum Kampfe wandelnd.' See Kuhn, Zeitschrift, vol. iv, p. 19.

Note 2. WILSON: Augmenters of rain, they drive, with golden wheels, the clouds asunder; as elephants (in a herd, break down the trees in their way). They are honoured with sacrifices, visitants of the hall of offering, spontaneous assailers (of their foes), subverters of what are stable, immovable themselves, and wearers of shining weapons.

BENFEY: Weghemmnissen gleich schleudern die Fluthmehrer mit den goldnen Felgen das Gewölk empor, die nie müden Kämpfer, frei schreitend-festesstürzenden, die schweres thu'nden, lanzenstrahlenden Maruts.

Verse 12.

Note 1. Havásá, instead of what one should expect, hávasá, occurs but once more in another Marut hymn, VI, 66, 11.

Note 2. Vanín does not occur again as an epithet of the Maruts. It is explained by Sâyana as a possessive adjective derived from vana, water, and Benfey accordingly translates it by fluthversehn. This, however, is not confirmed by any authoritative passages. Vanín, unless it means connected with the forest, a tree, in which sense it occurs frequently, is only applied to the worshippers or priests in the sense of venerating or adoring (cf. venero, venustus, &c.):

III, 40, 7. abhí dyumnāni vanínah índram sakante ákshitā.

The inexhaustible treasures of the worshipper go towards Indra.

VIII, 3, 5. índram vanínah havāmahe.

We, the worshippers, call Indra.

Unless it can be proved by independent evidence that vanín means possessed of water, we must restrict vanín to its two meanings, of which the only one here applicable, though weak, is adoring. The Maruts are frequently represented as singers and priests, yet the epithets here applied to them stand much in need of some definite explanation, as the poet could hardly have meant to string a number of vague and ill-connected epithets together. If one might conjecture, svānínam instead of vanínam would be an improvement. It is a scarce word, and occurs but once more in the Veda, III, 26, 5, where it is used of the Maruts, in the sense of noisy, turbulent.

Note 3. Saskata, which I have here translated literally by to cling, is often used in the sense of following or revering (colere):

II, 1, 13. tvām rāti-sākaḥ adhvarēshu saskire.

The gods who are fond of offerings cling to thee, follow thee, at the sacrifices.

The Soma libation is said to reach the god :

II, 22, 1. sāḥ enam saskat devāḥ devām. The gods too are said to cling to their worshippers, i. e. to love and protect them : III, 16, 2 ; VII, 18, 25. The horses are said to follow their drivers : VI, 36, 3 ; VII, 90, 3, &c. It is used very much like the Greek ἀπείλω.

Note 4. Ragastūḥ may mean rousing the dust of the earth, a very appropriate epithet of the Maruts. Sāyana explains it thus, and most translators have adopted his explanation. But as the epithets here are not simply descriptive, but laudatory, it seems preferable, in this place, to retain the usual meaning of rāgas, sky. When Soma is called ragastūḥ, IX, 108, 7, Sāyana too explains it by tegasām prerakam, and IX, 48, 4, by udakasya prerakam.

Note 5. Rigīshín, derived from rigīsha. Rigīsha is what remains of the Soma-plant after it has once been squeezed, and what is used again for the third libation. Now as the Maruts are invoked at the third libation, they were called rigīshín, as drinking at their later libation the juice made of the rigīsha. This, at least, is the opinion of the Indian commentators. But it is much more likely that the Maruts were invoked at the third libation, because originally they had been called rigīshín by the Vedic poets, this rigīshín being derived from rigīsha, and rigīsha from rig, to strive, to yearn, like purīsha from prī, manīshā from man ; (see Unādi-sūtras, p. 273.) This rig is the same root which we have in ῥέγειν, to reach, ῥογή, emotion, and ῥογία, furious transports of worshippers. Thus the Maruts from being called rigīshín, impetuous, came to be taken for drinkers of rigīsha, the fermenting and overflowing Soma, and were assigned accordingly to the third libation at sacrifices.

Rigishín, as an epithet, is not confined to the Maruts; it is given to Indra, with whom it could not have had a purely ceremonial meaning (VIII, 76, 5).

Verse 13.

Note 1. Âprikkhya, literally, to be asked for, to be inquired for, to be greeted and honoured. A word of an apparently modern character, but occurring again in the Rig-veda as applied to a prince, and to the vessel containing the Soma.

Note 2. Púshyati might be joined with krátu and taken in a transitive sense, he increases his strength. But púshyati is also used as an intransitive, and means he prospers :

I, 83, 3. ásam-yatah vraté te ksheti púshyati.

Without let he dwells in thy service and prospers.

Roth reads asamyattah, against the authority of the MSS.

Verse 14.

Note 1. The difficulty of this verse arises from the uncertainty whether the epithets dhanasprítam, ukthyām, and visvákarshanim belong to súshma, strength, or to toká, kith and kin. Roth and Benfey connect them with toká. Now dhanasprít is applicable to toká, yet it never occurs joined with toká again, while it is used with súshma, VI, 19, 8. Ukthyā, literally, to be praised with hymns, is not used again as an epithet of toká, though it is quite appropriate to any gift of the gods. Lastly, visvákarshani is never applied to toká, while it is an epithet used, if not exactly of the strength, súshma, given by the gods, yet of the fame given by them :

X, 93, 10. dhátam víréshu visvá-karshani srávah.

Give to these men world-wide glory. Cf. III, 2, 15.

The next difficulty is the exact meaning of visvá-karshani, and such cognate words as visvá-krishñi, visvá-manusha. The only intelligible meaning I can suggest for these words is, known to all men; originally, belonging to, reaching to all men; as we say, world-wide or European fame, meaning by it fame extending over the whole of Europe, or over the whole world. If Indra, Agni, and the Maruts are called by these names, they mean, as far as I can judge, known, worshipped by all men. Benfey translates allverständig.

Verse 15.

NOTE 1. Riti, the first element of riti-sāham, never occurs by itself in the Rig-veda. It comes from the root ar, to hurt, which was mentioned before (p. 65) in connection with ār-van, hurting, ārus, wound, and āri, enemy. Sām-riti occurs I, 32, 6. Riti therefore means hurting, and riti-sāh means one who can stand an attack. In our passage rayīm virā-vantam riti-sāham means really wealth consisting in men who are able to withstand all onslaughts.

The word is used in a similar sense, VI, 14, 4 :

agnih apsam riti-sāham viram dadāti sāt-patim, yasya trāsanti sāvasaḥ sam-kākshi sāt-ravaḥ bhiyā.

Agni gives a strong son who is able to withstand all onslaughts, from fear of whose strength the enemies tremble when they see him.

In other passages riti-sāh is applied to Indra :

VIII, 45, 35. bibhāya hī tvā-vataḥ ugrāt abhi-prabhaṅgī-naḥ dasmāt ahām riti-sāhaḥ.

For I stand in fear of a powerful man like thee, of one who crushes his enemies, who is strong and withstands all onslaughts.

VIII, 68, 1. tuvi-kūrmīm riti-sāham indra sāvishtha sāt-pate.

Thee, O most powerful Indra, of mighty strength, able to withstand all onslaughts.

VIII, 88, 1. tām vaḥ dasmām riti-sāham—īndram gih-bhīḥ navāmahe.

We call Indra the strong, the resisting, with our songs.

NOTE 2. The last sentence finishes six of the hymns ascribed to Nodhas. It is more appropriate in a hymn addressed to single deities, such as Agni or Indra, than in a hymn to the Maruts. We must supply sardha, in order to get a collective word in the masculine singular.

Nū, as usual, should be scanned nū.

NOTE 3. Dhiyā-vasu, as an epithet of the gods, means rich in prayers, i. e. invoked by many worshippers. It does not occur frequently. Besides the hymns of Nodhas, it only occurs independently in I, 3, 10 (Śarasvatī), III, 3, 2, III, 28, 1 (Agni), these hymns being all ascribed to the family of Visvāmitra. In the last verse, which forms the burden of the hymns of Nodhas, it may have been intended to mean, he who is rich through the hymn just recited, or he who rejoices in the hymn, the god to whom it is addressed.

Nodhas, the poet, belongs, according to the Anukramanī, to the family of Gotama, and in the hymns which are ascribed to him, I, 58-64, the Gotamas are mentioned several times :

I, 60, 5. tām tvā vayām pátim agne rayinām prá samsāmaḥ matī-bhiḥ gótamāsaḥ.

We, the Gotamas, praise thee with hymns, Agni, the lord of treasures.

I, 61, 16. evā te hāri-yogana su-vṛiktī indra brāhmāṇi gótamāsaḥ akran.

Truly the Gotamas made holy prayers for thee, O Indra with brilliant horses! See also I, 63, 9.

In one passage Nodhas himself is called Gotama :

I, 62, 13. sanā-yaté gótamaḥ indra nāvyaṃ átakshat brāhma hari-yóganāya, su-nīthāya naḥ savasāna nodhāḥ—prātāḥ makshú dhiyā-vasuḥ gagamyāt.

Gotama made a new song for the old (god) with brilliant horses, O Indra! May Nodhas be a good leader to us, O powerful Indra! May he who is rich in prayers (Indra) come early and soon!

I feel justified therefore in following the Anukramanī and taking Nodhas as a proper name. It occurs so again in

I, 61, 14. sadyāḥ bhuvat vīryāya nodhāḥ.

May Nodhas quickly attain to power!

In I, 124, 4. nodhāḥ-iva may mean like Nodhas, but more likely it has the general meaning of poet.

MANDALA I, HYMN 85.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYĀYA 6, VARGA 9-10.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Those who glance forth like wives and yoke-fellows¹, the powerful sons of Rudra on their way, they, the Maruts, have indeed made heaven and earth to grow²; they, the strong and wild, delight in the sacrifices.

2. When grown up¹, they attained to greatness; the Rudras have established their seat in the sky. While singing their song and increasing their vigour, the sons of Prisni have clothed themselves in beauty².

3. When these sons of the cow (Prisni)¹ adorn themselves with glittering ornaments, the brilliant² ones put bright weapons on their bodies³. They drive away every adversary⁴; fatness (rain) streams along their paths;—

4. When you¹, the powerful, who shine with your spears, shaking even what is unshakable by strength,—when you, O Maruts, the manly hosts², had yoked the spotted deer, swift as thought, to your chariots;—

5. When you had yoked the spotted deer before your chariots, hurling¹ the stone (thunderbolt) in the fight, then the streams of the red-(horse)² rush forth: like a skin³ with water they water the earth.

6. May the swiftly-gliding, swift-winged horses carry you hither! Come forth with your arms¹! Sit down on the grass-pile; a wide seat has been made for you. Rejoice, O Maruts, in the sweet food².

7. Strong in themselves, they grew¹ with might; they stepped to the firmament, they made their seat wide. When Vishṇu² saved the enrapturing Soma, the Maruts sat down like birds on their beloved altar.

8. Like¹ heroes indeed thirsting for fight they rush about; like combatants eager for glory they have striven in battles. All beings are afraid of the Maruts; they are men terrible to behold, like kings.

9. When the clever Tvashṭar¹ had turned the well-made, golden, thousand-edged thunderbolt, Indra takes it to perform his manly deeds²; he slew Vṛitra, he forced out the stream of water.

10. By their power they pushed the well¹ aloft, they clove asunder the rock (cloud), however strong. Blowing forth their voice² the bounteous Maruts performed, while drunk of Soma, their glorious deeds.

11. They pushed the well (cloud) athwart this way, they poured out the spring to the thirsty Gotama. The Maruts with beautiful splendour approach him with help, they in their own ways satisfied the desire of the sage.

12. The shelters which you have for him who praises you, grant them threefold¹ to the man who gives! Extend the same to us, O Maruts! Give us, ye heroes², wealth with valiant offspring!

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Gotama. No verse of this hymn occurs in SV., VS.; verse 6=AV. XX, 13, 2; verse 7=TS. IV, 1, 11, 3; verse 12=TS. I, 5, 11, 5; TB. II, 8, 5, 6.

Verse 1.

Note 1. The phrase gánayaḥ ná sáptayaḥ is obscure. As gáni has always the meaning of wife, and sápti in the singular, dual, and plural means horse, it might be supposed that gánayaḥ could be connected with sáptayaḥ, so as to signify mares. But although gáni is coupled with patnī, I, 62, 10, in the sense of mother-wife, and though sápti is most commonly joined with some other name for horse, yet gánayaḥ sáptayaḥ never occurs, for the simple reason that it would be too elaborate and almost absurd an expression for vaḍavāḥ. We find sápti joined with vāgīn, I, 162, 1; with ráthya, II, 31, 7; átyam ná sáptim, III, 22, 1; sáptī hárī, III, 35, 2; ásvā sáptī-iva, VI, 59, 3.

We might then suppose the thought of the poet to have been this: What appears before us like race-horses, viz. the storms coursing through the sky, that is really the host of the Maruts. But then gánayaḥ remains unexplained, and it is impossible to take gánayaḥ ná sáptayaḥ as two similes, like unto horses, like unto wives.

I believe, therefore, that we must here take sápti in its original etymological sense, which would be ju-mentum, a yoked animal, a beast of draught, or rather a follower, a horse that will follow. Sápti, therefore, could never be a wild horse, but always a tamed horse, a horse that will go in harness. Cf. IX, 21, 4. hitāḥ ná sáptayaḥ ráthe, like horses put to the chariot; or in the singular, IX, 70, 10. hitāḥ ná sáptiḥ, like a harnessed horse. The root is sap, which in the Veda means to follow, to attend on, to worship. But if sápti means originally animals that will go together, it may in our passage have retained the sense of yoke-fellow (σύνυγος), and be intended as an adjective to gánayaḥ, wives. There is at least one other passage where this meaning would seem to be more appropriate, viz.

VIII, 20, 23. yûyám sakhâyaḥ saptayaḥ.

You (Maruts), friends and followers! or you, friends and comrades!

Here it is hardly possible to assign to sápti the sense of horse, for the Maruts, though likened to horses, are never thus barely invoked as saptayaḥ!

If then we translate, 'Those who glance forth like wives and yoke-fellows,' i.e. like wives of the same husband, the question still recurs how the simile holds good, and how the Maruts rushing forth together in all their beauty can be compared to wives. In answer to this we have to bear in mind that the idea of many wives belonging to one husband (sapatnī) is familiar to the Vedic poet, and that their impetuously rushing into the arms of their husbands, and appearing before them in all their beauty, are frequent images in their poetry. In such phrases as pátim ná gánayaḥ and gánayaḥ ná gárbbham, the ganis, the wives or mothers, are represented as running together after their husbands or children. This impetuous approach the poet may have wished to allude to in our passage also, but though it might have been understood at once by his hearers, it is almost impossible to convey this implied idea in any other language.

Wilson translates: 'The Maruts, who are going forth, decorate themselves like females: they are gliders (through the air), the sons of Rudra, and the doers of good works, by which they promote the welfare of earth and heaven. Heroes, who grind (the solid rocks), they delight in sacrifices.'

Ludwig translates: 'Die ganz besonders sich schmücken wie frauen, die renner, zu ihrem zuge,' &c. This is possible, yet the simile sounds somewhat forced.

Note 2. The meaning of this phrase, which occurs very frequently, was originally that the storms by driving away the dark clouds, made the earth and the sky to appear larger and wider. It afterwards takes a more general sense of increasing, strengthening, blessing.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Ukshita is here a participle of vaksh or uksh, to grow, to wax; not of uksh, to sprinkle, to anoint, to inaugurate, as explained by Sāyana. Thus it is said of the Maruts, V, 55, 3. sākām gātāh—sākām ukshitāh, born together, and grown up together.

Note 2. The same expression occurs VIII, 28, 5. saptó (iti) ādhi srīyaḥ dhire. See also I, 116, 17; IX, 68, 1.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Gó-mātri, like gó-gāta, a name of the Maruts, who are also called prīṣni-mātaraḥ, sīndhu-mātaraḥ.

Note 2. Subhrā is applied to the Maruts, I, 19, 5. Otherwise, no doubt, it might refer, as Ludwig remarks, to virúk-mataḥ, always supposing that virúkmat is a feminine. Whether tanúshu subhrāḥ can stand for tanúshu subhrāsu is more doubtful.

Note 3. Virúk-mataḥ must be an accusative plural. It occurs I, 127, 3, as an epithet of ógas; VI, 49, 5, as an epithet of the chariot of the Asvins. In our place, however, it must be taken as a substantive, signifying something which the Maruts wear, probably armour or weapons. This follows chiefly from X, 138, 4. sátrūn asrināt virúkmatā, Indra tore his enemies with the bright weapon. In VIII, 20, 11, where rukmā occurs as a masculine plural, ví bhrāgante rukmāsaḥ ādhi bāhúshu, their bright things shine on their arms, it seems likewise to be meant for weapons; according to Sāyana, for chains. In V, 55, 3; X, 78, 3, the Maruts are called vi-rokīnaḥ, bright like the rays of the sun or the tongues of fire.

Note 4. Observe the short syllable in the tenth syllable of this Pāda; Benfey, Védica, p. 124; Lanman, Noun-Inflection, pp. 378, 543.

Verse 4.

Note 1. The sudden transition from the third to the second person is not unusual in the Vedic hymns, the fact being that where we in a relative sentence should use the same person as that of the principal verb, the Vedic poets frequently use the third.

Note 2. Vṛsha-vrāta is untranslatable for reasons stated p. 138 seq.; it means consisting of companies of vṛśhans, in whatever sense that word be taken. Wilson in his translation mistakes ákyutā for ákyutāḥ, and vrāta for vrata. He translates the former by 'incapable of being overthrown,' the latter by 'entrusted with the duty of sending rain,' both against the authority of Sāyana. Vṛsha-vrāta occurs twice in the Rig-veda as an epithet of Soma only, IX, 62, 11; 64, 1.

Verse 5.

Note 1. If we take ádri for cloud, then ramh might have the meaning of stirring up.

V, 32, 2. tvám útsán rítú-bhiḥ badbadhânñ áramhaḥ.

Thou madest the springs to run that had been shut up by the seasons.

VIII, 19, 6. tásya ít árvantaḥ ramhayante áśávaḥ.

His horses only run quick.

But ádri often means stone, in the sense of weapon, or bolt (cf. adrivaḥ, voc., wielder of the thunderbolt), and ramhayati would then have the meaning of hurling. This is the meaning adopted by Benfey and Ludwig.

Note 2. The red may be the dark red cloud, but arushá has almost become a proper name, and its original meaning of redness is forgotten. Nay, it is possible that arushá, as applied to the same power of darkness which is best known by the names of Vṛitra, Dasyu, &c., may never have had the sense of redness, but been formed straight from ar, to hurt, from which arvan, arus, &c. (see p. 65 seq.). It would then mean simply the hurter, the enemy. It is possible also to take arushá in the sense of the red horse, the leader between the two Haris, when we ought to remember that the Maruts pour forth the streams of the stallion, RV. V, 83, 6. prá pinvata vṛśhnaḥ ásvasya dhāráḥ, and that they lead about the horse to make it rain, RV. I, 64, 6. átyam ná mihé ví nayanti vâgínam.

Note 3. Sāyana explains: 'They moisten the whole earth like a hide,' a hide representing a small surface which is watered without great effort. Wilson: 'They moisten the earth, like a hide, with water.' Langlois: 'Alors les gouttes d'eau, perçant comme la peau de ce (nuage) bien-faisant viennent inonder la terre.' Benfey: 'Dann stürzen reichlich aus der rothen (Gewitterwolke) Tropfen, mit Fluth wie eine Haut die Erde netzend. (Dass die Erde so durchnässt wird, wie durchgeregnetes Leder.)' If the poet had intended to compare the earth, before it is moistened by rain, to a hide, he might have had in his mind the dryness of a tanned skin, or, as Professor Benfey says, of leather. If, on the contrary, the simile refers to the streams of water, then kārma-iva, like a skin, might either be taken in the technical acceptation of the skin through which, at the preparation of the Soma, the streams (dhârâh) of that beverage are squeezed and distilled, or we may take the word in the more general sense of water-skin. In that case the comparison, though not very pointedly expressed, as it would have been by later Sanskrit poets, would still be complete. The streams of the red-(horse), i. e. of the cloud, rush forth, and they, whether the streams liberated by the Maruts, or the Maruts themselves, moisten the earth with water, like a skin, i. e. like a skin in which water is kept and from which it is poured out. The cloud itself being called a skin by Vedic poets (I, 129, 3) makes the comparison still more natural.

One other explanation might suggest itself, if the singular of kārma should be considered objectionable on account of the plural of the verb. Vedic poets speak of the skin of the earth. Thus:

X, 68, 4. bhūmyâh udnâ-iva ví tvákam bibheda.

He (Br̥haspati) having driven the cows from the cave, cut the skin of the earth, as it were, with water, i. e. saturated it with rain.

The construction, however, if we took kārma in the sense of surface, would be very irregular, and we should have to translate: They moisten the earth with water like a skin, i. e. skin-deep.

We ought to scan kārmēvōdābhīḥ vī ūdāntī bhūmā, for kārmēvā ūdābhīḥ vyūdāntī bhūmā would give an unusual cæsure.

Verse 8.

Note 1. AV. XX, 13, 2. With your arms, i. e. according to Sāyana, with armfuls of gifts. Though this expression does not occur again so baldly, we read I, 166, 10, of the Maruts, that there are many gifts in their strong arms, bhūrīni bhadraṁ nāryeshu bāhūshu; nor does bāhū, as used in the plural, as far as I am able to judge, ever convey any meaning but that of arms. The idea that the Maruts are carried along by their arms as by wings, does not rest on Vedic authority, otherwise we might join raghupátvānaḥ with bāhūbhiḥ, come forth swiftly flying on your arms! As it is, and with the accent on the antepenultimate, we must refer raghupátvānaḥ to sáptayaḥ, horses.

Note 2. The sweet food is Soma.

Verse 7.

Note 1. The initial 'a' of avardhanta must be elided, or 'té a' be pronounced as two short syllables equal to one long.

Note 2. Taitt. S. IV, 1, 11, 3. Vishṇu, whose character in the hymns of the Veda is very different from that assumed by him in later periods of Hindu religion, must here be taken as the friend and companion of Indra. Like the Maruts, he assisted Indra in his battle against Vṛitra and the conquest of the clouds. When Indra was forsaken by all the gods, Vishṇu came to his help.

IV, 18, 11. utā mātā mahishám ānu avenat amī (īti) tvā gahati putra devāḥ, ātha abravīt vṛitrām índraḥ hanishyān sákhe vishṇo (īti) vi-tarám ví kramasva.

The mother also called after the bull, these gods forsake thee, O son; then, when going to kill Vṛitra, Indra said, Friend, Vishṇu, step forward!

This stepping of Vishṇu is emblematic of the rising, the culminating, and setting of the sun; and in VIII, 12, 27, Vishṇu is said to perform it through the power of Indra. In VI, 20, 2, Indra is said to have killed Vṛitra, assisted by Vishṇu (vishṇunā saśānāḥ). Vishṇu is therefore invoked together with Indra, VI, 69, 8; VII, 99; with the Maruts, V, 87; VII, 36, 9. In VII, 93, 8, Indra, Vishṇu, and the Maruts are called upon together. Nay, māruta, belonging to the Maruts, becomes actually an epithet of Vishṇu, V, 46, 2. māruta utā vishṇo (īti); and in I, 156, 4. mārutasya vedhāsaḥ has been pointed out by Roth as an appellation of Vishṇu. The mention of Vishṇu in our hymn is therefore by no means exceptional, but the whole purport of this verse is nevertheless very doubtful, chiefly owing to the fact that several of the words occurring in it lend themselves to different interpretations.

The translations of Wilson, Benfey, and others have not rendered the sense which the poet intends to describe at all clear. Wilson says: 'May they for whom Vishṇu defends (the sacrifice), that bestows all desires and confers delight, come (quickly) like birds, and sit down upon the pleasant and sacred grass.' Benfey: 'Wenn Vishṇu schützt den rauschtriefenden tropfenden (Soma), sitzen wie Vögel sie auf der geliebten Streu.' Langlois: 'Quand Vichnou vient prendre sa part de nos enivrantes libations, eux, comme des oiseaux, arrivent aussi sur le couda qui leur est cher.' Ludwig: 'Als Vishṇu half dem zum rauschtrank eilenden stiere, setzten sie sich wie vögel aufs liebe barhis.'

Whence all these varieties? First, because āvat may mean, he defended or protected, but likewise, it is supposed, he descried, became aware. Secondly, because vṛtshan is one of the most vague and hence most difficult words in the Veda, and may mean Indra, Soma, or the cloud: (see the note on Vṛtshan, p. 138.) Thirdly, because the adjective belonging to vṛtshan, which generally helps us to determine which vṛtshan is meant, is here itself of doubtful import, and certainly applicable to Indra as well as to Soma and the Asvins, possibly even to the cloud. Mada-kyút is readily explained by the commentators as bringing down pride, a meaning which the word might well have in modern Sanskrit, but which it clearly has not in the Veda. Even where the thunderbolt of Indra is called madaḥyút, and where the meaning of 'bringing down pride' would seem most appropriate, we ought to translate 'wildly rushing down.'

VIII, 96, 5. ā yát vágram bāhvóḥ indra dhátse mada-ḥyútam áhaye hántaváḥ ūm (íti).

When thou tookest the wildly rushing thunderbolt in thy arms in order to slay Ahi.

When applied to the gods, the meaning of madaḥyút is by no means certain. It might mean rushing about fiercely, reeling with delight, this delight being produced by the Soma, but it may also mean sending down delight, i. e. rain or Soma. The root kyu is particularly applicable to the sending down of rain; cf. Taitt. Samh. II, 4, 9, 2; 10, 3; III, 3, 4, 1; and Indra and his horses, to whom this epithet is chiefly applied, are frequently asked to send down rain. However, madaḥyút is also applied to real horses (I, 126, 4) where givers of rain would be an inappropriate epithet. I should therefore translate madaḥyút, when applied to Indra, to his horses, to the Asvins, or to horses in general by furiously or wildly moving about, as if 'made or madena kyavate,' he moves in a state of delight, or in a state of intoxication, such as was not incompatible with the character of the ancient gods. Here again the difficulty of rendering Vedic thought in English, or any other modern language, becomes apparent, for we have no poetical word to express a high state of mental excitement produced by drinking the intoxicating juice of the Soma or other plants, which has not something opprobrious mixed up with it, while in ancient times that state of excitement was celebrated as a blessing of the gods, as not unworthy of the gods themselves, nay, as a state in which both the warrior and the poet would perform their highest achievements. The German Rausch is the nearest approach to the Sanskrit mada.

VIII, 1, 21. vśveshām tarutāram mada-ḥyútam máde hí sma dádāti naḥ.

Indra, the conqueror of all, who rushes about in rapture, for in rapture he bestows gifts upon us. Cf. I, 51, 2.

The horses of Indra are called mada-kyút, I, 81, 3; VIII, 33, 18; 34, 9. Ordinary horses, I, 126, 4.

It is more surprising to see this epithet applied to the Asvins, who are generally represented as moving about with exemplary steadiness. However we read:

VIII, 22, 16. mánaḥ-gavasā vrishanā mada-kyutā.

Ye two Asvins, quick as thought, powerful, wildly moving; or, as Sâyana proposes, liberal givers, humblers of your enemies. See also VIII, 35, 19.

Most frequently mada-kyút is applied to Soma, X, 30, 9; IX, 32, 1; 53, 4; 79, 2; 108, 11; where particularly the last passage deserves attention, in which Soma is called mada-kyútam saḥśra-dhâram vrishabhâm.

Lastly, even the wealth itself which the Maruts are asked to send down from heaven, most likely rain, is called, VIII, 7, 13, rayīm mada-kyútam puru-kshúm visvá-dhâyasam.

In all these passages we must translate mada-kyút by bringing delight, showering down delight.

We have thus arrived at the conclusion that vrishanam mada-kyútam, as used in our passage I, 85, 7, might be meant either for Indra or for Soma. If the Asvins can be called vrishanau mada-kyutā, the same expression would be even more applicable to Indra. On the other hand, if Soma is called vrishabhāḥ mada-kyút, the same Soma may legitimately be called vrishā mada-kyút. In deciding whether Indra or Soma be meant, we must now have recourse to other hymns, in which the relations of the Maruts with Vishnu, Soma, and Indra are alluded to.

If Indra were intended, and if the first words meant 'When Vishnu perceived the approach of Indra,' we should expect, not that the Maruts sat down on the sacrificial pile, but that they rushed to the battle. The idea that the Maruts come to the sacrifice, like birds, is common enough:

VIII, 20, 10. vrishanasvéna marutaḥ vrishā-psunā ráthena vrishā-nābhinā, ā syenāsaḥ ná pakshínāḥ vrithā naraḥ havyā naḥ vítāye gata.

Come ye Maruts together, to eat our offerings, on your strong-horsed, strong-shaped, strong-naved chariot, like winged hawks!

But when the Maruts thus come to a sacrifice it is to participate in it, and particularly in the Soma that is offered by the sacrificer. This Soma, it is said in other hymns, was prepared by Vishṇu for Indra (II, 22, 1), and Vishṇu is said to have brought the Soma for Indra (X, 113, 2). If we keep these and similar passages in mind, and consider that in the preceding verse the Maruts have been invited to sit down on the sacrificial pile and to rejoice in the sweet food, we shall see that the same train of thought is carried on in our verse, the only new idea being that the saving or, possibly, the descrying of the Soma is ascribed to Vishṇu. See, however, Bergaigne, Journ. Asiat. 1884, p. 472.

Verse 8.

Note 1. On na and iva together, see Bollensen, Orient und Occident, II, 470.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Tvā́shṭar, the workman of the gods, frequently also the fashioner and creator.

Note 2. Nári, the loc. sing. of nri, but, if so, with a wrong accent, occurs only in this phrase as used here, and as repeated in VIII, 96, 19. nári ápāmsi kártā sáh vṛitra-hā. Its meaning is not clear. It can hardly mean 'on man,' without some more definite application. If nri could be used as a name of Vṛitra or any other enemy, it would mean, to do his deeds against the man, on the enemy. Nri, however, is ordinarily an honorific term, chiefly applied to Indra, IV, 25, 4. náre náryāya nri-tamáya nṛinām, and hence its application to Vṛitra would be objectionable. Sáyana explains it in the sense of battle. I believe that nári stands for náryá, the acc. plur. neut. of nárya, manly, and the frequent epithet of ápas, and I have translated accordingly. Indra is called nárya-apas, VIII, 93, 1. See also Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xxv, p. 601.

Verse 10.

Note 1. Avatá, a well, here meant for cloud, like útsa, I, 64, 6.

Note 2. Dhámantaḥ vānám is translated by Sâyana as playing on the lyre, by Benfey as blowing the flute. Such a rendering, particularly the latter, would be very appropriate, but there is no authority for vānā meaning either lyre or flute in the Veda. Vānā occurs five times only. In one passage, VIII, 20, 8. góbhiḥ vānāḥ agyate, it means arrow; the arrow is sent forth from the bow-strings. The same meaning seems applicable to IX, 50, 1. vānāsya kodaya pavīm. In another passage, IX, 97, 8. prá vadanti vānám, they send forth their voice, is applied to the Maruts, as in our passage; in IV, 24, 9, the sense is doubtful, but here too vānā clearly does not mean a musical instrument. See III, 30, 10. Spiegel compares the Huzvareh and Armenian vāng (Pers. bānig), voice. M. Senart (Journal Asiatique, 1874, p. 281) is in favour of taking vāna for flute.

Verse 12.

Note 1. In the Taitt. S. I, 5, 11, we have sasamānāya, and in the Taitt. Br. II, 8, 5, 6, samsamānāya, but Sâyana explains sasamānāya, samsanam kurvate. He explains tridhâtûni by asanam, pānam, khâdanam.

Vrīshan.

Note 2. In vrīshan we have one of those words which it is almost impossible to translate accurately. It occurs over and over again in the Vedic hymns, and if we once know the various ideas which it either expresses or implies, we have little difficulty in understanding its import in a vague and general way, though we look in vain for corresponding terms in any modern language. In the Veda, and in ancient languages generally, one and the same word is frequently made to do service for many. Words retain their general meaning, though at the same time they are evidently used with a definite purpose. This is not only a peculiar phase of language, but a peculiar phase of thought, and as to us this phase has become strange and unreal, it is very difficult to transport ourselves back into it, still more to translate the pregnant terms of the Vedic poets into the definite languages which we have to use. Let us imagine a state of thought and speech in which virtus still meant manliness, though it might also be applied to the virtue of a woman ; or let us try to speak and think a language which expressed the bright and the divine, the brilliant and the beautiful, the straight and the right, the bull and the hero, the shepherd and the king by the same terms, and we shall see how difficult it would be to translate such terms without losing either the key-note that was still sounding, or the harmonics which were set vibrating by it in the minds of the poets and their listeners.

I. Vṛiṣhan, male.

Vṛiṣhan, being derived from a root vrish, spargere, meant no doubt originally the male, whether applied to animals or men. In this sense vrīṣhan occurs frequently in the Veda, either as determining the sex of the animal which is mentioned, or as standing by itself and meaning the male. In either case, however, it implies the idea of strength and eminence, which we lose whether we translate it by man or male.

Thus ásva is horse, but VII, 69, 1, we read :

ā vām ráthak—vrīṣha-bhiḥ yātu ásvaiḥ.

May your chariot come near with powerful horses, i. e. with stallions.

The Háris, the horses of Indra, are frequently called vrīṣhanā :

I, 177, 1. yuktvā hárī (iti) vrīṣhanā.

Having yoked the bay stallions.

Vṛishabhá, though itself originally meaning the male animal, had become fixed as the name of the bull, and in this process it had lost so much of its etymological import that the Vedic poet did not hesitate to define vrīshabhá itself by the addition of vrīṣhan. Thus we find :

VIII, 93, 7. sák vrīṣhā vrīshabhák bhuvat.

May he (Indra) be a strong bull.

I, 54, 2. vrīṣhā vrīṣha-tvā vrīshabhák.

Indra by his strength a strong bull ; but, literally, Indra by his manliness a male bull.

Even vrīshabhá loses again its definite meaning ; and as bull in bull-calf means simply male, or in bull-trout, large, so vrishabhá is added to átya, horse, to convey the meaning of large or powerful :

I, 177, 2. yé te vrīṣhanāḥ vrishabhāsaḥ indra—átyāḥ.

Thy strong and powerful horses ; literally, thy male bull-horses.

When vrīṣhan and vrishabhá are used as adjectives, for instance with súshma, strength, they hardly differ in meaning :

VI, 19, 8. ā naḥ bhara vrīṣhanam súshmam indra.

Bring us thy manly strength, O Indra.

And in the next verse :

VI, 19, 9. ā te súshmaḥ vrishabhāḥ etu.

May thy manly strength come near.

Vámsaga, too, which is clearly the name for bull, is defined by vrīṣhan, I, 7, 8 :

vrīṣhā yúthā-iva vámsagaḥ.

As the strong bull scares the herds.

The same applies to varāha, which, though by itself meaning boar, is determined again by vrīṣhan :

X, 67, 7. vrīṣha-bhiḥ varāhaiḥ.

With strong boars.

In III, 2, 11, we read :

vrīṣhā—nānadat ná simhāḥ.

Like a roaring lion.

If used by itself, vrīṣhan, at least in the Rig-veda, can hardly be said to be the name of any special animal, though in later Sanskrit it may mean bull or horse. Thus if we read, X, 43, 8, vrīṣhā ná kruddhāḥ, we can only translate like an angry male, though, no doubt, like a wild bull, would seem more appropriate.

I, 186, 5. yéna nāpātam apām guṇāma manāḥ-gúvaḥ vrīṣhanāḥ yám váhanti.

That we may excite the son of the water (Agni), whom the males, quick as thought, carry along.

Here the males are no doubt the horses or stallions of Agni. But, though this follows from the context, it would be wrong to say that vrīṣhan by itself means horse.

If used by itself, vr̥ṣhan most frequently means man, and chiefly in his sexual character. Thus :

I, 140, 6. vr̥ṣhā-iva pátñih abhī eti rōruvat.

Agni comes roaring like a husband to his wives.

I, 179, 1. ápi ūm (liti) nú pátñih vr̥ṣhanah gagamyuh.

Will the husbands now come to their wives?

II, 16, 8. sakrīt sú te sumatī-bhih—sám pátñibhih ná vr̥ṣhanah nasímahi.

May we for once cling firmly to thy blessings, as husbands cling to their wives.

V, 47, 6. upa-prakshé vr̥ṣhanah módamânâh diváh pathā vadhvāh yanti ákkha.

The exulting men come for the embrace on the path of heaven towards their wives.

In one or two passages vr̥ṣhan would seem to have a still more definite meaning, particularly in the formula sūrah dr̥śike vr̥ṣhanah ka paúmsye, which occurs IV, 41, 6; X, 92, 7. See also I, 179, 1.

In all the passages which we have hitherto examined vr̥ṣhan clearly retained its etymological meaning, though even then it was not always possible to translate it by male.

The same meaning has been retained in other languages in which this word can be traced. Thus, in Zend, arshan (the later gushan) is used to express the sex of animals in such expressions as aspahé arshnô, gen. a male horse; varāzahe arshnô, gen. a male boar; géus arshnô, gen. a male ox; but likewise in the sense of man or hero, as arsha husrava, the hero Husrava. In Greek we find ἀρσην and ἀρρῆν used in the same way to distinguish the sex of animals, as ἀρσενες ἵπποι, βοῦν ἀρσενα. In Latin the same word may be recognised in the proper name Varro, and in vâro and bâro.

We now come to another class of passages in which vr̥ṣhan is clearly intended to express more than merely the masculine gender. In some of them the etymological meaning of spargere, to pour forth, seems to come out again, and it is well known that Indian commentators are very fond of explaining vr̥ṣhan by giver of rain, giver of good gifts, bounteous. The first of these meanings may indeed be admitted in certain passages, but in others it is more than doubtful.

II. Vṛśhan, fertilising.

I, 181, 8. vṛśhā vām meghāḥ may be translated, your raining cloud.

I, 129, 3. dasmāḥ hī sma vṛśhanam pīnvasi tvākam.

Thou art strong, thou fillest the rainy skin, i. e. the cloud.

See also IV, 22, 6; and possibly V, 83, 6.

It may be that, when applied to Soma too, vṛśhan retained something of its etymological meaning, that it meant gushing forth, poured out, though in many places it is impossible to render vṛśhan, as applied to Soma, by anything but strong. All we can admit is that vṛśhan, if translated by strong, means also strengthening and invigorating, an idea not entirely absent even in our expression, a strong drink.

III. Vṛśhan, strong.

I, 80, 2. sāḥ tvā amadat vṛśhā madaḥ, sómah—sutāḥ.

This strong draught inspirited thee, the poured out Soma-juice.

I, 91, 2. tvām vṛśhā vṛsha-tvébhiḥ.

Thou, Soma, art strong by strength.

I, 175, 1. vṛśhā te vṛśhne induh vāgī sahasra-sātamaḥ.

For thee, the strong one, there is strong drink, powerful, omnipotent.

In the ninth Mandala, specially dedicated to the praises of Soma, the inspiriting beverage of gods and men, the repetition of vṛśhan, as applied to the juice and to the god who drinks it, is constant. Indo vṛśhā or vṛśhā indo are incessant invocations, and become at last perfectly meaningless.

IV. Vṛśhan, epitheton ornans.

There can be no doubt, in fact, that already in the hymns of the Veda, vṛśhan had dwindled away to a mere epitheton ornans, and that in order to understand it correctly, we must, as much as possible, forget its etymological colouring, and render it by hero or strong. Indra, Agni, the Asvins, Vishnu, the R̥ibhus (IV, 35, 6), all are vr̥tshan, which means no longer male, but manly, strong.

In the following passages vr̥tshan is thus applied to Indra :

I, 54, 2. yák dhr̥ishnúnā sávasā ródasí (íti) ubhé (íti) vr̥tshā vr̥tsha-tvā vr̥tshabhāh ni-r̥iṅgáte.

(Praise Indra) who by his daring strength conquers both heaven and earth, a bull, strong in strength.

I, 100, 1. sák yák vr̥tshā vr̥tshnye bhih sám-okāh mahāh divāh pr̥ithivyāh ka sam-r̥āt satínā-satvá hávyah bháreshu marútvān nah bhavatu índrah ūtī.

He who is strong, wedded to strength, who is the king of the great sky and the earth, of mighty might, to be invoked in battles,—may Indra with the Maruts come to our help!

I, 16, 1. ā tvā vahantu hárayah vr̥tshanam sóma-pítaye, índra tvā sūra-kakshasah.

May the bays bring thee hither, the strong one, to the Soma-draught, may the sunny-eyed horses (bring) thee, O Indra!

IV, 16, 20. evā ít índrāya vr̥tshabhāya vr̥tshne bráhma akarma bhr̥t̥gavah ná rátham.

Thus we have made a hymn for Indra, the strong bull, as the Bhr̥igus make a chariot.

X, 153, 2. tvām vr̥tshan vr̥tshā ít asi.

Thou, O hero, art indeed a hero; and not, Thou, O male, art indeed a male; still less, Thou, O bull, art indeed a bull.

I, 101, 1. avasyávaḥ vr̥tshanam vágra-dakshinam marút-vantam sakhyāya havāmahe.

Longing for help we call as our friend the hero who wields the thunderbolt, who is accompanied by the Maruts.

VIII, 6, 14. ní sushne indra dharmasīm vágram gaghantha dásyavi, vr̥tshā hí ugra sr̥invishé.

Thou, O Indra, hast struck the strong thunderbolt against Sushna, the fiend; for, terrible one, thou art called hero!

VIII, 6, 40. vavridhánah úpa dyávi vr̥tshā vagrī aroravít vr̥itra-hā soma-pātamah.

Growing up by day, the hero with the thunderbolt has roared, the Vṛitra-killer, the great Soma-drinker.

V, 35, 4. vṛīshā hí ási rādhase gagñishé vṛīshni te sávak.

Thou (Indra) art a hero, thou wast born to be bounteous ; in thee, the hero, there is might.

V. Vārshishtā, strongest, best, oldest.

It is curious to watch the last stage of the meaning of vṛīshan in the comparative and superlative vārshiyas and vārshishtā. In the Veda, vārshishtā still means excellent, but in later Sanskrit it is considered as the superlative of vṛiddha, old, so that we see vṛīshan, from meaning originally manly, vigorous, young, assuming in the end the meaning of old. (M. M., Sanskrit Grammar, § 252.)

Yet even thus, when vṛīshan means simply strong or hero, its sexual sense is not always forgotten, and it breaks out, for instance, in such passages as,

I, 32, 7. vṛīshnah vādhriḥ prati-mānam búbhūshan puru-trā vṛitrāḥ asayat ví-astak.

Vṛitra, the eunuch, trying to be like unto a man (like unto Indra), was lying, broken to many pieces.

The next passages show vṛīshan as applied to Agni :

III, 27, 15. vṛīshanam tvā vayám vṛīshan vṛīshanah sám idhimahi.

O, strong one, let us the strong ones kindle thee, the strong !

V, 1, 12. ávoḥāma kaváye médhyāya vátak vandāru vṛīshabhāya vṛīshne.

We have spoken an adoring speech for the worshipful poet, for the strong bull (Agni).

Vishnu is called vṛīshan, I, 154, 3 :

prá víshnave sūshám etu mánma giri-kshíte uru-gâyāya vṛīshne.

May this hymn go forth to Vishnu, he who dwells in the mountain (cloud), who strides wide, the hero !

Rudra is called vṛīshan :

II, 34, 2. rudráḥ yát vak marutak rukma-vakshasak vṛīshā ágani prīsnýak sukré ūdhani.

When Rudra, the strong man, begat you, O Maruts with bright ornaments on your chests, in the bright lap of Prisni.

That the Maruts, the sons of Rudra, are called vr̥ṣhan, we have seen before, and shall see frequently again (I, 165, 1; II, 33, 13; VII, 56, 20; 21; 58, 6). The whole company of the Maruts is called vr̥ṣhā gaṇāḥ, the strong or manly host, i. e. the host of the Maruts, without any further qualification.

VI. Vr̥ṣhan, name of various deities.

Here lies, indeed, the chief difficulty which is raised by the common use of vr̥ṣhan in the Veda, that when it occurs by itself, it often remains doubtful who is meant by it, Indra, or Soma, or the Maruts, or some other deity. We shall examine a few of these passages, and first some where vr̥ṣhan refers to Indra :

IV, 30, 10. āpa ushāḥ ānasaḥ sarat sám-pishāt āha mibhyúshī, ní yāt sīm sīmáthat vr̥ṣhā.

Ushas went away from her broken chariot, fearing lest the hero should do her violence.

Here vr̥ṣhan is clearly meant for Indra, who, as we learn from the preceding verse, was trying to conquer Ushas, as Apollo did Daphne; and it should be observed that the word itself, by which Indra is here designated, is particularly appropriate to the circumstances.

I, 103, 6. bhūri-karmane vr̥ṣhabhāya vr̥ṣhne satyá-sushmāya sunavāma sómam, yáḥ ā-dr̥ṣtya paripanthī-iva sūrah áyagvanah vi-bhāgan éti védah.

Let us pour out the Soma for the strong bull, the performer of many exploits, whose strength is true, the hero who, watching like a footpad, comes to us dividing the wealth of the infidel.

Here it is clear again from the context that Indra only can be meant.

But in other passages this is more doubtful :

III, 61, 7. ritásya budhné ushásām ishanyán vr̥ṣhā mahī (īti) ródasī (īti) ā vivesa.

The hero in the depth of the heaven, yearning for the dawns, has entered the great sky and the earth.

The hero who yearns for the dawns, is generally Indra; here, however, considering that Agni is mentioned in the preceding verse, it is more likely that this god, as the light of the morning, may have been meant by the poet. That Agni, too, may be called vr̥ṣhan, without any other epithet to show that he is meant rather than any other god, is clear from such passages as,

VI, 3, 7. vr̥ṣhā ruksháh óshadhīshu nūnot.

He the wild hero shouted among the plants.

In VII, 60, 9, vr̥ṣhanau, the dual, is meant for Mitra and Varuna; in the next verse, vr̥ṣhanah, the plural, must mean the same gods and their companions.

That Soma is called simply vr̥ṣhan, not only in the ninth Mandala, but elsewhere, too, we see from such passages as,

III, 43, 7. īndra p̥ība vr̥ṣha-dhūtasya vr̥ṣnah (ā yām te syenáh usatē gabhāra), yāsya mādē kyaváyasi prā krishāh yāsya mādē āpa gotrā vavārtha.

Indra drink of the male (the strong Soma), bruised by the males (the heavy stones), inspirited by whom thou makest the people fall down, inspirited by whom thou hast opened the stables.

Here Sâyana, too, sees rightly that 'the male bruised by the males' is the Soma-plant, which, in order to yield the intoxicating juice, has to be bruised by stones, which stones are again likened to two males. But unless the words, enclosed in brackets, had stood in the text, words which clearly point to Soma, I doubt whether Sâyana would have so readily admitted the definite meaning of vr̥ṣhan as Soma.

I, 109, 3. mā k̥hedma rasmīn iti n̥dhamānāh pitr̥nām saktīh anu-yākkhamānāh, indrāgnī-bhyām kām vr̥ṣhanah madanti tā hī ādrī (īti) dhishānāyāh upā-sthe.

We pray, let us not break the cords (which, by means of the sacrifices offered by each generation of our forefathers, unite us with the gods); we strive after the powers of our fathers. The Somas rejoice for Indra and Agni; for the two stones are in the lap of the vessel.

First, as to the construction, the fact that participles are thus used as finite verbs, and particularly when the subject changes in the next sentence, is proved by other passages, such as II, 11, 4. The sense is that the new generation does not break the sacrificial succession, but offers Soma, like their fathers. The Soma-plants are ready, and, when pressed by two stones, their juice flows into the Soma-vessel. There may be a double entendre in dhishānāyāh upā-sthe, which Sanskrit scholars will easily perceive.

When vrīshan is thus used by itself, we must be chiefly guided by the adjectives or other indications before we determine on the most plausible translation. Thus we read :

I, 55, 4. sáh ít váne namasyú-bhih vakasyate káru gáneshu pra-bruvānāh indriyām, vrīshā khānduh bhavati haryatāh vrīshā kshémēna dhénām maghá-vā yát ínvati.

In the first verse the subject may be Indra or Soma : 'He alone is praised by worshippers in the forest (or in the wooden vessel), he who shows forth among men his fair power.' But who is meant to be the subject of the next verse? Even Sāyana is doubtful. He translates first : 'The bounteous excites the man who wishes to sacrifice; when the sacrificer, the rich, by the protection of Indra, stirs up his voice.' But he allows an optional translation for the last sentences : 'when the powerful male, Indra, by his enduring mind reaches the praise offered by the sacrificer.'

According to these suggestions, WILSON translated : He (Indra) is the granter of their wishes (to those who solicit him); he is the encourager of those who desire to worship (him), when the wealthy offerer of oblations, enjoying his protection, recites his praise.

BENFEY : The bull becomes friendly, the bull becomes desirable, when the sacrificer kindly advances praise.

LANGLOIS : When the noble Maghavan receives the homage of our hymns, his heart is flattered, and he responds to the wishes of his servant by his gifts.

As far as I know, the adjective khāndu does not occur again, and can therefore give us no hint. But haryatā, which is applied to vrīshan in our verse, is the standing epithet of Soma. It means delicious, and occurs very frequently in the ninth Mandala. It is likewise applied to Agni, Pūshan, the Haris, the thunderbolt, but wherever it occurs our first thought is of Soma. Thus, without quoting from the Soma-Mandala, we read, X, 96, 1, haryatám mādām, the delicious draught, i. e. Soma.

X, 96, 9. pítvā mādasya haryatāsyā āndhasaḥ, means having drunk of the draught of the delicious Soma.

VIII, 72, 18. padām haryatāsyā ni-dhānyām, means the place where the delicious Soma resides.

III, 44, 1. haryatāḥ sōmaḥ.

Delicious Soma.

II, 21, 1. bhara īndrāya sōmam yagatāya haryatām.

Bring delicious Soma for the holy Indra.

I, 130, 2. mādāya haryatāya te tuvíḥ-tamāya dhāyase.

That thou mayest drink the delicious and most powerful draught, i. e. the Soma.

If, then, we know that vr̥ṣhan by itself is used in the sense of Soma, haryatā vr̥ṣhan can hardly be anything else. Vaḥasyate also is peculiar to Soma in the sense of murmuring, or as it were talking, and never occurs as a passive. I therefore should prefer to assign the whole verse to Soma, and translate: He indeed, when in the wooden vessel, talks with his worshippers, proclaiming his fair power among men; the strong Soma is pleasing, the strong Soma is delicious, when the sacrificer safely brings the cow, i. e. the milk to be mixed with the Soma.

That Indra was thirsting for Soma had been said in the second verse, and he is again called the Soma-drinker in the seventh verse. A verse dedicated to Soma therefore seems to come in quite naturally, though the Anukramanī does not sanction it.

That the Maruts are called vr̥ṣhan, without further explanations, will appear from the following passages:

I, 85, 12. rayīm naḥ dhatta vr̥ṣhanah su-vīram.

Give us wealth, ye heroes, consisting of good offspring.

VIII, 96, 14. śhyāmi vaḥ vr̥ṣhanah yúdhyaata āgaú.

I wish for you, heroes (Maruts), fight in the race!

In all the passages which we have hitherto examined, vr̥ṣhan was always applied to living beings, whether animals, men, or gods. But as, in Greek, ἀρσεν means at last simply strong, and is applied, for instance, to the crash of the sea, κρύπος ὄρησιν πόντου, so in the Veda vr̥ṣhan is applied to the roaring of the storms and similar objects.

V, 87, 5. svanáḥ vr̥ṣhā.

Your powerful sound (O Maruts).

X, 47, 1. gagrībhṃá te dákshinam indra hástam vasu-yávaḥ vasu-pate vásūnām, vidmá hí tvā gó-patim sūra gónām asmábhyam kītrám vr̥ṣhanam rayīm dāḥ.

We have taken thy right hand, O Indra, wishing for treasures, treasurer of treasures, for we know thee, O hero, to be the lord of cattle; give us bright and strong wealth.

Should kītrá here refer to treasures, and vr̥ṣhan to cattle?

X, 89, 9. nī amítreshu vadhám indra túmram vr̥ṣhan vr̥ṣhānam arushám sīsihi.

Whet, O hero, the heavy strong red weapon against the enemies.

The long ā in vr̥ṣhānam is certainly startling, but it occurs once more, IX, 34, 3, where there can be no doubt that it is the accusative of vr̥ṣhan. Professor Roth takes vr̥ṣhan here in the sense of bull (s. v. tumra), but he does not translate the whole passage.

III, 29, 9. krinóta dhūmám vr̥ṣhanam sakhāyaḥ.

Make a mighty smoke, O friends!

Strength itself is called vr̥ṣhan, if I am right in translating the phrase vr̥ṣhanam sūshmam by manly strength. It occurs, IV, 24, 7. tásmin dadhat vr̥ṣhanam sūshmam indraḥ.

Indra may give to him manly strength.

VI, 19, 8. ā naḥ bhara vr̥ṣhanam sūshmam indra.

Bring to us, O Indra, manly strength.

VII, 24, 4. asmé (īti) dádhat vr̥ṣhanam sūshmam indra.

Giving to us, O Indra, manly strength.

See also VI, 19, 9, sūshmaḥ vr̥ṣhabháḥ, used in the same sense.

VII. Vr̥ṣhan, general and empty term of praise.

This constant play on the word vr̥ṣhan, which we have observed in the passages hitherto examined, and which give by no means a full idea of the real frequency of its occurrence in the Veda, has evidently had its influence on the Vedic Rīshis, who occasionally seem to delight in the most silly and unmeaning repetitions of this word, and its compounds and derivatives. Here no language can supply any adequate translation; for though we may translate words which express thoughts, it is useless to attempt to render mere idle play with words. I shall give a few instances:

I, 177, 3. ā tishtha rátham vrīshanam vrīshā te sūtāḥ sōmah pári-siktā mádhūni, yuktvá vrīsha-bhyām vrīshabha kshitnām hāri-bhyām yāhi pra-vátā úpa madrik.

Mount the strong car, the strong Soma is poured out for thee, sweets are sprinkled round; come down towards us, thou bull of men, with the strong bays, having yoked them.

But this is nothing yet compared to other passages, when the poet cannot get enough of vrīshan and vrīshabhā.

II, 16, 6. vrīshā te vágrah utá te vrīshā ráthah vrīshanā hārī (iti) vrīshabhāni āyudhā, vrīshnah mādasya vrīshabha tvām isishe índra sómasya vrīshabhásya trīpmuhi.

Thy thunderbolt is strong, and thy car is strong, strong are the bays, the weapons are powerful, thou, bull, art lord of the strong draught, Indra rejoice in the powerful Soma!

V, 36, 5. vrīshā tvā vrīshanam vardhatu dyaúh vrīshā vrīsha-bhyām vahase hāri-bhyām, sáh nah vrīshā vrīsha-rathah su-sipra vrīsha-krato (iti) vrīshā vagrin bhāre dhāh.

May the strong sky increase thee, the strong; a strong one thou art, carried by two strong bays; do thou who art strong, with a strong car, O thou of strong night, strong holder of the thunderbolt, keep us in battle!

V, 40, 2-3. vrīshā grāvā vrīshā mādah vrīshā sōmah ayám sūtāh, vrīshan indra vrīsha-bhih vritrahan-tama, vrīshā tvā vrīshanam huve.

The stone is strong, the draught is strong, this Soma that has been poured out is strong, O thou strong Indra, who killest Vritra with the strong ones (the Maruts), I, the strong, call thee, the strong.

VIII, 13, 31-33. vrīshā ayám indra te ráthah utó (iti) te vr̥ṣhanā hārī (īti), vr̥ṣhā tvām sata-krato (īti) vr̥ṣhā hāvah. vr̥ṣhā grāvā vr̥ṣhā mādah vr̥ṣhā sōmah ayām sutāh, vr̥ṣhā yagnāh yām īnvasi vr̥ṣhā hāvah. vr̥ṣhā tvā vr̥ṣhanam huve vāgrin kītrābhih ūtī-bhih, vavānthā hī prāti-stutim vr̥ṣhā hāvah.

This thy car is strong, O Indra, and thy bays are strong; thou art strong, O omnipotent, our call is strong. The stone is strong, the draught is strong, the Soma is strong, which is here poured out; the sacrifice which thou orderest is strong, our call is strong. I, the strong, call thee, the strong, thou holder of the thunderbolt, with manifold blessings; for thou hast desired our praise; our call is strong.

There are other passages of the same kind, but they are too tedious to be here repeated. The commentator, throughout, gives to each vr̥ṣhan its full meaning either of showering down or bounteous, or male or bull; but a word which can thus be used at random has clearly lost its definite power, and cannot call forth any definite ideas in the mind of the listener. It cannot be denied that here and there the original meaning of vr̥ṣhan would be appropriate even where the poet is only pouring out a stream of majestic sound, but we are not called upon to impart sense to what are verba et praeterquam nihil. When we read, I, 122, 3, vātah apām vr̥ṣhan-vân, we are justified, no doubt, in translating, 'the wind who pours forth water;' and X, 93, 5, apām vr̥ṣhan-vasû (īti) sūryāmāsā, means 'Sun and Moon, givers of water.' But even in some passages where vr̥ṣhan is followed by the word vr̥ṣh, it is curious to observe that vr̥ṣh is not necessarily used in the sense of raining or pouring forth, but rather in the sense of drinking.

VI, 68, 11. īndrāvarunā mādhumat-tamasya vr̥ṣhnaḥ sōmasya vr̥ṣhanā * ā vr̥ṣhethām.

* The dual vr̥ṣhanau occurs only when the next word begins with a vowel. Before an initial a, ā, i, the au is always changed into āv in the Samhitā (I, 108, 7-12; 116, 21; 117, 19; 153, 2; 157, 5; 158, 1; 180, 7; VII, 61, 5). Before u the preceding au becomes ā in the Samhitā, but the Pada gives au, in order to show that no Sandhi can take place between the two vowels (VII, 60, 9;

Indra and Varuṇa, you strong ones, may you drink of the sweetest strong Soma.

That â-vrîsh means to drink or to eat, was known to Sâyana and to the author of the Satapatha-brâhmana, who paraphrases â vrîshâyadhvam by asnîta, eat.

The same phrase occurs I, 108, 3.

I, 104, 9. uru-vyâkâḥ gathâre â vrîshasva.

Thou of vast extent, drink (the Soma) in thy stomach.

The same phrase occurs X, 96, 13.

VIII, 61, 3. â vrîshasva—sutâsya indra ândhasaḥ.

Drink, Indra, of the Soma that is poured out.

In conclusion, a few passages may be pointed out in which vrîshan seems to be the proper name of a pious worshipper :

I, 36, 10. yâm tvâ devâsaḥ mânave dadhúḥ ihâ yâgishtham havya-vâhana, yâm kâṇvaḥ médhya-atithiḥ dhana-sprîtam yâm vrîshâ yâm upa-stutâḥ.

Thee, O Agni, whom the gods placed here for man, the most worthy of worship, O carrier of oblations, thee whom Kaṇva, thee whom Medhyâtithi placed, as the giver of wealth, thee whom Vrîshan placed and Upastuta.

Here the commentator takes Vrîshan as Indra, but this would break the symmetry of the sentence. That Upa-stutâḥ is here to be taken as a proper name, as Upastuta, the son of Vrîshṭihavya, is clear from verse 17 :

agnîḥ pra âvat mitrâ utâ médhya-atithim agnîḥ sâtâ upa-stutâm.

Agni protected also the two friends, Medhyâtithi and Upastuta, in battle.

The fact is that whenever upastutâ has the accent on the last syllable, it is intended as a proper name, while, if used as a participle, in the sense of praised, it has the accent on the first.

X, 66, 7). Before consonants the dual always ends in â, both in the Samhitâ and Pada. But there are a few passages where the final â occurs before initial vowels, and where the two vowels are allowed to form one syllable. In four passages this happens before an initial â (I, 108, 3 ; VI, 68, 11 ; I, 177, 1 ; II, 16, 5). Once, and once only, it happens before u, in VIII, 22, 12.

VIII, 5, 25. yáthā kit kánvam āvatam priyá-medham upa-stutám.

As you have protected Kanva, Priyamedha, Upastutá. Cf. I, 112, 15.

VIII, 103, 8. prá mámhishthāya gāyata—úpa-stutāsa*h* agnáye (accent of the vocative).

Sing, O Upastutás, to the worthiest, to Agni !

X, 115, 9. Iti tvā agne vrishī-hávyasya putráh upa-stutāsa*h* rishayah avo*kan*.

By these names, O Agni, did the sons of Vrishihavya, the Upastutás, the Rishis, speak to you.

Vrishan occurs once more as a proper name in VI, 16, 14 and 15 :

tám ūm (Iti) tvā dadhya*ñ* rishi putrá*h* idhe átharva*ñ*, vritra-hánam puram-darám.

tám ūm (Iti) tvā páthya*ñ* vrishá sám idhe dasyuhán-tamam, dhanam-gayám ráne-rane.

Thee, O Agni, did Dadhyak kindle, the Rishi, the son of Atharvan, thee the killer of Vritra, the destroyer of towns ;

Thee, O Agni, did Vrishan Páthya kindle, thee the best killer of enemies, the conqueror of wealth in every battle.

Here the context can leave no doubt that Dadhyak and Vrishan were both intended as proper names. Yet as early as the composition of the Satapatha-bráhmaṇa, this was entirely misunderstood. Dadhyak, the son of Atharvan, is explained as speech, Vrishan Páthya as mind (Sat. Br. VI, 3, 3, 4). On this Mahidhara, in his remarks on Vāg. Samh. XI, 34, improves still further. For though he allows his personality to Dadhyak, the son of Atharvan, he says that Páthya comes from pathin, path, and means he who moves on the right path ; or it comes from páthas, which means sky, and is here used in the sense of the sky of the heart. He then takes vrishan as mind, and translates the mind of the heart. Such is a small chapter in the history of the rise and fall of the Indian mind !

MANDALA I, HYMN 86.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYĀYA 6, VARGA 11-12.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. O Maruts, that man in whose dwelling you drink (the Soma), ye mighty (sons) of heaven, he indeed has the best guardians¹.

2. You who are propitiated¹ either by sacrifices or from the prayers of the sage, hear the call, O Maruts!

3. Aye, the powerful man to whom you have granted a sage, he will live in a stable rich in cattle¹.

4. On the altar of this strong man (here)¹ Soma is poured out in daily sacrifices; praise and joy are sung.

5. To him let the mighty¹ Maruts listen, to him who surpasses all men, as the flowing rain-clouds² pass over the sun.

6. For we, O Maruts, have sacrificed at many harvests, through the mercies¹ of the swift gods (the storm-gods).

7. May that mortal be blessed, O chasing Maruts, whose offerings you carry off¹.

8. You take notice either of the sweat of him who praises you, ye men of true strength, or of the desire of the suppliant¹.

9. O ye of true strength, make this manifest with might! strike the fiend¹ with your lightning!

10. Hide the hideous darkness, destroy¹ every tusky² fiend. Make the light which we long for!

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Gotama.

Verse 1=VS. VIII, 31; AV. XX, 1, 2; TS. IV, 2, 11, 1.

Verse 2=TS. IV, 2, 11, 2.

Verse 6=TS. IV, 3, 13, 5.

Verse 8=SV. II, 944.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Vímahas occurs only once more as an epithet of the Maruts, V, 87, 4. Being an adjective derived from máhas, strength, it means very strong. The strong ones of heaven is an expression analogous to I, 64, 2. diváh rish-vāsaḥ ukshánah; I, 64, 4. diváh nárah. The Ait. Brāhmaṇa VI, 10, takes gopā, guardian, as Indra.

Verse 2.

Note 1. The construction of this verse is not clear. Yagnā-vāhas has two meanings in the Veda. It is applied to the priest who carries or performs the sacrifice:

III, 8, 3, and 24, 1. várkaḥ dhāḥ yagnā-vāhase.

Grant splendour to the sacrificer!

But it is also used of the gods who carry off the sacrifice, and in that case it means hardly more than worshipped or propitiated; I, 15, 11 (Asvinau); IV, 47, 4 (Indra and Vāyu); VIII, 12, 20 (Indra). In our verse it is used in the latter sense, and it is properly construed with the instrumental yagnāḥ. The difficulty is the gen. plur. matīnām, instead of matībhiḥ. The sense, however, seems to allow of but one construction, and we may suppose that the genitive depends on the yagnā in yagnāvāhas, 'accepting the worship of the prayers of the priest.' Benfey refers yagnāḥ to the preceding verse, and joins hávam to víprasya matīnām: 'Durch Opfer—Opferförderer ihr!—oder ihr hört—Maruts—den Ruf der Lieder, die der Priester schuf.'

The Samhitā text lengthens the last syllable of srinutá, as suggested by the metre.

If the accent allowed yagñavâhasaḥ to be taken as a genitive, the translation, as suggested by Ludwig, might be, 'Either for the sake of the sacrifices of the sacrificer, or because of the prayers of the sage, O Maruts, hear the call.'

Verse 3.

Note 1. The genitive yâsya vâgīnaḥ depends on vīpra. Anu-taksh, like anu-grah, anu-gñā, seems to convey the meaning of doing in behalf or for the benefit of a person. Gántā might also be translated in a hostile sense, he will go into, he will conquer many a stable full of cows.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Ludwig has pointed out that asyā may refer to the present sacrificer.

Verse 5.

Note 1. I have altered ā bhúvaḥ into ābhúvaḥ, for I do not think that bhúvaḥ, the second pers. sing., even if it were bhúvat, the third pers., could be joined with the relative pronoun yáḥ in the second pada. The phrase vīsvāḥ yáḥ karshanīḥ abhí occurs more than once, and is never preceded by the verb bhuvah or bhuvat. Ābhúvaḥ, on the contrary, is applied to the Maruts, I, 64, 6, vidátheshu ābhúvaḥ; and as there can be no doubt who are the deities invoked, ābhúvaḥ, the strong ones, is as appropriate an epithet as vīmahas in the first verse.

Note 2. Sasrúshiḥ śshaḥ, as connected with sūra, the sun, can only be meant for the flowing waters, the rain-clouds, the givers of ish or vigour. They are called divyāḥ śshaḥ :

VIII, 5, 21. utá naḥ divyāḥ śshaḥ utá śndhûn varshathaḥ.

You rain down on us the heavenly waters and the rivers.

WILSON translates: May the Maruts, victorious over all men, hear (the praises) of this (their worshipper); and may (abundant) food be obtained by him who praises them.

BENFEY: Ihn, der ob allen Menschen ragt, sollen hören die Labungen, und nahn, die irgend Weisen nahn.

LUDWIG: Hören sollen von ihm, der über allen menschen ist, die erden, seine bis zur sonne gelangten kräfte. In his notes he would prefer: Von ihm sollen sie gegenwärtig hören, von ihm der alle menschen übertrifft (und die in die sonne weggegangen), die darbringungen.

Sroshantu does not occur again; but we find sróshan, I, 68, 5; sróshamāna, III, 8, 10; VII, 51, 1; VII, 7, 6.

Verse 6.

Note 1. The expression ávobhiḥ, with the help, the blessings, the mercies, is generally used with reference to divine assistance; (I, 117, 19; 167, 2; 185, 10; 11; IV, 22, 7; 41, 6; V, 74, 6; VI, 47, 12; VII, 20, 1; 35, 1, &c.) It seems best therefore to take karshaní as a name or epithet of the Maruts, although, after the invocation of the Maruts by name, this repetition is somewhat unusual. I should have preferred, 'with the help of our men, of our active and busy companions,' for karshaní is used in that sense also. Only ávobhiḥ would not be in its right place then. The same applies to the various reading in TS. IV, 3, 13, 5, where instead of ávobhiḥ we find máhobhiḥ. This too is used with reference to gods, and particularly to the Maruts; see I, 165, 5, note.

Verse 7.

Note 1. Par, with ati, means to carry over (I, 97, 8; 99, 1; 174, 9; III, 15, 3; 20, 4; IV, 39, 1; V, 25, 9; 73, 8; VII, 40, 4; 97, 4; VIII, 26, 5; 67, 2, &c.); with apa, to remove (I, 129, 5); with niḥ, to throw down. Hence, if used by itself, unless it means to overrun, as frequently, it can only have the general sense of carrying, taking, accepting, or accomplishing.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Vidá as second pers. plur. perf. is frequent, generally with the final 'a' long in the Samhitá, I, 156, 3; V, 41, 13; 55, 2.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Observe the long penultimate in rákshaḥ, instead of the usual short syllable. Cf. I, 12, 5, and see Kuhn, Beiträge, vol. iii, p. 456.

Verse 10.

Note 1. See note 1 to I, 39, 3.

Note 2. Atrín, which stands for attrín, is one of the many names assigned to the powers of darkness and mischief. It is derived from atrá, which means tooth or jaw, and therefore meant originally an ogre with large teeth or jaws, a devourer. Besides atrá, we also find in the Veda átra, with the accent on the first syllable, and meaning what serves for eating, or food :

X, 79, 2. átrāni asmai paṭ-bhīk sám bharanti.

They bring together food for him (Agni) with their feet.

With the accent on the last syllable, atrá in one passage means an eater or an ogre, like atrín :

V, 32, 8. apādam atrām—mrīdhṛá-vākam.

Indra killed the footless ogre, the babbler.

It means tooth or jaw :

I, 129, 8. svayám sã rishayādhyai yã naḥ upa-īshé atrañh.

May she herself go to destruction who attacks us with her teeth.

It is probably from atrá in the sense of tooth (cf. δδόντες = ēdóntes) that atrín is derived, meaning ogre or a devouring devil. In the later Sanskrit, too, the Asuras are represented as having large tusks, Mahābh. V, 3572, damshīrino bhīmavegās ka.

Thus we read I, 21, 5, that Indra and Agni destroy the Rakshas, and the poet continues :

āpragāḥ santu atrīnaḥ.

May the ogres be without offspring !

IX, 86, 48. gahí vísvān rakshásah indo (īti) atrīnaḥ.

Kill, O Soma, all the tusky Rakshas. Cf. IX, 104, 6; 105, 6.

VI, 51, 14. gahí ní atrīnam pañim.

Kill, O Soma, the tusky Pani.

I, 94, 9. vadhañh duk-sāmsān āpa duk-dhyāñh gahí dûré vā yé ānti vā ké kīti atrīnaḥ.

Strike with thy blows, O Agni, the evil-spoken, evil-minded (spirits), the ogres, those who are far or who are near.

See also I, 36, 14; 20; VI, 16, 28; VII, 104, 1; 5; VIII, 12, 1; 19, 15; X, 36, 4; 118, 1.

MANDALA I, HYMN 87.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYĀYA 6, VARGA 13.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Endowed with exceeding vigour and power, the singers, the never flinching, the immovable, the impetuous, the most beloved and most manly, have decked themselves with their glittering ornaments, a few only¹, like the heavens with the stars.

2. When you have seen your way through the clefts, like birds, O Maruts, on whatever road it be¹, then the casks (clouds) on your chariots trickle everywhere, and you pour out the honey-like fatness (the rain) for him who praises you.

3. At their racings the earth shakes, as if broken¹, when on the (heavenly) paths they harness (their deer) for victory². They the sportive, the roaring, with bright spears, the shakers (of the clouds) have themselves glorified their greatness.

4. That youthful company (of the Maruts), with their spotted horses¹, moves by itself; hence² it exercises lordship, invested with powers. Thou indeed art true, thou searchest out sin³, thou art without blemish. Therefore the manly host will help this prayer.

5. We speak after the kind of our old father, our tongue goes forth at the sight¹ of the Soma: when the singers (the Maruts) had joined Indra in deed², then only they took their holy names;—

6. These Maruts, armed with beautiful rings, obtained splendours for their glory¹, they obtained² rays, and men to celebrate them; nay, armed with daggers, speeding along, and fearless, they found the beloved domain of the Maruts³.

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Gotama. No verse in SV., VS., AV.

Verse 2 = TS. IV, 3, 13, 7.

Verse 3 = TS. IV, 3, 13, 7.

Verse 6 = TS. II, 1, 11, 2; IV, 2, 11, 2.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Ké kit refers to the Maruts, who are represented as gradually rising or just showing themselves, as yet only few in number, like the first stars in the sky. Ké kit, some, is opposed to sarve, all. The same expression occurs again, V, 52, 12, where the Maruts are compared to a few thieves. B. and R., and those who follow them, translate usrāḥ iva strī-bhiḥ by 'like cows marked with stars on their foreheads.' Such cows no doubt exist, but they can hardly be said to become visible by these frontal stars, as the Maruts by their ornaments. We must take usrāḥ here in the same sense as dyāvāḥ; II, 34, 2, it is said that the Maruts were perceived dyāvāḥ ná strī-bhiḥ, like the heavens with the stars.

I, 166, 11. dûre-drīsaḥ yé divyāḥ-iva strī-bhiḥ.

Who are visible far away, like the heavens (or heavenly beings) by the stars.

And the same is said of Agni, II, 2, 5. dyaúḥ ná strī-bhiḥ kitayat ródasī (īti) ánu. Strībhiḥ occurs I, 68, 5; IV, 7, 3; VI, 49, 3; 12. It always means stars, and the meaning of rays (strahl) rests, as yet, on etymological authority only. The evening sky would, no doubt, be more appropriate than usrāḥ, which applies chiefly to the dawn. But in the Indian mind, the two dawns, i. e. the dawn and the gloaming, are so closely united and identified, that their names, too, are frequently interchangeable.

Verse 2.

Note 1. I translate yayī not by a goer, a traveller, i. e. the cloud (this is the explanation proposed by Sâyana, and adopted by Professor Benfey), but by path. Sâyana (TS. IV, 3, 13, 7) renders yayim by gatim. Etymologically yayí may mean either, and in some passages I feel doubtful as to which is the more appropriate meaning. But in parallel passages yayí is clearly replaced by yāma. Thus :

VIII, 7, 2. yát—yāmam subhrāḥ ákidhvam.

When you, bright Maruts, have seen your way.

See also VIII, 7, 4. yát yāmam yānti vāyú-bhiḥ.

When they (the Maruts) go on their path with the winds.

VIII, 7, 14. ádhi-iva yát girīnām yāmam subhrāḥ ákidhvam.

When you, bright Maruts, had seen your way, as it were, from above the mountains.

The same phrase occurs, even without yāma or yayí, in

V, 55, 7. ná párvatāḥ ná nadyāḥ varanta vaḥ yātra ákidhvam marutaḥ gákkhata ít u tát.

Not mountains, not rivers, keep you back ; where you have seen (your way), there you go.

Though yayí does not occur frequently in the Rig-veda, the meaning of path seems throughout more applicable than that of traveller.

V, 87, 5. tveshāḥ yayíḥ.

Your path, O Maruts, is blazing.

V, 73, 7. ugrāḥ vām kakuhāḥ yayíḥ.

Fearful is your pass on high.

I, 51, 11. ugrāḥ yayīm níḥ apāḥ srótasā asrigat.

The fearful Indra sent the waters forth on their way streaming.

X, 92, 5. prá—yayínā yanti síndhavaḥ.

The waters go forth on their path.

Ludwig takes kósa as buckets on the chariots of the Maruts, which seems right.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Cf. I, 37, 8, page 75. There is no authority for Sâyana's explanation of vithurā-iva, the earth trembles like a widow. Vithurā occurs several times in the Rig-veda, but never in the sense of widow. Thus :

I, 168, 6. yát kyaváyatha vithurā-iva sám-hitam.

When you, Maruts, throw down what is compact, like brittle things.

I, 186, 2 ; VI, 25, 3 ; 46, 6 ; VIII, 96, 2 ; X, 77, 4 (vi-thuryáti). The Maruts themselves are called ávithura in verse 1. Spiegel compares the Zend aiwithura. As to ágma and yāma, see I, 37, 8, page 75.

Note 2. Súbh is one of those words to which it is very difficult always to assign a definite special meaning. Being derived from subh, to shine, the commentator has no difficulty in explaining it by splendour, beauty ; sometimes by water. But although súbh means originally splendour, and is used in that sense in many passages, yet there are others where so vague a meaning seems very inappropriate. In our verse Sáyana proposes two translations, either, 'When the Maruts harness the clouds,' or, 'When the Maruts harness their chariots, for the bright rain-water.' Now the idea that the Maruts harness their chariots in order to make the clouds yield their rain, can hardly be expressed by the simple word subhé, i. e. for brightness' sake. As the Maruts are frequently praised for their glittering ornaments, their splendour might be intended in this passage, as it certainly is in others. Thus :

I, 85, 3. yát subháyante añgī-bhiḥ tanūshu subhrāḥ dadhire virúkmataḥ.

When the Maruts adorn themselves with glittering ornaments, the brilliant ones put bright weapons on their bodies.

VII, 56, 6. subhā sóbhishthāḥ, sriyā sám-mislāḥ, ógah-bhiḥ ugrāḥ.

The most brilliant by their brilliancy, united with beauty, terrible by terrors.

In I, 64, 4, I have translated vákshaḥ-su rukmān ádhi yetire subhé by 'they fix gold (chains) on their chests for beauty.' And the same meaning is applicable to I, 117, 5, subhé rukmám ná darsatám ní-khátam, and other passages : IV, 51, 6 ; VI, 63, 6.

But in our verse and others which we shall examine, beauty and brilliancy would be very weak renderings for subhé. 'When they harnessed their chariots or their deer for the sake of beauty,' means nothing, or, at least, very little. I take, therefore, subhé in this and similar phrases in the sense of triumph or glory or victory. 'When they harness their chariots for to conquer,' implies brilliancy, glory, victory, but it conveys at the same time a tangible meaning. Let us now see whether the same meaning is appropriate in other passages :

I, 23, 11. gáyatām-iva tanyatúḥ marútām eti dhṛishṇu-yā yāt súbham yāthána naráḥ.

The thundering voice of the Maruts comes fiercely, like that of conquerors, when you go to conquer, O men !

Sāyana : 'When you go to the brilliant place of sacrifice.'

Wilson : 'When you accept the auspicious (offering).'

Benfey : 'Wenn ihr euren Schmuck nehmt.'

V, 57, 2. yāthana súbham, you go to conquer. Cf. V, 55, 1.

Sāyana : 'For the sake of water, or, in a chariot.'

V, 52, 8. sárdhaḥ mārutam út samsa—utá sma té subhé naráḥ prá syandrāḥ yugata tmánā.

Praise the host of the Maruts, whether they, the men, the quickly moving, have by themselves harnessed (the chariots) for conquest.

Sāyana : 'For the sake of water.' Cf. X, 105, 3.

V, 57, 3. subhé yāt ugrāḥ prīshatīḥ áyugdhvam.

When you have harnessed the deer for conquest.

Sāyana : 'For the sake of water.'

III, 26, 4. subhé—prīshatīḥ ayukshata.

They had harnessed the deer for victory.

Sāyana : 'They had harnessed in the water the deer together (with the fires).'

V, 63, 5. rātham yuñgate marútaḥ subhé su-khám sūraḥ ná—gó-ishṛishu.

The Maruts harness the chariot meet for conquest, like a hero in battles.

Sāyana : 'For the sake of water.'

I, 88, 2. subhé kám yānti—ásvaiḥ.

The Maruts go on their horses towards conquest.

Sāyana : 'In order to brighten the worshipper, or, for the sake of water.'

I, 119, 3. sám yát mitháḥ paspridhânāsaḥ ágmata subhé makhāḥ ámitāḥ gāyávaḥ ráne.

When striving with each other they came together, for the sake of glory, the brisk (Maruts), immeasurable (in strength), panting for victory in the fight.

Sâyana : 'For the sake of brilliant wealth.'

VII, 82, 5. marút-bhiḥ ugráḥ súbham anyáḥ íyate.

The other, the fearful (Indra), goes with the Maruts to glory.

Sâyana : 'He takes brilliant decoration.'

I, 167, 6. ā asthāpayanta yuvatīm yúvānaḥ subhé nímislām.

The Maruts, the youths, placed the maid (lightning on their chariot), their companion for victory (subhé nímislām).

Sâyana : 'For the sake of water, or, on the brilliant chariot.' Cf. I, 127, 6; 165, 1.

VI, 62, 4. súbham pr̥ksham ísham ūrgam váhantā.

The Arsvins bringing glory, wealth, drink, and food.

VIII, 26, 13. subhé kákrâte, you bring him to glory.

Subham-yāvan is an epithet of the Maruts, I, 89, 7; V, 61, 13. Cf. subhra-yāvāná, VIII, 26, 19 (Arvinau).

Subham-yā, of the wind, IV, 3, 6.

Subham-yú, of the rays of the dawn, X, 78, 7.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Sâyana : 'With spotted deer for their horses.' See I, 37, 2, note 1, page 70; as Pûshan is called agâsra, having goats for his horses, RV. V, 58, 2.

That the Maruts have not only pr̥ishatī, but horses for their chariots, we have seen before. In I, 88, 1, we have ásvaparnaiḥ ráthebhiḥ.

Note 2. Ayā is a word of very rare occurrence in the Rig-veda. It is the instrum. sing. of the feminine pronominal base ā or ī, and as a pronoun followed by a noun it is frequently to be met with; V, 45, 11. ayā dhiyā, &c. But in our verse it is irregular in form as not entering into Sandhi with íśanáḥ. This irregularity, however, which might have led us to suppose an original ayāḥ, indefatigable, corresponding with the following ási, is vouched for by the Pada text, in such matters a better authority than the Samhitā text, and certainly in this case fully borne out by the Prātisākhya, I, 163, 10. Unless we read ayāh, we must take ayā as an adverb, in the sense of thus or hence; cf. VI, 66, 4. In some passages where ayā seems thus to be used as an adverb, it would be better to supply a noun from the preceding verse. Thus in II, 6, 2, ayā refers to samídham in II, 6, 1. In VI, 17, 15, a similar noun, samídghā or girā, should be supplied. But there are other passages where, unless we suppose that the verse was meant to illustrate a ceremonial act, such as the placing of a samídgh, and that ayā pointed to it, we must take it as a simple adverb, like the Greek τῷ: RV. III, 12, 2; IX, 53, 2; 106, 14. In X, 116, 9, the Pada reads áyāh-iva, not áyā, as given by Roth; in VI, 66, 4, áyā nú, the accent is likewise on the first.

Note 3. Rina-yāvan is well explained by B. and R. as going after debt, searching out sin. Sāyana, though he explains rina-yāvan by removing sin, derives it nevertheless correctly from rina and yā, and not from yu. The same formation is found in subham-yāvan, &c.; and as there is rina-yā besides rina-yāvan, so we find subham-yā besides subham-yāvan. Ludwig prefers the derivation from yu.

Verse 5.

Note 1. The Soma-juice inspires the poet with eloquence.

Note 2. Sāmi occurs again in II, 31, 6; III, 55, 3; VIII, 45, 27; X, 40, 1. Grassmann has shown that it may be taken as an instrum. of sāmi, meaning work, but with special reference to the toil of the battle-field or the sacrifice. It is used in the former sense in VIII, 45, 27. vī ānaṣ turvāne sāmi.

He (Indra) was able to overcome, lit. he reached to, or he arrived at the overcoming or at victory by toil.

But, like other words which have the general meaning of working or toiling, sāmi is used both in a general sense, and in the more special sense of sacrifice.

X, 40, 1. vāstoḥ-vastoḥ váhamānam dhiyā sāmi.

Your chariot, O Asvins, driven along every morning by thought and deed.

II, 31, 6. apām nāpāt āsu-hémā dhiyā sāmī.

Apām nāpāt (Agni) moving quickly by thought and deed.

In these two passages it might be possible, with a slight alteration of the accent, to read dhiyā-sāmī as one word. Dhiyā-sām would mean the sacrificer who is engaged in prayer; cf. dhiyā-gūr, V, 43, 15. Thus we read:

VI, 2, 4. yāh te su-dānave dhiyā martaḥ saramate.

The mortal who toils for thee, the liberal god, with prayer.

There is no necessity, however, for such a change, and the authority of the MSS. is against it. See also IX, 74, 7.

In III, 55, 3, sāmī ākṛha ḍidyē pūrvyāni, Roth takes sāmī as an acc. plur. neut., Lanman as an instrum., Grassmann as a locative.

I glance back at the former sacrifices. See B. R. s.v. dī and sāmī.

In other passages the feminine sāmī seems to mean work, sacrificial work, but, as far as we can see, not simply sacrifice. Thus the R̥ibhus and others are said to have acquired immortality by their work or works, sāmī or sāmibhiḥ, I, 20, 2; 110, 4; III, 60, 3; IV, 33, 4. Cf. IV, 22, 8; 17, 18; V, 42, 10; 77, 4; VI, 52, 1; VIII, 75, 14; IX, 74, 7; X, 28, 12. In VI, 3, 2, we read:

igē yagnēbhiḥ saramé sāmibhiḥ.

I have sacrificed with sacrifices, I have worked with pious works.

Here the verb sam must be taken in the sense of working, or performing ceremonial worship, while in other places (III, 29, 16; V, 2, 7) it may be perhaps taken in the more special sense of singing songs of praise. The Greek κᾶμ-νω, to work, to labour, to tire (Sanskrit sāmyati), the Greek κομιδή and κομίζω, to labour for or take care of a person, and possibly even the Greek κῶμος, a song or a festival (not a village song), may all find their explanation in the Sanskrit root sam.

The idea that the Maruts did not originally enjoy divine honours will occur again and again : cf. I, 6, 4 ; 72, 3. A similar expression is used of the Ribhus, I, 20, 8, &c. But while originally the expression of obtaining sacred names meant no more than obtaining a sacred or divine character, it was soon taken literally, and a number of names were invented for the Maruts which even in the Vāgasan. Samhitā XVII, 80–85 amount to 49, i.e. 7×7 . Yagnīya, properly 'worthy of sacrifice,' has the meaning of divine or sacred. The Greek ἄγιος has been compared with yāgya, sacrificio colendus, which is not a Vedic word.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Sriyāse kām seems to be the same as the more frequent sriyé kām. Sriyāse only occurs twice more, V, 59, 3. The chief irregularity consists in the absence of Guna, which is provided for by Pāṇini's kasēn (III, 4, 9). Similar infinitives, if they may so be called, are bhiyāse, V, 29, 4 ; vridhāse, V, 64, 5 ; dhruvāse, VII, 70, 1 ; tugāse, IV, 23, 7 ; riñgāse, VIII, 4, 17 ; vriñgāse, VIII, 76, 1 ; rikāse, VII, 61, 6. In VI, 39, 5, rikāse may be a dat. sing. of the masculine, to the praiser.

Note 2. Mimikshire from myaksh, to be united with. Rasmī, rays, after bhānū, splendour, may seem weak. It might be possible to assign to rasmī the meaning of reins, and take rikvabhir in the sense of sounding or tinkling. In V, 79, 8, arśī is used in juxtaposition with rasmī.

Note 3. The bearing of this concluding verse is not quite clear, unless we take it as a continuation of the preceding verse. It was there said that the Maruts (the rikvānah) obtained their holy names after having joined Indra in his work, which means that they then and there became what they are. Having thus obtained their true character and a place among the gods, they may be said to have won at the same time splendour, and worshippers to sing their praises, and to have established themselves in what became afterwards known as their own domain, their own place among the gods who are invoked at the sacrifice. See VII, 58, 1.

The metre requires that we should read dhāmanāḥ.

BENFEY translates : Gedeih'n zu spenden woll'n die schöngeschmücketen mit Lichtern, Strahlen mit Lobsängern regenen ; die brüllenden, furchtlosen, stürmischen, sie sind bekannt als Glieder des geliebten Marutstamms.

WILSON : Combining with the solar rays, they have willingly poured down (rain) for the welfare (of mankind), and, hymned by the priests, have been pleased partakers of the (sacrificial food). Addressed with praises, moving swiftly, and exempt from fear, they have become possessed of a station agreeable and suitable to the Maruts.

LUDWIG : Zu herlichkeit haben dise sich mit liechtglanz versehen, mit sausenden zügeln die schönberingten, schwertbewaffnet die kraftvollen, ohne furcht besitzen sie die freundliche Marutmacht.

MANDALA I, HYMN 88.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYÂYA 6, VARGA 14.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Come hither, Maruts, on your chariots charged with lightning, resounding with beautiful songs¹, stored with spears, and winged with horses! Fly³ to us like birds, with your best food², you mighty ones!

2. They come gloriously on their red, or, it may be, on their tawny horses which hasten their chariots. He who holds the axe¹ is brilliant like gold;— with the tire² of the chariot they have struck the earth.

3. On your bodies there are daggers for beauty; may they stir up our minds¹ as they stir up the forests. For yourselves, O well-born Maruts, the vigorous (among you) shake² the stone (for distilling Soma).

4. Days went round you and came back¹, O hawks, back to this prayer, and to this sacred rite; the Gotamas making prayer with songs, pushed up the lid of the well (the cloud) for to drink.

5. No such hymn¹ was ever known as this which Gotama sounded for you, O Maruts, when he saw you on golden wheels, wild boars² rushing about with iron tusks.

6. This comforting speech rushes sounding towards you, like the speech of a suppliant: it rushed freely from our hands as our speeches are wont to do.

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Gotama, the son of Rahûgana. The metre varies. Verses 1 and 6 are put down as Prastâra-paṅkti, i. e. as 12 + 12 + 8 + 8. By merely counting the syllables, and dissolving semivowels, it is just possible to get twenty-four syllables in the first line of verses 1 and 6. The old metricians must have scanned verse 1 :

ā vīdyunmāt-bhīh mārūtāh sū-ārkaīh
rāthēbhīh yāta-rishmat-bhīh āsvā-pārnaīh.

Again verse 6 : ēshā syā vāh mārūtāh anū-bhārtrī
prātī stobhātī vāghātāh nā vānī.

But the general character of these lines shows that they were intended for hendecasyllabics, each ending in a bacchius, though even then they are not free from irregularities. The first verse would scan :

ā vīdyunmāt-bhīh mārūtāh sū-ārkaīh
rāthēbhīh yāta-rishmat-(bhīh) āsvā-pārnaīh.

And verse 6 : ēshā syā vāh mārūtāh-anū-bhārtrī
prātī stobhātī vāghātāh nā vānī.

Our only difficulty would be the termination bhīh of rishmat-bhīh. I cannot adopt Professor Kuhn's suggestion to drop the Visarga of bhīh and change i into y (Beiträge, vol. iv, p. 198), for this would be a license without any parallel. It is different with sah, originally sa, or with feminines in ih, where parallel forms in ī are intelligible. The simplest correction would be to read rāthēbhīh yāta-rishmat-māntāh-āsvā-pārnaīh. One might urge in support of this reading that in all other passages where rishmat occurs, it refers to the Maruts themselves, and never to their chariots. Yet the difficulty remains, how could so simple a reading have been replaced by a more difficult one?

In the two Gâyatrî pâdas which follow I feel equally reluctant to alter. I therefore scan ā varshishīthāyā nāḥ īshā vāyāḥ nā pāptatā sū-māyāḥ, taking the dactyl of paptata as representing a spondee, and admitting the exceptional bacchius instead of the amphimacer at the end of the line.

The last line of verse 6 should be scanned :

āstobhāyāt vrīthāśām ānū svādhām gābhāstyōḥ.

There are two other verses in this hymn where the metre is difficult. In the last pâda of verse 5 we have seven syllables instead of eleven. Again, I say, it would be most easy to insert one of the many tetrasyllabic epithets of the Maruts. But this would have been equally easy for the collectors of the Veda. Now the authors of the Anukramanîs distinctly state that this fifth verse is virāḍrûpâ, i. e. that one of its pâdas consists of eight syllables. How they would have made eight syllables out of vi-dhāvataḥ varāhûn does not appear, but at all events they knew that last pâda to be imperfect. The rhythm does not suffer by this omission, as long as we scan vī-dhāvātāḥ varāhûn.

Lastly, there is the third pâda of the second verse, rukmaḥ na kītraḥ svadhiti-vân. It would not be possible to get eleven syllables out of this, unless we admitted vyūha not only in svādhītivân or svādhītī-vân, but also in kītrāḥ. Kuhn (Beiträge, vol. iv, p. 192) proposes to scan rukmaū na kītarāḥ svadhītivân. Nothing would be easier than to insert eshām after kītraḥ, but the question occurs again, how could eshām be lost, or why, if by some accident it had been lost, was not so obvious a correction made by Saunaka and Kātyāyana?

No verse of this hymn occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS., TB.

Verse 1

Note 1. Alluding to the music of the Maruts, and not to the splendour of the lightning which is mentioned before. See Wolf, Beiträge zur Deutschen Mythologie, vol. ii, p. 137. 'Das Ross und den Wagen des Gottes begleitet munterer Hörnerschall, entweder stösst er selbst ins Horn, oder sein Gefolge. Oft vernimmt man auch eine liebliche Musik, der keine auf Erden gleich kommt (Müllenhof, 582). Das wird das Pfeifen und Heulen des Sturmes sein, nur in idealisirter Art.' Ibid. p. 158.

Note 2. Várshishtā, which is generally explained as the superlative of vriddha, old (Pân. VI, 4, 157), has in most passages of the Rig-veda the more general meaning of strong or excellent: VI, 47, 9. īsham ā vakshi īshām vārshishtām; III, 13, 7 (vásu); III, 26, 8 (rátna); III, 16, 3 (raí); IV, 31, 15; VIII, 46, 24 (srávaḥ); IV, 22, 9 (nṛimná); V, 67, 1 (kshatrā); VI, 45, 31 (mūrdhán). In some passages, however, it may be taken in the sense of oldest (I, 37, 6; V, 7, 1), though by no means necessarily. Várshishtā is derived in reality from vr̥shan, in the sense of strong, excellent. See note to I, 85, 12, page 144.

Note 3. Paptata, the second person plural of the imperative of what is commonly, though without much reason, called the aorist of the causative of pat. It is curiously like the Greek πίπτει, but it has the meaning of flying rather than falling; see Curtius, Grundzüge, p. 190. Two other forms formed on the same principle occur in the Rig-veda, paptaḥ and paptan:

II, 31, 1. prá yát váyaḥ ná páptan.

That they may fly to us like birds.

VI, 63, 6. prá vām váyaḥ—ānu paptan.

May your birds fly after you.

X, 95, 15. púrûravaḥ mã mr̥itháh mã prá paptaḥ.

Purûravas, do not die, do not go away!

Verse 2.

Note 1. Though svadhiti-vân does not occur again, it can only mean he who holds the axe, or, it may be, the sword or the thunderbolt, the latter particularly, if Indra is here intended. Svadhiti signifies axe:

III, 2, 10. svá-dhitim ná tégase.

They adorned Agni like an axe to shine or to cut.

The svádhiti is used by the butcher, I, 162, 9; 18; 20; and by the wood-cutter or carpenter, III, 8, 6; 11; X, 89, 7, &c. Roth (s.v.) takes svadhiti as meaning also a tree, possibly the oak, and he translates svadhiti^{vān} in our passage by a chariot made of the wood of the Svadhiti tree. In RV. IX, 96, 6, svádhiti^r vānānām may well mean 'the strong axe among woods,' the axe being naturally made of the strongest wood. In V, 32, 10, a devī svádhiti^ḥ is mentioned, possibly the lightning, the companion of Indra and the Maruts.

Note 2. The tire of the chariot of the Maruts is frequently mentioned. It was considered not only as an essential part of their chariot, but likewise as useful for crushing the enemy :

V, 52, 9. utá pavyā^ḥ ráthānām ádrim bhindanti ógasā.

They cut the mountain (cloud) with the tire of their chariots.

I, 166, 10. pavíshu kshurā^ḥ ádhi.

On their tires are sharp edges.

In V, 31, 5, tires are mentioned without horses and chariot, which were turned by Indra against the Dasyus (I, 64, 11). I doubt, however, whether in India or elsewhere the tires or the wheels of chariots were ever used as weapons of attack, as detached from the chariot ; (see M. M., On Pavítrava, in Beiträge zur Vergleichenden Sprachforschung, vol. iii, p. 447.) If we translate the figurative language of the Vedic poets into matter-of-fact terms, the tires of the chariots of the Maruts may be rendered by thunderbolts ; yet by the poets of the Veda, as by the ancient people of Germany, thunder was really supposed to be the noise of the chariot of a god, and it was but a continuation of the same belief that the sharp wheels of that chariot were supposed to cut and crush the clouds ; (see M. M., loc. cit., p. 444.)

Verse 3.

Note 1. That the vāśis are small weapons, knives or daggers, we saw before, p. 71. Sāyana here explains vāśi by a weapon commonly called āra, or an awl. In X, 101, 10, vāśis are mentioned, made of stone, asman-máyī.

The difficulty begins with the second half. Medhā, as here written in the Pada text, could only be a plural of a neuter medhá, but such a neuter does nowhere exist in the Veda. We only find the masculine médha, sacrifice, which is out of the question here, on account of its accent. Hence the passage III, 58, 2, ūrdhvā^h bhavanti pitārā-iva médhā^h, is of no assistance, unless we alter the accent. The feminine medhā means will, thought, prayer: I, 18, 6; II, 34, 7; IV, 33, 10; V, 27, 4; 42, 13; VII, 104, 6; VIII, 6, 10; 52, 9; IX, 9, 9; 26, 3; 32, 6; 65, 16; 107, 25; X, 91, 8. The construction does not allow us to take medhā as a Vedic instrumental instead of medháyā, nor does such a form occur anywhere else in the Rig-veda. Nothing remains, I believe, but to have recourse to conjecture, and the addition of a single Visarga in the Pada would remove all difficulty. In the next line, if tuvi-dyum-nāsa^h be the subject, it would signify the priests. This, however, is again without any warrant from the Rig-veda, where tuvi-dyumná is always used as an epithet of gods. I therefore take it as referring to the Maruts, as an adjective in the nominative, following the vocatives maruta^h su-gātā^h. The conception that the Maruts stir up the forests is not of unfrequent occurrence in the Rig-veda: cf. I, 171, 3. That ūrdhvā is used of the mind, in the sense of roused, may be seen in I, 119, 2; 134, 1; 144, 1; VII, 64, 4. The idea in the poet's mind seems to have been that the thunderbolts of the Maruts rouse up men to prayer as they stir the tops of the forest trees. Ludwig takes medha, masc., in the sense of lance, comparing it with Icelandic meidhr, but the two words cannot well be the same. Possibly vana may be meant for lances: 'May they raise our minds, like lances;' see note to I, 171, 3.

Note 2. On dhan in the sense of to agitate, see B. and R. s. v. The shaking of the stone may be the shaking of the stone for distilling the heavenly Soma or the rain; but adri may also be meant for the thunderbolt. I now take tuvidyumna for an adjective referring to the Maruts, because it is a divine rather than a human epithet. Still, the passage is doubtful.

Verse 4.

Note 1. The first question is, which is the subject, áhāni or gr̥dhrah? If gr̥dhrah were the subject, then we should have to translate it by the eager poets, and take áhāni in the sense of visvā ahāni. The sense then might be: 'Day by day did the eager poets sing around you this prayer.' There would be several objections, however, to this rendering. First, gr̥dhrah, though metaphorically applicable to poets, never occurs again as signifying poets or priests. One passage only could be quoted in support, IX, 97, 57, kavayah ná gr̥dhrah (not gr̥dhrah), like greedy poets. But even here, if indeed the translation is right, the adjective is explained by kaví, and does not stand by itself. Secondly, áhāni by itself is never used adverbially in the sense of day after day. The only similar passage that might be quoted is III, 34, 10, and that is very doubtful. To take áhāni as a totally different word, viz. as á+hāni, without ceasing, without wearying, would be too bold in the present state of Vedic interpretation. If then we take áhāni as the subject, gr̥dhrah would have to be taken as a vocative, and intended for the Maruts. Now, it is perfectly true, that by itself gr̥dhra, hawk, does not occur again as a name of the Maruts, but syenā, hawk, and particularly a strong hawk (IX, 96, 6), is not only a common simile applied to the Maruts, but is actually used as one of their names:

VII, 56, 3. abhí sva-pūbhiḥ mithāḥ vapanta vāta-svanasaḥ syenāḥ aspridhran.

They plucked each other with their beaks (?), the hawks, rushing like the wind, strove together.

Aguḥ might be the aorist of gai, to sing, or of gā, to go:

I, 174, 8. sánā tã te indra návyāḥ ā aguḥ.

New poets, O Indra, sang these thy old deeds.

III, 56, 2. gāvaḥ ā aguḥ.

The cows approached.

If then the sense of the first line is, 'Days went and came back to you,' the next question is whether we are to extend the construction to the next words, imām dhīyam vārkāryām ka devīm, or whether these words are to be joined to krinvántaḥ, like bráhma. The meaning of vārkāryā is, of course, unknown. Sāyana's interpretation as 'what is to be made by means of water' is merely etymological, and does not help us much. It is true that the object of the hymn, which is addressed to the Maruts, is rain, and that literally vārkāryā might be explained as 'that the effect of which is rain.' But this is far too artificial a word for Vedic poets. Possibly there was some other word that had become unintelligible and which, by a slight change, was turned into vārkāryā, in order to give the meaning of rain-producing. It might have been kārkārya, glorious, or the song of a poet called Vārkara, or, as Ludwig suggests, Vrikāri. The most likely supposition is that vārkāryā was the name given to some famous hymn, some pæan or song of triumph belonging to the Gotamas, possibly to some verses of the very hymn before us. In this case the epithet devī would be quite appropriate, for it is frequently used for a sacred or sacrificial song: IV, 43, 1. devīm su-stutīm; III, 18, 3. imām dhīyam sata-séyāya devīm. See, however, the note to verse 6.

The purport of the whole line would then be that many days have gone for the Maruts as well as for the famous hymn once addressed to them by Gotama, or, in other words, that the Gotamas have long been devoted to the Maruts, an idea frequently recurring in the hymns of the Veda, and, in our case, carried on in the next verse, where it is said that the present hymn is like one that Gotama composed when he saw the Maruts or spoke of them as wild boars with iron tusks. The pushing up the lid of the well for to drink, means that they obtained rain from the cloud, which is here, as before, represented as a covered well.

See another explanation in Haug, Über die ursprüngliche Bedeutung des Wortes Brahma, 1868, p. 5.

Verse 5.

Note 1. Yógaṇa commonly means a chariot:

VI, 62, 6. areṇú-bhiḥ yógaṇebhiḥ bhugántā.

You who possess dustless chariots.

VIII, 72, 6. áśva-vat yógaṇam br̥hāt.

The great chariot with horses.

It then became the name for a distance to be accomplished without unharnessing the horses, just as the Latin jugum, a yoke, then a juger of land, 'quod uno jugo boum uno die exarari posset,' Pliny XVIII, 3, 3, 9.

In our passage, however, yógana means a hymn, lit. a composition, which is clearly its meaning in VIII, 90, 3. bráhma te indra girvanah kriyánte ánatidbhutá, imá gushasva hari-asva yóganá indra yá te ámanmahi.

Unequalled prayers are made for thee, praiseworthy Indra; accept these hymns which we have devised for thee, O Indra with bright horses!

Note 2. Varāhu has here the same meaning as varāhá, wild boar (VIII, 77, 10; X, 28, 4). It occurs once more, I, 121, 11, as applied to Vritra, who is also called varāhá, I, 61, 7; X, 99, 6. In X, 67, 7, vr̥sha-bhiḥ varāhaiḥ (with the accent on the penultimate) is intended for the Maruts^a. Except in this passage, varāha has the accent on the last syllable. In IX, 97, 7, varāhá is applied to Soma.

Verse 6.

This last verse is almost unintelligible to me. I give, however, the various attempts that have been made to explain it.

WILSON: This is that praise, Maruts, which, suited (to your merits), glorifies every one of you. The speech of the priest has now glorified you, without difficulty, with sacred verses, since (you have placed) food in our hands.

BENFEY: Dies Lied—Maruts!—das hinter euch emporstrebt, es klingt zurück gleich eines Beters Stimme. Mühlos schuf solche Lieder er, entsprechend eurer Arme Kraft. (Note: Der zum Himmel schallende Lobgesang findet seinen Widerhall (wirklich, 'bebt zurück') in dem Sturmgeheul der Maruts, welches mit dem Geheul des Betenden verglichen wird.)

^a See Genthe, Die Windgottheiten, 1861, p. 14; Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie, p. 689. Grimm mentions eburðrung (boar-throng) as a name of Orion, the star that betokens storm.

LUDWIG: Dises lied, o Marut, euch unterstützend (aufnemen) als eines priesters braust euch entgegen, nachbrausen hat es gemacht ohne mühe in (die) der nähe die göttliche weise (ihrer) arme.

My own translation is to a great extent conjectural. It seems to me from verse 3, that the poet offers both a hymn of praise and a libation of Soma. Possibly vârkâryâ in verse 4 might be taken in the sense of Soma-juice, and be derived from valkala, which in later Sanskrit means the bark of trees. In that case verse 5 would again refer to the hymn of Gotama, and verse 6 to the libation which is to accompany it. Anu-bhartrî does not occur again, but it can only mean what supports or refreshes, and therefore would be applicable to a libation of Soma which supports the gods. The verb stobhati would well express the rushing sound of the Soma, as in I, 168, 8, it expresses the rushing noise of the waters against the felines of the chariots. The next line adds little beyond stating that this libation of Soma rushes forth freely from the hands, the gabhastis being specially mentioned in other passages where the crushing of the Soma-plant is described :

IX, 71, 3. âdri-bhiḥ sutâḥ pavate gâbhastyoḥ.

The Soma squeezed by the stones runs from the hands.

The translation would then be : O Maruts, this comforting draught (of Soma) rushes towards you, like the speech of a suppliant ; it rushed freely from our hands, as our draughts (of Soma) are wont to do.

On svadhâ, see p. 32.

MANDALA I, HYMN 165.

ASHTAKA II, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 24-26.

TO THE MARUTS AND INDRA.

The Prologue.

The sacrificer speaks :

1. To what splendour do the Maruts all equally¹ cling², they who are of the same age, and dwell in the same nest? With what thoughts?—from whence are they come³? Do these heroes sing forth their (own) strength⁴, wishing for wealth?

2. Whose prayers have the youths accepted? Who has turned the Maruts to his own sacrifice? By what strong desire¹ may we arrest them, they who float through the air like hawks?

The Dialogue.

The Maruts speak :

3. From whence¹, O Indra, dost thou come alone, thou who art mighty? O lord of men², what has thus happened to thee? Thou greetest (us)³ when thou comest together with (us), the bright (Maruts)⁴. Tell us then, thou with thy bay horses, what thou hast against us!

Indra speaks :

4. The sacred songs are mine, (mine are) the prayers¹; sweet² are the libations! My strength rises³, my thunderbolt is hurled forth. They call for me, the hymns yearn for me. Here are my horses, they carry me hither.

The Maruts speak :

5. From thence, in company with our strong friends¹, having adorned our bodies, we now harness our fallow deer² with all our might³;—for, Indra, according to custom, thou hast come to be with us.

Indra speaks :

6. Where, O Maruts, was that custom with you, when you left me alone in the killing of Ahi? I indeed am terrible, powerful, strong,—I escaped from the blows of every enemy¹.

The Maruts speak :

7. Thou hast achieved much with us as companions¹. With equal valour, O hero! let us achieve then many things, O thou most powerful, O Indra! whatever we, O Maruts, wish with our mind².

Indra speaks :

8. I slew Vṛitra, O Maruts, with (Indra's) might, having grown powerful through my own vigour; I, who hold the thunderbolt in my arms, have made these all-brilliant waters to flow freely for man¹.

The Maruts speak :

9. Nothing, O mighty lord, is strong¹ before thee; no one is known among the gods² like unto thee. No one who is now born³ comes near, no one who has been born. Do what thou wilt do⁴, thou who art grown so strong.

Indra speaks :

10. Almighty strength be mine alone, whatever I may do, daring in my heart¹; for I indeed, O Maruts, am known as terrible: of all that I threw down, I, Indra, am the lord.

Indra speaks :

11. O Maruts, now your praise has pleased me, the glorious hymn which you have made for me, ye men!—for me, for Indra, for the joyful hero, as friends for a friend, for your own sake, and by your own efforts¹.

Indra speaks:

12. Truly, there they are, shining towards me, bringing blameless glory, bringing food. O Maruts, wherever I have looked for you, you have appeared to me in bright splendour: appear to me also now!

The Epilogue.

The sacrificer speaks:

13. Who has magnified you here, O Maruts? Come hither, O friends, towards your friends. Ye brilliant Maruts, welcoming¹ these prayers, be mindful² of these my rites.

14. The wisdom of Mânya has brought us hither, that he should help as the poet helps the performer of a sacrifice¹: turn hither quickly²! Maruts, on to the sage! the singer has recited these prayers for you.

15. May this your praise, O Maruts, this song of Mândârya, the son of Mâna¹, the poet, bring offspring² for ourselves with food. May we have an invigorating autumn, with quickening rain³.

NOTES.

A critical examination of Professor von Roth's remarks on this hymn, together with some supplementary notes of my own, will be found in the Preface to this volume.

According to the Anukramanikâ this hymn is a dialogue between Agastya, the Maruts, and Indra. A careful consideration of the hymn would probably have led us to a similar conclusion, but I doubt whether it would have led us to adopt the same distribution of the verses among the poet, the Maruts, and Indra, as that adopted by the author of the Anukramanikâ. He assigns the first two verses to Indra, the third, fifth, seventh, and ninth to the Maruts, the fourth, sixth, eighth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth to Indra, and the three concluding verses to Agastya. I think that the two verses in the beginning, as well as the three concluding verses, belong certainly to Agastya or to whoever else the real performer of the sacrifice may have been. The two verses in the beginning cannot be ascribed to Indra, who, to judge from his language, would never say: 'By what strong desire may we arrest the Maruts?' It might seem, in fact, as if the three following verses too should be ascribed to the sacrificer, so that the dialogue between Indra and the Maruts would begin only with the sixth verse. The third verse might well be addressed to Indra by the sacrificer, and in the fourth verse we might see a description of all that he had done for Indra. What is against this view, however, is the phrase prábhṛitaś me ádriś. If used by the sacrificer, it might seem to mean, 'my stone, i.e. the stone used for squeezing the Soma, has been brought forth.' But though Professor Roth assigns this meaning to prábhṛita in our passage, I doubt whether, in connection with ádri, or with vágra, prábhṛita can mean anything but hurled. Thus we read:

I, 61, 12. asmaí ít ūm (íti) prá bhara—vritrāya vágram.

Hurl thou, Indra, the thunderbolt against this Vritra.

V, 32, 7. yát im vágrasya prá-bhṛitau dadābha.

When Indra conquered him in the hurling of the thunderbolt.

I therefore suppose the dialogue to begin with verse 3, and I find that Langlois, though it may be from different reasons, arrived at the same conclusion.

There can be little doubt that the other verses, to verse 12, are rightly apportioned between Indra and the Maruts. Verse 12 might perhaps be attributed again to the worshipper of the Maruts, but as there is no absolute necessity for assigning it to him, it is better to follow the tradition and to take it as the last verse of Indra's speech. It would seem, in fact, as if these ten verses, from 3 to 12, formed an independent poem, which was intended to show the divine power of the Maruts. That their divine power was sometimes denied, and that Indra's occasional contempt of them was well known to the Vedic poets, will become evident from other hymns. This dialogue seems therefore to have been distinctly intended to show that, in spite of occasional misunderstandings between the Maruts and the all-powerful Indra, Indra himself had fully recognised their power and accepted their friendship. If we suppose that this dialogue was repeated at sacrifices in honour of the Maruts, or that possibly it was acted by two parties, one representing Indra, the other the Maruts and their followers, then the two verses in the beginning and the three at the end ought to be placed in the mouth of the actual sacrificer, whoever he was. He begins by asking, Who has attracted the Maruts to his sacrifice, and by what act of praise and worship can they be delighted? Then follows the dialogue in honour of the Maruts, and after it the sacrificer asks again, 'Who has magnified the Maruts, i.e. have not we magnified them?' and he implores them to grant him their friendship in recognition of his acts of worship. If then we suppose that the dialogue was the work of Mândārya Mānya, the fourteenth verse, too, would lose something of its obscurity. Coming from the mouth of the actual sacrificer, it would mean, 'the wisdom, or the poetical power, of Mānya has brought us to this, has induced us to do this, i.e. to perform this dialogue of Mānya, so that he, Mānya, should assist, as a poet assists the priest at a sacrifice.' Of course all this is and can only be guess-work.

We do not know the age of Mānya nor that of Agastya. We do not know whether they were contemporaries or not. But supposing that Mānya was present at the sacrifice, vīpra might be meant for Mānya; and in the last words, too, 'the singer has recited these prayers for you,' the singer (garitā) might again be Mānya, the powerful poet whose services the sacrificer had engaged, and whose famous dialogue between Indra and the Maruts was considered a safe means of winning their favour. It would be in keeping with all this, if in the last verse the sacrificer once more informed the Maruts that this hymn of praise was the work of the famous poet Māndārya, the son of Māna, and if he then concluded with the usual prayer for safety, food, and progeny.

No verse of this hymn occurs in the Sāma-veda; verse 3 = VS. XXXIII, 27; verse 4 = VS. XXXIII, 78; verse 6 = TB. II, 8, 3, 5; verse 8 = TB. II, 8, 3, 6; verse 9 = VS. XXXIII, 79.

Verse 1.

Note 1. As saṁānī occurs in the Veda as the feminine of saṁāna (cf. IV, 51, 9; X, 191, 3; 4), saṁānyā might, no doubt, be taken as an instrumental, belonging to subhā. We should then have to translate: 'With what equal splendour are the Maruts endowed?' Sāyana adopts the same explanation, while Wilson, who seems to have read saṁānyāḥ, translates 'of one dignity.' Professor Roth, s. v. myaksh, would seem to take saṁānyā as some kind of substantive, and he refers to another passage, I, 167, 4, sādhāraṇyā-iva marútaḥ mimikshuḥ, without, however, detailing his interpretation of these passages.

It cannot be said that Sāyana's explanation is objectionable, yet there is something awkward in qualifying by an adjective, however indefinite, what forms the subject of an interrogative sentence, and it would be possible to avoid this, by taking saṁānyā as an adverb. It is clearly used as an adverb in III, 54, 7; VIII, 83, 8.

Note 2. Mimikshuḥ is the perfect of myaksh, in the sense of to be firmly joined with something. It has therefore a more definite meaning than the Latin miscere and the Greek μίσγειν, which come from the same source, i. e.

from a root mik or mig, in Sanskrit also mis in mis-ra ; (see Curtius, Grundzüge, p. 300.) There may be indeed one or two passages in the Veda where myaksh seems to have the simple meaning of mixing, but it will be seen that they constitute a small minority compared with those where myaksh has the meaning of holding to, sticking to ; I mean X, 104, 2. mimikshúh yám ádraya^h indra túbhyam.

The Soma which the stones have mixed for thee.

This form cannot be derived from mimiksh, but is the 3rd pers. plur. perf. Parasm. of myaksh. It may, however, be translated, 'This Soma which the stones have grasped or squeezed for thee,' as may be seen from passages quoted hereafter, in which myaksh is construed with an accusative.

II, 3, 11. ghrítám mimikshe.

The butter has been mixed.

This form cannot be derived from mimiksh, but is the 3rd pers. sing. perf. Átm. of myaksh. If the meaning of mixing should be considered inadmissible, we might in this verse also translate, 'The butter has become fixed, solid, or coagulated.'

Leaving out of consideration for the present the forms which are derived from mimiksh, we find the following passages in which myaksh occurs. Its original meaning must have been to be mixed with, to be joined to, and in many passages that original sense is still to be recognised, only with the additional idea of being firmly joined, of sticking to, or, in an active sense, laying hold of, grasping firmly.

1. Without any case :

I, 169, 3. ámyak sã te indra risht^h asmé (Iti).

This thy spear, O Indra, sat firm for us.

This would mean that Indra held his weapon well, as a soldier ought to hold his spear. Ámyak is the 3rd pers. sing. of a second aor. Parasm., ámyaksham, ámyak(sh + t) ; (Sây. prâpnoti.) Cf. VIII, 61, 18.

2. With locative :

X, 44, 2. mimyáksha vágra^h nri-pate gabhásta.

In thy fist, O king, the thunderbolt rests firmly.

I, 167, 3. mimyaksha yéshu sú-dhitâ—rishth.

To whom clings the well-grasped spear.

VI, 50, 5. mimyaksha yéshu rodasî nú devî.

To whom the goddess Rodasî clings. (Sây. samgakkhate.)

VI, 11, 5. ámyakshi sádma sádane prithivyâh.

The seat was firmly set on the seat of the earth. (Sây. gamyate, parigrhyate.) It is the 3rd pers. sing. aor. pass.

VI, 29, 2. â yásmin háste náryâh mimikshúh â ráthe hiranyáye rathe-sthâh, â rasmáyah gâbhastyoh sthûráyoh â ádhvan árvâsah vrishanah yugânâh.

To whose hand men cling, in whose golden chariot the drivers stand firm, in whose strong fists the reins are well held, on whose path the harnessed stallions hold together. (Sây. âsikyante, âpûryante; or âsiñkanti, pûrayanti.)

X, 96, 3. indre ní rûpâ háritâ mimikshire.

Bright colours stuck or clung or settled on Indra. (Sây. nishiktâni babhûvu; miheh sanantât karmâni rûpam.)

3. With instrumental:

I, 165, 1. kâyâ subhâ marútaḥ sám mimikshuh.

To what splendour do the Maruts cling; or, what splendour clings to them?

V, 58, 5. svâyâ matyâ marútaḥ sám mimikshuh. (See also I, 165, 1.)

The Maruts cling to their own thought or will. (Sây. vrishyâ samyak siñkanti.)

I, 167, 4. yavyâ sâdhâraṇyâ-iva marútaḥ mimikshuh.

The Maruts cling to the young maid, as if she belonged to all. See I, 173, 12; VIII, 98, 8; or VI, 27, 6.

I, 87, 6. bhânú-bhiḥ sám mimikshire.

The Maruts were joined with splendour. (Sây. medhum ikkhanti.)

4. With accusative:

VIII, 61, 18. ní yâ vágram mimikshátuḥ.

Thy two arms which have firmly grasped the thunderbolt. (Sây. parigrhñitaḥ.)

Here I should also prefer to place VII, 20, 4, if we might read mimikshe or mimyaksha, for it is impossible to take mimikshan for anything but a participle of the desiderative of mih, which does not yield an appropriate meaning.

ní vágram índraḥ mīmikshan.

Grasping firmly the thunderbolt. (Sây. satrushu prâ-payan.)

VI, 29, 3. sriyê te pâdâ dūvaḥ ā mīmikshuḥ.

Thy servants embrace thy feet for their happiness. (Sây. āsiṅkanti, samarpayanti.)

Like other verbs which mean to join, myaksh, if accompanied by prepositions expressive of separation, means to separate. (Cf. vi-yukta, se-junctus.)

II, 28, 6. āpo (īti) sū myaksha varuṇa bhiyāsam māt.

Remove well from me, O Varuṇa, terror. (Sây. apagamaya.)

Quite distinct from this is the desiderative or inchoative verb mīmiksh, from mih, in the sense of to sprinkle, or to shower, chiefly used with reference to the gods who are asked to sprinkle the sacrifice with rain. Thus we read :

I, 142, 3. mādhvā yagñām mīmikshati.

(Narāsa) sprinkles the sacrifice with rain.

IX, 107, 6. mādhvā yagñām mīmiksha naḥ.

Sprinkle (O Soma) our sacrifice with rain.

I, 34, 3. tríḥ adyā yagñām mādhunā mīmikshatam.

O Asvins, sprinkle the sacrifice with rain thrice to-day!

I, 47, 4. mādhvā yagñām mīmikshatam.

O Asvins, sprinkle the sacrifice with rain!

5. Without mādhu :

I, 22, 13. mahī dyaúḥ prīthivī ka naḥ imām yagñām mīmikshatām.

May the great heaven and earth sprinkle this our sacrifice.

6. With mādhu in the accusative :

VI, 70, 5. mādhu naḥ dyāvāprīthivī (īti) mīmikshatām.

May heaven and earth shower down rain for us.

Very frequently the Asvins are asked to sprinkle the sacrifice with their whip. This whip seems originally, like the whip of the Maruts, to have been intended for the cracking noise of the storm, preceding the rain. Then as whips had possibly some similarity to the instruments used for sprinkling butter on the sacrificial viands, the Asvins are asked to sprinkle the sacrifice with their whip, i. e. to give rain :

I, 157, 4. mādhu-matyā naḥ kāsayaḥ mimikshatam.

O Asvins, sprinkle us with your rain-giving whip.

I, 22, 3. táyā yagnām mimikshatam.

O Asvins, sprinkle the sacrifice with it (your whip).

7. Lastly, we find such phrases as,

I, 48, 16. sám naḥ râyā—mimikshvá.

Sprinkle us with wealth, i. e. shower wealth down upon us. Here mih is really treated as a Hu-verb in the Ātmanepada, though others take it for mimikshasva.

As an adjective, mimikshú is applied to Indra (III, 50, 3), and mimikshá to Soma (VI, 34, 4).

Note 3. I do not see how étāsaḥ can here be taken in any sense but that suggested by the Pada, ā-itāsaḥ, come near. Professor Roth thinks it not impossible that it may be meant for étāḥ, the fallow deer, the usual team of the Maruts. These Etas are mentioned in verse 5, but there the Pada gives quite correctly étān, not ā-itān, and Sāyana explains it accordingly by gantūn.

Note 4. The idea that the Maruts proclaim their own strength occurred before, I, 87, 3. It is a perfectly natural conception, for the louder the voice of the wind, the greater its strength, and vice versa.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Mānas here, as elsewhere, is used in the sense of thought preceding speech, desire, or devotion not yet expressed in prayer. See Taitt. Samh. V, 1, 3, 3. yat purusho manasābhigakḥhati tad vākā vadati, what a man grasps in his mind, that he expresses by speech. Professor Roth suggests an emendation which is ingenious, but not necessary, viz. mahā nāmasā, with great adoration, an expression which occurs, if not in VI, 52, 17, at least in VII, 12, 1. We find, however, the phrase mahā mānasā in

VI, 40, 4. ā yāhi sāvata usatā yayātha indra mahā mānasā soma-péyam, úpa bráhmāni srinavaḥ imā naḥ átha te yagnāḥ tanvė váyaḥ dhāt.

Come hither, thou hast always come, Indra, to our libation through our yearning great desire. Mayest thou hear these our prayers, and may then the sacrifice put vigour in thy body.

It is curious to observe that throughout the Rig-veda the instrumental singular mahā is always used as an adjective belonging to some term or other for praise and prayer. Besides the passages mentioned, we find :

II, 24, 1. ayā vidhema nāvayā mahā girā.

Let us sacrifice with this new great song.

VI, 52, 17. su-uktēna mahā nāmasā ā vivāse.

I worship with a hymn with great adoration, or I worship with a great hymn in adoration. VIII, 46, 14. gāya girā mahā ví-ketasam. Celebrate the wise Indra with a great song. Otherwise we might translate, Thou hast always come with a great yearning desire.

Verse 3.

Note 1. We ought to scan kūṭāḥ tvām īndrā māhīnāḥ sām, because yāsi, being anudatta, could not begin a new pāda. It would be more natural to translate kūṭāḥ by why? for the Maruts evidently wish to express their surprise at Indra's going to do battle alone and without their assistance. I do not think, however, that in the Rig-veda, even in the latest hymns, kūṭāḥ has as yet a causal meaning, and I have therefore translated it in the same sense in which it occurs before in the poet's address to the Maruts.

Note 2. Sat-pati, lord of men, means lord of real men, of heroes, and should not be translated by good lord. Sat by itself is frequently used in the sense of heroes, of men physically rather than morally good :

II, 1, 3. tvām agne īndraḥ vṛishabhāḥ satām asi.

Thou, Agni, art Indra, the hero among heroes.

I, 173, 7. samāt-su tvā sūra satām urānām.

Thee, O hero, in battles the protector of (good and true) men.

Note 3. The meaning of sām prikkhase is very much the same as that of sām vadasva in I, 170, 5.

Note 4. Subhānā is evidently meant as a name for the Maruts, who thus speak of themselves in the third person, which is by no means unusual in the Rig-veda.

Mahidhara explains subhânaiḥ by sobhanair vaṭanaiḥ.

Verse 4.

Indra certainly addresses his old friends, the Maruts, very unceremoniously, but this, though at first startling, was evidently the intention of the poet. He wished to represent a squabble between Indra and the Maruts, such as they were familiar with in their own village life, and this was to be followed by a reconciliation. The boorish rudeness, selfishness, and boastfulness here ascribed to Indra may seem offensive to those who cannot divest themselves of the modern meaning of deities, but looked upon from the right point of view, it is really full of interest.

Note 1. Bráhmâni and matáyaḥ are here mentioned separately in the same way as a distinction is made between bráhman, stóma, and ukthá, IV, 22, 1; VI, 23, 1; between bráhmâni and gíraḥ, III, 51, 6; between bráhma, gíraḥ, and stómaḥ, VI, 38, 3; between bráhma, gíraḥ, ukthá, and mánma, VI, 38, 4, &c.

Note 2. Sám, which I have here translated by sweet, is a difficult word to render. It is used as a substantive, as an adjective, and as an adverb; and in several instances it must remain doubtful whether it was meant for one or the other. The adverbial character is almost always, if not always, applicable, though in English there is no adverb of such general import as sám, and we must therefore render it differently, although we are able to perceive that in the mind of the poet it might still have been conceived as an adverb, in the sense of 'well.' I shall arrange the principal passages in which sám occurs according to the verbs with which it is construed.

1. With bhû:

VIII, 79, 7. bháva naḥ soma sám hridé.

Be thou, Soma, well (pleasant) to our heart. Cf. VIII, 82, 3.

VIII, 48, 4. sám naḥ bhava hridé á pítáḥ indo (íti).

Be thou well (sweet) to our heart, when drunk, O Soma !
Cf. X, 9, 4.

I, 90, 9. sám naḥ bhavatu aryamā.

May Aryaman be well (kind) to us !

VI, 74, 1. sám naḥ bhûtam dvi-páde sám kátuk-pade.

May Soma and Rudra be well (kind) to our men and cattle.

Here sám might be rendered as an adverb, or as an adjective, or even as a substantive, in the sense of health or blessing.

Cf. VII, 54, 1; IX, 69, 7. The expression dvipád and kátuk-pad is curiously like what occurs in the prayers of the Eugubian tables, Fisovie Sansie, ditu ocre Fisi, tote Jovine, ocrer Fisie, totar Jovinar dupursus, peturpursus fato fito (Umbrische Sprachdenkmäler, ed. Aufrecht, p. 198); and also in the edicts of Piyadasi, dupada-katupadesu pakhivâlikalesu, 'aux bipèdes, aux quadrupèdes, aux volatiles, aux animaux qui se meuvent dans les eaux.' See Burnouf, Lotus, p. 667.

II, 38, 11. sám yát stotri-bhyaḥ âpáye bhávâti.

What may be well (a pleasure) for the praisers, for the friend.

X, 37, 10. sám naḥ bhava kákshasâ.

Be kind to us with thy light !

2. With as :

VIII, 17, 6. sómaḥ sám astu te hridé.

May the Soma be well (agreeable) to thy heart !

I, 5, 7. sám te santu prá-ketase.

May the Somas be well (pleasing) to thee, the wise !

V, 11, 5. túbhyam manîshâ iyám astu sám hridé.

May this prayer be well (acceptable) to thy heart !

I, 114, 1. yáthâ sám ásat dvi-páde kátuk-pade.

That it may be well for our men and cattle. Cf. X, 165, 1 ; 3.

VII, 86, 8. sám naḥ kshéme sám ûm (íti) yóge naḥ astu.

May it be well with us in keeping and acquiring !

V, 7, 9. â yáḥ te—agne sám ásti dhāyase.

He who is lief to thee to support, i.e. he whom thou likest to support.

V, 74, 9. sám ûm (íti) sú vâm—asmākam astu karkritih.

Let there be happiness to you—glory to us !

3. With as or bhû understood :VI, 45, 22. sám yát gáve ná sákíne.

A song which is pleasant to the mighty Indra, as food to an ox.

VIII, 13, 11. sám ít hí te.

For it is well for thee.

X, 86, 15. mantháh te indra sám hridé.

The mixture is pleasant to thy heart, O Indra !

X, 97, 18. áram kāmāya, sám hridé.

Enough for love, pleasant to the heart.

VI, 34, 3. sám tát asmai.

That is pleasant to him.

VI, 21, 4. káh te yagnáh mánase sám várāya.

What sacrifice seems to thy mind pleasant to select ?

4. With kar :I, 43, 6. sám naḥ karati árvate.

May he do well to our horse, i.e. may he benefit our horses.

IV, 1, 3. tokāya tugé—sám kridhi.

Do good to our children and progeny, or bless us for the procreation of children.

VIII, 18, 8. sám naḥ karataḥ asvínā.

May the two Asvins do us good !

5. With vah :I, 157, 3. sám naḥ ā vakshat dvi-páde kátuḥ-pade.

May he bring blessing to us for man and cattle.

VIII, 5, 20. téna naḥ—párve tokāya sám gáve, váhatam pīvaríḥ íshah.

Bring to us rich food, a blessing to cattle, to children, and to the ox.

6. With verbs, such as pû, vâ, and others, where it is clearly used as an adverb :IX, 11, 3. sáh naḥ pavasva sám gáve sám gánāya sám árvate, sám rāgan óshadhibhyaḥ.

Do thou, king Soma, stream upon us, a blessing for the ox, a blessing for man, a blessing for the horse, a blessing for the plants. Cf. IX, 11, 7 ; 60, 4 ; 61, 15 ; 109, 5.

VII, 35, 4. sám naḥ ishiráh abhí vātu vātah.

May the brisk wind blow kindly upon us, or blow a blessing upon us!

VII, 35, 6. sám nah tváshṭā gnābhiḥ ihā sṛinotu.

May Tvashṭar with the goddesses hear us here well, i. e. auspiciously!

VII, 35, 8. sám nah sūryah—út etu.

May the sun rise auspiciously for us!

VIII, 18, 9. sám nah tapatu sūryah.

May the sun warm us well!

III, 13, 6. sám nah soka—ágne.

Shine well for us, O Agni!

Sám Yóh.

Sám also occurs in a phrase that has puzzled the interpreters of the Veda very much, viz. sám yóh. These are two words, and must both be taken as substantives, though originally they may have been adverbs. Their meaning seems to have been much the same, and in English they may safely be rendered by health and wealth, in the old acceptance of these words:

I, 93, 7. dhattam yágamānáya sám yóh.

Give, Agni and Soma, to the sacrificer health and wealth.

I, 106, 5. sám yóh yát te mánuh-hitam tát ímahe.

Bṛihaspati, we ask for health and wealth which thou gavest to Manu.

I, 114, 2. yát sám ka yóh ka mánuh á-yegé pitā tát asyāma táva rudra prá-nītishu.

Rudra, the health and wealth which Manu, the father, obtained, may we reach it under thy guidance.

II, 33, 13. yāni mánuh ávrinīta pitā nah tā sám ka yóh ka rudráya varmi.

The medicines which our father Manu chose, those I desire, the health and wealth of Rudra.

I, 189, 2. bháva tokāya tánayāya sám yóh.

Be to our offspring health and wealth!

IV, 12, 5. yákkha tokāya tánayāya sám yóh.

Give to our offspring health and wealth!

V, 69, 3. īte tokāya tánayāya sám yóh.

I ask for our offspring health and wealth.

VI, 50, 7. dhāta tokāya tánayāya sām yóh.

Give to our offspring health and wealth !

X, 182, 1. átha karat yágamānáya sām yóh.

May he then produce for the sacrificer health and wealth.

VII, 69, 5. téna nah sām yóh—ní arvinā vahatam.

On that chariot bring to us, Asvins, health and wealth.

III, 17, 3. átha bhava yágamānáya sām yóh.

Then, Agni, be health and wealth to the sacrificer.

III, 18, 4. bṛihát váyah saramānéshu dhehi, revát agne visvāmitreshu sām yóh.

Give, Agni, much food to those who praise thee, give to the Visvāmitras richly health and wealth.

X, 15, 4. átha nah sām yóh arapáh dadhāta.

And give us health and wealth without a flaw! Cf. X, 59, 8.

X, 37, 11. tát asmé sām yóh arapáh dadhātana.

And give to us health and wealth without a flaw!

V, 47, 7. tát astu mitra-varunā tát agne sām yóh asmábhyam idám astu sastám.

Let this, O Mitra-Varuna, let this, O Agni, be health and wealth to us ; may this be auspicious !

V, 53, 14. vṛishṭvī sām yóh āpah usrí bhesagám syāma marutáh sahá.

Let us be together with you, O Maruts, after health, wealth, water, and medicine have been showered down in the morning.

VIII, 39, 4. sám ka yóh ka máyah dadhe.

He gave health, wealth, and happiness.

VIII, 71, 15. agním sām yóh ka dātave.

We ask Agni to give us health and wealth.

X, 9, 4. sám yóh abhí sravantu nah.

May the waters come to us, as health and wealth, or may they run towards us auspiciously.

Note 3. If we retain the reading of the MSS. súshmaḥ iyarti, we must take it as an independent phrase, and translate it by 'my strength rises.' For súshma, though in this and other places it is frequently explained as an adjective, meaning powerful, is, as far as I can see, always a substantive, and means breath, strength. There may be a few passages in which, as there occur several words for strength, it might be possible to translate súshma by strong. But even there it is better to keep to the general meaning of súshma, and translate it as a substantive.

Iyarti means to rise and to raise. It is particularly applied to prayers raised by the poet in honour of the gods, and the similes used in connection with this, show clearly what the action implied by iyarti really is. For instance,

I, 116, 1. stómân iyarmi abhriyâ-iva vâtaḥ.

I stir up hymns as the wind stirs the clouds.

X, 116, 9. su-vakasyām iyarmi sīndhau-iva prā īrayam nāvam arkaḥ.

I stir up sweet praise, as if I rowed a ship on the river with hymns.

In the sense of rising it occurs,

X, 140, 2. pāvakā-varṇāḥ sukrā-varṇāḥ ānūna-varṇāḥ út iyarshi bhānūnā.

Thou risest up with splendour, Agni, thou of bright, resplendent, undiminished majesty.

We might therefore safely translate in our verse 'my strength rises,' although it is true that such a phrase does not occur again, and that in other passages where iyarti and súshma occur together, the former governs the latter in the accusative. Cf. IV, 17, 12; X, 75, 3.

Mahādhara translates, 'my held-up thunderbolt moves on destroying everything,' but he admits another rendering in which adri would mean the stone used for pressing the Soma.

Verse 5.

Note 1. If, as we can hardly avoid, we ascribe this verse to the Maruts, we must recognise in it the usual offer of help to Indra on the part of the Maruts. The question then only is, who are the strong friends in whose company they appear? It would be well if one could render antamébhiḥ by horses, as Sāyana does, but there is no authority for it. Svá-kshatra is an adjective, meaning endowed with independent strength, synonymous with svá-tavas, I, 166, 2. It is applied to the mind of Indra, I, 54, 3; V, 35, 4; to the Maruts, V, 48, 1, but never to horses. As it stands, we can only suppose that a distinction is made between the Maruts and their followers, and that after calling together their followers, and adorning themselves for battle, they proceed to harness their chariots. Cf. I, 107, 2.

Note 2. Etán, in all MSS. which I consulted, has here the accent on the first syllable, and Professor Aufrecht ought not to have altered the word into etán. If the accent had not been preserved by the tradition of the schools, the later interpreters would certainly have taken etán for the demonstrative pronoun. As it is, in spite of accent and termination, Sâyana in I, 166, 10, seems to take étâh for eté. In other passages, however, Sâyana, too, has perceived the difference, and in I, 169, 6, he explains the word very fully as prishadvarnâ gantâro vâ asvâ vâ. In this passage the Etas are clearly the deer of the Maruts, the Prishatis:

I, 169, 6. ádha yát eshâm prithu-budhnâsaḥ étâh.

In the next verse, however, éta seems applied to the Maruts themselves:

I, 169, 7. práti ghorānām étānām ayāsām marútām srinve â-yatām upabdhī.

The sound of the terrible, speckled, indefatigable Maruts is heard, as they approach; unless we translate:

The noise of the terrible deer of the indefatigable Maruts is heard, as they approach.

In I, 166, 10, ámseshu étâh, I adopt Professor Roth's conjecture, that étâh means the skins of the fallow deer, so that we should have to translate: On their shoulders are the deer-skins.

In the other passages where éta occurs it is used as a simile only, and therefore throws no light on the relation of the Etas to the Maruts. In both passages, however (V, 54, 5; X, 77, 2), the simile refers to the Maruts, though to their speed only, and not to their colour.

Note 3. Máhaḥ-bhiḥ, which I have translated 'with all our might,' seems to be used almost as an adverb, mightily or quickly (makshu), although the original meaning, with our powers, through our might, is likewise applicable. The original meaning is quite perceptible in passages like

V, 62, 3. ádhárayatam prithivīm utá dyāṁ mītra-rāgānā varunā máhaḥ-bhiḥ.

Kings Mitra and Varuna, you have supported heaven and earth by your powers.

VII, 3, 7. tébhiḥ naḥ agne ámitaiḥ máhaḥ-bhiḥ satám pûrbhiḥ áyasibhiḥ ní páhi.

With those immeasurable powers, O Agni, protect us, with a hundred iron strongholds.

I, 90, 2. té—máhaḥ-bhiḥ, vratā rakshante visvāḥ.

They always protect the laws by their powers.

VII, 71, 1. tvám naḥ agne máhaḥ-bhiḥ páhi.

Protect us, Agni, with thy power.

In other passages, however, we see máhaḥ-bhiḥ used of the light or of the flames of Agni and of the dawn :

IV, 14, 1. deváh rókamānaḥ máhaḥ-bhiḥ.

Agni, the god, brilliant with his powers.

VI, 64, 2. devi rókamāná máhaḥ-bhiḥ.

O goddess, brilliant with thy powers.

The powers of the Maruts are referred to by the same name in the following passages :

V, 58, 5. prá-pra gāyante—máhaḥ-bhiḥ.

The Maruts are born with their powers.

VII, 58, 2. prá yé máhaḥ-bhiḥ ógasā utá sánti.

The Maruts who excel in power and strength. Cf. III, 4, 6.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Indra in this dialogue is evidently represented as claiming everything for himself alone. He affects contempt for the help proffered by the Maruts, and seems to deny that he was at any time beholden to their assistance. By asking, Where was that custom that I should be with you and you with me in battle? he implies that it was not always their custom, and that he can dispense with their succour now. He wants to be alone, as in his former battle with Ahi, and does not wish that they should join him (cf. I, 33, 4). Professor Roth takes sam-ádhatta in the sense of implicating, but it can hardly be said that the Maruts ever implicated Indra in his fight against Ahi. Certainly this is not in keeping with the general tenor of this dialogue where, on the contrary, Indra shuns the company of the Maruts. But while on this point I differ from Professor Roth, I think he has rightly interpreted the meaning of ánamam. Out of the four passages in which badhasnañ occurs, it is three times joined with nam, and every time has the sense of to bend away from, to escape from. See also Sonne, in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xii, p. 348.

Verse 7.

Note 1. See VII, 39, 6. sakshímáhi yúgyebhiñ nú devañ.

Note 2. The last words leave no doubt as to their meaning, for the phrase is one of frequent occurrence. The only difficulty is the vocative marutañ, where we should expect the nominative. It is quite possible, however, that the Maruts should here address themselves, though, no doubt, it would be easy to alter the accent. As to the phrase itself, see

VIII, 61, 4. táthá ít asat índra krátvá yáthá vásañ.

May it be so, O Indra, as thou mayest desire by thy mind.

VIII, 66, 4. vagríñ—ít karat índrañ krátvá yáthá vásat.

May Indra with the thunderbolt act as he may desire in his mind. Cf. VIII, 20, 17; 28, 4, &c.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Here again Indra claims everything for himself, denying that the Maruts in any way assisted him while performing his great deeds. These deeds are the killing of Vṛitra, who withholds the waters, i. e. the rain from the earth, and the consequent liberation of the waters, so that they flow down freely for the benefit of Manu, that is, of man.

When Indra says that he slew Vṛitra indriyēna, he evidently chooses that word with a purpose, and we must therefore translate it here, not only by might, but by Indra's peculiar might. Indriyá, as derived from índra, means originally Indra-hood, then power in general, just as verethraghna in Zend means victory in general, though originally it meant the slaying of Vṛitra.

On bádhīm, see Bollensen, Z. D. M. G. XXII, p. 594.

He takes bádhiṃ for a contraction of badhisham, in analogy with badhiṣ and badhīt. He refers to akramiṃ, X, 166, 5, and badhiṃ, X, 28, 7.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Ánutta, in the sense of 'not shaken,' not shakeable, inébranlable, is strange; likewise the genitive, where we expect the instrumental. Still, nud, by itself, occurs in similar phrases, e. g. VI, 17, 5, nutthák ákyutam, thou shookest what is unshakeable, which might have been expressed by ákukyavaḥ ánuttam, and I cannot bring myself to believe that in our passage Aufrecht's conjectural emendation is called for. He (K. Z. XXVI, 611) takes ánutta for ánudatta, like pratta for pradatta, &c., and proposes to omit the negative particle, translating the verse: 'Certainly it is conceded to thee, there is none among the gods like unto thee.'

But though I cannot adopt this emendation here, I think that in other passages Aufrecht's rendering of ánutta is far more appropriate than to take it for a-nutta; for instance, I, 80, 7; III, 31, 13; VII, 34, 11.

There remains one verse in which anutta seems to mean not shaken, not overcome, namely, VIII, 90, 5, tvám vritráni hamsi apratīni ékaḥ ít ánuttá karshani-dhrítá, thou, being alone, killest the irresistible enemies with the thunderbolt (?). However, anudá, in the sense of conceding, yielding, nachgeben, is certainly a very familiar idea in Vedic poetry.

II, 12, 10. yák sárdhate ná anu-dádāti sridhyám, who does not forgive the hurter his hurt.

I, 53, 8; II, 21, 4; 23, 11; X, 38, 5, Indra is called ananudák, not yielding, not surrendering.

We must therefore admit two anuttas, one á-nutta, the other ánu(da)tta. In ánutta-manyu I prefer the former, 'of irresistible fury,' while Aufrecht prefers the latter, 'of recognised, or universally-admitted fury.'

Note 2. Devátá in the ordinary sense of a deity never occurs in the Rig-veda. The word, in fact, as a feminine substantive occurs but twice, and in the tenth Mandala only. But even there it does not mean deity. In X, 24, 6, devāḥ devátayā means, O gods, by your godhead, i.e. by your divine power. In X, 98, 1, br̥haspate prāti me devátām ihi, I take devátā in the same sense as devátāti, and translate, O Br̥haspati, come to my sacrifice.

In all other places where devátā occurs in the Rig-veda it is a local adverb, and means among the gods. I shall only quote those passages in which Professor Roth assigns to devátā a different meaning :

I, 55, 3. prā vīryēṇa devátā āti kekite.

He is pre-eminent among the gods by his strength.

I, 22, 5. sáḥ kēttā devátā padám.

He knows the place among the gods.

I, 100, 15. ná yásya devāḥ devátā ná mártāḥ āpah kánā sávasaḥ ántam āpúḥ.

He, the end of whose power neither the gods among the gods, nor mortals, nor even the waters have reached.

Here the translation of devátā in the sense of 'by their godhead,' would be equally applicable, yet nothing would be gained as, in either case, devátā is a weak repetition.

VI, 4, 7. índram ná tvā sávasā devátā vāyúm prínanti rāḍhasā nṛt-tamāḥ.

The best among men celebrate thee, O Agni, as like unto Indra in strength among the gods, as like unto Vāyu in liberality. See also devatāti, VIII, 74, 3 ; X, 8, 2.

Note 3. The juxta-position of gāyamānaḥ and gātāḥ would seem to show that, if the latter had a past, the former had a future meaning. To us, 'No one who will be born and no one who has been born,' would certainly sound more natural. The Hindu, however, is familiar with the idea as here expressed, and in order to comprehend all beings, he speaks of those who are born and those who are being born. Thus in a Padasishṭa of the Pāvamānīs (IX, 67) we read :

yan me garbhe vasataḥ pápam ugram, yag gāyamānasya ka kimkid anyat, gātasya ka yak kāpi vardhato me,
tat pávamānibhir aham punāmi.

Note 4. Karishyā is written in all the MSS. without a Visarga, and unless we add the Visarga on our own authority, we should have to take it as an entirely anomalous acc. plur. neut. of a passive participle of the future, karishyám standing for kāryām, faciendum. It is much easier, however, to explain this form if we add the Visarga, and read karishyāḥ, which would then be a second person singular of a Vedic conjunctive of the future. This form occurs at least once more in the Veda :

IV, 30, 23. utá nūnám yát indriyám karishyāḥ indra paúmsyam, adyá nákiḥ tát ā minat.

O Indra, let no man destroy to-day whatever manly feat thou art now going to achieve.

Verse 10.

Note 1. As I have translated these words, they sound rather abrupt. The meaning, however, would be clear enough, viz. almighty power belongs to me, therefore I can dare and do. If this abrupt expression should offend, it may be avoided, by taking the participle dadhṛishván as a finite verb, and translating, Whatever I have been daring, I shall do according to my will.

Verse 11.

Note 1. In this verse Indra, after having declined with no uncertain sound the friendship of the Maruts, seems to repent himself of his unkindness towards his old friends. The words of praise which they addressed to him in verse 9, in spite of the rebuff they had received from Indra, have touched his heart, and we may suppose that, after this, their reconciliation was complete. The words of Indra are clear enough, the only difficulty occurs in the last words; which are so idiomatic that it is impossible to render them in English. In tanvë tanúbhiḥ, literally for the body by the bodies, tanû is used like the pronoun self. Both must therefore refer to the same subject. We cannot translate 'for myself made by yourselves,' but must take the two words together, so that they should mean, 'the hymn which you have made for your own benefit and by your own exertions.'

Verse 13.

Note 1. Spiegel, in his review, called my attention to the Zend api-vat, which Burnouf discussed in his 'Études,' p. 328. Burnouf tries to show that vat in Zend has the meaning of knowing, and that it occurs with the preposition api, in apivatahê and apivatâiti. If this is the same word as in Sanskrit, then apivâtayati would be a causative, meaning to make known. The meaning of vat, however, is doubtful in Zend, and hardly appropriate in the few passages where it occurs in the Veda. Roth, in the Dictionary, explains vat by verstehn, begreifen, the causative by begreiflich machen; but in our passage he translates it by belebend, Ludwig by aufspürend. Till we get more light, I shall feel content to translate apivat by to approach, to obtain, and the causative by to make approach, to invite, to welcome.

The following are the passages in which api-vat occurs :
VII, 3, 10. âpi krátum su-kétasam vatemala.

May we obtain an excellent understanding; not, Awaken in us a good sense.

VII, 60, 6. âpi krátum su-kétasam vátantaḥ.

They (Mitra and Varuṇa) obtaining an excellent understanding.

I, 128, 2. tám yagñā-sādhām âpi vâtayâmasi.

Him, Agni, the performer of the sacrifice, we make approach, we invite.

X, 20, 1; 25, 1. bhádram naḥ âpi vâtaya mánah, dáksham utá krátum.

Bring to us, i. e. give us, a good mind, and a strong understanding.

X, 13, 5. pitré putrásaḥ âpi avíwatan rítam.

The sons obtained the right for the father (an obscure verse).

As to svapivâta, VII, 46, 3, I should derive it from van, in the sense of implored, desired; see, however, Muir, Sanskrit Texts, IV, p. 314, note; Nirukta, ed. Roth, p. 135.

Note 2. On návedāḥ, see IV, 23, 4.

Verse 14.

Note 1. This is a verse which, without some conjectural alterations, it seems impossible to translate. Sâyana, of course, has a translation ready for it, so has M. Langlois, but both of them offend against the simplest rules of grammar and logic. The first question is, who is meant by asmān (which is here used as an amphimacer), the sacrificers or the Maruts? The verb ā kakré would well apply to the medhā manyāsya, the hymn of Mānya, which is intended to bring the Maruts to the sacrifice, this bringing to the sacrifice being the very meaning of ā kar. But then we have the vocative marutaḥ in the next line, and even if we changed the vocative into the accusative, we should not gain much, as the Maruts could hardly call upon anybody to turn them towards the sage.

If, on the contrary, we admit that asmān refers to those who offer the sacrifice, then we must make a distinction, which, it is true, is not an unusual one, between those who here speak of themselves in the first person, and who provide the sacrifice, and the poet Māndārya Mānya, who was employed by them to compose or to recite this hymn.

But even if we adopt this alternative, many difficulties still remain. First of all, we have to change the accent of kakré into kakre, which may seem a slight change, but is not the less objectionable when we consider that in our emendations of the Vedic hymns we must think rather of accidents that might happen in oral traditions than of the lapsus calami of later scribes. Secondly, we must suppose that the hymn of Māndārya Mānya ends with verse 13, and that the last verses were supplied by the sacrificers themselves. Possibly the dialogue only, from verse 3 to verse 12, was the work of Mānya, and the rest added at some solemn occasion.

Other difficulties, however, remain. Duvasyāt is taken by Sâyana as an ablative of duvasyā, worthy of dúvas, i. e. of worship, of sacrifice. Unfortunately this duvasyā does not occur again, though it would be formed quite regularly, like namasyā, worthy of worship, from nāmas, worship.

If we take duvasyāt as the 3rd pers. sing. of the present in the Vedic conjunctive, we must also confess that this conjunctive does not occur again. But the verb duvasyati occurs frequently. It seems to have two meanings. It is derived from dúvas, which in the Vedic language means worship or sacrifice, just as karma, work, has assumed the special sense of sacrifice. Derived from dúvas in this sense, duvasyati means to worship. But dúvas meant originally any opus operatum. The root from which dúvas is derived, is lost in Sanskrit, but it exists in other languages. It must have been du or dû in the sense of acting, or sedulously working. It exists in Zend as du, to do, in Gothic as táujan, gataujan, Old High-German zawjan, Modern German zauen (Grimm, Gram. i². p. 1041). The Gothic tavi, opus, Old High-German zouwi, Middle High-German gezöuwe (Grimm, Gram. iii. p. 499), come from the same source; and it is possible, too, that the Old Norse taufr, modern töfrar, incantamenta, the Old High-German zoupar, Middle High-German zouber, both neuter, and the modern Zauber, may find their explanation in the Sanskrit dúvas. Derived from dúvas, in the sense of work, we have duvasyati in the sense of helping, providing, the German schaffen and verschaffen.

In the sense of worshipping, duvasyati occurs,

III, 2, 8. duvasyáta—gâtá-vedasam.

Worship Gâtavedas.

V, 28, 6. ā guhota duvasyáta agním.

Invoke, worship Agni. Cf. III, 13, 3; 1, 13.

III, 3, 1. agníh hí devān—duvasyáti.

Agni performs the worship of the gods. Cf. VII, 82, 5.

I, 167, 6. sutá-somaḥ duvasyán.

He who has poured out Soma and worships.

In many passages duvasyati is joined with an instrumental:

V, 42, 11. námaḥ-bhiḥ devám—duvasya.

Worship the god with praises.

I, 78, 2. tám u tvā gótamaḥ girā—duvasyati.

Gotama worships thee with a song.

V, 49, 2. su-uktaíḥ devám—duvasya.

Worship the god with hymns.

VI, 16, 46. vitṛ yáḥ devám—duvasyét.

He who worships the god with a feast.

X, 14, 1. yamám—havíśhâ duvasya.

Worship Yama with an oblation.

VI, 15, 6. agnīm-agnim vaḥ samídhâ duvasyata.

Worship Agni with your log of wood. Cf. VIII, 44, 1.

III, 1, 2. samít-bhiḥ agnīm námasâ duvasyan.

They worshipped Agni with logs of wood, with praise.

In the more general and, I suppose, more original sense of caring for, attending, we find duvasyati :

III, 51, 3. anehásaḥ stúbhaḥ índraḥ duvasyati.

Indra provides for the matchless worshippers.

I, 112, 15. kalīm yābhiḥ—duvasyáthaḥ.

By the succours with which you help Kali. Cf. I, 112, 21.

I, 62, 10. duvasyánti svásáraḥ áhrayānam.

The sisters attend the proud (Agni).

I, 119, 10. yuvám pedáve—svetám—duvasyathaḥ.

You provide for Pedu the white horse.

If, then, we take duvasyati in the sense of working for, assisting, it may be with the special sense of assisting at a sacred act, like διακονεῖν; and if we take duvās, as it has the accent on the last syllable, as the performer of a sacrifice, we may venture to translate, 'that he should help, as the singer helps the performer of the sacrifice*.' The singer or the poet may be called the assistant at a sacrifice, for his presence was not necessary at all sacrifices, the songs constituting an ornament rather than an essential part in most sacred acts. But though I think it right to offer this conjectural interpretation, I am far from supposing that it gives us the real sense of this difficult verse. Duvasyāt may be, as Sāyana suggests, an ablative of duvasyá; and duvasyá, like namasyā, if we change the accent, may mean he who is to be worshipped, or worshipping. In this way a different interpretation might suggest itself, though I confess I do not see that any other interpretation as yet suggested is satisfactory. Some happy thought may some day or other clear up this difficulty, when those who have toiled, but toiled in a wrong direction, will receive scant thanks for the trouble they have taken. See Bollensen, Z. D. M. G. XVIII, p. 606.

* Kar in the sense of officiating at a sacrifice is equally construed with a dative, X, 97, 22. yásmai kṛinóti bráhmaṇáh, he for whom a Bráhmaṇa performs a sacrifice.

Note 2. In the second line, the words ó sú varta remind us of similar phrases in the Veda, but we want an accusative, governed by varta; whereas marutaḥ, to judge from its accent, can only be a vocative. Thus we read :

I, 138, 4. ó (iti) sú tvā vavṛitmahī stómebhiḥ.

May we turn thee quickly hither by our praises!

VIII, 7, 33. ó (iti) sú vṛishnah—vavṛityām.

May I turn the heroes quickly hither!

Compare also passages like III, 33, 8 :

ó (iti) sú svasārah kārāve sṛinota.

Listen quickly, O sisters, to the poet.

I, 139, 7. ó (iti) sú nah agne sṛinuhi.

Hear us quickly, O Agni.

Cf. I, 182, 1; II, 34, 15; VII, 59, 5; VIII, 2, 19; X, 179, 2.

Unless we change the accent, we must translate, 'Bring hither quickly!' and we must take these words as addressed to the kāru, the poet, whose hymn is supposed to attract the gods to the sacrifice. By a quick transition, the next words, marutaḥ vípram ákkha, would then have to be taken as addressed to the gods, 'Maruts, on to the sage!' and the last words would become intelligible by laying stress on the vaḥ, 'for you, and not for Indra or any other god, has the singer recited these hymns.' See, however, Preface, p. xxi.

Verse 15.

Note 1. I translate Mánya, the son of Mána, because the poet, so called in I, 189, 8, is in all probability the same as our Mándārya Mánya. But it may also be Mánya, the descendant of Mandāri. The Mānas are mentioned I, 172, 5; 182, 8.

Note 2. Vāg. S. XXXIV, 48. The second line is difficult, owing to the uncertain meaning of vayām.

Ā ishā^a yāśishā has been rendered, 'Come hither with ^a There was a misprint in the Samhitā text, eshā instead of éshā, which was afterwards repeated whenever the same verse occurred again.

water or drink or rain,' yâsishṭa being the aorist without the augment and with the intermediate vowel lengthened. The indicative occurs in

V, 58, 6. yât prâ âyâsishṭa prîshatîbhiḥ âsvaiḥ.

When you Maruts came forth with your fallow deer and your horses.

But what is the meaning of vayāṃ? Vayā means a germ, a sprout, an offshoot, a branch, as may be seen from the following passages:

II, 5, 4. vidvān asya vratā dhruvā vayāḥ-iva ānu rohate.

He who knows his eternal laws, springs up like young sprouts. (Better vayā-iva.)

VI, 7, 6. tāsya it ūm (īti) vīsvā bhūvanā ādhi mûrdhāni vayāḥ-iva ruruhuḥ.

From above the head of Vaisvanara all worlds have grown, like young sprouts.

VIII, 13, 6. stotā—vayāḥ-iva ānu rohate. (Better vayā-iva.)

The worshipper grows up like young sprouts.

VIII, 13, 17. īndram kshonīḥ avardhayan vayāḥ-iva.

The people made Indra to grow like young sprouts.

VIII, 19, 33. yāsya te agne anyé agnāyaḥ upa-kshītaḥ vayāḥ-iva.

Agni, of whom the other fires are like parasitical shoots.

I, 59, 1. vayāḥ it agne agnāyaḥ te anyé.

O Agni, the other fires are indeed offshoots of thee.

II, 35, 8. vayāḥ it anyā bhūvanāni asya.

The other worlds are indeed his (the rising sun's) offshoots.

VI, 13, 1. tvât vīsvā—saubhagāni āgne vī yanti vanīnaḥ nā vayāḥ.

From thee, O Agni, spring all happinesses, as the sprouts of a tree.

VI, 24, 3. vrikshāsya nū (nā?) te—vayāḥ vī ūtāyaḥ ruruhuḥ.

Succours sprang from thee, like the branches of a tree.

V, 1, 1. yahvāḥ-iva prâ vayāṃ ut-gîhānāḥ prâ bhānāvaḥ sisrate nākam ākkha.

Like birds(?) flying up to a branch, the flames of Agni went up to heaven; (or like strong men reaching up to.)

VI, 57, 5. tām pūshnāḥ su-matīm vayām vrikshāsya prā vayām-iva índrasya ka ā rabhāmahe.

Let us reach this favour of Pūshan and of Indra, as one reaches forth to the branch of a tree.

There remain some doubtful passages in which vayā occurs, VII, 40, 5, and X, 92, 3; 134, 6. In the first passage, as in our own, vayāḥ is trisyllabic.

If vayā can be used in the sense of offshoot or sprout, we may conclude that the same word, used in the singular, might mean offspring, particularly when joined with tanvē. 'Give a branch to our body,' would be understood even in languages less metaphorical than that of the Vedas; and as the prayer for 'olive branches' is a constant theme of the Vedic poets, the very absence of that prayer here, might justify us in assigning this sense to vayām. In VI, 2, 5, the expression vayāvantam ksháyam, a house with branches, means the same as nṛvántam, a house with children and men. See M. M., On Bíos and váyas, in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xv, p. 215. Benfey (Endungen in íans, p. 37) takes vayām as a genitive plural, referring it to the Maruts, as closely connected with each other, like branches of a tree. This is much the same interpretation as that of Mahīdhara (VS. XXXIV, 48), who translates 'come near for the body, i. e. for the bodily strength of the fellows, the Maruts.' Ludwig takes it as a possible instrumental of vayam.

It is preferable, however, to take yāsishṭa as a precative Ātm., in order to account for the long ī, and to accept it as a third person singular, referring to stómaḥ.

Note 3. Vṛigāna means an enclosure, a vomós, whether it be derived from vrig, to ward off, like arx from arcere, or from vrig, in the sense of clearing, as in vrikta-barhis, barhíḥ prā vṛiṅge, I, 116, 1. In either case the meaning remains much the same, viz. a field, cleared for pasture or agriculture,—a clearing, as it is called in America, or a camp,—enclosed with hurdles or walls, so as to be capable of defence against wild animals or against enemies. In this sense, however, vṛigana is a neuter, while as a masculine it means powerful, invigorating. See Preface, p. xx.

MANDALA I, HYMN 166.

ASHTAKA II, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 1-8.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Let us now proclaim for the robust¹ host, for the herald² of the powerful (Indra), their ancient greatness! O ye strong-voiced Maruts, you heroes, prove your powers on your march, as with a torch, as with a sword³!

2. Like parents bringing a dainty to¹ their own² son, the wild (Maruts) play playfully at the sacrifices. The Rudras reach the worshipper with their protection, strong in themselves, they do not fail the sacrificer.

3. For him to whom the immortal guardians have given fulness of wealth, and who is himself a giver of oblations, the Maruts, who gladden men with the milk (of rain), pour out, like friends, many clouds.

4. You who have stirred¹ up the clouds with might, your horses rushed² forth, self-guided. All beings who dwell in houses³ are afraid of you, your march is brilliant with your spears thrust forth.

5. When they whose march is terrible have caused the rocks to tremble¹, or when the manly Maruts have shaken the back of heaven, then every lord of the forest fears at your racing, each shrub flies out of your way², whirling like chariot-wheels³.

6. You, O terrible Maruts, whose ranks are never broken, favourably¹ fulfil our prayer²! Wherever your gory-toothed³ lightning bites⁴, it crunches⁵ cattle, like a well-aimed bolt⁶.

7. The Maruts whose gifts are firm, whose bounties are never ceasing, who do not revile¹, and who are highly praised at the sacrifices, they sing their song² for to drink the sweet juice: they know the first manly deeds of the hero (Indra).

8. The man whom you have guarded, O Maruts, shield him with hundredfold strongholds from injury¹ and mischief,—the man whom you, O fearful, powerful singers, protect from reproach in the prosperity of his children.

9. On your chariots, O Maruts, there are all good things, strong weapons¹ are piled up clashing against each other. When you are on your journeys, you carry the rings² on your shoulders, and your axle turns the two wheels at once³.

10. In their manly arms there are many good things, on their chests golden chains¹, flaring² ornaments, on their shoulders speckled deer-skins³, on their fellies sharp edges⁴; as birds spread their wings, they spread out splendours behind.

11. They, mighty by might, all-powerful powers¹, visible from afar like the heavens² with the stars, sweet-toned, soft-tongued singers with their mouths³, the Maruts, united with Indra, shout all around.

12. This is your greatness¹, O well-born Maruts!—your bounty³ extends far, as the sway² of Aditi⁴. Not even⁵ Indra in his scorn⁶ can injure that bounty, on whatever man you have bestowed it for his good deeds.

13. This is your kinship (with us), O Maruts, that you, immortals, in former years have often protected the singer¹. Having through this prayer granted a hearing to man, all these heroes together have become well-known by their valiant deeds.

14. That we may long flourish, O Maruts, with your wealth, O ye racers, that our men may spread in the camp, therefore let me achieve the rite with these offerings.

15. May this praise, O Maruts, this song of Mândârya, the son of Mâna, the poet, ask you with food for offspring for ourselves! May we have an invigorating autumn, with quickening rain!

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Agastya, the reputed son of Mitrāvaruṇau, and brother of Vasishṭha. The metre in verses 1-13 is Gāgati, in 14, 15 Trishṭubh. No verse of this hymn occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS., TB.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Rabhasá, an adjective of rábhas, and this again from the root rabh, to rush upon a thing, á-rabh, to begin a thing. From this root rabh we have the Latin robur, in the general sense of strength, while in rabies the original meaning of impetuous motion has been more clearly preserved. The Greek λάβρος, too, as pointed out by Cowell, comes from this root. In the Vedic Sanskrit, derivatives from the root rabh convey the meaning both of quickness and of strength. Quickness in ancient languages frequently implies strength, and strength implies quickness, as we see, for instance, from the German snēl, which, from meaning originally strong, comes to mean in modern German quick, and quick only. The German bald again, meaning soon, comes from the Gothic balþs, the English bold. Thus we read :

I, 145, 3. śśuk ā adatta sám rábhaḥ.

The child (Agni) acquired vigour.

Indra is called rabhaḥ-dāḥ, giver of strength ; and rabhasá, vigorous, is applied not only to the Maruts, who in V, 58, 5, are called rábhishthāḥ, the most vigorous, but also to Agni, II, 10, 4, and to Indra, III, 31, 12.

In the sense of rabid, furious, it occurs in X, 95, 14. ádha enam vṛkáḥ rabhasāsaḥ adyúḥ.

May rabid wolves eat him !

In the next verse rabhasá, the epithet of the wolves, is replaced by śśiva, which means unlucky, uncanny.

In our hymn rabhasá occurs once more, and is applied there, in verse 10, to the aṅgí or glittering ornaments of the Maruts. Here Sáyana translates it by lovely, and it was most likely intended to convey the idea of lively or brilliant splendour, though it may mean also strong. See also IX, 96, 1.

Note 2. Ketú, derived from an old root ki, in Sanskrit ki, to perceive, from which also kitra, conspicuous, ken-speckled, beautiful, means originally that by which a thing is perceived or known, whether a sign, or a flag, or a herald. It is the Gothic haidu, species. It then takes the more general sense of light and splendour. In our passage, herald seems to me the most appropriate rendering, though B. and R. prefer the sense of banner. The Maruts come before Indra, they announce the arrival of Indra, they are the first of his army.

Note 3. The real difficulty of our verse lies in the two comparisons aidhā-iva and yudhā-iva. Neither of them occurs again in the Rīg-veda. B. and R. explain aidhā as an instrumental of aidh, flaming, or flame, and derive it from the root idh, to kindle, with the preposition ā. Professor Bollensen in his excellent article Zur Herstellung des Veda (Orient und Occident, vol. iii, p. 473) says: 'The analysis of the text given in the Pada, viz. aidhā-iva and yudhā-iva, is contrary to all sense. The common predicate is taviṣhāmi kartana, exercise your power, you roarers, i. e. blow as if you meant to kindle the fire on the altar, show your power as if you went to battle. We ought therefore to read aidhé | va and yudhé | va. Both are infinitives, aidh is nothing but the root idh + ā, to kindle, to light.' Now this is certainly a very ingenious explanation, but it rests on a supposition which I cannot consider as proved, viz. that in the Veda, as in Pāli, the comparative particle iva may be changed, as shown in the preface to the first edition, to va. It must be admitted that the two short syllables of iva are occasionally counted in the Veda as one, but yudhé-iva, though it might become yudhá iva, would never in the Veda become yudhéva.

As yudhā occurs frequently in the Veda, we may begin by admitting that the parallel form aidhā must be explained in analogy to yudhā. Now yúdh is a verbal noun and means fighting. We have the accusative yúdham, I, 53, 7; the genitive yudháḥ, VIII, 27, 17; the dative yudhé, I, 61, 13; the locative yudhí, I, 8, 3; the instrumental yudhā, I, 53, 7, &c.; loc. plur. yut-sú, I, 91, 21. As long as yúdh retains the general predicative meaning of fighting, some of these cases may be called infinitives. But yúdh soon assumes not only the meaning of battle, battle-ground, but also of instrument of fighting, weapon. In another passage, X, 103, 2, yúdhāḥ may be taken as a vocative plural, meaning fighters. Passages in which yúdh means clearly weapon, are, for instance,

V, 52, 6. ārukmaḥ ā yudhā nārah rishvāḥ rishṭīḥ asrikshata.

With their bright chains, with their weapon, the tall men have stretched forth the spears.

X, 55, 8. pītṛī sómasya divāḥ ā vridhānāḥ sūrah nīḥ yudhā adhamat dāsýūn.

The hero, growing, after drinking the Soma, blew away from the sky the enemies with his weapon. See also X, 103, 4.

I therefore take yúdh in our passage also in the sense of weapon or sword, and, in accordance with this, I assign to aīdh the meaning of torch. Whether aīdh comes from idh with the preposition ā, which, after all, would only give edh, or whether we have in the Sanskrit aīdh the same peculiar strengthening which this very root shows in Greek and Latin*, would be difficult to decide. The torch of the Maruts is the lightning, the weapon the thunderbolt, and by both they manifest their strength; ferro et igne, as Ludwig remarks.

WILSON: We proclaim eagerly, Maruts, your ancient greatness, for (the sake of inducing) your prompt appearance, as the indication of (the approach of) the showerer (of benefits). Loud-roaring and mighty Maruts, you exert your vigorous energies for the advance (to the sacrifice), as if it was to battle.

Verse 2.

NOTE 1. That úpa can be construed with the accusative is clear from many passages:

III, 35, 2. úpa imám yagnám ā vahātaḥ indram.

Bring Indra to this sacrifice!

I, 25, 4. váyah ná vasatīḥ úpa.

As birds (fly) to their nests.

* Schleicher, Compendium, § 36, αἶδω, αἰδέομαι, αἰδοῦναι; and § 49, aides, aidilis aestas.

Note 2. Nítya, from *ni + tya, means originally what is inside, internus, then what is one's own; and is opposed to níshṭya, from nis + tya, what is outside, strange, or hostile. Nítya has been well compared with nigá, literally eingeboren, then, like nítya, one's own. What is inside, or in a thing or place, is its own, is peculiar to it, does not move or change, and hence the secondary meanings of nítya, one's own, unchanging, eternal. Thus we find nítya used in the sense of internal or domestic:

I, 73, 4. tám tvá nárah dāme ā nítyam iddhām āgne sákanta kshitíshu dhruvāsu.

Our men worshipped thee, O Agni, lighted within the house in safe places.

This I believe to be a more appropriate rendering than if we take nítya in the sense of always, continuously lighted, or, as some propose, in the sense of eternal, everlasting.

VII, 1, 2. dakshāyāh yāh dāme āsa nítyah.

Agni who is to be pleased within the house, i. e. as belonging to the house, and, in that sense, who is to be pleased always. Cf. I, 140, 7; 141, 2; X, 12, 2, and III, 25, 5, where nítyah, however, may have been intended as an adjective belonging to the vocative sūno.

Most frequently nítya occurs with sūnú, I, 66, 1; 185, 2; tánaya, III, 15, 2; X, 39, 14; toká, II, 2, 11; āpí, VII, 88, 6; páti, I, 71, 1, and has always the meaning of one's own, very much like the later Sanskrit nigā, which never occurs in the Rig-veda, though it makes its appearance in the Ātharvāna.

Níshṭya, extraneus, occurs three times in the Rig-veda:

VI, 75, 19. yāh nah svāh áranah yāh ka níshṭyah gíghāmsati.

Whoever wishes to hurt us, our own friend or a stranger from without.

X, 133, 5. yāh nah indra abhi-dāsati sá-nábhih yāh ka níshṭyah.

He who infests us, O Indra, whether a relative or a stranger.

VIII, 1, 13. mā bhūma níshṭyāh-iva indra tvád áranāh-iva.

* Āpa-tya; cf. Bopp, Accentuationssystem, § 138, ἐπι-σσαι, Nachkommen.

Let us not be like outsiders, O Indra, not like strangers to thee.

WILSON: Ever accepting the sweet (libation), as (they would) a son, they sport playfully at sacrifices, demolishing (all intruders).

LUDWIG: Wie einen nicht absterbenden Sohn das Madhu bringend.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Ávyata, a Vedic second aorist of vî (ag), to stir up, to excite. From it pravayana, a goad, pra-vetar, a driver. The Greek οἶστρος, gad-fly, has been referred to the same root. See Fick, Wörterbuch, p. 170.

Roth (Wenzel, Instrumental, p. 54) translates: 'While you quickly throw yourselves into the mists;' from a verb vyâ.

Note 2. Adhragan, from dhrag, a root which, by metathesis of aspiration, would assume the form of dragh or dragh. In Greek, the final medial aspirate being hardened, reacts on the initial media, and changes it to t, as bâhu becomes πῆχυς, budh πυθ, bandh πενθ. This would give us τρεχ, the Greek root for running, Goth. thrag-jan.

Note 3. Harmyâ is used here as an adjective of bhúvana, and can only mean living in houses. It does not, however, occur again in the same sense, though it occurs several times as a substantive, meaning house. Its original meaning is fire-pit, then hearth, then house, a transition of meaning analogous to that of aedes. Most of the ancient nations begin their kitchen with a fire-pit. 'They dig a hole in the ground, take a piece of the animal's raw hide, and press it down with their hands close to the sides of the hole, which thus becomes a sort of pot or basin. This they fill with water, and they make a number of stones red-hot in a fire close by. The meat is put into the water, and the stones dropped in till the meat is boiled. Catlin describes the process as awkward and tedious, and says that since the Assinaboins had learnt from the Mandans to make pottery, and had been supplied with vessels by the traders, they had entirely done away the custom, "excepting at public festivals; where they seem, like all others of the human family, to take pleasure in cherishing and perpetuating their ancient customs^a.”’ This pit was called harmyá^b or gharmá, which is the Latin formus. Thus we read :

VII, 56, 16. té harmye-sthāh śśavaḥ ná subhrāh.

The Maruts bright like boys standing by the hearth.

From meaning fire-pit, or hearth, harmyá afterwards takes the more general sense of house :

VII, 55, 6. téshām sám hanmaḥ akshāni yáthā idám harmyám táthā.

We shut their eyes as we shut this house (possibly, this oven).

VII, 76, 2. pratikī ā agāt ádhi harmyébhyaḥ.

The dawn comes near, over the house-tops.

X, 46, 3. gātāḥ ā harmyéshu.

Agni, born in the houses.

X, 73, 10. manyóḥ iyáya harmyéshu tasthau.

He came from Manyu, he remained in the houses.

In some of these passages harmyá might be taken in the sense of householder ; but as harmyá in VII, 55, 6, has clearly the meaning of a building, it seems better not to assign to it unnecessarily any new significations.

If harmya or harma* meant originally a fire-pit, then a hearth, a house, we see the close connection between harma and gharma, harmya and gharmya. Thus by the side of harmyeshtha we find gharmyeshtha (RV. X, 106, 5). We find gharma meaning, not only heat in general, but fire-pit, hearth ; and we find the same word used for what we should call the pit, a place of torture and punishment from which the gods save their worshippers, or into which they throw the evil-doers.

V, 32, 5. yúyutsantam támasi harmyé dhāh.

^a Tylor, Early History of Mankind, p. 262.

^b Spiegel, who had formerly identified harmyá with the Zend zairimya in zairimyaŋura, has afterwards recalled this identification ; see Spiegel, Av. Übers. I, p. 190 ; Commentar über den Avesta, I, p. 297 ; Justi, Handbuch, p. 119 ; Haug, Pahlavi Glossary, p. 22. According to the Parsis, the Hairimyaŋura, a daēva animal which appears at the rising of the sun, is the turtle, and Darmesteter (Ormazd et Ahriman, p. 283) identifies zair in zair-imya with the Greek χαλ-ύς, Sanskrit har-muḥa.

When thou, Indra, hadst placed Sushna, who was anxious to fight, in the darkness of the pit.

In the next verse we find asûryé tāmasi, in the ghastly darkness.

VIII, 5, 23. yuvám kárvāya násatyā ápi-riptāya harmyé sásvat ūtíh dasasyathah.

You, Násatyas, always grant your aid to Karva when thrown into the pit.

This fiery pit into which Atri is thrown, and whence he, too, was saved by the Asvins, is likewise called gharmá, I, 112, 7; 119, 6; VIII, 73, 3; X, 80, 3.

Lastly we find :

X, 114, 10. yadā yamáh bhávati harmyé hitáh.

When Yama is seated in the house, or in the nether world.

When the Pitars, too, the spirits of the departed, the Manes, are called gharma-sád, this is probably intended to mean, dwelling on the hearth (X, 15, 9 and 10), and not dwelling in the abode of Yama.

Kuhn, Zeitschrift, vol. ii, p. 234 : 'Die ihr die Luft erfüllt mit eurer Kraft, hervorstürmt ihr selbst-gelenkten Laufes.'

Verse 5.

Note 1. Nad certainly means to sound, and the causative might be translated by 'to make cry or shriek.' If we took párvata in the sense of cloud, we might translate, 'When you make the clouds roar;' if we took párvata for mountain, we might, with Professor Wilson, render the passage by 'When your brilliant coursers make the mountains echo.' But nad, like other roots which afterwards take the meaning of sounding, means originally to vibrate, to shake; and if we compare analogous passages where nad occurs, we shall see that in our verse, too, the Vedic poet undoubtedly meant nad to be taken in that sense :

VIII, 20, 5. ákyutā kit vah ágman ā nānadati párvatāsaḥ vānaspátih, bhūmih yāmeshu regate.

At your racing even things that are immovable vibrate, the rocks, the lord of the forest; the earth quivers on your ways. (See I, 37, 7, note 1.) Grassmann here translates nadáyanta by erschüttern, but in VIII, 20, 5 by erdröhnt.

Note 2. See I, 37, 7, note 1.

Note 3. Rathiyánti-iva does not occur again. Sâyana explains it, like a woman who wishes for a chariot, or who rides in a chariot. I join it with óshadhi, and take it in the sense of upamánád ákâre (Pân. III, 1, 10), i.e. to behave like or to be like a chariot, whether the comparison is meant to express simply the quickness of chariots or the whirling of their wheels. The Pada has rathiyánti, whereas the more regular form is that of the Samhitâ, rathiyántî. Cf. Prâtisâkhya, 587.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Su-ketúnâ, the instrumental of su-ketú, kindness, good-mindedness, favour. This word occurs in the instrumental only, and always refers to the kindness of the gods; not, like sumatî, to the kindness of the worshipper also :

I, 79, 9. *â nah agne su-ketúnâ rayîm visvâyu-poshasam, mârâikâm dhehi gîvâse.*

Give us, O Agni, through thy favour wealth which supports our whole life, give us grace to live.

I, 127, 11. *sâh nah nêdishîkam dâdrisânâh â bhara âgne devêbhih sâ-kanâh su-ketúnâ mahâh râyâh su-ketúnâ.*

Thou, O Agni, seen close to us, bring to us, in union with the gods, by thy favour, great riches, by thy favour !

I, 159, 5. *asmâbhyam dyâvâprithivî (îti) su-ketúnâ rayîm dhattam vâsu-mantam sata-gvînam.*

Give to us, O Dyâvâprithivî, by your favour, wealth, consisting of treasures and many flocks.

V, 51, 11. *svastî dyâvâprithivî (îti) su-ketúnâ.*

Give us, O Dyâvâprithivî, happiness through your favour !

V, 64, 2. *tâ bâhâvâ su-ketúnâ prá yantam asmai ârkate.*

Stretch out your arms with kindness to this worshipper !

In one passage of the ninth Mandala (IX, 65, 30) we meet with su-ketúnâ, as an accusative, referring to Soma, the gracious, and this would pre-suppose a substantive ketúna, which, however, does not exist.

Note 2. Sumatî has, no doubt, in most passages in the Rig-veda, the meaning of favour, the favour of the gods. 'Let us obtain your favour, let us be in your favour,' are familiar expressions of the Vedic poets. But there are also numerous passages where that meaning is inapplicable, and where, as in our passage, we must translate sumatí by prayer or desire.

In the following passages sumatí is clearly used in its original sense of favour, blessing, or even gift :

I, 73, 6 (7). su-matím bhíkshamānāh.

Begging for thy favour.

I, 171, 1. su-ukténa bhikshe su-matím turānām.

With a hymn I beg for the favour of the quick Maruts.

I, 114, 3. aryāma te su-matím.

May we obtain thy favour! Cf. I, 114, 9.

I, 114, 4. su-matím it vayám asya ā vrinīmahe.

We choose his favour. Cf. III, 33, 11.

I, 117, 23. sádā kavī (iti) su-matím ā kake vām.

I always desire your favour, O ye wise Asvins.

I, 156, 3. mahāh te vishno (iti) su-matím bhagāmahe.

May we, O Vishnu, enjoy the favour of thee, the mighty!

Bhiksh, to beg, used above, is an old desiderative form of bhag, and means to wish to enjoy.

III, 4, 1. su-matím rāsi vásvaḥ.

Thou grantest the favour of wealth.

VII, 39, 1. ūrdhvāh agnīh su-matím vásvaḥ asret.

The lighted fire went up for the favour of wealth. Cf. VII, 60, 11; IX, 97, 26.

III, 57, 6. vāso (iti) rāsva su-matím visvá-ganyām.

Grant us, O Vasu, thy favour, which is glorious among men!

VII, 100, 2. tvām vishno (iti) su-matím visvá-ganyām—dâh.

Mayest thou, Vishnu, give thy favour, which is glorious among men!

X, 11, 7. yāh te agne su-matím mārtaḥ ākshat.

The mortal who obtained thy favour, O Agni.

II, 34, 15. arvākē sā marutaḥ yā vaḥ ūtlh ó (iti) sú vāsrā-iva su-matīh gigātu.

Your help, O Maruts, which is to usward, your favour may it come near, like a cow!

VIII, 22, 4. asmān ākkha su-matīh vām subhaḥ patī (iti) ā dhenúk-iva dhāvatu.

May your favour, O Asvins, hasten towards us, like a cow!

But this meaning is by no means the invariable meaning of sumatí, and it will easily be seen that, in the following passages, the word must be translated by prayer. Thus when Sarasvatī is called (I, 3, 11) kétantī su-matīnām, this can only mean she who knows of the prayers, as before she is called kodayitrī sūnṛtānām, she who excites songs of praise :

I, 151, 7. ákḥha gírah su-matīm gantam asma-yū (īti).

Come towards the songs, towards the prayer, you who are longing for us. Cf. X, 20, 10.

II, 43, 3. tūshnīm āsinah su-matīm kīkiddhi nah.

Sitting quiet, listen, O Sakuni (bird), to our prayer !

V, 1, 10. ā bhāndishthasya su-matīm kīkiddhi.

Take notice of the prayer of thy best praiser ! Cf. V, 33, 1.

VII, 18, 4. ā nah īndrah su-matīm gantu ákḥha.

May Indra come to our prayer !

VII, 31, 10. prá-ketase prá su-matīm kṛinudhvam.

Make a prayer for the wise god !

IX, 96, 2. su-matīm yāti ákḥha.

He (Soma) goes near to the prayer.

X, 148, 3. r̥shinām víprah su-matīm kakánáh.

Thou, the wise, desiring the prayer of the R̥shis.

VIII, 22, 6. tā vām adyá sumatī-bhiḥ subhah patī (īti) ásvinā prá stuvīmahi.

Let us praise to-day the glorious Asvins with our prayers.

IX, 74, 1. tám ímahe su-matī.

We implore him with prayer.

In our passage the verb pipartana, fill or fulfil, indicates in what sense sumatī ought to be taken. Su-matīm pipartana is no more than kāmam pipartana, fulfil our desire ! See VII, 62, 3. ā nah kāmam pūpurantu ; I, 158, 2. kāmapréna-iva mánasā. On sumná, see Burnouf, Études, p. 91, and Aufrecht, in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. iv, p. 274.

Note 3. Kriviḥ-datī has been a crux to ancient and modern interpreters. It is mentioned as a difficult word in the Nighantū, and all that Yāska has to say is that it means possessed of cutting teeth (Nir. VI, 30. krivirdatī vikartanadantī). Professor Roth, in his note to this passage, says that krivi can never have the meaning of well, which is ascribed to it in the Nighantū III, 23, but seems rather to mean an animal, perhaps the wild boar, κῆρπος, with metathesis of v and r. He translates our passage : 'Where your lightning with boar-teeth tears.' In his Dictionary, however, he only says, 'krivis, perhaps the name of an animal, and dant, tooth.' Sâyana contents himself with explaining krivirdatî by vikshepanasîladantî, having teeth that scatter about.

My own translation is founded on the supposition that krivis, the first portion of krivirdatî, has nothing to do with krivi, but is a dialectic variety of kravîs, raw flesh, the Greek κρέας, Latin caro, cruor. It means what is raw, bloody, or gory. From it the adjective krûra, horrible, cruentus (Curtius, Grundzüge, p. 142; Kuhn, Zeitschrift, vol. ii, p. 235). A name of the goddess Durgâ in later Sanskrit is krûradantî, and with a similar conception the lightning, I believe, is here called krivirdatî, with gory teeth.

Note 4. It should be observed that in râdati the simile of the teeth of the lightning is carried on. For râdati may be supposed to have had in the Veda, too, the original meaning of râdere and rôdere, to scratch, to gnaw. Râda and radana in the later Sanskrit mean tooth. It is curious, however, that there is no other passage in the Rig-veda where rad clearly means to bite. It means to cut, in

I, 61, 12. góh ná párvā ví rada tiraskā.

Cut his joint through, as the joint of an ox.

But in most passages where rad occurs in the Veda, it has the meaning of giving. It is not the same which we have in the Zend râd, to give, and which Justi rightly identifies with the root râdh. But rad, to divide, may, like the German theilen in zutheilen, have taken the meaning of giving. Greek δαίω means to divide, but yields δαίς, portion, meal, just as Sanskrit day, to divide, yields dâyas, share, i. e. inheritance.

This meaning is evident in the following passages :

VII, 79, 4. tâvat ushah râdhaḥ asmâbhyam râsva yâvat stotri-bhyah âradah grinânâ.

Grant us, Ushas, so much wealth as thou hast given to the singers, when praised.

I, 116, 7. kakshîvate aradatam pûram-dhim.

You gave wisdom to Kakshîvat.

I, 169, 8. râda marût-bhiḥ surûdhaḥ gó-agrah.

Give to the Maruts gifts, rich in cattle.

VII, 62, 3. ví naḥ sahásram surúdhaḥ radantu.

May they (the gods) give to us a thousand gifts!

I, 117, 11. vāgam víprāya—rádantā.

Giving spoil to the sage!

VI, 61, 6. rāda pūshā-iva naḥ saním.

Give us, Sarasvatī, wealth, like Pūshan!

IX, 93, 4. rada índo (íti) rayím.

Give us, O Indra, wealth!

VII, 32, 18. rada-vaso (íti).

Indra, thou who givest wealth!

In many passages, however, this verb rad is connected with words meaning way or path, and it then becomes a question whether it simply means to grant a way, or to cut a way open for some one. In Zend, too, the same idiom occurs, and Professor Justi explains it by 'prepare a way.' I subjoin the principal passages:

VI, 30, 3. yát ābhyaḥ áradaḥ gâtúm indra.

That thou hast cut a way for them (the rivers). Cf. VII, 74, 4.

IV, 19, 2. prá vartanīḥ aradaḥ visvá-dhenâḥ.

Thou (Indra) hast cut open the paths for all the cows.

X, 75, 2. prá te aradat várunaḥ yátave patháḥ.

Varuna cut the paths for thee to go.

VII, 87, 1. rádat patháḥ várunaḥ súryāya.

Varuna cut paths for Sūrya.

V, 80, 3. patháḥ rádanti suvitāya devī.

She, the dawn, cutting open the paths for welfare.

VII, 60, 4. yásmai ādityāḥ ádhvanaḥ rádanti.

For whom the Ādityas cut roads.

II, 30, 2. patháḥ rádantiḥ—dhúnayaḥ yanti ártham.

Cutting their paths, the rivers go to their goal.

This last verse seems to show that the cutting open of a road is really the idea expressed by rad in all these passages. And thus we find the rivers themselves saying that Indra cut them out or delivered them:

III, 33, 6. indraḥ asmān aradat vágra-bāhuḥ. Cf. X, 89, 7.

Note 5. Rināti, like the preceding expressions krívdāti and rádati, is not chosen at random, for though it has the general meaning of crushing or destroying, it is used by the Vedic poets with special reference to the chewing or crunching by means of the teeth. For instance,

I, 148, 4. purūṇi dasmāḥ nī rināti gāmbhaiḥ.

Agni crunches many things with his jaws.

I, 127, 4. sthīrā kit ānnā nī rināti ógasā.

Even tough morsels he (Agni) crunches fiercely.

In a more general sense we find it used,

V, 41, 10. sokīḥ-kesaḥ nī rināti vānā.

Agni with flaming hair swallows or destroys the forests.

IV, 19, 3. āhim vāgreṇa ví rināḥ.

Thou destroyedst Ahi with the thunderbolt.

X, 120, 1. sadyāḥ gagānāḥ nī rināti sátrūn.

As soon as born he destroys his enemies.

Note 6. Súdhita-iva barhánā. I think the explanation of this phrase given by Sāyana may be retained. He explains súdhitā by suhitā, i. e. sushīḥ preritā, well thrown, well levelled, and barhánā by hatis, tatsādhanā hetir vā, a blow or its instrument, a weapon. Professor Roth takes barhánā as an instrumental, used adverbially, in the sense of powerfully, but he does not explain in what sense súdhitā-iva ought then to be taken. We cannot well refer it to didyút, lightning, on account of the iva, which requires something that can form a simile of the lightning. Nor is su-dhitā ever used as a substantive so as to take the place of svádhitīva. Sú-dhita has apparently many meanings, but they all centre in one common conception. Sú-dhita means well placed, of a thing which is at rest, well arranged, well ordered, secure; or it means well sent, well thrown, of a thing which has been in motion. Applied to human beings, it means well disposed or kind.

III, 23, 1. nīḥ-mathitāḥ sú-dhitāḥ ā sadhá-sṭhe.

Agni produced by rubbing, and well placed in his abode.

VII, 42, 4. sú-pritāḥ agnīḥ sú-dhitāḥ dāme ā.

Agni, who is cherished and well placed in the house.

III, 29, 2. arányoḥ nī-hitāḥ gâtá-vedāḥ gárbhaḥ-iva sú-dhitāḥ garbhínīshu.

Agni placed in the two fire-sticks, well placed like an embryo in the mothers. Cf. X, 27, 16.

VIII, 60, 4. abhī práyāmsi sú-dhitā ā vaso (īti) gahi.

Come, O Vasu, to these well-placed offerings. Cf. I, 135, 4; VI, 15, 15; X, 53, 2.

X, 70, 8. sú-dhitā havīmshi.

The well-placed offerings.

IV, 2, 10 (adhvarām). VII, 7, 3 (barhī).

As applied to āyus, life, súdhita may be translated by well established, safe :

II, 27, 10. asyāma āyūmshi sú-dhitāni pūrvā.

May we obtain the happy long lives of our forefathers.

IV, 50, 8. sá it ksheti sú-dhitāh ókasi své.

That man dwells secure in his own house.

Applied to a missile weapon, súdhita may mean well placed, as it were, well shouldered, well held, before it is thrown ; or well levelled, well aimed, when it is thrown :

I, 167, 3. mīmáksha yéshu sú-dhitā—rishīh.

To whom the well held spear sticks fast.

VI, 33, 3. tvām tām indra ubháyan amitrān dāsā vritrāni āryā ka sūra, vādhih vānā-iva sú-dhitebhih átkaih.

Thou, Indra, O hero, struckest both enemies, the barbarous and the Aryan fiends, like forests with well-aimed weapons.

Applied to a poem, súdhita means well arranged or perfect :

I, 140, 11. idám agne sú-dhitam dúh-dhitāt ádhi priyāt ūm (īti) kit mánmanaḥ préyah astu te.

May this perfect prayer be more agreeable to thee than an imperfect one, though thou likest it.

VII, 32, 13. mántram ákharvam sú-dhitam.

A poem, not mean, well contrived.

As applied to men, súdhita means very much the same as hitá, well disposed, kind :

IV, 6, 7. ádha mitráh ná sú-dhitāh pávakāh agnīh didāya mánushishu vikshú.

Then, like a kind friend, Agni shone among the children of man.

V, 3, 2. mitráam sú-dhitam.

VI, 15, 2. mitráam ná yám sú-dhitam.

VIII, 23, 8. mitráam ná gāne sú-dhitam ritá-vani.

X, 115, 7. mitrásaḥ ná yé sú-dhitāḥ.

At last sú-dhita, without reference to human beings, takes the general sense of kind, good:

III, 11, 8. pári vīsvāni sú-dhitā agnēḥ aryāma mánma-bhiḥ.

May we obtain through our prayers all the goods of Agni.

Here, however, práyāmsi may have to be supplied, and in that case this passage, too, should be classed with those mentioned above, VIII, 60, 4, &c.

If then we consider that súdhita, as applied to weapons, means well held or well aimed, we can hardly doubt that barhánā is here, as Sâyana says, some kind of weapon. I should derive it from barhayati, to crush, which we have, for instance,

I, 133, 5. pisāṅga-bhrishṭim ambhrinām piśāṭim indra sám mrīṇa, sárvaṃ rākshaḥ ní-barhaya.

Pound together the fearful Pisāṭi with his fiery weapons, strike down every Rakshas.

II, 23, 8. br̥haspate deva-nīdaḥ ní-barhaya.

Bṛihaspati strike down the scoffers of the gods. Cf. VI, 61, 3.

Barhánā would therefore mean a weapon intended to crush an enemy, a block of stone, it may be, or a heavy club, and in that sense barhánā occurs at least once more:

VIII, 63, 7. yát pāñka-ganyayā viśā indre ghóshāḥ ásrī-kshata, ástrināt barhánā vipáḥ.

When shouts have been sent up to Indra by the people of the five clans, then the club scattered the spears; or, then he scattered the spears with his club.

In other passages Professor Roth is no doubt right when he assigns to barhánā an adverbial meaning, but I do not think that this meaning would be appropriate in our verse. Grassmann also translates, 'ein wohlgezielter Pfeil.'

Verse 7.

NOTE 1. Alátrināsaḥ, a word which occurs but once more, and which had evidently become unintelligible even at the time of Yāska. He (Nir. VI, 2) explains it by alamâtardano meghaḥ, the cloud which opens easily. This, at least, is the translation given by Professor Roth, though not without hesitation. Alamâtardanaḥ, as a compound, is explained by the commentator as âtardanaparyâptaḥ, alam âtardayitum udakam, i. e. capable of letting off the water. But Devarāgayagvan explains it differently. He says: alam paryâptam âtardanam himsā yasya, bahûdakavāḥkhabalo meghe viśeshyate, i. e. whose injuring is great; the dark cloud is so called because it contains much water. Sāyana, too, attempts several explanations. In III, 30, 10, he seems to derive it from tr̥h, to kill, not, like Yāska, from trid, and he explains its meaning as the cloud which is exceedingly hurt by reason of its holding so much water. In our passage he explains it either as anâtrina, free from injury, or good hurters of enemies, or good givers of rewards.

From all this I am afraid we gain nothing. Let us now see what modern commentators have proposed in order to discover an appropriate meaning in this word. Professor Roth suggests that the word may be derived from rā, to give, and the suffix trina, and the negative particle, thus meaning, one who does not give or yield anything. But, if so, how is this adjective applicable to the Maruts, who in this very verse are praised for their generosity? Langlois in our passage translates, 'heureux de nos louanges;' in III, 30, 10, 'qui laissait flétrir les plantes.' Wilson in our passage translates, 'devoid of malevolence;' but in III, 30, 10, 'heavy.'

I do not pretend to solve all these difficulties, but I may say this in defence of my own explanation that it fulfils the condition of being applicable both to the Maruts and to the demon Bala. The suffix trina is certainly irregular, and I should much prefer to write alâtrina, for in that case we might derive lâtrin from lâtra, and to this lâtra, i. e. râtra, I should ascribe the sense of barking. The root rai or rā means to bark, and has been connected by Professor Aufrecht with Latin rire, inrire, and possibly inritare^a, thus showing a transition of meaning from barking, to provoking or attacking. The same root râ explains also the Latin lâtrare, to bark, allâtrare, to assail; and, whatever ancient etymologists may say to the contrary, the Latin latro, an assailer. The old derivation 'latrones eos antiqui dicebant, qui conducti militabant, ἀπὸ τῆς λατρείας,' seems to me one of those etymologies in which the scholars of Rome, who had learnt a little Greek, delighted as much as scholars who know a little Sanskrit delight in finding some plausible derivation for any Greek or Latin word in Sanskrit. I know that Curtius (Grundzüge, p. 326) and Corssen (Kritische Nachträge, p. 239) take a different view; but a foreign word, derived from λάτρον, pay, hire, would never have proved so fertile as latro has been in Latin.

^a Kuhn, Zeitschrift, vol. ix, p. 233.

If then we could write alâtrinâśaḥ, we should have an appropriate epithet of the Maruts, in the sense of not assailing or not reviling, in fact, free from malevolence, as Wilson translated the word, or rather Sâyana's explanation of it, âtardanarahita. What gives me some confidence in this explanation is this, that it is equally applicable to the other passage where alâtrina occurs, III, 30, 10:

alâtrinâḥ valâḥ indra vragâḥ gôḥ purâ hântoḥ bhâyamânaḥ ví âra.

Without barking did Vala, the keeper of the cow, full of fear, open, before thou struckest him.

If it should be objected that vragâ means always stable, and is not used again in the sense of keeper, one might reply that vragâḥ, in the nom. sing., occurs in this one single passage only, and that bhâyamânaḥ, fearing, clearly implies a personification. Otherwise, one might translate: 'Vala was quiet, O Indra, and the stable of the cow came open, full of fear, before thou struckest.' The meaning of alâtrinâ would remain the same, the not-barking being here used as a sign that Indra's enemy was cowed, and no longer inclined to revile or defy the power of Indra. Hom. hymn. in Merc. 145, οὐδὲ κύνας λελάκοντο.

Note 2. See I, 38, 15, note 1, page 95.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Abhi-hruti seems to have the meaning of assault, injury, insult. It occurs but once, but abhi-hrut, a feminine substantive with the same meaning, occurs several times. The verb hru, which is not mentioned in the Dhâtupâtha, but has been identified with hvar, occurs in our hymn, verse 12:

I, 128, 5. sák nah trâsate duk-itât abhi-hrútaḥ sámsât aghât abhi-hrútaḥ.

He protects us from evil, from assault, from evil speaking, from assault.

X, 63, 11. trâyadhvam nah duk-évâyâḥ abhi-hrútaḥ.

Protect us from mischievous injury!

I, 189, 6. abhi-hrútâm ási hí deva vishpát.

For thou, god, art the deliverer from all assaults. Vishpát, deliverer, from vi and spas, to bind.

Ví-hruta, which occurs twice, means evidently what has been injured or spoiled:

VIII, 1, 12. ishkartâ ví-hrutam púnar (íti).

He who sets right what has been injured. Cf. VIII, 20, 26.

Ávi-hruta again clearly means uninjured, intact, entire:

V, 66, 2. tā hí kshatrám ávi-hrutam—āráte.

For they both have obtained uninjured power.

X, 170, 1. āyuh dádhat yagnā-patau ávi-hrutam.

Giving uninjured life to the lord of the sacrifice.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Tavishá certainly means strength, and that it is used in the plural in the sense of acts of strength, we can see from the first verse of our hymn and other passages. But when we read that tavishāṇi are placed on the chariots of the Maruts, just as before bhadrá, good things, food, &c., are mentioned, it is clear that so abstract a meaning as strength or powers would not be applicable here. We might take it in the modern sense of forces, i. e. your armies, your companions are on your chariots, striving with each other; but as the word is a neuter, weapons, as the means of strength, seemed a preferable rendering. As to mitha-spridhya, see I, 119, 3, p. 164.

Note 2. The rendering of this passage must depend on the question whether the khâdís, whatever they are, can be carried on the shoulders or not. We saw before (p. 120) that khâdís were used both as ornaments and as weapons, and that, when used as weapons, they were most likely rings or quoits with sharp edges. There is at least one other passage where these khâdís are said to be worn on the shoulders :

VII, 56, 13. ámseshu á marutaḥ khādāyaḥ vaḥ vākshah-su rukmāḥ upa-sisriyānāḥ.

On your shoulders are the quoits, on your chests the golden chains are fastened.

In other places the khâdís are said to be in the hands, hásteshu, but this would only show that they are there when actually used for fighting. Thus we read :

I, 168, 3. áeshām ámseshu rambhínī-iva rarabhe, hásteshu khādīḥ ka kritīḥ ka sám dadhe.

To their shoulders there clings as if a clinging wife, in their hands the quoit is held and the dagger.

In V, 58, 2, the Maruts are called khâdi-hasta, holding the quoits in their hands. There is one passage which was mentioned before (p. 112), where the khâdís are said to be on the feet of the Maruts, and on the strength of this passage Professor Roth proposes to alter prá-patheshu to prá-padeshu, and to translate, 'The khâdís are on your forefeet.' I do not think this emendation necessary. Though we do not know the exact shape and character of the khâdí, we know that it was a weapon, most likely a ring, occasionally used for ornament, and carried along either on the feet or on the shoulders, but in actual battle held in the hand. The weapon which Vishnu holds in one of his right hands, the so-called kakra, may be the modern representation of the ancient khâdí. What, however, is quite certain is this, that khâdí in the Veda never means food, as Sáyana optionally interprets it. This interpretation is accepted by Wilson, who translates, 'At your resting-places on the road refreshments (are ready).' Nay, he goes on in a note to use this passage as a proof of the advanced civilisation of India at the time of the Vedic Rishis. 'The expression,' he says, 'is worthy of note, as indicating the existence of accommodations for the use of travellers: the prapatha is the choltri of the south of India, the sarāi of the Mohammedans, a place by the road-side where the travellers may find shelter and provisions.'

Note 3. This last passage shows that the poet is really representing to himself the Maruts as on their journey, and he therefore adds, 'your axle turns the two (IV, 30, 2) wheels together,' which probably means no more than, 'your chariot is going smoothly or quickly.' Though the expression seems to us hardly correct, yet one can well imagine how the axle was supposed to turn the wheels as the horses were drawing the axle, and the axle acted on the wheels. Anyhow, no other translation seems possible. Samáyā in the Veda means together, at once, and is the Greek ὁμῆ, generally ὁμοῦ or ὁμῶς, the Latin simul. Cf. I, 56, 6; 73, 6; 113, 10; 163, 3; VII, 66, 15; IX, 75, 4; 85, 5; 97, 56.

Vṛit means to turn, and is frequently used with reference to the wheels:

VIII, 46, 23. dāsa syāvāḥ—nemīm ní vavṛituh.

The ten black horses turn down the felly or the wheel.

IV, 30, 2. satṛā te ānu kṛishṭāyāḥ vīsvāḥ kakṛā-iva vavṛituh.

All men turn always round thee, like wheels.

That the Ātmanepada of vṛit may be used in an active sense we see from

I, 191, 15. tātaḥ vishám prá vavṛite.

I turn the poison out from here.

All the words used in this sentence are very old words, and we can with few exceptions turn them into Greek or Latin. In Latin we should have axis vos(ter) circos simul divertit. In Greek ἄξων ὁ(μῶν) κύκλω δμῆ . . .

Verse 10.

Note 1. See I, 64, 4, note 1, page 111.

Note 2. See I, 166, 1, note 1, page 212.

Note 3. On éta in the sense of fallow deer, or, it may be, antelope, see I, 165, 5, note 2, page 196.

Éta originally means variegated, and thus becomes a name of any speckled deer, it being difficult to say what exact species is meant. Sâyana in our passage explains étâh by suklavarnâ mâlâh, many-coloured wreaths or chains, which may be right. Yet the suggestion of Professor Roth that étâh, deer, stands here for the skins of fallow deer, is certainly more poetical, and quite in accordance with the Vedic idiom, which uses, for instance, go, cow, not only in the sense of milk,—that is done even in more homely English,—but also for leather, and thong. It is likewise in accordance with what we know of the earliest dress of the Vedic Indians, that deer-skins should here be mentioned. We learn from Āsvalâyana's Gr̥hya-sûtras, of which we now possess an excellent edition by Professor Stenzler, and a reprint of the text and commentary by Râma Nârâyana Vidyâratna, in the Bibliotheca Indica, that a boy when he was brought to his tutor, i. e. from the eighth to possibly the twenty-fourth year, had to be well combed, and attired in a new dress. A Brâhmaṇa should wear the skin of an antelope (aiṇeya), the Kshatriya the skin of a deer (raurava), the Vaisya the skin of a goat (âga). If they wore dresses, that of the Brâhmaṇa should be dark red (kâshâya), that of the Kshatriya bright red (mâṅgishtha), that of the Vaisya yellow (hâridra). The girdle of the Brâhmaṇa should be of Muṅga grass, that of the Kshatriya a bow-string, that of the Vaisya made of sheep's wool. The same regulations occur in other Sûtras, as, for instance, the Dharma-sûtras of the Āpastambîyas and Gautamas, though there are certain characteristic differences in each, which may be due either to local or to chronological causes. Thus according to the Āpastambîya-sûtras, which have been published by Professor Bühler, the Brâhmaṇa may wear the skin of the harina deer, or that of the antelope (aiṇeyam), but the latter must be from the black antelope (krishnam), and, a proviso is added, that if a man wears the black antelope skin, he must never spread it out to sit or sleep on it. As materials for the dress, Āpastamba allows sana, hemp*, or kshumâ, flax, and he adds that woollen dresses are allowed to all castes, as well as the kambala (masc.), which seems to be any cloth made of vegetable substances (darbhâdinirmitam kîram kambalam). He then adds a curious remark, which would seem to show

* Sana is an old Aryan word, though its meanings differ. Hesychius and Eustathius mention κάννα as being synonymous with ψίαθος, reed. Pollux gives two forms, κάννα and κάνα, (Pollux X, 166, πανάκα δὲ ἐστὶ ψίαθος ἢ ἐν τοῖς ἀκατίοις ἦν καὶ κάναν καλοῦσιν. VII, 176, κάνναι δὲ τὸ ἐκ κανάβων πλέγμα.) This is important, because the same difference of spelling occurs also in κάνναβις and κάναβος or κάνναβος, a model, a lay figure, which Lobeck derives from κάνναι. In Old Norse we have hanp-r, in A. S. hænep, hemp, Old High-Germ. hanaf.

The occurrence of the word sana is of importance as showing at how early a time the Aryans of India were acquainted with the uses and the name of hemp. Our word hemp, the A. S. hænep, the Old Norse hanp-r, are all borrowed from Latin cannabis, which, like other borrowed words, has undergone the regular changes required by Grimm's law in Low-German, and also in High-German, hanaf. The Slavonic nations seem to have borrowed their word for hemp (Lith. kanapė) from the Goths, the Celtic nations (Ir. canaib) from the Romans (cf. Kuhn, Beiträge, vol. ii, p. 382). The Latin cannabis is borrowed from Greek, and the Greeks, to judge from the account of Herodotus, most likely adopted the word from the Aryan Thracians and Scythians (Her. IV, 74; Pictet, Les Aryens, vol. i, p. 314). Κάνναβις being a foreign word, it would be useless to attempt an explanation of the final element bis, which is added to sana, the Sanskrit word for hemp. It may be visa, fibre, or it may be anything else. Certain it is that the main element in the name of hemp was the same among the settlers in Northern India, and among the Thracians and Scythians through whom the Greeks first became acquainted with hemp.

The history of the word κάνναβις must be kept distinct from that of the Greek κάννα or κάνα, reed. Both spellings occur, for Pollux, X, 166, writes πανάκα δὲ ἐστὶ ψίαθος ἢ ἐν τοῖς ἀκατίοις ἦν καὶ κάναν καλοῦσιν, but VII, 176, κάνναι δὲ τὸ ἐκ κανάβων πλέγμα. This word κάννα may be the same as the Sanskrit sana, only with this difference, that it was retained as common property by Greeks and Indians before they separated, and was applied differently in later times by the one and the other.

that the Brâhmanas preferred skins, and the Kshatriyas clothes, for he says that those who wish well to the Brâhmanas should wear agina, skins, and those who wish well to the Kshatriyas should wear vastra, clothes, and those who wish well to both should wear both, but, in that case, the skin should always form the outer garment. The Dharma-sûtras of the Gautamas, which were published in India, prescribe likewise for the Brâhmana the black antelope skin, and allow clothes of hemp or linen (sânakshaumakîra) as well as kutapas (woollen cloth) for all. What is new among the Gautamas is, that they add the kârpâsa, the cotton dress, which is important as showing an early knowledge of this manufacture. The kârpâsa dress occurs once more as a present to be given to the Potar priest (Âsv. Srauta-sûtras IX, 4), and was evidently considered as a valuable present, taking precedence of the kshaumî or linen dress. It is provided that the cotton dress should not be dyed, for this, I suppose, is the meaning of avikrîta. Immediately after, however, it is said, that some authorities say the dress should be dyed red (kâshâyam apy eke), the very expression which occurred in Âpastamba, and that, in that case, the red for the Brâhmana's dress should be taken from the bark of trees (vârksha). Manu, who here, as elsewhere, simply paraphrases the ancient Sûtras, says, II, 41 :

kârshmarauravabâstâni karmâni brahma-kârînavasîrann ânupûrvyena sânakshaumâvikâni ka.

‘Let Brahma-kârîns wear (as outer garments) the skins of the black antelope, the deer, the goat, (as under garments) dresses of hemp, flax, and sheep's wool, in the order of the three castes.’

The Sanskrit name for a dressed skin is agina, a word which does not occur in the Rig-veda, but which, if Bopp is right in deriving it from agâ, goat, as aiyís from aîf, would have meant originally, not skin in general, but a goat-skin. The skins of the éta, here ascribed to the Maruts, would be identical with the aineya, which Âsvalâyana ascribes to the Brâhmana, not, as we should expect, to the Kshatriya, if, as has been supposed, aineya is derived from ena, which is a secondary form, particularly in the feminine enī, of eta. There is, however, another word, eda, a kind of sheep, which, but for Festus, might be haedus, and by its side ena, a kind of antelope. These two forms pre-suppose an earlier erna or arna, and point therefore in a different direction, though hardly to āpves.

Note 4. I translate kshurā by sharp edges, but it might have been translated literally by razors, for, strange as it may sound, razors were known, not only during the Vedic period, but even previous to the Aryan separation. The Sanskrit kshurā is the Greek ξυρός or ξυρόν. In the Veda we have clear allusions to shaving :

X, 142, 4. yadā te vātaḥ anu-vāti sokīḥ, vāptā-iva smāsrū vapasi prā bhūma.

When the wind blows after thy blast, then thou shavest the earth as a barber shaves the beard. Cf. I, 65, 4.

If, as B. and R. suggest, vaptar, barber, is connected with the more modern name for barber in Sanskrit, viz. nāpita, we should have to admit a root svap, in the sense of tearing or pulling, vellere, from which we might derive the Vedic svapṛ (VII, 56, 3), beak. Corresponding to this we find in Old High-German snabul, beak, (schnepfe, snipe,) and in Old Norse nef. The Anglo-Saxon neb means mouth and nose, while in modern English neb or nib is used for the bill or beak of a bird*. Another derivation of nāpita, proposed by Professor Weber (Kuhn's Beiträge, vol. i, p. 505), who takes nāpita as a dialectic form of snāpitar, balneator, or lavator, might be admitted if it could be proved that in India also the barber was at the same time a balneator. Burnouf, Lotus, p. 452, translating from the Sāmañña-phala Sutta, mentions among the different professions of the people those of 'portier,' 'barbier,' and 'baigneur.'

Verse 11.

Note 1. Vī-bhūṭayaḥ is properly a substantive, meaning

* Grimm, Deutsche Grammatik, vol. iii, pp. 400, 409. There is not yet sufficient evidence to show that Sanskrit sv, German sn, and Sanskrit n are interchangeable, but there is at least one case that may be analogous. Sanskrit svaṅg, to embrace, to twist round a person, German slango, Schlange, snake, and Sanskrit nāga, snake. Grimm, Deutsche Grammatik, vol. iii, p. 364.

power, but, like other substantives*, and particularly substantives with prepositions, it can be used as an adjective, and is, in fact, more frequently used as an adjective than as a substantive. In English we may translate it by power. It is a substantive,

I, 8, 9. evá hí te ví-bhûṭayaḥ ūṭayaḥ indra mā-vate sadyáḥ kit sánti dāsúshe.

For indeed thy powers, O Indra, are at once shelters for a sacrificer, like me.

But it is an adjective,

I, 30, 5. ví-bhûṭiḥ astu sūnṛtā.

May the prayer be powerful.

VI, 17, 4. mahām ánūnam tavásam ví-bhûṭim matsarāsaḥ garhrishanta pra-sāham.

The sweet draughts of Soma delighted the great, the perfect, the strong, the powerful, the unyielding Indra. Cf. VIII, 49, 6; 50, 6.

Vibhṛvāḥ, with the Svarita on the last syllable, has to be pronounced vibhṛáḥ. In III, 6, 9, we find vi-bhávaḥ.

Note 2. See I, 87, 1, note 1, page 160.

Note 3. See I, 6, 5, note 1, page 41.

Verse 12.

Note 1. Mahi-tvanám, greatness, is formed by the suffix tvaná, which Professor Aufrecht has identified with the Greek σῦνη (συνον); see Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. i, p. 482. The origin of this suffix has been explained by Professor Benfey, ibid. vol. vii, p. 120, who traces it back to the suffix tvan, for instance, i-tvan, goer, in prātaḥ-ítvá = prātaḥ-yāvā.

Note 2. Vratá is one of the many words which, though we may perceive their one central idea, and their original purport, we have to translate by various terms in order to make them intelligible in every passage where they occur. Vratá (from vri, vrinoti), I believe, meant originally what is enclosed, protected, set apart, the Greek νομός :

1. V, 46, 7. yāḥ pārthivāsaḥ yāḥ apām ápi vraté tāḥ naḥ devīḥ su-havāḥ sárma yakḥhata.

* See Benfey, Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. ii, p. 216.

O ye gracious goddesses, who are on the earth or in the realm of the waters, grant us your protection !

Here vratá is used like vrigána, see I, 165, 15, note 3, page 208.

X, 114, 2. tāsām ní kīkyuḥ kaváyaḥ ni-dānam páreshu yāḥ gúhyeshu vratéshu.

The poets discovered their (the Nirriti's) origin, who are in the far hidden chambers.

I, 163, 3. ási tritáḥ gúhyena vraténa.

Thou art Trita within the hidden place, or with the secret work.

Dr. Muir sent me another passage :

III, 54, 5. dádrisre eshām avamā sádāmsi páreshu yā gúhyeshu vratéshu.

2. Vratá means what is fenced off or forbidden, what is determined, what is settled, and hence, like dhárman, law, ordinance. Várayati means to prohibit. In this sense vratá occurs very frequently :

I, 25, 1. yát kīṭ hí te vísaḥ yathā prá deva varuṇa vratám, minímási dyávi-dyavi.

Whatever law of thine we break, O Varuṇa, day by day, men as we are.

II, 8, 3. yásya vratám ná mīyate.

Whose law is not broken.

III, 32, 8. índrasya kárma sú-kritā purūṇi vratāni devāḥ ná minanti víśve.

The deeds of Indra are well done and many, all the gods do not break his laws, or do not injure his ordinances.

II, 24, 12. víśvam satyám maghavânā yuvóḥ ít āpaḥ kaná prá minanti vratám vām.

All that is yours, O powerful gods, is true ; even the waters do not break your law.

II, 38, 7. nákiḥ asya tāni vratā devásya savitúḥ minanti.

No one breaks these laws of this god Savitar. Cf. II, 38, 9.

I, 92, 12. áminatī dáivyāni vratāni.

Not injuring the divine ordinances. Cf. I, 124, 2.

X, 12, 5. kát asya áti vratám kakrima.

Which of his laws have we overstepped ?

VIII, 25, 16. tásya vratāni ānu vaḥ kārāmasi.

His ordinances we follow.

X, 33, 9. nā devānām āti vratām satā-ātmā kṇā gīvati.

No one lives beyond the statute of the gods, even if he had a hundred lives.

VII, 5, 4. táva tri-dhātu prithivī utá dyaúḥ vaīsvānara vratām agne saḁanta.

The earth and the sky followed thy threefold law, O Agni Vaisvānara.

VII, 87, 7. yáḥ mrīláyāti kakrúshe kit āgah vayám syāma várune ánāgáh, ānu vratāni áditeḥ ridhántaḥ.

Let us be sinless before Varuna, who is gracious even to him who has committed sin, performing the laws of Aditi!

II, 28, 8. námaḥ purā te varuṇa utá nūnám utá aparám tuvi-gāta bravāma, tvé hí kam párvate ná sritāni ápra-kyutāni duḥ-dabha vratāni.

Formerly, and now, and also in future let us give praise to thee, O Varuna; for in thee, O unconquerable, all laws are grounded, immovable as on a rock.

A very frequent expression is ānu vratām, according to the command of a god, II, 38, 3; 6; VIII, 40, 8; or simply ānu vratām, according to law and order:

I, 136, 5. tám aryamā abhī rakshati rīgu-yántam ānu vratām.

Aryaman protects him who acts uprightly according to law.

Cf. III, 61, 1; IV, 13, 2; V, 69, 1.

3. The laws or ordinances or institutions of the gods are sometimes taken for the sacrifices which are supposed to be enjoined by the gods, and the performance of which is, in a certain sense, the performance of the divine will.

I, 93, 8. yáḥ agnīśhómā havīśhā saparyát devadrīkā mánasā yáḥ ghrítēna, tásya vratām rakshatam pátām ám-hasaḥ.

He who worships Agni and Soma with oblations, with a godly mind, or with an offering, protect his sacrifice, shield him from evil!

I, 31, 2. tvám agne prathamáḥ ángirah-tamaḥ kavíḥ devānām pári bhūshasi vratām.

Agni, the first and wisest of poets, thou performest the sacrifice of the gods.

III, 3, 9. tāsa vratāni bhūri-poshīṇaḥ vayām ūpa bhūshema dāme ā suvṛiktī-bhiḥ.

Let us, who possess much wealth, perform with prayers the sacrifices of Agni within our house.

In another acceptation the vratas of the gods are what they perform and establish themselves, their own deeds :

III, 6, 5. vratā te agne mahatāḥ mahāni tāva krātvā ródasī (īti) ā tatantha.

The deeds of thee, the great Agni, are great, by thy power thou hast stretched out heaven and earth.

VIII, 42, 1. āstabhnāt dyām āsuraḥ visvā-vedāḥ āmimīta varimānam prithivyāḥ, ā asīdat visvā bhūvanāni sam-rāṭ visvā īt tāni vārunasya vratāni.

The wise spirit established the sky, and made the width of the earth, as king he approached all beings,—all these are the works of Varuna.

VI, 14, 3. tūrvantaḥ dāsyum āyāvaḥ vrataḥ sīkshantaḥ avratām.

Men fight the fiend, trying to overcome by their deeds him who performs no sacrifices ; or, the lawless enemy.

Lastly; vratā comes to mean sway, power, or work, and the expression vraté tāva signifies, at thy command, under thy auspices :

I, 24, 15. ātha vayām āditya vraté tāva ānāgasaḥ āditaye syāma.

Then, O Āditya, under thy auspices may we be guiltless before Aditi.

VI, 54, 9. pūshan tāva vraté vayām ná rishyema kádā kaná.

O Pūshan, may we never fail under thy protection.

X, 36, 13. yé savitūḥ satyā-savasya visve mitrásya vraté vārunasya devāḥ.

All the gods who are in the power of Savitar, Mitra, and Varuna.

V, 83, 5. yāsya vraté prithivī nāmnamīti yāsya vraté saphā-vat gārbhurīti, yāsya vraté óshadhīḥ visvā-rūpāḥ sáhaḥ parganya máhi sárma yakṣha.

At whose bidding the earth bows down, at whose bidding hoofed animals run about, at whose bidding the plants assume all shapes, mayest thou, O Parganya, yield us great protection!

Note 3. Dâtrá, if derived from dâ, would mean gift, and that meaning is certainly the most applicable in some passages where it occurs:

IX, 97, 55. ási bhágaḥ ási dâtrásya dâtā.

Thou art Bhaga, thou art the giver of the gift.

In other passages, too, particularly in those where the verb dâ or some similar verb occurs in the same verse, it can hardly be doubted that the poet took dâtrá, like dátra or dâttra, in the sense of gift, bounty, largess:

I, 116, 6. yám arvinā dadáthuḥ svetám ásvam—tát vām dâtrám máhi kirtényam bhūt.

The white horse, O Asvins, which you gave, that your gift was great and to be praised.

I, 185, 3. aneháḥ dâtrám áditeḥ anarvám huvé.

I call for the unrivalled, the uninjured bounty of Aditi.

VII, 56, 21. mã vaḥ dâtrāt marutaḥ níḥ arāma.

May we not fall away from your bounty, O Maruts!

III, 54, 16. yuvám hí stháh rayi-daú naḥ rayinām dâtrám rakshethe.

For you, Násatyas, are our givers of riches, you protect the gift.

VI, 20, 7. *rig*svane dâtrám dâsúshe dāḥ.

To Rigisvan, the giver, thou givest the gift.

VIII, 43, 33. tát te sahasva ímahe dâtrám yát ná upa-dásyati, tvát agne vāryam vásu.

We ask thee, strong hero, for the gift which does not perish; we ask from thee the precious wealth.

X, 69, 4. dâtrám rakshasva yát idám te asmé (íti).

Protect this gift of thine which thou hast given to us.

VIII, 44, 18. ísishe vāryasya hí dâtrásya agne svāḥ-patíḥ.

For thou, O Agni, lord of heaven, art the master of the precious gift. Cf. IV, 38, 1.

Professor Roth considers that dâtrá is derived rather from dâ, to divide, and that it means share, lot, possession. But there is not a single passage where the meaning of gift or bounty does not answer all purposes. In VII, 56, 21, mā vaḥ dātrāt marutaḥ nīḥ arāma, is surely best translated by, 'let us not fall away from your bounty,' and in our own passage the same meaning should be assigned to dātrá. The idea of dātrá, bounty, is by no means incompatible with vratá, realm, dominion, sway, if we consider that the sphere within which the bounty of a king or a god is exercised and accepted, is in one sense his realm. What the poet therefore says in our passage is simply this, that the bounty of the Maruts extends as far as the realm of Aditi, i. e. is endless, or extends everywhere, Aditi being in its original conception the deity of the unbounded world beyond, the earliest attempt at expressing the Infinite.

As to dātra occurring once with the accent on the first syllable in the sense of sickle, see M. M., 'Über eine Stelle in Yaska's Commentar zum Naighantuka,' Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft, 1853, vol. vii, p. 375.

VIII, 78, 10. táva ít indra ahám ā-sāsá háste dātram kaná ā dade.

Trusting in thee alone, O Indra, I take the sickle in my hand.

This dātra, sickle, is derived from do, to cut.

Aditi, the Infinite.

Note 4. Aditi, an ancient god or goddess, is in reality the earliest name invented to express the Infinite; not the Infinite as the result of a long process of abstract reasoning, but the visible Infinite, visible, as it were, to the naked eye, the endless expanse beyond the earth, beyond the clouds, beyond the sky. That was called A-diti, the un-bound, the un-bounded; one might almost say, but for fear of misunderstandings, the Absolute, for it is derived from diti, bond, and the negative particle, and meant therefore originally what is free from bonds of any kind, whether of space or time, free from physical weakness, free from moral guilt. Such a conception became of necessity a being, a person, a god. To us such a name and such a conception seem decidedly modern, and to find in the Veda Aditi, the Infinite, as the mother of the principal gods, is certainly, at first sight, startling. But the fact is that the thoughts of primitive humanity were not only different from our thoughts, but different also from what we think their thoughts ought to have been. The poets of the Veda indulged freely in theogonic speculations, without being frightened by any contradictions. They knew of Indra as the greatest of gods, they knew of Agni as the god of gods, they knew of Varuṇa as the ruler of all, but they were by no means startled at the idea that their Indra had a mother, or that their Agni was born like a babe from the friction of two fire-sticks, or that Varuṇa and his brother Mitra were nursed in the lap of Aditi. Some poet would take hold of the idea of an unbounded power, of Aditi, originally without any reference to other gods. Very soon these ideas met, and, without any misgivings, either the gods were made subordinate to, and represented as the sons of Aditi, or where Indra was to be praised as supreme, Aditi was represented as doing him homage.

VIII, 12, 14. utā sva-rāge áditiḥ stómam índrāya gīṣanat.
And Aditi produced a hymn for Indra, the king.

Here Professor Roth takes Aditi as an epithet of Agni, not as the name of the goddess Aditi, while Dr. Muir rightly takes it in the latter sense, and likewise retains stómam instead of sómam, as printed by Professor Aufrecht. Cf. VII, 38, 4.

The idea of the Infinite, as I have tried to show elsewhere, was most powerfully impressed on the awakening mind, or, as we now say, was revealed, by the East*. 'It is impossible to enter fully into all the thoughts and feelings that passed through the minds of the early poets when they formed names for that far, far East from whence even the early dawn, the sun, the day, their own life, seemed to spring. A new life flashed up every morning before their eyes, and the fresh breezes of the dawn reached them like greetings from the distant lands beyond the mountains, beyond the clouds, beyond the dawn, beyond "the immortal sea which brought us hither." The dawn seemed to them to open golden gates for the sun to pass in triumph, and while those gates were open, their eyes and their mind strove in their childish way to pierce beyond the limits of this finite world. That silent aspect awakened in the human mind the conception of the Infinite, the Immortal, the Divine.' Aditi is a name for that distant East, but Aditi is more than the dawn. Aditi is beyond the dawn, and in one place (I, 113, 19) the dawn is called 'the face of Aditi,' áditer ánikam. Thus we read :

* Lectures on the Science of Language, Second Series, p. 499.

V, 62, 8. híranya-rûpam ushásaḥ ví-ushṭau áyaḥ-sthûnam út-itâ sūryasya, ā rohathaḥ varuṇa mitra gártam átaḥ kakshâthe (iti) áditim dítim ka.

Mitra and Varuṇa, you mount your chariot, which is golden, when the dawn bursts forth, and has iron poles at the setting of the sun : from thence you see Aditi and Diti, i. e. what is yonder and what is here.

If we keep this original conception of Aditi clearly before our mind, the various forms which Aditi assumes, even in the hymns of the Veda, will not seem incoherent. Aditi is not a prominent deity in the Veda, she is celebrated rather in her sons, the Âdityas, than in her own person. While there are so many hymns addressed to Ushas, the dawn, or Indra, or Agni, or Savitar, there is but one hymn, X, 72, which from our point of view, though not from that of Indian theologians, might be called a hymn to Aditi. Nevertheless Aditi is a familiar name ; a name of the past, whether in time or in thought only, and a name that lives on in the name of the Âdityas, the sons of Aditi, including the principal deities of the Veda.

Aditi and the Âdityas.

Thus we read :

I, 107, 2. úpa naḥ devāḥ ávasā ā gamantu ángirasām sāma-bhiḥ stûyámānāḥ, indraḥ indriyaḥ marútaḥ marút-bhiḥ ádityaḥ naḥ áditiḥ sárma yamsat.

May the gods come to us with their help, praised by the songs of the Ângiras,—Indra with his powers, the Maruts with the storms, may Aditi with the Âdityas give us protection !

X, 66, 3. indraḥ vāsu-bhiḥ pári pátu naḥ gáyam ádityaḥ naḥ áditiḥ sárma yákkhatu, rudráḥ rudrébhiḥ deváh mṛilayāti naḥ tváshṭā naḥ gnābhiḥ suvitāya ginvatu.

May Indra with the Vasus watch our house, may Aditi with the Ādityas give us protection, may the divine Rudra with the Rudras have mercy upon us, may Tvashṭar with the mothers bring us to happiness!

III, 54, 20. ádityaḥ naḥ áditiḥ sṛinotu yákkhantu naḥ marútaḥ sárma bhadram.

May Aditi with the Ādityas hear us, may the Maruts give us good protection!

In another passage Varuna takes the place of Aditi as the leader of the Ādityas:

VII, 35, 6. sám naḥ indraḥ vāsu-bhiḥ deváh astu sám ádityébhiḥ várunaḥ su-sámsaḥ, sám naḥ rudráḥ rudrébhiḥ gálāshaḥ sám naḥ tváshṭā gnābhiḥ ihá sṛinotu.

May Indra bless us, the god with the Vasus! May Varuna, the glorious, bless us with the Ādityas! May the relieving Rudra with the Rudras bless us! May Tvashṭar with the mothers kindly hear us here!

Even in passages where the poet seems to profess an exclusive worship of Aditi, as in

V, 69, 3. prátáḥ devīm áditim gohavími madhyándine út-itá súryasya,

I invoke the divine Aditi early in the morning, at noon, and at the setting of the sun, Mitra and Varuna, her principal sons, are mentioned immediately after, and implored, like her, to bestow blessings on their worshipper.

Her exclusive worship appears once, in VIII, 19, 14.

A very frequent expression is that of ádityāḥ áditiḥ without any copula, to signify the Ādityas and Aditi:

IV, 25, 3. káḥ devānām ávaḥ adyá vṛínite káḥ ádityān áditim gyótiḥ itte.

Who does choose now the protection of the gods? Who asks the Ādityas, Aditi, for their light?

VI, 51, 5. vísve ádityāḥ adite sa-góshāḥ asmábhyam sárma bahulám ví yanta.

All ye Âdityas, Aditi together, grant to us your manifold protection!

X, 39, 11. ná tám rāḡānau adite kútaḥ káná ná ámhaḥ asnoti duḥ-itám nákiḥ bhayám.

O ye two kings (the Asvins), Aditi, no evil reaches him from anywhere, no misfortune, no fear (whom you protect). Cf. VII, 66, 6.

X, 63, 5. tās ā vivāsa námasā suvṛiktī-bhiḥ mahāḥ âdityān âditim svastāye.

I cherish them with worship and with hymns, the great Âdityas, Aditi, for happiness' sake.

X, 63, 17. evá platéh sūnúḥ avivṛidhat vaḥ vísve âdityāḥ adite manīṣhī.

The wise son of Plati magnified you, all ye Âdityas, Aditi!

X, 65, 9. pargányāvātā vṛishabhā purīṣhīnā indravāyū (iti) várūnaḥ mitráḥ aryamā, devān âdityān âditim havāmahe ye pāṛthivāsaḥ divyāsaḥ ap-sú yé.

There are Parganya and Vāta, the powerful, the givers of rain, Indra and Vāyu, Varuna, Mitra, Aryaman, we call the divine Âdityas, Aditi, those who dwell on the earth, in heaven, in the waters.

We may not be justified in saying that there ever was a period in the history of the religious thought of India, a period preceding the worship of the Âdityas, when Aditi, the Infinite, was worshipped, though to the sage who first coined this name, it expressed, no doubt, for a time the principal, if not the only object of his faith and worship.

Aditi and Daksha.

Soon, however, the same mental process which led on later speculators from the earth to the elephant, and from the elephant to the tortoise, led the Vedic poets beyond Aditi, the Infinite. There was something beyond that Infinite which for a time they had grasped by the name of Aditi, and this, whether intentionally or by a mere accident of language, they called dāksha, literally power or the powerful. All this, no doubt, sounds strikingly modern, yet, though the passages in which this dāksha is mentioned are few in number, I should not venture to say that they are necessarily modern, even if by modern we mean only later than 1000 B.C. Nothing can bring the perplexity of the ancient mind, if once drawn into this vortex of speculation, more clearly before us than if we read :

X, 72, 4-5. áditeh dákshah agâyata dákshât um (iti) áditih pári,—áditih hí áganishtha dáksha yá duhitā táva, tām devāh ánu agâyanta bhadráh amṛta-bandhavaḥ.

Daksha was born of Aditi, and Aditi from Daksha. For Aditi was born, O Daksha, she who is thy daughter; after her the gods were born, the blessed, who share in immortality.

Or, in more mythological language :

X, 64, 5. dákshasya vā adite gánmani vraté rāgānā mitrā-várunā ā vivāsasi.

Or thou, O Aditi, nursest in the birthplace of Daksha the two kings, Mitra and Varuna.

Nay, even this does not suffice. There is something again beyond Aditi and Daksha, and one poet says :

X, 5, 7. ásat ka sāt ka paramé ví-oman dákshasya gánman áditeh upá-sthe.

Not-being and Being are in the highest heaven, in the birthplace of Daksha, in the lap of Aditi.

At last something like a theogony, though full of contradictions, was imagined, and in the same hymn from which we have already quoted, the poet says :

X, 72, 1-4. devānām nú vayám gānā prá voḥāma vipanyáyā, ukthéshu sasyámāneshu yáh (yát?) pásyāt út-tare yugé. 1.

bráhmaṇah pátiḥ etā sám karmāra-iva adhamat, devānām pûrvyé yugé ásataḥ sāt agâyata. 2.

devānām yugé prathamé ásataḥ sāt agâyata, tát āsāh ánu agâyanta tát uttānā-padaḥ pári. 3.

bhūh gagñe uttānā-padaḥ bhuváh āsāh agâyanta, áditeh dákshah agâyata, dákshât um (iti) áditiḥ pári. 4.

1. Let us now with praise proclaim the births of the gods, that a man may see them in a future age, whenever these hymns are sung.

2. Brahmanaspati * blew them together like a smith (with

* Bráhmaṇaspati, literally the lord of prayer, or the lord of the sacrifice, sometimes a representative of Agni (I, 38, 13, note), but his bellows); in a former age of the gods, Being was born from Not-being.

3. In the first age of the gods, Being was born from Not-being, after it were born the Regions (space), from them Uttānapada ;

4. From Uttānapad the Earth was born, the Regions were born from the Earth. Daksha was born of Aditi, and Aditi from Daksha.

The ideas of Being and Not-being (τὸ ὄν and τὸ μὴ ὄν) are familiar to the Hindus from a very early time in their intellectual growth, and they can only have been the result of abstract speculation. Therefore dāksha, too, in the sense of power or potentia, may have been a metaphysical conception. But it may also have been suggested by a mere accident of language, a never-failing source of ancient thoughts. The name dāksha-pitaraḥ, an epithet of the gods, has generally been translated by 'those who have Daksha for their father.' But it may have been used originally in a very different sense. Professor Roth has, I think, convincingly proved that this epithet dāksha-pitar, as given to certain gods, does not mean, the gods who have Daksha for their father, but that it had originally the simpler meaning of fathers of strength, or, as he translates it, 'preserving, possessing, granting faculties*.' This is particularly clear in one passage :

III, 27, 9. bhūtānām gārbham ādadhe, dākshasya pitāram.

I place Agni, the source of all beings, the father of strength by no means identical with him (see VII, 41, 1); sometimes performing the deeds of Indra, but again by no means identical with him (see II, 23, 18. īndreṇa yugā—nīḥ apām aubgaḥ arnavām; cf. VIII, 96, 15). In II, 26, 3, he is called father of the gods (devānām pitāram); in II, 23, 2, the creator of all beings (vīśvashām ganiṭā).

* The accent in this case cannot help us in determining whether dāksha-pitar means having Daksha for their father (Δακχοπατήρ), or father of strength. In the first case dāksha would rightly retain its accent (dāksha-pitar) as a Bahuvrīhi; in the second, the analogy of such Tatpurusha compounds as grīhā-pati (Pân. VI, 2, 18) would be sufficient to justify the pūrvapadaprakṛitisvaratvam.

After this we can hardly hesitate how to translate the next verse :

VI, 50, 2. su-gyótishaḥ—dáksha-pitr̥n—devān.

The resplendent gods, the fathers of strength.

It may seem more doubtful, when we come to gods like Mitra and Varuṇa, whom we are so much accustomed to regard as Ādityas, or sons of Aditi, and who therefore, according to the theogony mentioned before, would have the best claim to the name of sons of Daksha ; yet here, too, the original and simple meaning is preferable ; nay, it is most likely that from passages like this, the later explanation, which makes Mitra and Varuṇa the sons of Daksha, may have sprung.

VII, 66, 2. yá—su-dákshâ dáksha-pitarā.

Mitra and Varuṇa, who are of good strength, the fathers of strength.

Lastly, even men may claim this name ; for, unless we change the accent, we must translate :

VIII, 63, 10. avasyávaḥ yushmābhiḥ dáksha-pitarāḥ.

We suppliants, being, through your aid, fathers of strength.

But whatever view we take, whether we take dáksha in the sense of power, as a personification of a philosophical conception, or as the result of a mythological misunderstanding occasioned by the name of dáksha-pitar, the fact remains that in certain hymns of the Rig-veda (VIII, 25, 5) Dáksha, like Āditi, has become a divine person, and has retained his place as one of the Ādityas to the very latest time of Purāṇic tradition.

Aditi in her Cosmic Character.

But to return to Aditi. Let us look upon her as the Infinite personified, and most passages, even those where she is presented as a subordinate deity, will become intelligible.

Aditi, in her cosmic character, is the Beyond, the unbounded realm beyond earth, sky, and heaven, and originally she was distinct from the sky, the earth, and the ocean. Aditi is mentioned by the side of heaven and earth, which shows that, though in more general language she may be identified with heaven and earth in their unlimited character, her original conception was different. This we see in passages where different deities or powers are invoked together, particularly if they are invoked together in the same verse, and where Aditi holds a separate place by the side of heaven and earth :

I, 94, 16 (final). tát naḥ mitráḥ váruṇaḥ mamahantām áditiḥ síndhuḥ pr̥thivī utá dyaúḥ.

May Mitra and Varuna grant us this, may Aditi, Sindhu (sea), the Earth, and the Sky!

In other passages, too, where Aditi has assumed a more personal character, she still holds her own by the side of heaven and earth ; cf. IX, 97, 58 (final) :

I, 191, 6. dyaúḥ vaḥ pitā pr̥thivī mātā sómaḥ bhrātā áditiḥ svásā.

The Sky is your father, the Earth your mother, Soma your brother, Aditi your sister.

VIII, 101, 15. mātā rudrāṇām duhitā vásūnām svásā ádityāṇām amṛtasya nābhiḥ, prá nú voḥam kikitúshe gánāya mā gām ánāgām áditim vadhishā.

The mother of the Rudras, the daughter of the Vasus, the sister of the Ádityas, the source of immortality, I tell it forth to the man of understanding, may he not offend the cow, the guiltless Aditi ! Cf. I, 153, 3 ; IX, 96, 15 ; Vāgasan. Samhitā XIII, 49.

VI, 51, 5. dyaúḥ pítar (iti) pr̥thivi mātāḥ ádhruk ágne bhrātāḥ vasavaḥ mr̥lāta naḥ, v̥sve ádityāḥ adite sa-góshāḥ asmábhyam sárma bahulám vi yanta.

Sky, father, Earth, kind mother, Fire, brother, bright gods, have mercy upon us ! All Ádityas (and) Aditi together, grant us your manifold protection !

X, 63, 10. su-trāmānam pr̥thivīm dyāṁ aneḥásam su-sármānam áditim su-prán̥itim, daivīm nāvam su-aritrām ánāgasam ásravantīm ā ruhema svastāye.

Let us for welfare step into the divine boat, with good oars, faultless and leakless—the well-protecting Earth, the peerless Sky, the sheltering, well-guiding Aditi !

X, 66, 4. áditiḥ dyāvâpr̥thivī (iti).

Aditi, and Heaven and Earth.

Where two or more verses come together, the fact that Aditi is mentioned by the side of Heaven and Earth may seem less convincing, because in these Nivids or long strings of invocations different names or representatives of one and the same power are not unfrequently put together. For instance,

X, 36, 1-3. ushásânáktâ brihatī (īti) su-pésasâ dyāvâ-kshāmâ várūnah mitráh aryamā, índram huve marútaḥ párvatân apáh ádityān dyāvâprithivī (īti) apáh svār (īti svāh). 1.

dyaúh ka nah prithivī ka prá-ktasâ ritávarī (īty ritá-vari) rakshatām ámhasah risháh, mā duh-vidátrā nīh-rītiḥ nah ísata tát devānām ávah adyá vrinímahe. 2.

vīsvasmât nah áditiḥ pátu ámhasah mātā mitráśya várūnasya revátaḥ svāh-vat gyótiḥ avrikám nasímahi. 3.

1. There are the grand and beautiful Morning and Night, Heaven and Earth, Varuna, Mitra, Aryaman; I call Indra, the Maruts, the Waters, the Âdityas, Heaven and Earth, the Waters, the Heaven.

2. May Heaven and Earth, the provident, the righteous, preserve us from sin and mischief! May the malevolent Nirrīti not rule over us! This blessing of the gods we ask for to-day.

3. May Aditi protect us from all sin, the, mother of Mitra and of the rich Varuna! May we obtain heavenly light without enemies! This blessing of the gods we ask for to-day.

Here we cannot but admit that Dyāvâkshāmâ, heaven and earth, is meant for the same divine couple as Dyāvâprithivī, heaven and earth, although under slightly differing names they are invoked separately. The waters are invoked twice in the same verse and under the same name; nor is there any indication that, as in other passages, the waters of the sky are meant as distinct from the waters of the sea. Nevertheless even here, Aditi, who in the third verse is called distinctly the mother of Mitra and Varuna, cannot well have been meant for the same deity as Heaven and Earth, mentioned in the second verse; and the author of these two verses, while asking the same blessing from both, must have been aware of the original independent character of Aditi.

Aditi as Mother.

In this character of a deity of the far East, of an Orient in the true sense of the word, Aditi was naturally thought of as the mother of certain gods, particularly of those that were connected with the daily rising and setting of the sun. If it was asked whence comes the dawn, or the sun, or whence come day and night, or Mitra and Varuna, or any of the bright, solar, eastern deities, the natural answer was that they come from the Orient, that they are the sons of Aditi. Thus we read in IX, 74, 3. urvī gávyûtiḥ áditeḥ ritám yaté.

Wide is the space for him who goes on the right path of Aditi.

In VIII, 25, 3, we are told that Aditi bore Mitra and Varuna, and these in verse 5 are called the sons of Daksha (power), and the grandsons of Savas, which again means might: nápâtâ sávasaḥ maháḥ sūnū (īti) dákshasya su-krátū (īti). In X, 36, 3, Aditi is called the mother of Mitra and Varuna; likewise in X, 132, 6; see also VI, 67, 4. In VIII, 47, 9, Aditi is called the mother of Mitra, Aryaman, Varuna, who in VII, 60, 5 are called her sons. In X, 11, 1, Varuna is called yahvāḥ áditeḥ, the son of Aditi (cf. VIII, 19, 12); in VII, 41, 2, Bhaga is mentioned as her son. In X, 72, 8, we hear of eight sons of Aditi, but it is added that she approached the gods with seven sons only, and that the eighth (mārtāndá, addled egg) was thrown away: aṣṭaú putrásaḥ áditeḥ yé gâtāḥ tanvāḥ pári, devān úpa prá ait saptá-bhiḥ parā mārtāndám āsyat.

In X, 63, 2, the gods in general are represented as born from Aditi, the waters, and the earth: yé sthā gâtāḥ áditeḥ at-bhyāḥ pári yé prithivyāḥ té me ihá sruta hávam.

You who are born of Aditi, from the water, you who are born of the earth, hear ye all my call!

The number seven, with regard to the Ādityas, occurs also in IX, 114, 3. saptá dísaḥ nānā-sūryāḥ saptá hótāraḥ ritvīgaḥ devāḥ ādityāḥ yé saptá tébhiḥ soma abhí raksha naḥ.

There are seven regions with their different suns, there are seven Hotars as priests, those who are the seven gods, the Ādityas, with them, O Soma, protect us!

The Seven Ādityas.

This number of seven Ādityas requires an explanation. To say that seven is a solemn or sacred number is to say very little, for however solemn or sacred that number may be elsewhere, it is not more sacred than any other number in the Veda. The often-mentioned seven rivers have a real geographical foundation, like the seven hills of Rome. The seven flames or treasures of Agni (V, 1, 5) and of Soma and Rudra (VI, 74, 1), the seven paridhis or logs at certain sacrifices (X, 90, 15), the seven Harits or horses of the sun, the seven Hotar priests (III, 7, 7; 10, 4), the seven cities of the enemy destroyed by Indra (I, 63, 7), and even the seven Rishis (X, 82, 2; 109, 4), all these do not prove that the number of seven was more sacred than the number of one or three or five or ten used in the Veda in a very similar way. With regard to the seven Ādityas, however, we are still able to see that their number of seven or eight had something to do with solar movements. If their number had always been eight, we should feel inclined to trace the number of the Ādityas back to the eight regions, or the eight cardinal points of the heaven. Thus we read :

I, 35, 8. ashtaú ví akhyat kakúbhaḥ prīthivyāḥ.

The god Savitar lighted up the eight points of the earth (not the eight hills).

But we have seen already that though the number of Ādityas was originally supposed to have been eight, it was reduced to seven, and this could hardly be said in any sense of the eight points of the compass. Cf. Taitt. Ār. I, 7, 6.

As we cannot think in ancient India of the seven planets, I can only suggest the seven days or tithis of the four parvans of the lunar month as a possible prototype of the Ādityas. This might even explain the destruction of the eighth Āditya, considering that the eighth day of each parvan, owing to its uncertainty, might be represented as exposed to decay and destruction. This would explain such passages as,

IV, 7, 5. yágishthaṁ sapta dhāma-bhiḥ.

Agni, most worthy of sacrifice in the seven stations.

IX, 102, 2. yagñāsya sapta dhāma-bhiḥ.

In the seven stations of the sacrifice.

The seven threads of the sacrifice may have the same origin :

II, 5, 2. ā yāsmiṁ sapta rasmāyaḥ tatāḥ yagñāsya netāri, manushvāt daivyaṁ aśvaṁ.

In whom, as the leader of the sacrifice, the seven threads are stretched out,—the eighth divine being is manlike (?).

The sacrifice itself is called, X, 124, 1, saptá-tantu, having seven threads.

X, 122, 3. saptá dhāmāni pari-yān āmartyaḥ.

Agni, the immortal, who goes round the seven stations.

X, 8, 4. ushāḥ-ushāḥ hí vaso (íti) ágram éshi tvám yamá-yoḥ abhavaḥ vi-bhāva, ritāya sapta dadhishe padāni ganāyan mitrám tanvê svāyai.

For thou, Vasu (Agni), comest first every morning, thou art the illuminator of the twins (day and night). Thou holdest the seven places for the sacrifice, creating Mitra (the sun) for thy own body.

X, 5, 6. saptá maryādāḥ kavāyaḥ tatakshuḥ tāsām ékām ít abhí amhuráḥ gāt.

The sages established the seven divisions, but mischief befell one of them.

I, 22, 16. átaḥ devāḥ avantu naḥ yátaḥ víshnuḥ vi-śakramé prithivyāḥ sapta dhāma-bhiḥ.

May the gods protect us from whence Vishnu strode forth, by the seven stations of the earth!

Even the names of the seven or eight Ādityas are not definitely known, at least not from the hymns of the Rig-veda. In II, 27, 1, we have a list of six names: Mitrá, Aryamán, Bhága, Váruna, Dáksha, Ámsaḥ. These with Áditi would give us seven. In VI, 50, 1, we have Áditi, Várūna, Mitrá, Agní, Aryamán, Savitár, and Bhága. In I, 89, 3, Bhága, Mitrá, Áditi, Dáksha, Aryamán, Várūna, Sóma, Arvínā, and Sárasvatī are invoked together with an old invocation, pūrvayā ni-vídā. In the Taittirīya-āraṇyaka, I, 13, 3, we find the following list: 1. Mitra, 2. Varuna, 3. Dhātār, 4. Aryaman, 5. Amsa, 6. Bhaga, 7. Indra, 8. Vivasvat, but there, too, the eighth son is said to be Mārtānda, or, according to the commentator, Áditya.

The character of Aditi as the mother of certain gods is also indicated by some of her epithets, such as rāga-putrā, having kings for her sons; su-putrā, having good sons; ugrā-putrā, having terrible sons:

II, 27, 7. pīpartu naḥ áditiḥ rāga-putrā áti dvéshāmsi aryamā su-gébhiḥ, brhāt mitrásya várūnasya sárma úpa syāma puru-vīrāḥ árishtāḥ.

May Aditi with her royal sons, may Aryaman carry us on easy roads across the hatreds; may we with many sons and without hurt obtain the great protection of Mitra and Varuna!

III, 4, 11. barhiḥ naḥ ástām áditiḥ su-putrā.

May Aditi with her excellent sons sit on our sacred pile!

VIII, 67, 11. pārsi dīné gabhīré ā úgra-putre glghām-sataḥ, mákiḥ tokásya naḥ rishat.

Protect us, O goddess with terrible sons, from the enemy in shallow or deep water, and no one will hurt our offspring!

Aditi identified with other Deities.

Aditi, however, for the very reason that she was originally intended for the Infinite, for something beyond the visible world, was liable to be identified with a number of finite deities which might all be represented as resting on Aditi, as participating in Aditi, as being Aditi. Thus we read:

I, 89, 10 (final). áditiḥ dyaúḥ áditiḥ antáriksham áditiḥ mâtā sáḥ pitā sáḥ putráḥ, víśve devāḥ áditiḥ pāñka gánāḥ áditiḥ gâtām áditiḥ gáni-tvam.

Aditi is the heaven, Aditi the sky, Aditi the mother, the father, the son. All the gods are Aditi, the five clans, the past is Aditi, Aditi is the future.

But although Aditi may thus be said to be everything, heaven, sky, and all the gods, no passage occurs, in the Rig-veda at least, where the special meaning of heaven or earth is expressed by Aditi. In X, 63, 3, where Aditi seems to mean sky, we shall see that it ought to be taken as a masculine, either in the sense of Āditya, or as an epithet, unbounded, immortal. In I, 72, 9, we ought probably to read prīthvī and pronounce prīthuvī, and translate 'the wide Aditi, the mother with her sons;' and not, as Benfey does, 'the Earth, the eternal mother.'

It is more difficult to determine whether in one passage Aditi has not been used in the sense of life after life, or as the name of the place whither people went after death, or of the deity presiding over that place. In a well-known hymn, supposed to have been uttered by Sunaḥsepa when on the point of being sacrificed by his own father, the following verse occurs :

I, 24, 1. kāḥ naḥ mahyaḥ āditaye pūnaḥ dāt, pitāram ka drīśeyam mātāram ka.

Who will give us back to the great Aditi, that I may see father and mother?

As the supposed utterer of this hymn is still among the living, Aditi can hardly be taken in the sense of earth, nor would the wish to see father and mother be intelligible in the mouth of one who is going to be sacrificed by his own father. If we discard the story of Sunaḥsepa, and take the hymn as uttered by any poet who craves for the protection of the gods in the presence of danger and death, then we may choose between the two meanings of earth or liberty, and translate, either, Who will give us back to the great earth? or, Who will restore us to the great Aditi, the goddess of freedom?

Aditi and Diti.

There is one other passage which might receive light if we could take Aditi in the sense of Hades, but I give this translation as a mere guess :

IV, 2, 11. râyé ka nah su-apatyāya deva dītim ka rāsva āditim urushya.

That we may enjoy our wealth and healthy offspring, give us this life on earth, keep off the life to come! Cf. I, 152, 6.

It should be borne in mind that Diti occurs in the Rig-veda thrice only, and in one passage it should, I believe, be changed into Aditi. This passage occurs in VII, 15, 12. tvām agne vīrá-vat yārah devāh ka savitā bhāgah, dītih ka dāti vāryam. Here the name of Diti is so unusual, and that of Aditi, on the contrary, so natural, that I have little doubt that the poet had put the name of Aditi; and that later reciters, not aware of the occasional license of putting two short syllables instead of one, changed it into Aditi. If we remove this passage, then Diti, in the Rig-veda at least, occurs twice only, and each time together or in contrast with Aditi; cf. V, 62, 8, page 243. I have no doubt, therefore, that Professor Roth is right when he says that Diti is a being without any definite conception, a mere reflex of Aditi. We can clearly watch her first emergence into existence through what is hardly more than a play of words, whereas in the epic and Purāṇic literature this Diti (like the Suras) has grown into a definite person, one of the daughters of Daksha, the wife of Kasyapa, the mother of the enemies of the gods, the Daityas. Such is the growth of legend, mythology and religion!

Aditi in her Moral Character.

Besides the cosmical character of Aditi, which we have hitherto examined, this goddess has also assumed a very prominent moral character. Aditi, like Varuṇa, delivers from sin. Why this should be so, we can still understand if we watch the transition which led from a purely cosmical to a moral conception of Aditi. Sin in the Veda is frequently conceived as a bond or a chain from which the repentant sinner wishes to be freed:

VII, 86, 5. āva drugdhāni pītryā sriga nah āva yā vayām kakrīmā tanūbhih, āva rāgan pasu-trīpam nā tāyūm srigā vatsām nā dāmnah vāsishtham.

Absolve us from the sins of our fathers, and from those which we have committed with our own bodies. Release Vasishtha, O king, like a thief who has feasted on stolen cattle; release him like a calf from the rope^a.

VIII, 67, 14. té naḥ āsnāḥ vṛkânām ādityāsaḥ mumókata stenām baddhām-iva adite.

O Ādityas, deliver us from the mouth of the wolves, like a bound thief, O Aditi! Cf. VIII, 67, 18.

Sunakṣepa, who, as we saw before, wishes to be restored to the great Aditi, is represented as bound (dita) by ropes, and in V, 2, 7, we read :

sūnakṣēpam kīti nī-ditam saḥsṛāt yūpāt amuñikāḥ āsa-mishṭa hī sāk, evā asmāt agne vī mumugdhi pāsān hōtar (īti) kīkitvaḥ ihā tū nī-sādya.

O Agni, thou hast released the bound Sunakṣepa from the stake, for he had prayed; thus take from us, too, these ropes, O sagacious Hotar, after thou hast settled here.

Expressions like these, words like dāman, bond, nī-dita, bound, naturally suggested ā-diti, the un-bound or un-bounded, as one of those deities who could best remove the bonds of sin or misery. If we once realise this concatenation of thought and language, many passages of the Veda that seemed obscure, will become intelligible.

VII, 51, 1. ādityānām āvasā nūtanena sakṣhīmāhi sārmanā sām-tamena, anāgāḥ-tvé aditi-tvé turāsaḥ imām yagñām dadhatu srōshamānāḥ.

May we obtain the new favour of the Ādityas, their best protection; may the quick Maruts listen and place this sacrifice in guiltlessness and Aditi-hood.

I have translated the last words literally, in order to make their meaning quite clear. Āgas has the same meaning as the Greek āyos, guilt, abomination; an-āgās-tvá, therefore, as applied to a sacrifice or to the man who makes it, means guiltlessness, purity. Aditi-tvá, Aditi-hood, has a similar meaning, it means freedom from bonds, from anything that hinders the proper performance of a religious act; it may come to mean perfection or holiness.

^a See M. M., History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, 2nd ed., p. 541.

Aditi having once been conceived as granting this adititvá, soon assumed a very definite moral character, and hence the following invocations :

I, 24, 15. út ut-tamám varuṇa pāśam asmát áva adhamám ví madhyamám srathaya, átha vayám áditya vraté táva ánāgasaḥ áditaye syāma.

O Varuṇa, lift the highest rope, draw off the lowest, remove the middle ; then, O Áditya, let us be in thy service free of guilt before Aditi.

V, 82, 6. ánāgasaḥ áditaye devásya savitúḥ savé, vísvā vāmāni dhīmahi.

May we, guiltless before Aditi, and in the keeping of the god Savitar, obtain all goods ! Professor Roth here translates Aditi by freedom or security.

I, 162, 22. anāgāh-tvám naḥ áditiḥ krinotu.

May Aditi give us sinlessness ! Cf. VII, 51, 1.

IV, 12, 4. yát kit hí te puruṣa-trā yavishtha ákitti-bhiḥ kakrimá kát kit āgah, kridhí sú asmān áditeḥ ánāgān ví énāmsi sistrathaḥ víshvak agne.

Whatever, O youthful god, we have committed against thee, men as we are, whatever sin through thoughtlessness, make us guiltless of Aditi, loosen the sins on all sides, O Agni !

VII, 93, 7. sáh agne enā námasá sám-iddhaḥ ákṣha mitráṃ várunam índram voṣeḥ, yát-sím āgah kakrimá tát sú mrīḥ tát aryamā áditiḥ sistrathantu.

O Agni, thou who hast been kindled with this adoration, greet Mitra, Varuṇa, and Indra. Whatever sin we have committed, do thou pardon it ! May Aryaman, Aditi loose it !

Here the plural sistrathantu should be observed, instead of the dual.

VIII, 18, 6-7. áditiḥ naḥ dívā paśúm áditiḥ náktam ádva-yāḥ, áditiḥ pátu amhasaḥ sadā-vridhā.

utá syā naḥ dívā matíḥ áditiḥ ūtyā ā gamat, sá sám-tāti máyaḥ karat āpa srīdhaḥ.

May Aditi by day protect our cattle, may she, who never deceives, protect by night ; may she, with steady increase, protect us from evil !

And may she, the thoughtful Aditi, come with help to us by day; may she kindly bring happiness to us, and carry away all enemies! Cf. X, 36, 3, page 251.

X, 87, 18. ā vṛiskyantām āditaye duḥ-ēvāḥ.

May the evil-doers be cut off from Aditi! or literally, may they be rooted out before Aditi!

II, 27, 14. ādite mītra vārūna utā mrīḥ yāt vaḥ vayām kakṛimā kāt kīt āgaḥ, urū asyām ābhayam gyōtiḥ indra mā naḥ dīrghāḥ abhī nasan tāmistrāḥ.

Aditi, Mitra, and also Varuna forgive, if we have committed any sin against you. May I obtain the wide and fearless light, O Indra! May not the long darkness reach us!

VII, 87, 7. yāḥ mrīḥyāti kakṛúshe kīt āgaḥ vayām syāma vārūne anāgāḥ, ānu vratāni āditeḥ ridhāntaḥ yuyām pāta svastī-bhiḥ sādā naḥ.

May we be sinless before Varuna, who is gracious even to him who has committed sin, and may we follow the laws of Aditi! Protect us always with your blessings!

Lastly, Aditi, like all other gods, is represented as a giver of worldly goods, and implored to bestow them on her worshippers, or to protect them by her power:

I, 43, 2. yāthā naḥ āditiḥ kárat páṛve nṛí-bhyaḥ yāthā gáve, yāthā tokāya rudríyam.

That Aditi may bring Rudra's favour to our cattle, our men, our cow, our offspring.

I, 153, 3. pípāya dhenúḥ āditiḥ rītāya gánāya mitrávarunā haviḥ-dé.

Aditi, the cow, gives food to the righteous man, O Mitra and Varuna, who makes offerings to the gods. Cf. VIII, 101, 15.

I, 185, 3. aneháḥ dātrám āditeḥ anarvám huvé.

I call for the unrivalled, uninjured gift of Aditi. Here Professor Roth again assigns to Aditi the meaning of freedom or security.

VII, 40, 2. dīdeshṭu devī āditiḥ réknaḥ.

May the divine Aditi assign wealth!

X, 100, 1. ā sarvá-tātim āditim vrinīmahe.

We implore Aditi for health and wealth.

I, 94, 15. yásmai tvám su-dravināḥ dáḍasaḥ anāgāḥ-tvám

adite sarvá-tâtâ, yám bhadréna sávasâ kodáyâsi pragâ-vatâ râdhasâ té syâma.

To whom thou, possessor of good treasures, grantest guiltlessness, O Aditi, in health and wealth*, whom thou quickenest with precious strength and with riches in progeny, may we be they! Cf. II, 40, 6; IV, 25, 5; X, 11, 2.

The principal epithets of Aditi have been mentioned in the passages quoted above, and they throw no further light on the nature of the goddess. She was called devî, goddess, again and again; another frequent epithet is anarván, uninjured, unscathed. Being invoked to grant light (VII, 82, 10), she is herself called luminous, gyótishmatî, I, 136, 3; and svârvatî, heavenly. Being the goddess of the infinite expanse, she, even with greater right than the dawn, is called úrûkî, VIII, 67, 12; uruvyâkas, V, 46, 6; uruvragâ, VIII, 67, 12; and possibly prithvî in I, 72, 9. As supporting everything, she is called dhârayátkshiti, supporting the earth, I, 136, 3; and visvâganyâ, VII, 10, 4. To her sons she owes the names of râgaputrâ, II, 27, 7; suputrâ, III, 4, 11; and ugrâputrâ, VIII, 67, 11: to her wealth that of sudravinas, I, 94, 15, though others refer this epithet to Agni. There remains one name pastyâ, IV, 55, 3; VIII, 27, 5, meaning housewife, which again indicates her character as mother of the gods.

I have thus given all the evidence that can be collected from the Rig-veda as throwing light on the character of the goddess Aditi, and I have carefully excluded everything that rests only on the authority of the Yagur- or Atharva-vedas, or of the Brâhmanas and Âranyakas, because in all they give beyond the repetitions from the Rig-veda, they seem to me to represent a later phase of thought that ought not to be mixed up with the more primitive conceptions of the Rig-veda. Not that the Rig-veda is free from what seems decidedly modern, or at all events secondary and late. But it is well to keep the great collections, as such, separate, whatever our opinions may be as to the age of their component parts.

* On sarvâtâtî, salus, see Benfey's excellent remarks in Orient und Occident, vol. ii, p. 519. Professor Roth takes aditi here as an epithet of Agni.

In the Atharva-veda Aditi appears more unintelligible, more completely mythological, than in the Rig-veda. We read, for instance, Atharva-veda VII, 6, 1 :

‘Aditi is the sky, Aditi is the welkin, Aditi is mother, is father, is son ; all the gods are Aditi, and the five clans of men ; Aditi is what was, Aditi is what will be.

‘We invoke for our protection the great mother of the well-ruling gods, the wife of Rita, the powerful, never-aging, far-spreading, the sheltering, well-guiding Aditi.’

In the Taittirīya-āraṇyaka and similar works the mythological confusion becomes greater still. Much valuable material for an analytical study of Aditi may be found in B. and R.’s Dictionary, and in several of Dr. Muir’s excellent contributions to a knowledge of Vedic theogony and mythology.

Aditi as an Adjective.

But although the foregoing remarks give as complete a description of Aditi as can be gathered from the hymns of the Rig-veda, a few words have to be added on certain passages where the word áditi occurs, and where it clearly cannot mean the goddess Aditi, as a feminine, but must be taken either as the name of a corresponding masculine deity, or as an adjective in the sense of unrestrained, independent, free.

V, 59, 8. mímātu dyaúh áditih vitáye nah.

May the boundless Dyú (sky) help us to our repast !

Here áditi must either be taken in the sense of Āditya, or better in its original sense of unbounded, as an adjective belonging to Dyú, the masculine deity of the sky.

Dyú or the sky is called áditi or unbounded in another passage, X, 63, 3 :

yébhyaḥ mātā mādhu-mat pínvate páyaḥ pýūṣham dyaúh áditih ádri-barhâh.

The gods to whom their mother yields the sweet milk, and the unbounded sky, as firm as a rock, their food.

IV, 3, 8. kathā sárdhāya marútām ritāya kathā sūrē brīhatē prikkhyāmānah, prāti bravaḥ áditaye turāya.

How wilt thou tell it to the host of the Maruts, how to the bright heaven, when thou art asked? How to the quick Aditi?

Here Aditi cannot be the goddess, partly on account of the masculine gender of turāya, partly because she is never called quick. Aditi must here be the name of one of the Ādityas, or it may refer back to sûré brīhaté. It can hardly be joined, as Professor Roth proposes, with sārdhāya marútām, owing to the intervening sûré brīhaté.

In several passages áditi, as an epithet, refers to Agni:

IV, 1, 20 (final). vīsveshām áditiḥ yagnīyānām vīsveshām átithiḥ mānushānām.

He, Agni, the Aditi, or the freest, among all the gods; he the guest among all men.

The same play on the words áditi and átithi occurs again:

VII, 9, 3. ámūrah kavīḥ áditiḥ vivásvān su-samsát mitráḥ átithiḥ siváḥ nah, kītrá-bhānuḥ ushásām bhāti ágre.

The wise poet, Aditi, Vivasvat, Mitra with his good company, our welcome guest, he (Agni) with brilliant light came at the head of the dawns.

Here, though I admit that several renderings are possible, Aditi is meant as a name of Agni, to whom the whole hymn is addressed, and who, as usual, is identified with other gods, or, at all events, invoked by their names. We may translate áditiḥ vivásvān by 'the brilliant Aditi,' or 'the unchecked, the brilliant,' or by 'the boundless Vivasvat,' but on no account can we take áditi here as the female goddess. The same applies to VIII, 19, 14, where Aditi, unless we suppose the goddess brought in in the most abrupt way, must be taken as a name of Agni; while in X, 92, 14, áditim anarvānam, to judge from other epithets given in the same verse, has most likely to be taken again as an appellative of Agni. In some passages it would, no doubt, be possible to take Aditi as the name of a female deity, if it were certain that no other meaning could be assigned to this word. But if we once know that Aditi was the name of a male deity also, the structure of these passages becomes far more perfect, if we take Aditi in that sense:

IV, 39, 3. ánágasam tám áditih kṛinotu sáh mitréna várūnena sa-gósháh.

May Aditi make him free from sin, he who is allied with Mitra and Varuna.

We have had several passages in which Aditi, the female deity, is represented as sagósháh or allied with other Ádityas, but if sáh is the right reading here, Aditi in this verse can only be the male deity. The pronoun sá cannot refer to tám.

With regard to other passages, such as IX, 81, 5; VI, 51, 3, and even some of those translated above in which Aditi has been taken as a female goddess, the question must be left open till further evidence can be obtained. There is only one more passage which has been often discussed, and where ádití was supposed to have the meaning of earth:

VII, 18, 8. duh-ádhyāh áditim sreváyantaḥ aketásah ví gagrībhre párushnīm.

Professor Roth in one of his earliest essays translated this line, 'The evil-disposed wished to dry the earth, the fools split the Parushnī,' and he supposed its meaning to have been that the enemies of Sudás swam across the Parushnī in order to attack Sudás. We might accept this translation, if it could be explained how by throwing themselves into the river, the enemies made the earth dry, though even then there would remain this difficulty that, with the exception of one other doubtful passage, discussed before, ádití never means earth. We might possibly translate: 'The evil-disposed, the fools, laid dry and divided the boundless river Parushnī.' This would be a description of a stratagem very common in ancient warfare, viz. diverting the course of a river and laying its original bed dry by digging a new channel, and thus dividing the old river. This is also the sense accepted by Sâyana, who does not say that vīgraha means dividing the waves of a river, as Professor Roth renders kūlabheda, but that it means dividing or cutting through its banks. In the Dictionary Professor Roth assigns to ádití in this passage the meaning of endless, inexhaustible.

Kaná.

Note 5. Nothing is more difficult in the interpretation of the Veda than to gain an accurate knowledge of the power of particles and conjunctions. The particle kaná, we are told, is used both affirmatively and negatively, a statement which shows better than anything else the uncertainty to which every translation of Vedic hymns is as yet exposed. It is perfectly true that in the text of the Rig-veda, as we now read it, kaná means both indeed and no. But this very fact shows that we ought to distinguish where the first collectors of the Vedic hymns have not distinguished, and that while in the former case we read kaná, we ought in the latter to read ka ná.

I begin with those passages in which kaná is used emphatically, though originally it may have been a double negation.

I a. In negative sentences :

I, 18, 7. yásmât rité ná sídhyati yagñáh vipaḥ-kítaḥ kaná.

Without whom the sacrifice does not succeed, not even that of the sage.

V, 34, 5. ná ásunvatá saḥate púshyatá kaná.

He does not cling to a man who offers no libations, even though he be thriving.

I, 24, 6. nahí te kshatrám ná sáhaḥ ná manyúm váyaḥ kaná amī (íti) patáyantaḥ ápúḥ.

For thy power, thy strength, thy anger even these birds which fly up, do not reach. Cf. I, 100, 15.

I, 155, 5. trítīyam asya nákiḥ ā dadharshati váyaḥ kaná patáyantaḥ patatrīnaḥ.

This third step no one approaches, not even the winged birds which fly up.

I, 55, 1. diváh kít asya varimā ví papratha, índram ná mahnā prithivī kaná práti.

The width of the heavens is stretched out, even the earth in her greatness is no match for Indra.

I b. In positive sentences :

VII, 32, 13. pûrvīḥ kaná prá-sitayaḥ taranti tám yáh índre kármanā bhúvat.

Even many snares pass him who is with Indra in his work.
VIII, 2, 14. ukthám kaná sasyámānam ágoḥ aríḥ á kiketa, ná gāyatrám gīyámānam.

He (Indra) marks indeed a poor man's prayer that is recited, but not a hymn that is sung. (Doubtful.)

VIII, 78, 10. táva ít indra ahám á-sásá háste dātram kaná á dade.

Hoping in thee alone, O Indra, I take even this sickle in my hand.

I, 55, 5. ádha kaná srát dadhati tvíshi-mate indráya vāgram ni-ghánighnate vadhám.

Then indeed they believe in Indra, the majestic, when he hurls the bolt to strike.

I, 152, 2. etát kaná tvaḥ ví kiketat eshám.

Does one of them understand even this?

IV, 18, 9. mámat kaná used in the same sense as mámat kít.

I, 139, 2. dhíbhíḥ kaná mánasá svébhiḥ akshá-bhiḥ.

V, 41, 13. váyah kaná su-bhvāḥ á áva yanti.

VII, 18, 9. áśúḥ kaná ít abhi-pitvám gagāma.

VIII, 91, 3. á kaná tvā kikitsāmaḥ ádhi kaná tvā ná imasi.

We wish to know thee, indeed, but we cannot understand thee.

X, 49, 5. ahám randhayam mrígayam srutárvane yát má ágihíta vayúnā kaná ānu-shák.

VI, 26, 7. ahám kaná tát sūrí-bhiḥ ānaryām.

May I also obtain this with the lords.

I c. Frequently kaná occurs after interrogative pronouns, to which it imparts an indefinite meaning, and principally in negative sentences :

I, 74, 7. ná yóḥ upabdíḥ ásvyah srinvé ráthasya kát kaná, yát agne yāsi dūtyām.

No sound of horses is heard, and no sound of the chariot, when thou, O Agni, goest on thy message.

I, 81, 5. ná tvā-vān indra káḥ kaná ná gātáḥ ná gani-shyaté.

No one is like thee, O Indra, no one has been born, no one will be !

I, 84, 20. mā te rādhāmsi mā te ūtāyaḥ vaso (īti) asmān kádā ṇaná dabhan.

May thy gifts, may thy help, O Vasu, never fail us!

Many more passages might be given to illustrate the use of ṇaná or kás ṇaná and its derivatives in negative sentences.

Cf. I, 105, 3; 136, 1; 139, 5; II, 16, 3; 23, 5; 28, 6; III, 36, 4; IV, 31, 9; V, 42, 6; 82, 2; VI, 3, 2; 20, 4; 47, 1; 3; 48, 17; 54, 9; 59, 4; 69, 8; 75, 16; VII, 32, 1; 19; 59, 3; 82, 7; 104, 3; VIII, 19, 6; 23, 15; 24, 15; 28, 4; 47, 7; 64, 2; 66, 13; 68, 19; IX, 61, 27; 69, 6; 114, 4; X, 33, 9; 39, 11; 48, 5; 49, 10; 59, 8; 62, 9; 85, 3; 86, 11; 95, 1; 112, 9; 119, 6; 7; 128, 4; 129, 2; 152, 1; 168, 3; 185, 2.

I d. In a few passages, however, we find the indefinite pronoun kás ṇaná used in sentences which are not negative:

III, 30, 1. títikshante abhí-sastim gānānām indra tvát ā káh ṇaná hí pra-ketáh.

They bear the scoffing of men; for, Indra, from thee comes every wisdom.

I, 113, 8. ushāḥ mṛítám kám ṇaná bodháyantí.

Ushas, who wakes every dead (or one who is as if dead).

I, 191, 7. ādrishṭáh kím ṇaná ihá vaḥ sārve sákám ní gasyata.

Invisible ones, whatever you are, vanish all together!

II. We now come to passages in which ṇaná stands for ka ná, and therefore renders the sentence negative without any further negative particle. It might seem possible to escape from this admission, by taking certain sentences in an interrogative sense. But this would apply to certain sentences only, and would seem forced even there:

II, 16, 2. yásmāt indrāt bṛihatáh kím ṇaná im rité.

Beside whom, (beside) the great Indra, there is not anything.

II, 24, 12. vísvam satyám magha-vâná yuvóḥ it āpah ṇaná prá minanti vratám vām.

Everything, you mighty ones, belongs indeed to you; even the waters do not transgress your law.

IV, 30, 3. vīśve kánā ít anā tvā devāsaḥ indra yuyudhuḥ.
Even all the gods do not ever fight thee, O Indra.

V, 34, 7. duḥ-gé kánā dhriyate vīśvaḥ ā purú gānaḥ yāḥ
asya távishīm ákukrudhat.

Even in a stronghold many a man is not often preserved who has excited his anger.

VII, 83, 2. yásmin āgā bhāvati kīm kánā priyám.

In which struggle there is nothing good whatsoever.

VII, 86, 6. svāpnaḥ kánā ít ánrítasya pra-yotā.

Even sleep does not remove all evil.

In this passage I formerly took kánā as affirmative, not as negative, and therefore assigned to prayotā the same meaning which Sāyana assigns to it, one who brings or mixes, whereas it ought to be, as rightly seen by Roth, one who removes.

VIII, 1, 5. mahé kánā tvām adri-vaḥ párá sulkāya deyām, ná saháśráya ná ayútāya vagri-vaḥ ná satāya sata-magha.

I should not give thee up, wielder of the thunderbolt, even for a great price, not for a thousand, not for ten thousand (?), not for a hundred, O Indra, thou who art possessed of a hundred powers!

VIII, 51, 7. kadā kánā starīḥ asi.

Thou art never sterile.

VIII, 52, 7. kadā kánā prá yukkkhasi.

Thou art never weary.

VIII, 55, 5. kákshushā kánā sam-nāse.

Not to be reached even with eye.

X, 56, 4. mahimnáḥ eshām pitáraḥ kánā ísire.

Note 6. Considering the particular circumstances mentioned in this and the preceding hymn, of Indra's forsaking his companions, the Maruts, or even scorning their help, one feels strongly tempted to take tyágas in its etymological sense of leaving or forsaking, and to translate, by his forsaking you, or, if he should forsake you. The poet may have meant the word to convey that idea, which no doubt would be most appropriate here; but it must be confessed, at the same time, that in other passages where tyágas occurs, that meaning could hardly be ascribed to it. Strange as it may seem, no one who is acquainted with the general train of thought in the Vedic hymns can fail to see that tyágas in most passages means attack, onslaught; it may be even the instrument of an attack, a weapon. How it should come to take this meaning is indeed difficult to explain, and I do not wonder that Professor Roth in his Dictionary simply renders the word by forlornness, need, danger, or by estrangement, unkindness, malignity. But let us look at the passages, and we shall see that these abstract conceptions are quite out of place:

VIII, 47, 7. ná tám tigmám kaná tyágah ná drásad abhí tám gurú.

No sharp blow, no heavy one, shall come near him whom you protect.

Here the two adjectives tigmá, sharp, and gurú, heavy, point to something tangible, and I feel much inclined to take tyágas in this passage as a weapon, as something that is let off with violence, rather than in the more abstract sense of onslaught.

I, 169, 1. maháh kit asi tyágasaḥ varūtā.

Thou art the shielder from a great attack.

IV, 43, 4. káh vām maháh kit tyágasaḥ abhīke urushyátam mádhvī dasrá naḥ útī.

Who is against your great attack? Protect us with your help, O Asvins, ye strong ones.

Here Professor Roth seems to join maháh kit tyágasaḥ abhīke urushyátam, but in that case it would be impossible to construe the first words, káh vām.

I, 119, 8. ágakḥhatam kṛpamānam parā-vāti pitúḥ svásya tyágasá ní-bádhitam.

You went from afar to the suppliant, who had been struck down by the violence of his own father.

According to Professor Roth tyágas would here mean forlornness, need, or danger. But níbádhita is a strong verb, as we may see in VIII, 64, 2. padā pavīn arādhásaḥ ní bādhasva mahān asi.

Strike the useless Panis down with thy foot, for thou art great.

X, 18, 11. út svañīkasva prīthivi mā ní bādhathāh.

Open, O earth, do not press on him (i. e. the dead, who is to be buried ; cf. M. M., Über Todtenbestattung, Zeitschrift der D. M. G., vol. ix, p. xv).

VII, 83, 6. yātra rāga-bhiḥ dasā-bhiḥ nī-bādhitam prā su-dāsam āvatam trītsu-bhiḥ sahā.

Where you protected Sudās with the Trītsus, when he was pressed or set upon by the ten kings.

Another passage in which tyāgas occurs is,

VI, 62, 10. sánutyena tyāgasā mártasya vanushyatām āpi śīrshā vavṛiktam.

By your covert attack turn back the heads of those even who harass the mortal.

Though this passage may seem less decisive, yet it is difficult to see how tyāgasā could here, according to Professor Roth, be rendered by forlornness or danger. Something is required by which enemies can be turned back. Nor can it be doubtful that śīrshā is governed by vavṛiktam, meaning turn back their heads, for the same expression occurs again in I, 33, 5. páraḥ kīti śīrshā vavṛiguh té indra āyagvānaḥ yāgva-bhiḥ spārdhamānāḥ.

Professor Benfey translates this verse by, 'Kopfüber flohn sie alle vor dir;' but it may be rendered more literally, 'These lawless people fighting with the pious turned away their heads.'

X, 144, 6. evā tát índraḥ indunā devéshu kīti dhārayāte máhi tyāgaḥ.

Indeed through this draught Indra can hold out against that great attack even among the gods.

X, 79, 6. kīm devéshu tyāgaḥ énaḥ kakartha.

What insult, what sin hast thou committed among the gods?

In these two passages the meaning of tyāgas as attack or assault is at least as appropriate as that proposed by Professor Roth, estrangement, malignity.

There remains one passage, VI, 3, 1. yám tvám mitréna váranaḥ sa-góshāḥ déva pāsi tyāgasā mártam āmhaḥ.

I confess that the construction of this verse is not clear to me, and I doubt whether it is possible to use tyāgasā as a verbal noun governing an accusative. If this were possible, one might translate, 'The mortal whom thou, O God (Agni), Varuna, together with Mitra, protectest by pushing back evil.' More probably we should translate, 'Whom thou protectest from evil by thy might.'

If it be asked how tyágas can possibly have the meaning which has been assigned to it in all the passages in which it occurs, viz. that of forcibly attacking or pushing away, we can only account for it by supposing that tyag, before it came to mean to leave, meant to push off, to drive away with violence (verstossen instead of verlassen). This meaning may still be perceived occasionally in the use of tyag; e. g. devás tyagantu mām, may the gods forsake me! i. e. may the gods drive me away! Even in the latest Sanskrit tyag is used with regard to an arrow that is let off. 'To expel' is expressed by nis-tyag. Those who believe in the production of new roots by the addition of prepositional prefixes might possibly see in tyag an original ati-ag, to drive off; but, however that may be, there is evidence enough to show that tyag expressed originally a more violent act of separation than it does in ordinary Sanskrit, though here, too, passages occur in which tyag may be translated by to throw, to fling; for instance, khe dhûlim yas tyaged ukkair mûrdhnî tasyaiva sâ patet, he who throws up dust in the air, it will fall on his head. Ind. Spr. 1582.

Muk, too, is used in a similar manner; for instance, vagram mokshyate te mahendraḥ, Mahâbh. XIV, 263. Cf. Dhammapada, ver. 389.

Verse 13.

Note 1. Sâmsa, masc., means a spell, whether for good or for evil, a blessing as well as a curse. It means a curse, or, at all events, a calumny:

I, 18, 3. mā naḥ sâmsaḥ ārarushaḥ dhûrtiḥ prānak mārtyasya.

Let not the curse of the enemy, the onslaught of a mortal hurt us,

I, 94, 8. asmākam sâmsaḥ abhī astu duḥ-dhyāḥ.

May our curse overcome the wicked!

III, 18, 2. tāpa sâmsam ārarushaḥ.

Burn the curse of the enemy!

VII, 25, 2. âré tám sámsam krinuhi ninitsóh.

Take far away the curse of the reviler! Cf. VII, 34, 12.

It means blessing :

II, 31, 6. utá vah sámsam uslgâm-iva smasi.

We desire your blessing as a blessing for suppliants.

X, 31, 1. â nah devânâm úpa vetu sámsah.

May the blessing of the gods come to us!

X, 7, 1. urushyá nah urú-bhih deva sámsaih.

Protect us, god, with thy wide blessings!

II, 23, 10. mā nah duh-sámsah abhi-dipsúh írata prá su-sámsáh matí-bhih târishîmahî.

Let not an evil-speaking enemy conquer us; may we, enjoying good report, increase by our prayers!

In some passages, however, as pointed out by Grassmann, sámsa may best be rendered by singer, praiser. Grassmann marks one passage only,

II, 26, 1. rigúh ít sámsah vanavat vanushyatáh.

May the righteous singer conquer his enemies.

He admits, however, doubtfully, the explanation of B. R., that rigúh sámsah may be taken as one word, meaning, 'requiring the right.' This explanation seems surrendered by B. R. in the second edition of their Dictionary, and I doubt whether sámsah can mean here anything but singer. That being so, the same meaning seems more appropriate in other verses also, which I formerly translated differently, e. g.

VII, 56, 19. imé sámsam vanushyatáh ní pânti.

They, the Maruts, protect the singer from his enemy.

Lastly, sámsa means praise, the spell addressed by men to the gods, or prayer :

I, 33, 7. prá sunvatáh stuvatáh sámsam ávah.

Thou hast regarded the prayer of him who offers libation and praise.

X, 42, 6. yásmin vayám dadhimá sámsam índre.

Indra in whom we place our hope. Cf. ásams, Westergaard, Radices Linguae Sanscritae, s. v. sams.

MANDALA I, HYMN 167.

ASHṬAKA II, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 4-5.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. O Indra, a thousand have been thy helps accorded to us, a thousand, O driver of the bays, have been thy most delightful viands. May thousands of treasures richly to enjoy, may goods¹ come to us a thousandfold.

2. May the Maruts come towards us with their aids, the mighty ones, or with their best aids from the great heaven, now that their furthest steeds have rushed forth on the distant shore of the sea ;

3. There clings¹ to the Maruts one who moves in secret, like a man's wife (the lightning²), and who is like a spear carried behind³, well grasped, resplendent, gold-adorned ; there is also with them Vāk (the voice of thunder), like unto a courtly, eloquent woman.

4. Far away the brilliant, untiring Maruts cling to their young maid, as if she belonged to them all¹; but the terrible ones did not drive away Rodast (the lightning), for they wished her to grow² their friend.

5. When the divine Rodast with dishevelled locks, the manly-minded, wished to follow them, she went, like Sûryâ (the Dawn), to the chariot of her servant, with terrible look, as with the pace of a cloud.

6. As soon as the poet with the libations, O Maruts, had sung his song at the sacrifice, pouring out Soma, the youthful men (the Maruts) placed the young maid (in their chariot) as their companion for victory, mighty in assemblies.

7. I praise what is the praiseworthy true greatness of those Maruts, that the manly-minded, proud, and strong one (Rodasi) drives with them towards the blessed mothers.

8. They protect¹ Mitra and Varuṇa from the unspeakable, and Aryaman also finds out the infamous. Even what is firm and unshakable is being shaken²; but he who dispenses treasures³, O Maruts, has grown (in strength).

9. No people indeed, whether near to us, or from afar, have ever found the end of your strength, O Maruts! The Maruts, strong in daring strength, have, like the sea, boldly¹ surrounded their haters.

10. May we to-day, may we to-morrow in battle be called the most beloved of Indra. We were so formerly, may we truly be so day by day, and may the lord of the Maruts be with us.

11. May this praise, O Maruts, this song of Māndārya, the son of Māna, the poet, ask you with food for offspring for ourselves! May we have an invigorating autumn, with quickening rain!

NOTES.

Ascribed to Agastya, addressed to the Maruts, but the first verse to Indra. Metre Trishṭubh throughout.

No verse of this hymn occurs in the Sâma-veda, nor in the other Samhitâs.

Verse 1.

Note 1. We must keep vâga, as a general term, distinct from asva, horses, and go, cows, for the poets themselves distinguish between gavyântaḥ, asvayântaḥ, and vâgayântaḥ; see IV, 17, 16; VI, 8, 6.

Verse 3.

Note 1. On mimyaksha, see before, I, 165, 1, note 2.

Note 2. The spear of the Maruts is meant for the lightning, and we actually find rishî-vidyutaḥ, having the lightning for their spear, as an epithet of the Maruts, - I, 168, 5; V, 52, 13.

The rest of this verse is difficult, and has been variously rendered by different scholars. We must remember that the lightning is represented as the wife or the beloved of the Maruts. In that character she is called Rodasî, with the accent on the last syllable, and kept distinct from ródasî, the dual, with the accent on the antepenultimate, which means heaven and earth.

This Rodasî occurs:

V, 56, 8. á yásmin tastháu su-ránâni bíbhraṭi sákâ marútsu rodasî.

The chariot on which, carrying pleasant gifts, stands Rodasî among the Maruts.

VI, 50, 5. mimyaksha yéshu rodasî nú devî.

To whom clings the divine Rodasî.

VI, 66, 6. ádha sma eshu rodasî svá-sokîḥ á ámavatsu tasthau ná rókaḥ.

When they (the Maruts) had joined the two Rodas, i.e. heaven and earth, then the self-brilliant Rodasî came among the strong ones.

The name of Ródasî, heaven and earth, is so much more frequent in the Rig-veda than that of Rodasî, that in several passages the iti which stands after duals, has been wrongly inserted after Rodasī in the singular. It is so in our hymn, verse 4, where we must read rodasīm instead of rodasī iti, and again in X, 92, 11.

Besides the lightning, however, the thunder also may be said to be in the company of the Maruts, to be their friend or their wife, and it is this double relationship which seems to be hinted at in our hymn.

The thunder is called Vāk, voice, the voice of heaven, also called by the author of the Anukramanī, Āmbhrinī. It was natural to identify this ambhrina with Greek ὄβριμος, terrible, particularly as it is used of the thunder, ὄβριμον ἐβρόντησε, Hes. Th. 839, and is applied to Athene as ὄβριμο-πάτρη. But there are difficulties pointed out by Curtius, Grundzüge, p. 532, which have not yet been removed. This Vāk says of herself (X, 125, 12) that she stretched the bow for Rudra, the father of the Maruts, that her birth-place is in the waters (clouds), and that she fills heaven and earth. See also X, 114, 8.

In I, 173, 3. antāh dūtāh nā rodasī karat vāk.

The voice (thunder) moved between heaven and earth, like a messenger.

In VIII, 100, 10 and 11, after it has been said that the thunderbolt lies hidden in the water, the poet says: yāt vāk vādantī avi-keṭanāni rāshtri devānām ni-sasāda mandrā, when the voice, the queen of the gods, the delightful, uttering incomprehensible sounds, sat down. If, in our verse, we take Vāk in the sense of thunder, but as a feminine, it seems to me that the poet, speaking of the lightning and thunder as the two companions of the Maruts, represents the first, Rodasī, or the lightning, as the recognised wife, hiding herself in the house, while the other, the loud thunder, is represented as a more public companion of the Maruts, distinctly called vidatheshu pagrā (verse 6), a good speaker at assemblies. This contrast, if it is really what the poet intended, throws a curious light on the social character of the Vedic times, as it presupposes two classes of wives, not necessarily simultaneous, however,—a house-wife, who stays at home and is not much seen, and a wife who appears in public and takes part in the society and conversation of the sabhâ, the assembly-room, and the vidathas, the meetings. The loud voice of the thunder as well as the usual hiding of the lightning might well suggest this comparison. That good manners, such as are required in public, and ready speech, were highly esteemed in Vedic times, we learn from such words as sabhéya and vidathyâ. Sabhéya, from sabhâ, assembly, court, comes to mean courtly, polite; vidathyâ, from vidatha, assembly, experienced, learned.

VIII, 4, 9. kandráh yâti sabhâm úpa.

Thy friend, Indra, goes brilliant towards the assembly.

X, 34, 6. sabhâm eti kitaváh.

The gambler goes to the assembly.

VI, 28, 6. brîhât vah váyah ukryate sabhâsu.

Your great strength is spoken of in the assemblies.

Wealth is described as consisting in sabhâs, houses, IV, 2, 5; and a friend is described as sabhâsaha, strong in the assembly, X, 71, 10.

Sabhéya is used as an epithet of vipra (II, 24, 13), and a son is praised as sabheya, vidathya, and sadanya, i.e. as distinguished in the assemblies.

Vidathyâ, in fact, means much the same as sabheya, namely, good for, distinguished at vidathas, meetings for social, political, or religious purposes, IV, 21, 2; VII, 36, 8, &c.

Note 3. Úparâ ná rishîh. I do not see how uparâ can here mean the cloud, if it ever has that meaning. I take úpara as opposed to pûrva, i.e. behind, as opposed to before. In that sense úpara is used, X, 77, 3; X, 15, 2; 44, 7, &c. It would therefore mean the spear on the back, or the spear drawn back before it is hurled forward.

B. R. propose to read sam-vâk, colloquium, but they give no explanation. The reference to VS. IX, 2, is wrong.

Verse 4.

Note 1. The fourth verse carries on the same ideas which were hinted at in the third. We must again change rodasî, the dual, into rodasîm, which is sufficiently indicated by the accent. Yavyâ I take as an instrumental of yavi, or of yavyâ. It means the youthful maid, and corresponds to yuvati in verse 6. Yavyâ would be the exact form which Curtius (Grundzüge, p. 589) postulated as the Sanskrit prototype of Hebe^a. Now, if the Maruts correspond to Mars in Latin, and to Ares in Greek, the fact that in the Iliad Hebe bathes and clothes Ares^b, may be of some significance. Sâdhârani is used in the sense of uxor communis, and would show a familiarity with the idea of polyandry recognised in the epic poetry of the Mahâbhârata.

But although the Maruts cling to this maid (the Vâk, or thunder), they do not cast off Rodasî, their lawful wife, the lightning, but wish her to grow for their friendship, i. e. as their friend.

Ayâsah yavyâ must be scanned ˘ ˘ ˘ — ˘ — —. In VI, 66, 5, ayâsah mahnâ must be scanned as ˘ ˘ ˘ — ˘ — — (mahimnâ?).

Note 2. Vṛdham, as the accent shows, is here an infinitive governed by gushanta.

Verse 5.

See von Bradke, Dyaus Asura, p. 76.

Verse 6.

I translate arkâ by poet. The construction would become too cumbersome if we translated, 'as soon as the hymn with the libations was there for you, as soon as the sacrificer sang his song.'

Verse 7.

The meaning of the second line is obscure, unless we adopt Ludwig's ingenious view that Rodasî is here conceived as Eileithyia, the goddess who helps mothers in childbirth. I confess that it is a bold conjecture, and there is nothing in Vedic literature to support it. All I can say is that Eileithyia is in Greek, like Hebe (Yavyâ) and Ares (Marut), a child of Hera, and that lightning as well as dawn might become a symbol of birth. The etymology and the very form of Ελλείθνια is doubtful, and so is that of Rodasī. It is tempting to connect rodasī, in the sense of heaven and earth, with O. S. radur, A. S. rodor (Grimm, Myth. p. 662), but that is impossible. Cf. I, 101, 7.

^a Wir müssen ein vorgriechisches yâvâ oder möglicherweise yâvyâ annehmen.

^b Il. V, 905.

Verse 8.

Note 1. I do not see how pānti, the plural, can refer to Mitra and Varuṇa, nor how these gods could here be introduced as acting the part of the Maruts. I therefore refer pānti to the Maruts, who may be said to protect Mitra and Varuṇa, day and night, and all that belongs to them, from evil and disgrace. Aryaman is then brought in, as being constantly connected with Mitrā-varuṇau, and the finding out, the perceiving from a distance, of the infamous enemies, who might injure Mitrā-varuṇau, is parenthetically ascribed to him. See Ludwig, Anmerkungen, p. 239.

Note 2. Kyavante cannot and need not be taken for kyāvayanti, though akyutaḥ is a common epithet of the Maruts. It is quite true that the shaking of the unshakable mountains is the work of the Maruts, but that is understood, even though it is not expressed. In V, 60, 3, we read, pārvataḥ kīṭ māhi vṛiddhāḥ bibhāya, even the very great mountain feared, i. e. the Maruts.

Note 3. Dāti in dātivāra has been derived by certain Sanskrit scholars from dā, to give. It means, no doubt, gift, but it is derived from dā (do, dyati), to share, and means first, a share, and then a gift. Dātivāra is applied to the Maruts, V, 58, 2; III, 51, 9, and must therefore be applied to them in our passage also, though the construction becomes thereby extremely difficult. It means possessed of a treasure of goods which they distribute. The growing, too, which is here predicated by vavṛidhe, leads us to think of the Maruts, as in I, 37, 5, or of their friend Indra, I, 52, 2; 81, 1; VI, 30, 1. It is never, so far as I know, applied to the sacrificer.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Dhrīṣhatā is used as an adverb; see I, 71, 5; 174, 4; II, 30, 4, &c. Perhaps tmanā may be supplied as in I, 54, 4.

MANDALA I, HYMN 168.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 6-7.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. To every sacrifice¹ you hasten together², you accept prayer after prayer, O quick Maruts! Let me therefore bring you hither by my prayers from heaven and earth, for our welfare, and for our great protection;

2. The shakers who were born to bring food and light¹, self-born and self-supported, like springs², like thousandfold waves of water, aye, visibly like unto excellent bulls³,

3. Those Maruts, like Soma-drops¹, which squeezed from ripe stems dwell, when drunk, in the hearts of the worshipper—see how on their shoulders there clings as if a clinging wife; in their hands the quoit is held and the sword.

4. Lightly they have come down from heaven of their own accord: Immortals, stir yourselves with the whip! The mighty Maruts on dustless paths, armed with brilliant spears, have shaken down even the strong places.

5. O ye Maruts, who are armed with lightning-spears, who stirs you from within by himself, as the jaws are stirred by the tongue¹? You shake the sky², as if on the search for food; you are invoked by many³, like the (solar) horse of the day⁴.

6. Where, O Maruts, is the top, where the bottom of the mighty sky where you came? When you throw down with the thunderbolt what is strong, like brittle things, you fly across the terrible sea!

7. As your conquest is violent, splendid, terrible, full and crushing, so, O Maruts, is your gift delightful, like the largess of a liberal worshipper, wide-spreading, laughing like heavenly lightning.

8. From the tires of their chariot-wheels streams gush forth, when they send out the voice of the clouds; the lightnings smiled upon the earth, when the Maruts shower down fatness (fertile rain).

9. *Prisni*¹ brought forth for the great fight the terrible train of the untiring Maruts: when fed they produced the dark cloud³, and then looked about for invigorating food².

10. May this praise, O Maruts, this song of Mândârya, the son of Mâna, the poet, ask you with food for offspring for ourselves! May we have an invigorating autumn, with quickening rain!

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Agastya. Verses 1-7, Gagatī; 8-10, Trishāubh. No verse of this hymn occurs in the SV., VS., TS., AS.

Verse 1.

There can be little doubt that the text of the first line is corrupt. Ludwig admits this, but both he and Grassmann translate the verse.

GRASSMANN: Durch stetes Opfer möchte ich euch gewinnen recht, Gebet, das zu euch Göttern drengt, empfängt ihr gern.

LUDWIG: Bei jedem opfer ist zusammen mit euch der siegreich thätige, in jedem lied hat der fromme an euch gedacht.

Ludwig proposes to read ādīdhiye or devayād ā dīdhiye, but even then the construction remains difficult.

Note 1. Yagñā-yagñā, an adverbial expression, much the same as yagñe yagñe (I, 136, 1); it occurs once more in VI, 48, 1.

Note 2. Tuturvāniḥ does occur here only, but is formed like gugurvāni, I, 142, 8, and susukvāni, VIII, 23, 5. Possibly tuturvāniḥ might stand for the host of the Maruts in the singular, 'you hasten together to every sacrifice.' As to dadhidhve, used in a similar sense, see IV, 34, 3; 37, 1.

As a conjecture, though no more, I propose to read evayāḥ u.

Eva, in the sense of going, quick, is used of the horses of the Maruts, I, 166, 4. More frequently it has the sense of going, moving, than of manner (mos), and as an adverb eva and evam mean in this way (K. Z. II, 235). From this is derived evayāḥ, in the sense of quickly moving, an epithet applied to Vishṇu, I, 156, 1, and to the Maruts, V, 41, 16: kathā dāsema nāmasā su-dānūn eva-yā marūtaḥ akkha-ukthaiḥ, How shall we worship with praise and invocations the liberal quick-moving Maruts? I read, with Roth, eva-yāḥ; otherwise we should have to take evayā as an adverbial instrumental, like âsayâ from âsâ; see Grassmann, s. v. âsayâ.

In one hymn (V, 87) Evayâ-marut, as one word, has become an invocation, reminding us of ἦε Φοῖβε, or Evoe Bacche, and similar forms. Possibly ἦα may be viatica, though the vowels do not correspond regularly (see yayi, I, 87, 2, note 1).

From eva we have also eva-yâvan (fem. evayâvari, VI, 48, 12), which Benfey proposed to divide into evayâ-van, quick, again an epithet of Vishnu and the Maruts. If then we read evayâh u, without the accent on the last syllable, we should have a proper invocation of the Maruts, 'You, quick Maruts, accept prayer after prayer.'

Verse 2.

Note 1. Îsham svâr are joined again in VII, 66, 9. sahâ îsham svâh ka dhimahi. It seems to mean food and light, or water and light, water being considered as invigorating and supporting. Abhigâyanta governs the accusative.

Note 2. The meaning of spring was first assigned to vavra by Grassmann.

Note 3. Though I cannot find gâvaḥ and ukshânaḥ again, used in apposition to each other, I have little doubt that Grassmann is right in taking both as one word, like ταῦρος βοῦς in Greek.

Verse 3.

Note 1. The first line of this verse is extremely difficult. GRASSMANN translates:

Den Somasäften gleichen sie, den kräftigen,
Die eingeschlürft sich regen, nimmer wirkungslos.

LUDWIG: Die wie Soma, das gepresst aus saftvollen stengel, aufgenommen ins innere freundlich weilen.

It may be that the Maruts are likened to Somas, because they refresh and strengthen. So we read VIII, 48, 9:

tvám hí naḥ tanvâḥ Soma gopâḥ gâtre-gâtre ni-sasâttha.

For thou, O Soma, has sat down as a guardian in every member of our body.

It is possible, therefore, though I shall say no more, that the poet wished to say that the Maruts, bringing rain and cooling the air, are like Somas in their refreshing and invigorating power, when stirring the hearts of men. In X, 78, 2, the Maruts are once more compared with Somas, su-sármāṇāḥ ná sómāḥ ritām yaté. Should there be a dative hidden in ásate?

Rambhīṇī I now take with Sāyana in the sense of a wife clinging to the shoulders of her husband, though what is meant is the spear, or some other weapon, slung over the shoulders; see I, 167, 3.

Verse 5.

Note 1. Hánvā-iva gihváyā gives no sense, if we take hanvā as an instrum. sing. Hanu is generally used in the dual, in the Rig-veda always, meaning the two jaws or the two lips. Thus Ait. Br. VII, 11. hanû sagihve; AV. X, 2, 7. hanvor hi gihvām adadhâḥ, he placed the tongue in the jaws. I should therefore prefer to read hanû iva, which would improve the metre also, or take hanvā for a dual, as Sāyana does.

One might also translate, 'Who amongst you, O Maruts, moves by himself, as the jaws by the tongue,' but the simile would not be so perfect. The meaning is the same as in the preceding verse, viz. that the Maruts are self-born, self-determined, and that they move along without horses and chariots. In X, 78, 2, the Maruts are called svayug, like the winds.

Note 2. I feel doubtful about dhanvaḥkyút, and feel inclined towards Sāyana's explanation, who takes dhanvan for antariksha. It would then correspond to parvata-kyút, dhruva-kyút, &c.

Note 3. Purupraisha may also be, You who have the command of many.

Note 4. As to ahanyâḥ ná étasaḥ, see V, 1, 4. svetâḥ vâgī gāyate agre áhnām.

Verse 6.

Vithura translated before, I, 87, 3, by broken, means also breakable or brittle. Sāyana explains it by grass, which may be true, though I see no authority for it. Grassmann translates it by leaves. It is derived from vyath.

Verse 7.

Sâtí and râtí are used on purpose, the former meaning the acquisition or conquest of good things, the latter the giving away of them. The onslaught of the Maruts is first described as violent and crushing; their liberality in giving away what they have conquered, chiefly rain, is represented as delightful, like the gifts of a liberal worshipper. Then follows prithugráyī asuryēva gāṇḡgatī. Here asuryā reminds us of the asuryā in the preceding hymn, where it occurred as an epithet of Rodasī, the lightning. Prithugráyī, wide-spreading, seems to apply best to the rain, that is, the râtī, though it might also apply to the lightning. However, the râtī is the storm with rain and lightning, and I therefore propose to read gāḡghatī for gāṇḡgatī. Gāṇḡ is a root which occurs here only, and gaggh too is a root which is unknown to most students of Sanskrit. Benfey*, to whom we owe so much, was the first to point out that gaggh, which Yaska explains by to make a noise and applies to murmuring waters, is a popular form of gaksh, to laugh, a reduplicated form of has. He shows that ksh is changed into kkh in akkhā for akshā, and into gh and ggh, in Pāli and Prakrit, e.g. ghā for kshā. The original form gaksh, to laugh, occurs I, 33, 7. tvām etān rudatāh grākshatah ka āyodhayaah, thou foughest them, the crying and the laughing.

That the lightning is often represented as laughing we see from the very next verse, āva smayanta vidyūtah, the lightnings laughed down; and the very fact that this idea occurs in the next verse confirms me in the view that it was in the poet's mind in the preceding one. See also I, 23, 12. haskārāt vidyūtah pāri ātah gātāh avantu nah marūtah mri-layantu nah.

In the only other passage where gāṇḡ occurs, VIII, 43, 8, arkīshā gaṇḡganābhāvan, applied to Agni, admits of the same correction, gagghanābhāvan, and of the same translation, 'laughing with splendour.'

Benfey's objection to the spelling of gaggh with two

* Gött. Nachr., 1876, No. 13, s. 324.

aspirates is just with regard to pronunciation, but this would hardly justify our changing the style of our MSS., which, in this and in other cases, write the two aspirates, though intending them for non-aspirate and aspirate.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Prisni, the mother of the Maruts, who are often called Prisni-mâtaraḥ, gô-mâtaraḥ, and sîndhu-mâtaraḥ.

Note 2. As to svadhâ in the sense of food, see before, I, 6, 4, note 2, and X, 157, 5.

Note 3. Abhva is more than dark clouds, it is the dark gathering of clouds before a storm, ein Unwetter, or, if conceived as a masculine, as in I, 39, 8, ein Ungethüm. Such words are simply untranslatable.

MANDALA I, HYMN 170.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 8-9.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN INDRA AND HIS WORSHIPPER, AGASTYA.

1. Indra : There is no such thing to-day, nor will it be so to-morrow. Who knows what strange thing¹ this is? We must consult the thought of another, for even what we once knew seems to vanish.

2. Agastya : Why dost thou wish to kill us, O Indra? the Maruts are thy brothers; fare kindly with them, and do not strike¹ us in battle.

3. The Maruts : O brother Agastya, why, being a friend, dost thou despise us? We know quite well what thy mind was. Dost thou not wish to give to us?

4. Agastya : Let them prepare the altar, let them light the fire in front! Here we two will spread² for thee the sacrifice, to be seen¹ by the immortal.

5. Agastya : Thou rulest, O lord of treasures; thou, lord of friends, art the most generous. Indra, speak again with the Maruts, and then consume our offerings at the right season.

NOTES.

Although this hymn is not directly addressed to the Maruts, yet as it refers to the before-mentioned rivalry between the Maruts and Indra, and as the author is supposed to be the same, namely Agastya, I give its translation here.

None of its verses occurs in SV., VS., TS., AV.

The Anukramanikâ ascribes verses 1, 3, 4 to Indra, 2 and 5 to Agastya ; Ludwig assigns verses 1 and 3 to the Maruts, 2, 4, and 5 to Agastya ; Grassmann gives verse 1 to Indra, 2 and 3 to the Maruts, and 4 and 5 to Agastya.

The hymn admits of several explanations. There was a sacrifice in which Indra and the Maruts were invoked together, and it is quite possible that our hymn may owe its origin to this. But it is possible also that the sacrifice may be the embodiment of the same ideas which were originally expressed in this and similar hymns, namely, that Indra, however powerful by himself, could not dispense with the assistance of the storm-gods. I prefer to take the latter view, but I do not consider the former so untenable as I did formerly. The idea that a great god like Indra did not like to be praised together with others is an old idea, and we find traces of it in the hymns themselves, e. g. II, 33, 4. mā dúḥstutî, mā sáhûti.

It is quite possible, therefore, that our hymn contains the libretto of a little ceremonial drama in which different choruses of priests are introduced as preparing a sacrifice for the Maruts and for Indra, and as trying to appease the great Indra, who is supposed to feel slighted. Possibly Indra and the Maruts too may have been actually represented by some actors, so that here, as elsewhere, the first seeds of the drama would be found in sacrificial performances.

I propose, though this can only be hypothetical, to take the first verse as a vehement complaint of Indra, when asked to share the sacrifice with the Maruts. In the second verse Agastya is introduced as trying to pacify Indra. The third verse is most likely an appeal of the Maruts to remind Indra that the sacrifice was originally intended for them. Verses 4 and 5 belong to Agastya, who, though frightened into obedience to Indra, still implores him to make his peace with the Maruts.

Verse 1.

Note 1. In the first verse Indra expresses his surprise in disconnected sentences, saying that such a thing has never happened before. I do not take ádbhuta (nie da gewesen) in the sense of future, because that is already contained in svas. The second line expresses that Indra does not remember such a thing, and must ask some one else, whether he remembers anything like it. We ought to take abhisamkárénya as one word, and probably in the sense of to be approached or to be accepted. Abhisamkârin, however, means also changeable.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Vadhî is the augmentless indicative, not subjunctive; see, however, Delbrück, Synt. Forsch. I, pp. 21, 115.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Ketana refers to yagña as in VIII, 13, 8. It means that which attracts the attention of the gods (IV, 7, 2), and might be translated by beacon.

Note 2. The dual tanavāvahai is strange. It may refer, as Grassmann supposes, to Agastya and his wife, Lopamudrá, but even that is very unusual. See Oldenberg, K. Z. XXXIX, 62. Professor Oldenberg (K. Z. XXXIX, 60 seq.) takes this and the next hymn as parts of the same Âkhyâna hymn, and as intimately connected with the Marutvatiya Sâstra of the midday Savana, in the Soma sacrifice.

MANDALA I, HYMN 171.

ASHTAKA II, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 11.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. I come to you with this adoration, with a hymn I implore the favour¹ of the quick (Maruts). O Maruts, you have rejoiced² in it clearly³, put down then all anger and unharness your horses!

2. This reverent praise of yours, O Maruts, fashioned in the heart, has been offered by the mind¹, O gods! Come to it, pleased in your mind, for you give increase to (our) worship².

3. May the Maruts when they have been praised be gracious to us, and likewise Maghavat (Indra), the best giver of happiness, when he has been praised. May our trees (our lances)¹ through our valour stand always erect, O Maruts!

4. I am afraid of this powerful one, and trembling in fear of Indra. For you the offerings were prepared,—we have now put them away, forgive us!

5. Thou through whom the Mānas¹ see the mornings, whenever the eternal dawns flash forth with power², O Indra, O strong hero, grant thou glory to us with the Maruts, terrible with the terrible ones, strong and a giver of victory.

6. O Indra, protect thou these bravest of men¹ (the Maruts), let thy anger be turned away² from the Maruts, for thou hast become³ victorious together with those brilliant heroes. May we have an invigorating autumn, with quickening rain!

NOTES.

The Anukramanî assigns verses 1 and 2 to the Maruts, the rest to Indra Marutvat. The poet is again Agastya. The whole hymn corresponds to the situation as described in the preceding hymns, and leads on to a kind of compromise between the Maruts, who seem really the favourite gods of the poet, and Indra, an irresistible and supreme deity whose claims cannot be disregarded.

None of the verses of this hymn occurs in SV., VS., TS., AV.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Sumati here means clearly favour, as in I, 73, 6, 7; while in I, 166, 6 it means equally clearly prayer.

Note 2. Ludwig takes rarânâtâ as referring to sùkténa and námasâ. The accent of rarânâtâ is irregular, and likewise the retaining of the final long â in the Pada text. Otherwise the form is perfectly regular, namely the 2 p. plural of the reduplicated aorist, or the so-called aorist of the causative*. Pânini (VII, 4, 2, 3) gives a number of verbs which form that aorist as √ √ -, and not as √ - √, e.g. asasâsat, not asîsasat; ababâdhat, ayayâkat, &c. Some verbs may take both forms, e.g. abibhragat and ababhrâgat. This option applies to all Kânyâdi verbs, and one of these is ran, which therefore at the time of Kâtyâyana was supposed to have formed its reduplicated aorist both as ârarânat and as ârîranat. Without the augment we expect rîranata or rârânata. The question is why the final a should have been lengthened not only in the Samhitâ, that would be explicable, but in the Pada text also. The conjunctive of the perfect would be rârânata. See also Delbrück, Verbum, p. 111.

Note 3. Vedyâbhis, which Ludwig translates here by um dessentwillen, was ihr erfahren sollt, I have translated by clearly, though tentatively only.

* See Sanskrit Grammar, § 372, note.

Verse 2.

Note 1. The same idea is expressed in X, 47, 7. hridi-sprīsaḥ mánasā vakyámānāḥ.

Note 2. Námasaḥ vridhásāḥ is intended to convey the idea that the Maruts increase or bless those who worship them.

Verse 3.

Note 1. The second line has given rise to various interpretations.

GRASSMANN :

Uns mögen aufrecht stehn wie schöne Bäume

Nach unsrem Wunsch, O Maruts, alle Tage.

LUDWIG: Hoch mögen sein unsere kämpfenden lanzen, alle tage, O Marut, sigesstreben.

As komyā never occurs again, it must for the present be left unexplained.

There was another difficult passage, I, 88, 3. medhā vānā nā kṛinavante ūrdhvā, which I translated, 'May the Maruts stir up our minds as they stir up the forests.' I pointed out there that ūrdhva means not only upright, but straight and strong (I, 172, 3; II, 30, 3), and I conjectured that the erect trees might have been used as a symbol of strength and triumph. Vana, however, may have been used poetically for anything made of wood, just as cow is used for leather or anything made of leather. In that case vana might be meant for the wooden walls of houses, or even for lances (like δοῦπα from δόρυ = Sk. dāru), and the adjective would probably have to determine the true meaning. If connected with komala it might have the same meaning as εὐχεστός.

Prof. Oldenberg suggests that vanāni may be meant for the wooden vessels containing the Soma.

Verse 5.

Note 1. The Mānas are the people of Mānya, see I, 165, 15, note 1, and there is no necessity for taking māna, with Grassmann, as a general name for poet (Kuhn's Zeitschrift, vol. xvi, p. 174).

Note 2. It is doubtful to which word savasâ belongs. I take it to be used adverbially with vyushîshu.

Verse 6.

Note 1. We might also translate, 'protect men from the stronger one,' as we read I, 120, 4. pâtâm ka sâhyasâh yuvâm ka râbhyasâh nah; and still more clearly in IV, 55, 1. sâhiyasâh varuṇa mitra mâtât. But I doubt whether nṛñ by itself would be used in the sense of our men, while naraḥ is a common name of the Maruts, whether as divâḥ nâraḥ, I, 64, 4, or as nâraḥ by themselves, I, 64, 10; 166, 13, &c.

Note 2. On the meaning of avayâ in âvayâtaheḥâḥ, see Introduction, p. xx:

Note 3. On dadhânaḥ, see VIII, 97, 13, &c.

MANDALA I, HYMN 172.

ASHTAKA II, ADHYÂYA 4, VARGA 12.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. May your march be brilliant, brilliant through your protection, O Maruts, you bounteous givers, shining like snakes !

2. May that straightforward shaft of yours, O Maruts, bounteous givers, be far from us, and far the stone which you hurl !

3. Spare, O bounteous givers, the people of Trinaskanda, lift us up that we may live !

NOTES.

The hymn is ascribed to Agastya, the metre is Gâyatrî. None of its verses occurs in SV., VS., TS., AV.

Verse 1.

Prof. Oldenberg conjectures kitrá ûtíh, and possibly mahibhânavaḥ for ahibhânavaḥ. See for yāmaḥ kitráh ûtī V, 52, 2. té yāman pānti; also VI, 48, 9.

MANDALA II, HYMN 34.

ASHṬAKA II, ADHYĀYA 7, VARGA 19-21.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. The Maruts charged with rain¹, endowed with fierce force, terrible like wild beasts², blazing³ in their strength⁴, brilliant like fires, and impetuous⁵, have uncovered the (rain-giving) cows by blowing away the cloud⁶.

2. The (Maruts) with their rings¹ appeared like the heavens with their stars², they shone wide like streams from clouds as soon as Rudra, the strong man, was born for you, O golden-breasted Maruts, in the bright lap of *Prisni*³.

3. They wash¹ their horses like racers in the courses, they hasten with the points of the reed² on their quick steeds. O golden-jawed³ Maruts, violently shaking (your jaws), you go quick⁴ with your spotted deer⁵, being friends of one mind.

4. Those Maruts have grown to feed¹ all these beings, or, it may be, (they have come) hither for the sake of a friend, they who always bring quickening rain. They have spotted horses, their bounties cannot be taken away, they are like headlong charioteers on their ways².

5. O Maruts, wielding your brilliant spears, come hither on smooth¹ roads with your fiery² cows (clouds) whose udders are swelling; (come hither), being of one mind, like swans toward their nests, to enjoy the sweet offering.

6. O one-minded Maruts, come to our prayers, come to our libations like (Indra) praised by men¹ !

Fulfil (our prayer) like the udder of a barren cow², and make the prayer glorious by booty to the singer.

7. Grant us this strong horse for our chariot, a draught¹ that rouses our prayers, from day to day, food to the singers, and to the poet in our homesteads² luck³, wisdom, inviolable and invincible strength.

8. When the gold-breasted Maruts harness the horses to their chariots, bounteous¹ in wealth, then it is as if a cow in the folds poured out² to her calf copious food, to every man who has offered libations.

9. Whatever mortal enemy may have placed us among wolves¹, shield us from hurt, ye Vasus! Turn the wheels with burning heat² against him, and strike down the weapon of the impious fiend, O Rudras!

10. Your march, O Maruts, appears brilliant, whether even friends have milked the udder of Prisni, or whether, O sons of Rudra, you mean to blame him who praises you, and to weaken those who are weakening Trita, O unbeguiled heroes¹.

11. We invoke you, the great Maruts, the constant wanderers, at the offering of the rapid *Vishnu*¹; holding ladles (full of libations) and prayerful we ask the golden-coloured and exalted Maruts for glorious wealth.

12. The Dasagvas (Maruts?)¹ carried on² the sacrifice first; may they rouse us at the break of dawn. Like the dawn, they uncover the dark nights with the red (rays), the strong ones, with their brilliant light, as with a sea of milk.

13. With the (morning) clouds, as if with glittering red ornaments¹, these Maruts have grown great in the sacred places². Streaming down with rushing splendour³, they have assumed their bright and brilliant colour.

14. Approaching¹ them for their great protection to help us, we invoke them with this worship, they whom Trita may bring near, like the five Hotri priests for victory², descending on their chariot to help.

15. May that grace of yours by which you help the wretched¹ across all anguish, and by which you deliver the worshipper from the reviler, come hither, O Maruts ; may your favour approach us like a cow (going to her calf) !

NOTES.

Hymn ascribed to Gr̥tsamada. Metre, 1-14 Gagatī, 15 Trishṭubh, according to the paribhāṣhā in the Sarvānu-kramanī 12, 13. See also Ludwig, III, p. 59; Bergaigne, Recherches sur l'histoire de la liturgie védique, 1889, pp. 66 seq.; Oldenberg, Prolegomena, p. 144. None of its verses occurs in SV., VS., AV. The first verse is found in TB. II, 5, 5, 4, with three various readings, viz. tavishébhir ūrm̐bhiḥ instead of távishībhir ar̥kīnaḥ, bhrúmim instead of bhr̥mim, and rīpa instead of ápa.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Dhârāvarāḥ, a word of doubtful import, possibly meaning wishing for rain, or the suitors of the streams of rain. The Maruts are sometimes represented as varas or suitors; cf. V, 60, 4.

Note 2. Cf. II, 33, 11.

Note 3. Bergaigne, II, 381, translates ar̥kīnaḥ by chantres, singers, deriving it, as it would seem, from arka which, as he maintains (Journ. Asiat. 1884, IV, pp. 194 seq.), means always song in the RV. (Rel. Véd. I, 279). This, however, is not the case, as has been well shown by Pischel, Ved. Stud. I, pp. 23 seq. Besides, unless we change ar̥kīnaḥ into arkīnaḥ, we must connect it with arkī, light. Thus we read VIII, 41, 8, ar̥kīnâ padā.

Note 4. Tavishébhir ūrm̐bhiḥ, the reading of the Taittirīyas, is explained by Sāyana by balavadbhir gamanaiḥ. It may have been taken from RV. VI, 61, 2.

Note 5. On rigishín, see I, 64, 12^b; I, 87, 1.

Note 6. Bhr̥mim seems to me a name of the cloud, driven about by the wind. The Taittirīyas read bhrúmim, and Sāyana explains it by megham dhamantas k̐layantaḥ. In most passages, no doubt, bhr̥mim means quick, fresh, and is opposed to radhra, IV, 32, 2; VII, 56, 20. In I, 31, 16, as applied to Agni, it may mean quick. But in our passage that meaning is impossible, and I prefer the traditional meaning of cloud to that of storm-wind, adopted by Benfey and Roth. The expression 'to blow a storm-wind' is not usual, while dham is used in the sense of blowing away clouds and darkness. The cows would then be the waters in the clouds. It is possible, however, that Sâyana's explanation, according to which bhṛīmi is a musical instrument, may rest on some traditional authority. In this case it would correspond to dhāmantaḥ vāṇām, in I, 85, 10².

Verse 2.

Note 1. On khâdin, see I, 166, 9, note 2. On rukma-vakshas, I, 64, 4, note 1. Golden-breasted is meant for armed with golden chest-plates. The meaning seems to be that the Maruts with their brilliant khâdis appear like the heavens with their brilliant stars. The Maruts are not themselves lightning and rain, but they are seen in them, as Agni is not the fire, but present in the fire, or the god of fire. Thus we read, RV. III, 26, 6. agnéḥ bhāmam marútām ógaḥ, 'The splendour of Agni, the strength of the Maruts,' i.e. the lightning. It must be admitted, however, that a conjecture, proposed by Bollensen (Z.D.M.G. XLI, p. 501), would improve the verse. He proposes to read riśhtayah instead of vriśhtayah. We should then have to translate, 'Their spears shone like lightnings from the clouds.' These riśhtis or spears are mentioned by the side of khâdi and rukma in RV. V, 54, 11, and the compound riśhtīvidyutah is applied to the Maruts in I, 168, 5 and V, 52, 13. The difficulty which remains is abhṛīyâḥ.

Note 2. On dyāvō ná strībhiḥ, see note to I, 87, 1.

Note 3. The second line is full of difficulties. No doubt the Maruts are represented as the sons of Rudra (V, 60, 5; VI, 66, 3), and as the sons of Prisni, fem., being called Prisni-mâtaraḥ. Their birth is sometimes spoken of as unknown (VII, 56, 2), but hardly as mysterious. Who knows their birth, hardly means more than 'the wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh.' Prisni as a feminine is the speckled sky, and the cloud may have been conceived as the udder at the same time that Prisni was conceived as a cow (I, 160, 3). Nothing seems therefore more natural than that we should translate, 'When Rudra had begotten you in the bright lap of Prisni.' The bright lap, sukráṁ ūdhaḥ, is an idiomatic expression (VI, 66, 1; IV, 3, 10), and I see no reason why we should with Roth, K.Z. XXVI, 49, change the sukré of the padapāṭha into sukráḥ and refer it to vrīshā.

The real difficulty lies in ágani. Can it mean he begot, as Bergaigne (Religion Védique, III, 35) interprets it? Wherever ágani occurs it means he was born, and I doubt whether it can mean anything else. It is easy to suggest aganit, for though the third person of the aorist never occurs in the RV., the other persons, such as aganishṭa, ganishṭāḥ, are there. But, as the verse now stands, we must translate, 'When Rudra was born for you, he the strong one in the bright udder of Prisni.' Could Rudra be here conceived as the son, he who in other passages is represented as the husband of Prisni? There is another passage which may yield the same sense, VI, 66, 3. vidé hí mātá maháḥ mahī sá, sá it prīsnih subhvē gárgham á adhāt, 'for she, the great, is known as the mother of the great, that very Prisni conceived the germ (the Maruts) for the strong one.'

Verse 3.

Note 1. Ukshánte is explained by washing, cleaning the horses, before they start for a new race. See V, 59, 1. ukshánte ásvān, followed by tárushante á rágaḥ; IX, 109, 10. ásvaḥ ná niktáḥ vāgī dhánāya; Satap. Br. XI, 5, 5, 13. Pischel (Ved. Stud. I, 189) supposes that it always refers to the washing after a race.

Note 2. Nadáśya kárnaiḥ is very difficult. Sâyana's explanation, meghasya madhyapradesaiḥ, 'through the hollows of the cloud,' presupposes that nada by itself can in the RV. be used in the sense of cloud, and that karna, ear, may have the meaning of a hole or a passage. To take, as BR. propose, kárna in the sense of karvá, eared, with long ears, would not help us much. Grassmann's translation, 'mit der Wolke schnellen Fittigen,' is based on a conjectural reading, nadasya parnaiḥ. Ludwig's translation, 'mit des fluszes wellen den raschen eilen sie,' is ingenious, but too bold, for karna never means waves, nor nada river in the Rig-veda. The Vedārthayātṇa gives: 'they rush with steeds that make the roar,' taking karnaiḥ for karṭṛibhiḥ, which again is simply impossible. The best explanation is that suggested by Pischel, Ved. Stud., p. 189. He takes nada for reed, and points out that whips were made of reeds. The karna would be the sharp point of the reed, most useful for a whip. I cannot, however, follow him in taking āśúbhiḥ in the sense of accelerating. I think it refers to asva in the preceding pāda.

Note 3. Hīraṇyasiprāḥ. Siprā, in the dual sipre, is intended for the jaws, the upper and lower jaws, as in RV. I, 101, 10. vī syasva sipre, open the jaws. See Zimmer, Altindisches Leben, p. 249, note. RV. III, 32, 1; V, 36, 2, sipre and hánû; VIII, 76, 10; X, 96, 9. sipre hárinî dávidhvataḥ; X, 105, 5. siprābhyām siprínivān. In the plural, however, siprāḥ, V, 54, 11 (siprāḥ śirshásu vítatāḥ hīraṇyáyīḥ), VIII, 7, 25, is intended for something worn on the head, made of gold or gold threads. As we speak of the ears of a cap, that is, lappets which protect the ears, or of the cheeks of a machine, so in this case the jaws seem to have been intended for what protects the jaws, and not necessarily for the real jaw-bones of an animal, used as an helmet, and afterwards imitated in any kind of metal. As to siprin it may mean helmeted or possessed of jaws. To be possessed of jaws is no peculiar distinction, yet in several of the passages where siprin occurs, there is a clear reference to eating and drinking; see VI, 44, 14; VIII, 2, 28; 17, 4; 32, 24; 33, 7; 92, 4; see also sipravān in VI, 17, 2. It is possible therefore that like susipra, siprin also was used in the sense of possessed of jaw-bones, i. e. of strong jaw-bones. Even such epithets as hīraṇya-sipra, hári-sipra, híri-sipra may mean possessed of golden, possibly of strong jaws. (M. M., Biographies of Words, p. 263, note.) Roth takes hārisipra as yellow-jawed, hírisipra as golden-cheeked, or with golden helmet, hīraṇyasipra, with golden helmet. A decision between golden-jawed or golden-helmeted is difficult, yet golden-jawed is applicable in all cases.

In our passage we must be guided by dávidhvataḥ, which together with sípra occurs again X, 96, 9. sípre vāgāya hárinī dávidhvataḥ, shaking the golden jaws, and it seems best to translate: O ye golden-jawed Maruts, shaking (your jaws), you go to feed.

Note 4. If we retain the accent in prīkshám, we shall have to take it as an adverb, from prīkshá, quick, vigorous, like the German snél. This view is supported by Pischel, Ved. Stud. I, 96. If, however, we could change the accent into prīksham, we might defend Sâyana's interpretation. We should have to take prīksham as the accusative of prīksh, corresponding to the dative prīkshé in the next verse. Prīksh is used together with subh, ish, ûrg (VI, 62, 4), and as we have subham yâ, we might take prīksham yâ in the sense of going for food, in search of food. But it is better to take prīkshám as an adverb. In the next verse prīkshé is really a kind of infinitive, governing bhúvanâ.

Note 5. Tradition explains the Prishatīs as spotted deer, but prishadasva, as an epithet of the Maruts, need not mean having Prishatīs for their horses, but having spotted horses. See Bergaigne, Rel. Véd. II, p. 378, note.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Ludwig translates: Zu narung haben sie alle diese Wesen gebracht; Grassmann: Zur Labung netzten alle diese Wesen sie. Ludwig suggests kitrāya for mitrāya; Oldenberg, far better, mitrāyavaḥ, looking for friends, like mitrāyúvaḥ, in I, 173, 10.

Note 2. On vayúna, see Pischel in Vedische Studien, p. 301. But why does Pischel translate rigipyá by bulls, referring to VI, 67, 11?

Verse 5.

Note 1. Adhvasmábhiḥ seems to mean unimpeded or smooth. Cf. IX, 91, 3.

Note 2. The meaning of īndhanvabhiḥ is very doubtful.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Narām ná sámsah, the original form of Narâ-samsah, I take here as a proper name, Männerlob (like Frauenlob, the poet) referring to Indra. Bergaigne, I, p. 305, doubts whether Narâsamsa can be a proper name in our passage, but on p. 308 he calls it an appellation of Indra.

Note 2. Āsvām iva, gives a sense, but one quite inappropriate to the Veda. It would mean, 'fill the cow in her udder like a mare.' I therefore propose to read asvām iva (asuam iva), from asû, a cow that is barren, or a cow that has not yet calved. Thus we read, I, 112, 3. yābhiḥ dhenúm asvām pínvathah, 'with the same help with which you nourish a barren cow.' Cf. I, 116, 22. staryām pipyathuh gām, 'you have filled the barren cow.' If asvām iva dhenúm is a simile, we want an object to which it refers, and this we find in dhīyam. Thus we read, V, 71, 2; VII, 94, 2; IX, 19, 2, pipyatam dhīyah, to fulfil prayers. I know, of course, that such changes in the sacred text will for the present seem most objectionable to my friends in India, but I doubt not that the time will come when they will see that such emendations are inevitable. I see that in the appendix to the Petersburg Dictionary, s.v. asû, the same conjecture has been suggested.

Verse 7.

Note 1. Here again I have taken great liberties. Āpânám is explained by Sâyana as a participle for âpnuvantam. This participle, though quite correct (see Lindner, Altindische Nominalbildung, p. 54), does not occur again in the RV., nor does it yield a proper meaning. It could only mean, 'give us a horse to the chariot, an obtaining prayer, rousing the attention (of the gods) day by day.' Āpâna may mean a drinking or carousing, and I do not see why we should not take it in that sense. Sacrifices in ancient times were often festivals; VII, 22, 3. imā bráhma sadhamāde gushasva, 'accept these prayers at our feast.' If we suppose that âpâna refers to the drinking of Soma, then nothing is more appropriate than to call the drinking kitáyat, exciting, bráhma, a hymn. Anyhow I can discover no better meaning in this line. Grassmann, who knows that kitayati means to excite, yet translates: 'Gebt Gebet, das durchdringt, euch erinnernd Tag für Tag.' Ludwig: 'Das erfolgreiche brahma, das erinnernde tag für tag.' Possibly we should have to change the accent from ápáná to ápána. Ápáná in IX, 10, 5 is equally obscure.

Note 2. On vrigana, see I, 165, 15³. For fuller discussions of the various meanings of vrigana, see Geldner, Ved. Stud. I, 139; Oldenberg, Göttinger gel. Anzeigen, 1890, pp. 410 seq.; Ph. Colinet, Les principes de l'exégèse védique d'après MM. Pischel et Geldner, p. 28; Ludwig, Über Methode bei Interpretation des Rigveda, 1890, pp. 27 seq.

Note 3. Saní means acquiring, success, luck, gain, and is often placed in juxtaposition with medhá, wisdom. If they are thus placed side by side, saní looks almost like an adjective, meaning efficient. RV. I, 18, 6. saním medhám ayásisham, 'I had asked for efficient, true, real wisdom,' or, 'I had asked for success and wisdom.' In such passages, however, as V, 27, 4. dádat riká saním yaté dádat medhám ritáyaté, it is clear that saní was considered as independent and different from medhá (rikáyaté = ritáyaté).

Verse 8.

Note 1. On sudánavaḥ, see note to I, 64, 6. It must often be left open whether sudánu was understood as bounteous, or as having good rain or good Soma.

Note 2. Pinvate, lit. to make swell or abound.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Vrikatáti is an old locative of vrikatát, wolfhood. To place us in wolfhood means to treat us as wolves, or as vogelfrei. Others take it to mean treating us as a wolf would treat us.

Note 2. Tápushâ kakríyâ. According to Lanman (p. 571) tápushâ might be taken as an acc. dual fem. I know, however, of no strictly analogous cases, and prefer to take tápūshā as an instrumental, this being its usual employment.

Verse 10.

Note 1. The second line is obscure. Neither Grassmann nor Ludwig nor Sāyana can extract any intelligible meaning from it. I have translated it, but I am far from satisfied. There may be an antithesis between the friends (the Maruts themselves, see V, 53, 2), milking the udder of Prisni, and the Maruts coming to blame their friends for not offering them sacrifices, or for offering them sacrifices in common with Indra. In the first case when they, as friends, milk the cloud, their approach is brilliant and auspicious. In the second case, when they come to blame those who ought to celebrate them, or those who are actually hostile to them by causing the ruin or decay of a friend of the Maruts, such as Trita, their approach is likewise brilliant, but not auspicious. Trita is a friend of the Maruts whom they assist in battle, and it is possible that this legend may be alluded to here. Sometimes Trita seems also connected with the third libation which was offered at sunset, just as Vishṇu represented the second libation which was offered at noon*. Thus we read, VIII, 12, 16. yát sómam indra víshṇavi yát vâ gha trité âptyé yát vâ marútsu mândase, 'whether you, Indra, enjoy the Soma near Vishṇu, or near Trita Âptya, or among the Maruts.' Sâkapûni, as quoted by Yâska (Nir. XII, 19), explains the three steps of Vishṇu as earth, sky, and heaven; Aurṇavâbha distinguishes Samârohana, Vishṇupada, and Gayasiras. But all this does not help us to disentangle our verse. It should be added that Bergaigne makes Tritám to be governed by duhúh (Rel. Véd. II, 327). We should then have to translate, 'or whether they milk Trita in order to blame the singer, to make them old who make others old, or who themselves become old.' This, however, does not help us much. Professor Oldenberg conjectures that possibly gurátām might be changed to gurátā, and that the dual of the verb might refer to Rudra and Prisni; or we might read gurátā for guráta, if it refers to Rudriyas. Návamānasya might also be used in the sense of making a noise (see I, 29, 5), and possibly návamānasya nidé might have been intended for shouting and laughing to scorn. But all this leaves the true meaning of the verse as unfathomable as ever.

* Odinn is styled Thridi, by the side of Hâr and Tafnhâr (the high and the even high) as the Third High. At other times he is Tveggi (secundus). Grimm's Teutonic Mythology, vol. i, p. 162.

Verse 11.

Note 1. Vishṇor esháya prabhṛithé is obscure. At the offering of the rapid Vishṇu is supposed to mean, when the rapid Vishṇu offers Soma. The same phrase occurs again, VII, 40, 5. In VIII, 20, 3, we can translate, 'we know the strength of the Maruts, and of the hasting Vishṇu, the bounteous gods.' In VII, 39, 5, the reading is vishṇum eshām. Bergaigne (II, 419) is inclined to take vishṇu esha as Soma. We should then translate, 'at the offering of Soma.'

Verse 12.

Note 1. The Daragvas are mentioned as an old priestly family, like the Āngiras, and they seem also, like the Āngiras, to have their prototypes or their ancestors among the divine hosts. Could they here be identified with the Maruts? They are said to have been the first to carry on the sacrifice, and they are asked to rouse men at the break of the day. Now the same may be said of the Maruts. They are often connected with the dawn, probably because the storms break forth with greater vigour in the morning, or, it may be, because the chasing away of the darkness of the night recalls the struggle between the darkness of the thunderstorm and the brightness of the sun. The matutinal character of the Maruts appears, for instance, in V, 53, 14 (usrí bhesagám), and their father Dyaus is likewise called vṛishabhák usríyah, V, 58, 6. In the second line úrñute, though in the singular, refers also to the Maruts in the plural; see Bergaigne, Mélanges Renier, Paris, 1886, p. 80. There still remain two difficult words, maháh and gó-arnasá. The former (see Lanman, p. 501) may be taken as an adjective referring to the Dasagvas or Maruts, unless we take it as an adverb, quickly, like makshu. If we could change it into mahá, it would form an appropriate adjective to gyotishá, as in IV, 50, 4. On gó-arnasá all that can be said is that it mostly occurs where something is uncovered or revealed, so I, 112, 18; X, 38, 2.

Note 2. On yagñam vah, to carry on the sacrifice like a wagon, see Bergaigne, Rel. Véd. II, 259–260. See also RV. VIII, 26, 15; 58, 1, and yagña-vâhas.

Verse 13.

Note 1. In interpreting this obscure verse we must begin with what is clear. The arunáh aṅgáyah are the well-known ornaments of the Maruts, mentioned I, 37, 2, note; I, 64, 4, note, &c. The Maruts shine in these ornaments or paints, I, 85, 3; 87, 1; V, 56, 1; X, 78, 7. Though we do not know their special character, we know that, like the daggers, spears, and bracelets of the Maruts, they were supposed to contribute to their beautiful appearance. Again, we know that when the Maruts are said to grow (vavridhu), that means that they grow in strength, in spirits, and in splendour, or, in a physical sense, that the storms increase, that the thunder roars, and the lightnings flash, see V, 55, 3; 59, 5. Now if it is said that the Rudras grew with kshonís, as if with bright red ornaments, we must have in these kshonís the physical prototype of what are metaphorically called their glittering ornaments. And here we can only think either of the bright morning clouds (referring to usháh ná râmíh arunáh ápa ūrnute in the preceding verse), or lightnings. These bright clouds of heaven are sometimes conceived as the mothers (III, 9, 2. apáh mātṛíh), and more especially the mothers of the Maruts, who are in consequence called Síndhu-mátarah, X, 78, 6, a name elsewhere given to Soma, IX, 61, 7, and to the Asvins, I, 46, 2. It is said of a well-known hero, Purúravas (originally a solar hero), that as soon as he was born the women (gnáh) were there, and immediately afterwards that the rivers increased or cherished him, X, 95, 7. In other passages too these celestial rivers or waters or clouds are represented as women, whether mothers or wives (X, 124, 7). A number of names are given to these beings, when introduced as the companions of the Apsaras Urvasī, and it is said of them that they came along like aṅgāyah arunāyah, like bright red ornaments, X, 95, 6. It seems clear therefore that the arunāḥ aṅgāyah of the Maruts have to be explained by the bright red clouds of the morning, or in more mythological language, by the Apsaras, who are said to be like arunāyah aṅgāyah. Hence, whatever its etymology may have been, kshonībhiḥ in our passage must refer to the clouds of heaven, and the verse can only be translated, 'the Rudras grew with the clouds as with their red ornaments,' that is, the clouds were their red ornaments, and as the clouds grew in splendour, the Maruts grew with their splendid ornaments.

Professor Geldner arrived at a similar conclusion. In Bezenberger's Beiträge, XI, p. 327, and more recently in Ved. Stud., p. 277, he assigned to kshonī the meaning of woman, which is quite possible, and would make it a synonym of the celestial gnās. But he translates, 'the Maruts excite themselves with red colours as with women.' These are hardly Vedic thoughts, and the position of nā would remain anomalous. Nor should we gain much if we read te kshonayah arunebhiḥ na aṅgibhiḥ, 'these Rudras were delighted like wives by bright ornaments.' The bright ornaments have once for all a settled meaning, they are peculiar to the Maruts, and cannot in a Marut hymn be taken in any other sense.

Then comes the question, how is the meaning assigned to kshonī, namely cloud, or, as personified, Apsaras, applicable to other passages? In X, 95, 9, it seems most appropriate: 'So long as the mortal (Purūravas), longing for the immortal (Apsaras), does not come near with strength to those kshonīs, i. e. those Apsaras, or morning clouds, they beautified their bodies like ducks' (an excellent image, if one watches ducks cleaning themselves in the water), 'like sporting horses biting each other.' Geldner translates this verse somewhat differently, Ved. Stud. I, p. 276.

Having disposed of these two passages where kshonī occurs in the plural, we have next to consider those where it stands in the dual. Here kshonī always means heaven and earth, like rodasi, dyāvaprithivī, &c.

VIII, 7, 22. sám u tyé mahatīh apáh sám kshonī sám u sūryam . . . parvasáh dadhuh. They, the Maruts, set the great waters (the sky), heaven and earth and the sun piece-meal (or, they put them together piece by piece).

VIII, 52, 10. sám índrah ráyah bṛihatīh adhūnuta sám kshonī sám u sūryam. Indra shook the great treasures, heaven and earth, and the sun.

VIII, 99, 6. ánu te sūshmam turáyantam iyatuḥ kshonī sīsum ná mātárā. Heaven and earth followed thy rapid strength, like mother-cows their calf.

II, 16, 3. ná kshonībhyám paribhvē te indriyám. Thy strength is not to be compassed by heaven and earth.

If after this we look at the passage translated by Professor Geldner, I, 180, 5. apáh kshonī sakate máhinā vām, we see at once that apáh and kshonī cannot be separated, and that we must translate, your Máhinā reaches heaven and earth and the sky. Máhinā, according to Professor Geldner, means the magnificent woman, namely Sūryā, but it is possible that it may have been meant for 'mahimā, your greatness reaches heaven and earth and the sky.' Apáh, which Professor Geldner translates 'from the water,' is the acc. plural, meaning the waters between heaven and earth, or the sky. It occurs again in connection with heaven and earth, the sun, heaven, and generally without any copula. Thus, VIII, 7, 22. apáh, kshonī, sūryam, i.e. the waters (the sky), heaven and earth, the sun. I, 36, 8. ródasi apáh, heaven and earth and the waters; cf. V, 31, 6. Likewise I, 52, 12. apáh svāh paribhūh eshi á dívam; V, 14, 4. ávindat gáh apáh svāh; VI, 47, 14. apáh gáh; cf. VI, 60, 2. VII, 44, 1. dyāvaprithivī apáh svāh, cf. X, 36, 1; IX, 90, 4; 91, 6.

There remain five passages where kshonīh occurs, and where Professor Geldner's conjecture that it means women holds good. In I, 54, 1, it may mean real women, or the women of the clouds. In I, 57, 4; 173, 7; VIII, 3, 10; 13, 17; also in X, 22, 9, women seems the most plausible translation.

Note 2. Rítasya sádanâni is almost impossible to translate. It may be the places in heaven where the Maruts are supposed to be, or the places where sacrifices are offered to them.

Note 3. Átyena págasâ has been explained in different ways. Sâyana renders it by always moving power; Grassmann by 'mit schnell erregtem Schimmer;' Ludwig, 'mit eilender kraft,' though he is no longer satisfied with this meaning, and suggests 'net for catching.' Roth has touched several times on this word. In the Allgemeine Monatsschrift of 1851, p. 87, he suggested for págas the meaning of 'impression of a foot or of a carriage, perhaps also reflection.' In his Notes on the Nirukta, p. 78 seq., he is very hard on the Indian commentators who explain the word by strength, but who never go conscientiously through all the passages in which a word occurs. He then still maintained that the word ought to be translated by track.

It seems, however, that the most appropriate meaning in the passages in which págas occurs is splendour, though of course a stream of light may be conceived as a bright train or path. In some the meaning of light seems quite inevitable, for instance, III, 15, 1. ví págasâ prithúnâ sósukânah. Agni, shining with broad light.

VIII, 46, 25. á . . . yâhí makhâya págase. Come hither, Vâyu, for strong light.

III, 14, 1. (agnih) prithivyâm págah asret. Agni assumed (or spread) splendour on earth.

VII, 10, 1. usháh ná gârah prithú págah asret. (Agni,) like the lover of the dawn, assumed (or spread) wide splendour.

III, 61, 5. úrdhvâm madhudhá diví págah asret. The dawn assumed rising splendour in the sky.

VII, 3, 4. ví yâsya te prithivyâm págah áset. Thou (Agni) whose splendour spread on earth.

IX, 68, 3. abhivrágan ákshitam págaḥ á dade. (Soma) approaching assumed imperishable splendour. This splendour of Soma is also mentioned in IX, 109, 21, and the expression that he shakes his splendour (vr̥thā kar) occurs IX, 76, 1; 88, 5. (Cf. Geldner, Ved. Stud. I, p. 117.)

In VI, 21, 7. abhí tvā págaḥ rakshásaḥ ví tasthe, it would, no doubt, seem preferable to translate, 'the power of the Rakshas came upon thee,' but the ugrám págaḥ, the fierce light, is not out of place either, while in most of the passages which we have examined, the meaning of power would be entirely out of place.

In I, 121, 11, heaven and earth seem to be called pāgasī, the two splendours. Pischel, Ved. Stud. p. 87, translates átyena págasá by 'durch das stattliche Ross,' namely the Soma, but pāgas seems to be something that belongs to Soma, not Soma himself.

Verse 14.

Note 1. Grassmann suggests iyánáḥ instead of iyánáḥ.

Note 2. Abhíshṭaye, for superiority or victory, rather than for assistance. Abhíshṭi, with accent on the last syllable, means conqueror or victorious; see RV. I, 9, 1; III, 34, 4; X, 100, 12; 104, 10.

Verse 15.

Note 1. On radhra and its various applications, see Pischel, Ved. Stud. I, p. 124.

MANDALA V, HYMN 52.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 8-10.

TO THE MARUTS (THE-STORM-GODS).

1. O Syāvāsva, sing boldly with¹ the Maruts, the singers who, worthy themselves of sacrifice, rejoice in their guileless glory² according to their nature.

2. They are indeed boldly the friends of strong power; they on their march protect all who by themselves are full of daring¹.

3. Like rushing bulls, these Maruts spring over¹ the dark cows (the clouds)², and then we perceive the might of the Maruts in heaven and on earth.

4. Let us boldly offer praise and sacrifice to your Maruts, to all them who protect the generation of men, who protect the mortal from injury.

5. They who are worthy, bounteous, men of perfect strength, to those heavenly Maruts who are worthy of sacrifice, praise the sacrifice!

6. The tall men¹, coming near with their bright chains, and their weapon, have hurled forth their spears. Behind these Maruts there came by itself the splendour of heaven, like laughing lightnings².

7. Those who have grown up on earth, or in the wide sky, or in the realm of the rivers, or in the abode of the great heaven,

8. Praise that host of the Maruts, endowed with true strength and boldness¹, whether those rushing heroes have by themselves harnessed (their horses) for triumph,

9. Or whether these brilliant Maruts have in the (speckled) cloud clothed themselves in wool¹, or whether by their strength they cut the mountain asunder with the tire of their chariot;

10. Call them comers, or goers, or enterers, or followers, under all these names, they watch on the straw¹ for my sacrifice.

11. The men (the Maruts) watch, and their steeds watch. Then, so brilliant are their forms to be seen, that people say, Look at the strangers¹!

12. In measured steps¹ and wildly shouting² the gleemen³ have danced toward the well (the cloud). They who appeared one by one like thieves, were helpers to me to see the light⁴.

13. Worship, therefore, O seer, that host of Maruts, and keep and delight them with your voice, they who are themselves wise¹ poets, tall heroes armed with lightning-spears.

14. Approach, O seer, the host of Maruts, as a woman approaches a friend, for a gift¹; and you, Maruts, bold in your strength², hasten hither, even from heaven, when you have been praised by our hymns.

15. If he, after perceiving them, has approached them as gods with an offering, then may he for a gift remain united with the brilliant (Maruts), who by their ornaments are glorious on their march.

16. They, the wise¹ Maruts, the lords, who, when there was inquiry for their kindred, told me of the cow, they told me of Prisni as their mother, and of the strong Rudra as their father.

17. The seven and seven heroes¹ gave me each a hundred. On the Yamunâ I clear off glorious wealth in cows, I clear wealth in horses.

NOTES.

This hymn is ascribed to Syāvārva Ātreya. Metre, Anuṣṭubh, 1-5, 7-15; Pañkti, 6, 16, and 17. Sāyana seems to take verse 16 as an Anuṣṭubh, which of course is a mistake. No verse of this hymn occurs in SV., VS., TS., TB., MS., AV.

Verse 1.

Note 1. One expects the dative or accusative after arkā. The instrumental leaves us no choice but to translate, 'Sing with the Maruts, who are themselves famous as singers.' Cf. I, 6, 8; V, 60, 8.

Note 2. On śrāvaḥ mādanti, see Gaedicke, Accusativ, p. 75.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Dhrīśadvīnas may also refer to the Maruts.

Verse 3.

Note 1. One expects ádhi instead of āti, see Gaedicke, Accusativ, p. 95 seq.

Note 2. See note to I, 37, 5; also, Bartholomae in Bezenberger's Beiträge, XV, 211. The whole verse has been discussed by Benfey, Vedica und Verwandtes, p. 152 seq.

Verse 6.

Note 1. This verse has been discussed before, I, 168, 7, note. Benfey (Nachrichten der K. Ges. der Wiss. zu Göttingen, 1876, 28 Juni; comp. Vedica und Verwandtes, p. 141) translated it: 'Heran... haben die Helden, die ehren, ihre Speere geschleudert; ihnen, den Maruts, nach (erheben sich) traun gleichsam lachende Blitze, erhebt sich selbst des Himmels Glanz.' Rīshvāḥ seems here, as in verse 13, to refer to the Maruts, as in IV, 19, 1, rīshvám refers to Indra, though it can be used of weapons also, see VI, 18, 10. As to the instrumentalis comitativus in rukmaḥ and yudhā, see Lanman, p. 335.

Note 2. Benfey's explanation of gāghghatīh is ingenious, though it leaves some difficulties. The writing of ghgh in Devanāgarī may have been meant for ggh, as in akhhkhalī-kṛītya, VII, 103, 3. But there remains the fact that gaksh occurs in the sense of laughing, I, 33, 7, and one does not see why it should have undergone a Prakritic change in our passage, and not there. It might be a mimetic word, to express the sound of rattling and clattering; cf. gañganābhāvan, VIII, 43, 8.

Verse 8.

Note 1. As to the adjective in the masculine gender after sārdhas, see I, 37, 1, note. The meaning of rābhvas, bold, rabid, is doubtful; see Bergaigne, Rel. Véd. II, 408.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Sāyana takes Parushnī as the name of one of the rivers of the Punjab, called the Irāvati, and at present the Ravi. Parushnī might mean speckled, muddy, as a synonym of prīni. Roth has suggested that parushnī might here mean cloud. But what is the meaning of parushnī in a similar passage, IV, 22, 2. (Indrah) sriyē pārushnīm ushāmānah ūrnām yāsyāh pārvāni sakhyāya vivyē? If it means that Indra clothed himself in speckled wool, that wool might be intended for what we call woolly or fleecy clouds. As the Maruts often perform the same acts as Indra, we might read in our verse utā sma té pārushnis ūrnāh, and pronounce utā sma té pārushnia ūrnāh, though Lanman, p. 395, objects to ias for is in the acc. plur. See, however, hetīh ādevīh in VIII, 61, 16. The instrumental singular is possible, but again unusual with vas, pārushnyā ūrnā. Possibly the original meaning of parushnī may have been forgotten, and if the name of the river Parushnī was generally known, it might easily have taken the place of parushnī, the cloud. For other explanations see Roth, Über gewisse Kürzungen, Wien, 1887; Bartholomae, in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, XXIX, 583; Schmidt, Die Pluralbildungen der indogermanischen Neutra, 1889, p. 307.

Verse 10.

Note 1. Vishṭārāḥ does not occur again, and Lanman is therefore quite justified in assigning to it the meaning of straw (p. 339). He paraphrases: 'Let their customs carry them where they may, yet when I sacrifice, they wait quietly on the straw, i.e. the altar, for it.' He reads in the Pada text vi-stāré for vi-stārāḥ. Vishṭārīn, which occurs AV. IV, 34, 1, does not throw much light on the exact meaning of vishṭāra in this place. If we retain vishṭārāḥ, the nominative, we must assign to it the meaning of crowd, and refer it to the Maruts.

Verse 11.

Note 1. Pārāvata is a turtle-dove (VS. XXIV, 25), and it is just possible that the Maruts might have been compared to them. But pārāvata is used in VIII, 100, 6, as an epithet of vasu, wealth, and in VIII, 34, 18, we read of rātis (not rātris), i.e. gifts of Pārāvata. The river Sarasvatī is called pārāvataḡṇī, killing Pārāvata, VI, 61, 2, and in the Pañkav. Br. IX, 4, 11, we hear that Turasravas and the Pārāvatas offered their Somas together. I am therefore inclined to take Pārāvata, lit. distant people, extranei, strangers, as a name of an Aryan border clan with whom the Vedic Aryas were sometimes at war, sometimes at peace. In that case the frontier-river, the Sarasvatī, might be called the destroyer or enemy of the Pārāvatas. As their wealth and gifts have been mentioned, to compare the Maruts with the Pārāvatas may mean no more than that the Maruts also are rich and generous. Ludwig thinks of the Παρυῆται, which seems more doubtful. For a different interpretation see Delbrück, Syntax, p. 531.

Verse 12.

Note 1. I take khandaḥstúbh in the sense of stepping (according to) a measure, as explained in my Preface (1st ed.), p. cii, though I do not doubt that that meaning was afterwards forgotten, and replaced by the technical meaning of stubh, to shout. See Böhtlingk-Roth, s.v. stubh, and stobhagrantha, Sâma-veda, Bibl. Ind., II, p. 519. It can hardly be supposed that such artificial performances of Vedic hymns, as are preserved in the Sâma-veda, could have suggested the first names of the ancient metres.

Note 2. Kubhanyú can only be derived from bhan, to shout.

Note 3. The kirīṇah are probably intended here for strolling minstrels who, when they approached the well of a village (here the cloud), might be taken either for friends or foes.

Note 4. Drīśī tvishé. Grassmann translates: 'Wie Räuberbanden schienen sie geschart zum Andrang meinem Blick.' Ludwig better: 'Helfer waren sie, glanz zu sehn.' We must either read drīśé tvishé, to see the light, or drīśé tvishī, to be seen by light. See, however, P. G., Ved. Stud. p. 225.

Verse 13.

Note 1. Vedhas, wise. The different possible meanings of this word have been discussed by Ludwig, Z.D.M.G. XL, p. 716; and by Bartholomae, in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, XXVII, p. 361.

Verse 14.

Note 1. On dānā, see Lanman, pp. 533, 335; P. G., Ved. Stud. p. 101.

Note 2. Dhrishṇavaḥ ógasā to be read - ॐ - ॐ - ॐ.

Verse 15.

This verse, as Roth says, is very obscure, and the translation is purely tentative. Grassmann derives vak-shánā from vah in the sense of an offering. It may more easily be derived from vaksh, i.e. what gives increase, and be taken as an instrumental. Pischel shows that in many passages vakshanā in the plural has the meaning of yoni, also of the yoni on the altar. But even this meaning does not throw much light on our passage. The first pāda may possibly be taken in an interrogative and conditional sense, or we may translate: 'Now, having perceived them, may he, as a refreshing draught goes to the gods, come together with the Maruts for his reward.' Whatever the verse may mean, eshâm devân cannot mean the gods of the Maruts, or prove the existence of idols, as Bollensen (Z. D. M. G. XXII, 587) and even Muir (S. T. V, 454) imagined. The translation of Pischel, Ved. Stud. p. 101, sûr(bhi) aṅgibhi mit 'Herren, die schmieren, d. h. ordentlich bezahlen,' seems too exclusively German. Could aṅgin be an adjective, in the sense of possessed of aṅgis?

Verse 16.

Note 1. If sîkvas is not to be derived from sak (see Hübschmann, Vocalsystem, pp. 64, 186), we should have to derive nis, night, from a root altogether different from that which yields nakt, nákta, &c. But how does sîkvas come to mean, according to Ludwig, both bunch of flowers, and flaming? Does he connect it with sikhâ? Surely, if siksh may stand for sirak-s, why not sik-vas for sirisak-vas*? 'Bright' leaves it doubtful whether it means clever or flaming.

Verse 17.

Note 1. The seven, seven heroes need not be the Maruts, but some liberal patrons who rewarded Syâvârva. See Bergaigne, Rel. Véd. II, 371.

MANDALA V, HYMN 53.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 11-13.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Who knows their birth? or who was of yore in the favour of the Maruts, when they harnessed the spotted deer¹?

2. Who has heard them when they had mounted their chariots, how they went forth? For the sake of what liberal giver (Sudâs) did they run, and their comrades followed¹, (as) streams of rain (filled) with food?

3. They themselves said to me when day by day¹ they came to the feast with their birds²: they (the Maruts) are manly youths and blameless; seeing them, praise them thus;

4. They who shine by themselves in their ornaments¹, their daggers, their garlands, their golden chains, their rings, going² on their chariots and on dry land.

5. O Maruts, givers of quickening rain, I am made to rejoice, following after your chariots, as after days¹ going with rain.

6. The bucket which the bounteous heroes shook down from heaven for their worshipper, that cloud they send¹ along heaven and earth, and showers follow on the dry land.

7. The rivers having pierced¹ the air with a rush of water, went forth like milk-cows; when your spotted deer roll about² like horses that have hasted to the resting-place on their road.

8. Come hither, O Maruts, from heaven, from the sky, even from near¹; do not go far away!

9. Let not the Rasâ, the Anitabhâ, the Kubhâ, the Krumu, let not the Sindhu delay you ! Let not the marshy Sarayu prevent you ! May your favour be with us alone !

10. The showers come forth after the host of your chariots, after the terrible Marut-host of the ever-youthful heroes ¹.

11. Let us then follow with our praises and our prayers each host of yours, each troop, each company ¹.

12. To what well-born generous worshipper have the Maruts gone to-day on that march,

13. On which you bring to kith and kin the never-failing seed of corn ? Give us that for which we ask you, wealth and everlasting happiness !

14. Let us safely pass through our revilers, leaving behind the unspeakable and the enemies. Let us be with you when in the morning ¹ you shower down health, wealth ², water, and medicine, O Maruts !

15. That mortal, O men, O Maruts, whom you protect, may well be always beloved by the gods, and rich in valiant offspring. May we be such !

16. Praise the liberal Maruts, and may they delight on the path of this man here who praises them, like cows in fodder. When they go, call after them as for old friends, praise them who love you, with your song !

NOTES.

Ascribed to Syāvāsva Ātreya. Metre, 1, 5, 10, 11, 15 Kakubh; 2 Bṛīhati; 3 Anuṣṭubh; 4 Pura-ushnih; 6, 7, 9, 13, 14, 16 Satobṛīhati; 8, 12 Gāyatrī. No verse of this hymn occurs in SV., VS., AV.; the sixth verse is found in TS. II, 4, 8, 1; MS. II, 4, 7; Kāthaka XI, 9.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Kilāṣi, as fem. of kilāsa, does not occur again. It seems to have meant spotted or marked with pocks, and would be intended for the prīshatis. Does Kailāsa come from the same source?

Verse 2.

Note 1. Kāsmāi sasruḥ is much the same as kāsmāi adyā sūgātāya ... prā yayuḥ, in verse 12. We must then begin a new sentence, ānu āpāyaḥ, their comrades after, namely sasruḥ. Thus we read in verse 10 tām vaḥ sārđham ... ānu prā yanti vṛishtāyaḥ, where the streams of rain are represented as the followers of the Maruts. We might also translate in our sentence: For what liberal giver did their comrades, the streams of rain with food follow after (the Maruts).

Verse 3.

Note 1. Ūpa dyūbhiḥ occurs again VIII, 40, 8, and seems to mean from day to day.

Note 2. The birds of the Maruts, probably of the same character as the birds of the Asvins.

Verse 4.

Note 1. I translate aṅgi by ornament in general, not by paint or ointment, though that may have been its original meaning.

Note 2. On srāya, see Pān. III, 3, 24. Dhānvasu may possibly have been intended as governed by svābhānavaḥ, and not by srāyāḥ; see, however, VIII, 33, 6. smāsrushu sritāḥ.

Verse 5.

Note 1. On dyāvah, nom. plur., and ráthān, acc. plur., compare Bergaigne, Mélanges Renier, p. 88. The text is doubtful, and may be a corruption of vrishṭīh dyāvah yatīh iva.

Verse 6.

Note 1. The Taittirīyas, TS. II, 4, 8, 1, read pargányāh; the Maitreyas, prā pargányah śrigatām and yantu.

Verse 7.

Note 1. Tatridāná, as trid occurs in the Veda in the Parasmaipada only, may be intended for a passive, bored, dug out, tapped. One would, however, expect in that case an instrumental, marudbhih, by whom they were brought forth.

Note 2. The words ví yád vártanta enyāh have received various explanations. Wilson translates: 'When the rivers rush in various directions.' Sāyana admits also another meaning: 'When the rivers grow.' Ludwig translates: 'Sich verteilend gehn die schimmernden auseinander.' Grassmann, very boldly: 'Wie Hengste träufelnd, wenn vom Wege heimgekehrt, sie zu den bunten Stuten gehn.' Vi-vrit seems, however, to have a very special meaning, namely, rolling on the ground, and this the spotted deer are here said to have done, like horses at the end of their journey. We read of the sacrificial horse, Sat. Br. XIII, 5, 1, 16. sa yady ava vā gighred vi vā varteta, samriddho me yagñā iti ha vidyāt; cf. XI, 2, 5, 3. In the TS. VII, 1, 19, 3, the commentator explains vivartanam by nirgatya bhūmau viluṭhanam, the rolling on the ground. The same meaning is applicable to Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, p. 66 (Childers), where the Bhikkhus are said to roll on the ground when they hear of Buddha's death; also to Mahābh. III, 11953 (of a wild boar). The meaning therefore in our passage seems to be, when the deer roll on the ground, as horses are wont to do at the end of a journey.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Amāt corresponds here to prithivī in other places. Originally it may have meant from the home.

Verse 9.

This verse has often been discussed on account of the names of the rivers which it contains. Syāvārṣva had mentioned the Yamunā in 52, 17, and some interpreters have been inclined to give to parushnī in 52, 9 a geographical meaning, taking it for the river Ravi, instead of translating it by cloud. The geographical names are certainly interesting, but they have been discussed so often that I need not dwell on them here. (See M. M., India, p. 163.)

The Rasā, known to the Zoroastrians as the Razhā, was originally the name of a real river, but when the Āryas moved away from it into the Punjāb, it assumed a mythical character, and became a kind of Okeanos, surrounding the extreme limits of the world.

Anitabhā seems to be the name of a new river or part of a river. It can hardly be taken as an epithet of Rasā, as Ludwig suggests. Anitabhā, whose splendour has not departed (Ludwig), or, amitabhā, of endless splendour, would hardly be Vedic formations. (Chips, I, p. 157; Hibbert Lect., p. 207; India, pp. 166, 173, notes.)

Kubhā is the Κωφῆν or Κωφῆς of the Greeks, the Kabul river. The Krumu I take to be the Kurrum. (India, p. 177, note.)

The Sindhu is the Indus, though it is difficult to say which part of it, while the Sarayu has been supposed to be the Sarayū, the affluent of the Gaṅgā, but may also be a more general name for some more northern river in the Punjāb. (See Zimmer, Altindisches Leben, pp. 17 f., 45; Muir, S. T. II, p. xxv, note.)

Verse 10.

Note 1. Návyasīnām has been a puzzle to all interpreters. Sāyana seems to me to give the right interpretation, namely, nūtanānām. As from aṅgasā, instr. sing., straightway, aṅgasīna was formed, straightforward; from návyasā, instr. sing., anew, návyasīna seems to have been formed in the sense of new. Návyasīnām might then be a somewhat irregular gen. plur., referring to gaṇám mārutam, the Marut-host of the young men; see V, 58, 1. Lanman (p. 515) takes it for a gen. plur. fem., but in that case it could not refer to rāthānām. Zimmer translates endlos, Bergaigne (II, 400) thinks of new or rejuvenescent mothers.

Verse 11.

Note 1. See III, 26, 6.

Verse 14.

Note 1. Uśrī, in the morning. Lanman (p. 427) proposes to read uśhāri, but the metre would be better preserved by reading vṛishṭvī as trisyllabic. The difficulty is the construction of the gerund vṛishṭvī, which refers to the Maruts, and syāma sahā, which refers to the sacrificers.

Note 2. On sām yóh, see I, 165, 4, note 2.

The metrical structure of this hymn is interesting. If we represent the foot of eight syllables by a, that of twelve by b, we find the following succession:

I {	1 a b a	II {	3 a a a a
	2 a a b a		4 b a a
III {	5 a a a	IV {	8 a a a
	6 b a b a		9 b a b a
	7 b a b a		12 a a a
V {	10 a b a	VI {	13 b a b a
	11 a b a		14 b a b a
		VII {	15 a b a
			16 b a b a

We find that I contains the question, II the answer, III description of rain, IV prayer and invitation, V praise of the companions, VI prayer, VII conclusion. Comp. Oldenberg's Prolegomena, p. 106 seq.

MANDALA V, HYMN 54.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 14-16.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. You have fashioned¹ this speech for the brilliant Marut-host which shakes the mountains : celebrate then the great manhood in honour of that host who praises the warm milk (of the sacrifice), and sacrifices on the height of heaven², whose glory is brilliant.

2. O Maruts, your powerful men (came) forth searching for water, invigorating, harnessing their horses, swarming around. When they aim with the lightning, Trita shouts, and the waters murmur, running around on their course.

3. These Maruts are men brilliant with lightning, they shoot with thunderbolts, they blaze with the wind, they shake the mountains, and suddenly, when wishing to give water¹, they whirl the hail ; they have thundering strength, they are robust, they are ever-powerful.

4. When you drive forth¹ the nights, O Rudras, the days, O powerful men, the sky, the mists, ye shakers, the plains, like ships, and the strongholds, O Maruts, you suffer nowhere.

5. That strength of yours, O Maruts, that greatness extended far as the sun extends its daily course, when you, like your deer on their march, went down to the (western) mountain with untouched splendour¹.

6. Your host, O Maruts, shone forth when, O sages, you strip, like a caterpillar, the waving tree¹.

Conduct then, O friends, our service ² to a good end, as the eye conducts the man in walking.

7. That man, O Maruts, is not overpowered, he is not killed, he does not fail, he does not shake, he does not drop, his goods do not perish, nor his protections, if you lead him rightly, whether he be a seer or a king.

8. The men with their steeds, like conquerors of clans, like Aryaman (Mitra and Varuna)¹, the Maruts, carrying waterskins², fill the well; when the strong ones roar, they moisten the earth with the juice of sweetness³.

9. When the Maruts come forth this earth bows, the heaven bows, the paths in the sky bow, and the cloud-mountains with their quickening rain.

10. When you rejoice at sunrise, O Maruts, toiling together¹, men of Svar (sun-light), men of Dyū (heaven), your horses never tire in running, and you quickly reach the end of your journey.

11. On your shoulders are the spears, on your feet rings, on your chests golden chains, O Maruts, on your chariot gems; fiery lightnings in your fists, and golden headbands tied round your heads¹.

12. O Maruts, you shake the red apple¹ from the firmament, whose splendour no enemy² can touch; the hamlets bowed when the Maruts blazed, and the pious people (the Maruts) intoned their far-reaching shout.

13. O wise Maruts, let us carry off¹ the wealth of food which you have bestowed on us; give us², O Maruts, such thousandfold wealth as never fails³, like the star Tishya⁴ from heaven!

14. O Maruts, you protect our wealth of excellent men, and the seer, clever in song; you give to Bharata (the warrior)¹ a strong horse ², you make the king to be obeyed ³.

15. O you who are quickly ready to help, I implore you for wealth whereby we may overshadow all men, like the sky. O Maruts, be pleased with this word of mine, and let us speed by its speed over a hundred winters !

NOTES.

The same poet, Syāvārva Ātreya. Metre, 1-13, 15 Gagati; 14 Trishṭubh. None of the verses of this hymn occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS., TB., MS.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Anaga, explained as a 2nd pers. plur. perf., referring to the same people who are addressed by arkata. It may be also the first person of the imperative; see Benfey, Über die Entstehung der mit r anlautenden Personalendungen, p. 5, note.

Note 2. Possibly the second line of this verse may refer to ceremonial technicalities. Gharma means heat and summer, but also the sacrificial vessel (formus) in which the milk is heated, and the warm milk itself. Yagvan can only mean sacrificing, and diváh prishtha is the back of heaven, the highest roof of heaven; see triprishtha. Thus we read, I, 115, 3. haritah . . . diváh á prishthám asthuh. See also I, 164, 10; 166, 5; III, 2, 12; IX, 36, 6; 66, 5; 69, 5; 83, 2; 86, 27. It would seem therefore as if the Maruts themselves were here represented as performing sacrificial acts in the highest heaven, praising the milk, that is, the rain, which they pour down from heaven to earth. Possibly the text is corrupt. If yagyu could have the same meaning as prayagyu, I should like to conjecture, diváh á prishthám yágyave. In IX, 61, 12. índrāya yágyave seems to mean 'to the chasing Indra.' See also āyagi (erjagend), obtaining. Might we conjecture divá á prikshayāvane? Prikshayāma occurs as a name; see also II, 34, 3.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Abdā, wish to give water, is very doubtful. Both abda and abdi, in abdimat, mean cloud. The text seems corrupt.

Verse 4.

Note 1. The meaning of vyag is doubtful. It may simply mean to make visible.

Verse 5.

Note 1. The last words ánasvadâm yát ní áyâtana girím are difficult. Sâyana has an explanation ready, viz. when you throw down the cloud or the mountain which gives no water or which does not give up the horses carried off by the Pañis. Grassmann too is ready with an explanation: 'Als ihr unnahbar glänzend, Hirschen gleich, den Berg auf eurer Fahrt durchranntet, den kein Ross erreicht.' Ludwig: 'Als ihr nider gehn machtet den nicht vergängliches gebenden (d. i. die waszer; oder: die rosse verweigernden?) berg.'

Giri may be the cloud, and nothing could be more appropriate than that the Maruts should come down upon the cloud or go over it, in order to make it give up the rain. But asvadâ means 'giving horses,' and though rain-clouds may be compared to horses, it does not follow that asva by itself could mean rain. Asvadâ is used of the dawn, I, 113, 18, possibly as giving horses, that is, wealth, but possibly also, as bringing the horses to the morning sun. These horses start with the dawn or the sun in the morning, and they rest in the evening. The legend that Agni hid himself in an Asvattha tree (Sâyana, RV. I, 65, 1) may owe its origin to asvattha, i. e. horse-stable, having been a name of the West (K. Z. I, 467); cf. tishtadgu, at sunset. In X, 8, 3, the Dawns are called ásvabudhnâh, which may mean that they had their resting-place among the horses. The Maruts, more particularly, are said to dwell in the Asvattha tree, when Indra called them to his help against Vṛitra; cf. Sat. Brāhm. IV, 3, 3, 6; Pār. Grīhy. II, 15, 4. Possibly therefore, though I say no more, possibly the Dawn or the East might have been called asvadâ, the West anasvadâ, and in that case it might be said that the Maruts are of unsullied splendour, when they go down to the western mountain. M. Bergaigne explains, 'La montagne qui ne donne pas, qui retient le cheval, le cheval mythique, soleil ou éclair.' My own impression, however, is that anasvadâm is an old mistake, though I cannot accept Ludwig's conjecture a-nasva-dâm. Why not ánu svadhâm, or anasva-yâh, moving without horses? cf. V, 42, 10.

Verse 6.

Note 1. This is, no doubt, a bold simile, but a very true one. In one night caterpillars will eat off the whole foliage of a tree, and in the same way a violent storm in the autumn will strip every leaf. Arnasám as an adjective, with the accent on the last syllable, does not occur again, but it can hardly mean anything but waving. If it will stand for the sea, we might translate, 'When you clear the waving sea (or air), as the caterpillar a tree.'

Note 2. Arámati seems here to mean service or obedience, not a person who is willing to serve.

Verse 8.

Note 1. To translate aryamánah by friends is unsatisfactory. Bergaigne takes it for Aryaman, Mitra, and Varuna, the three Aryamans, as we say the two Mitras, and points out that these three gods do send rain, in I, 79, 3; VII, 40, 4.

Note 2. It ought to be kavandhína as much as kávandha, V, 85, 3.

Note 3. Mádhva ándhasá; Grassmann, 'mit des Honigs Seim.'

Verse 10.

Note 1. Sabharas is evidently a recognised epithet of the Maruts, see VS. XVII, 81 and 84, but its meaning is doubtful. We have visvábharasam, IV, 1, 19, as an epithet of Agni, which does not help us much. If bharas means burden, sabharas may mean those who work together, companions, friends.

Verse 11.

Note 1. See Muir, S. T. V, p. 149. On síprāḥ &c., see II, 34, 3, note.

Verse 12.

Note 1. The red apple to be shaken from the firmament can only be the lightning. Vi-dhû is construed with two accusatives, as in III, 45, 4; V, 57, 3. Gaedicke, Accusativ, p. 266.

Note 2. Aryáḥ cannot be a vocative, on account of the accent, nor a nominative on account of the context. There remains nothing but to take it as a genitive, and connect it with agrībhīta, though such a construction has few parallels, except perhaps in such sentences as hávyaḥ karshanínám, VI, 22, 1, &c. Possibly it may be intended as an epithet of the Maruts. Bergaigne (Journ. As. 1884, p. 190), 'au profit du pauvre.' Geldner (Ved. Stud. I, p. 148) proposes a very bold translation: 'The sacrificial nets are being contracted, when the Maruts rush on. The priests (ritāyu) roar their (as catching-net) extended shouting.' The sense is said to be that when the Maruts appear, all priests try to catch them by shouting. See, however, Oldenberg in Gött. Gel. Anzeigen, 1890, p. 414.

Verse 13.

Note 1. For rathyāḥ, see II, 24, 15. rāyáḥ syāma rathyāḥ váyasvataḥ; VI, 48, 9.

Note 2. Rāranta, 2nd pers. plur. imp. intens., but Pada has raranta. Why not rarāta?

Note 3. Yukkkhati has been compared by Kuhn (K. Z. III, 328) with δύσκει; but see Brugmann, Grundriss, I, pp. 110, 118.

Note 4. Tishya must be the name of a star, hardly, as Sâyana suggests, of the sun. It ought to be a star which does not set. See Weber, Über alte iranische Sternnamen, p. 14. Ludwig quotes from TS. II, 2, 10, 1 seq., an identification of Tishya with Rudra.

Verse 14.

Note 1. Grassmann marks this verse as late, Ludwig defends it. We must know what is meant by late before we decide. Bharata may mean simply a warrior, or a Bharata ; see Ludwig, III, 175-176 ; Oldenberg, Buddha (1st edition), p. 413.

Note 2. Árvantam vāgam, a horse, his strength. See Bergaigne, Rel. Véd. II, 405 ; Pischel, Ved. Stud. p. 46.

Note 3. Could srushámat here mean obedient ?

MANDALA V, HYMN 55.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 8, VARGA 17-18.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. The chasing¹ Maruts with gleaming spears, the golden-breasted, have gained great strength, they move along on quick well-broken horses;—when they went in triumph, the chariots followed.

2. You have yourselves, you know, acquired power; you shine bright and wide, you great ones. They have even measured the sky with their strength;—when they went in triumph, the chariots followed.

3. The strong heroes, born together, and nourished together, have further grown to real beauty. They shine brilliantly like the rays of the sun;—when they went in triumph, the chariots followed.

4. Your greatness, O Maruts, is to be honoured, it is to be yearned for like the sight of the sun. Place us also in immortality;—when they went in triumph, the chariots followed.

5. O Maruts, you raise¹ the rain from the sea, and rain it down, O yeomen²! Your milch-cows, O destroyers³, are never destroyed;—when they went in triumph, the chariots followed.

6. When you have joined the deer as horses¹ to the shafts, and have clothed yourselves in golden garments, then, O Maruts, you scatter all enemies;—when they went in triumph, the chariots followed.

7. Not mountains, not rivers have kept you back, wherever you see, O Maruts, there you go. You go even round heaven and earth ;—when they went in triumph, the chariots followed.

8. Be it old, O Maruts, or be it new, be it spoken, O Vasus, or be it recited, you take cognisance of it all ;—when they went in triumph, the chariots followed.

9. Have mercy on us, O Maruts, do not strike us, extend to us your manifold protection. Do remember the praise, the friendship ;—when they went in triumph, the chariots followed.

10. Lead us, O Maruts, towards greater wealth, and out of tribulations, when you have been praised. O worshipful Maruts, accept our offering, and let us be lords of treasures !

NOTES.

The same poet, Syāvārva Ātreya. Metre, 1-9 Gagati; 10 Trishubh. None of the verses occurs in SV., VS., AV. Verse 5 is found in TS. II, 4, 8, 2; MS. II, 4, 7. The refrain probably means that when the Maruts march in triumph, the chariots of their army, or the chariots of other gods, follow. The latter view is taken by Sāyana, TS. II, 4, 8, 2.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Práyagyu, generally explained by rushing forward, but in that sense hardly to be derived from yag, to sacrifice, may stand for an old Vedic form prayakshyu, changed into prayagyu by priests who had forgotten the root yaksh, and thought of nothing but sacrifices. This root yaksh has been identified by Grassmann with OHG. jagôn (venari, persequi), originally to rush after, to hunt, to try to injure or kill (cf. mṛiganyávah, X, 40, 4). This would explain most derivations from yaksh, not excepting the later Yakshas, and would yield an excellent sense for prayakshyu, as an epithet of the Maruts. See note to VII, 56, 16. Pischel, Ved. Stud. I, p. 98, is satisfied with deriving prayagyu and prishthaprayag from the root yag, to sacrifice, and translates it by sacrificing, but in the sense of causing sacrifices to be offered.

Verse 5.

Note 1. The verb irayatha is transitive; see Gaedicke, Accusativ, p. 54, and compare AV. IV, 27, 4. apáh samudrád dívam úd vahanti.

Note 2. I have translated purishinaḥ by yeomen, in the sense of cultivators of the land. I have followed Roth, who shows that purisha means soil, and that purishin is used for an occupier of the soil, a landlord. See K. Z. XXVI, p. 65.

Note 3. Dasra, powerful, a common epithet of the Asvins, seems here, when joined with dasyanti, to retain something of its etymological meaning, which comes out clearly in dâs, to attack, unless it is derived from dams.

Verse 6.

Note 1. I prefer to translate here 'the deer as horses,' not 'the speckled horses.' See, however, II, 34, 4, and Pischel, Ved. Stud. p. 226.

MANDALA V, HYMN 56.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 19-20.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. O Agni, on to the strong host (of the Maruts), bedecked with golden chains and ornaments¹. To-day I call the folk of the Maruts down from the light of heaven.

2. As thou (Agni) thinkest in thine heart, to the same object my wishes have gone. Strengthen thou these Maruts, terrible to behold, who have come nearest to thy invocations.

3. Like a bountiful lady¹, the earth comes towards us, staggering, yet rejoicing; for your onslaught, O Maruts, is vigorous, like a bear, and fearful, like a wild bull.

4. They who by their strength disperse wildly¹ like bulls, impatient of the yoke, they by their marches make the heavenly stone, the rocky mountain (cloud)² to shake.

5. Arise, for now I call with my hymns¹ the troop of these Maruts, grown strong together, the manifold, the incomparable, as if calling a drove of bulls.

6. Harness the red mares to the chariot, harness the ruddy horses to the chariots, harness the two bays, ready to drive in the yoke, most vehement to drive in the yoke.

7. And this red stallion too, loudly neighing, has been placed here, beautiful to behold; may it not cause you delay on your marches, O Maruts; spur him forth on your chariots.

8. We call towards us the glorious chariot of the Maruts, whereon there stands also Rodasi¹, carrying delightful gifts, among the Maruts.

9. I call hither this your host, brilliant on chariots, terrible and glorious; among which she, the well-born and fortunate, the bounteous lady, is also magnified among the Maruts.

NOTES.

The same poet and deity, though Agni is invoked in the first, possibly in the second verse also. Metre, 1, 2, 4-6, 8, 9 Bṛīhatī; 3, 7 Satobṛīhatī. None of the verses occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS., MS.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Here again some interpreters of the Veda take añgi in the sense of paint, war-paint. It may be so, but the more general meaning of colours or ornament seems, as yet, safer.

Verse 3.

Note 1. The earth is frequently represented as trembling under the fury of the Maruts. Here she is first called mīlūśmatī, a curious compound which, in our verse, may possibly have a more special meaning. As the earth is not only struck down by the storm, but at the same time covered with water and fertilised, she is represented as struck down and staggering, but likewise as rejoicing, possibly, as drunk.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Vṛthā means pell-mell, confusedly, wildly; see also Geldner, Ved. Stud. p. 115.

Note 2. Āsmā svaryāḥ seems to mean the thunderbolt like vāgraḥ svaryāḥ in I, 32, 2; 61, 6. See also V, 30, 8. In that case we should have to translate, 'they let the heavenly bolt fall down on the rocky mountain.' But kyāvayati is never used for the hurling of the thunderbolt, nor is it construed with two accusatives. It always means to shake what is firm, and we have therefore to translate, 'they shake the heavenly stone (the sky), the rocky mountain (the cloud).' Parvata and giri often occur together, as in I, 37, 7; VIII, 64, 5.

Verse 5.

Note 1. Stómaiḥ may possibly refer to sámukshitânām.

Verse 8.

Note 1. On Rodasī, see before, I, 167, 3.

MANDALA V, HYMN 57.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 21-22.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. O Rudras, joined by Indra, friends on golden chariots, come hither for our welfare! This prayer from us is acceptable to you like the springs of heaven to a thirsty soul longing for water.

2. O you sons of Prisni, you are armed with daggers and spears, you are wise, carrying good bows and arrows and quivers, possessed of good horses and chariots. With your good weapons, O Maruts, you go to triumph!

3. You shake¹ the sky and the mountains (clouds) for wealth to the liberal giver; the forests bend down out of your way from fear². O sons of Prisni, you rouse the earth when you, O terrible ones, have harnessed the spotted deer for triumph!

4. The Maruts, blazing with the wind, clothed in rain, are as like one another as twins, and well adorned. They have tawny horses, and red horses, they are faultless, endowed with exceeding vigour; they are in greatness wide as the heaven.

5. Rich in rain-drops, well adorned, bounteous, terrible to behold, of inexhaustible wealth, noble by birth, golden-breasted, these singers of the sky¹ have obtained their immortal name².

6. Spears are on your two shoulders, in your arms are placed strength, power, and might. Manly thoughts dwell in your heads, on your chariots are weapons, and every beauty has been laid on your bodies.

7. O Maruts, you have given us wealth of cows, horses, chariots, and heroes, golden wealth! O men of Rudra, bestow on us great praise, and may I enjoy your divine protection!

8. Hark, O heroes, O Maruts! Be gracious to us! You who are of great bounty, immortal, righteous, truly listening to us, poets, young, dwelling on mighty mountains¹, and grown mighty.

NOTES.

The same poet and deity. Metre, 1-6 Gagatī; 7, 8 Trishūbh. None of its verses occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS.; verse 6 in MS. IV, 11, 4.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Dhû is construed with two accusatives, see RV. III, 45, 4; otherwise vâsu might be connected with dârúshe. The third pāda is almost literally repeated soon after, V, 60, 2; see note 1 to I, 37, 7.

Note 2. Yámanah bhiyá may be from fear of your approach.

Verse 5.

Note 1. In diváh arkáh even Bergaigne allows that arká may mean singer, not song.

Note 2. Náma, name, is here as elsewhere what is meant by the name, therefore immortal being or immortality.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Bríhadgirayah cannot well mean with a powerful voice. The Maruts are called girishṭha, VIII, 94, 12, dwelling on mountains, and like bríhaddiva, bríhadgiri seems to have been intended for dwelling on high mountains.

MANDALA V, HYMN 58.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 8, VARGA 28.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. I praise¹ now the powerful company of these ever-young Maruts, who drive violently along with quick horses; aye, the sovereigns are lords of Amṛita (the immortal).

2. The terrible company, the powerful, adorned with quoits on their hands, given to roaring, potent, dispensing treasures, they who are beneficent, infinite in greatness, praise, O poet, these men of great wealth!

3. May your water-carriers come here to-day, all the Maruts who stir up the rain. That fire which has been lighted for you, O Maruts, accept it, O young singers!

4. O worshipful Maruts, you create for man an active king, fashioned by *Vibhvan*¹; from you comes the man who can fight with his fist, and is quick with his arm, from you the man with good horses and valiant heroes.

5. Like the spokes of a wheel, no one is last, like the days they are born on and on, not deficient in might. The very high sons of Prisni are full of fury, the Maruts cling firmly to their own will¹.

6. When you have come forth with your speckled deer as horses¹ on strong-fellied chariots, O Maruts, the waters gush, the forests go asunder²;—let *Dyu*³ (Sky) roar down, the bull of the Dawn.

7. At their approach, even the earth opened wide, and they placed (sowed) their own¹ strength (the rain), as a husband the germ. Indeed they have harnessed the winds as horses to the yoke, and the men of Rudra have changed their sweat into rain.

8. Hark, O heroes, O Maruts! Be gracious to us! You who are of great bounty, immortal, righteous, truly listening to us, poets, young, dwelling on mighty mountains, and grown mighty.

NOTES.

The same poet and deity. Metre, Trishubh. None of the verses occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS. Verses 3 and 5 are found in TB. II, 5, 5, 3; II, 8, 5, 7; MS. IV, 11, 2; IV, 4, 18.

Verse 1.

Note 1. On stushé, see M. M., Selected Essays, I, p. 162; Wilhelm, De infinitivi forma et usu, p. 10; Bartholomae, in Bezzenberger's Beiträge, XV, p. 219. I take stushé as 1 pers. sing. Aor. Átm. (not, as Avery, of the Present) in many places where it has been taken as an infinitive. For instance, II, 31, 5; VI, 49, 1; 51, 3 (with voke); 62, 1 (with huve); VIII, 5, 4; 7, 32; 74, 1; 84, 1 (here the second páda must begin with stushé). It may be an indicative or a subjunctive. As to stushe, without an accent, its character cannot be doubtful; see I, 122, 8; 159, 1; V, 33, 6; VI, 21, 2; 48, 14; VIII, 21, 9; 23, 2; 23, 7 (grine). In II, 20, 4, tám u stushe índram tám griníshe, griníshe is an aorist with vikarāṇa, like punishé, I praise that Indra, I laud him. In I, 46, 1, stushé may be the infinitive, but not necessarily. It is an infinitive in I, 122, 7. stushé sâ vâm varuna mitra rátih, your gift, Varuna and Mitra, is to be praised. Likewise in VIII, 4, 17 (see BR. s. v. sāman); 24, 1; 63, 3, though in several of these passages it must remain doubtful whether stushé should be taken as an absolute infinitive, or as a finite verb. In VIII, 65, 5, indra griníshe u stushé, means, 'Indra, I laud and praise,' as in II, 20, 4.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Vibhva-tashá is generally explained as made by a master, or by Vibhvan, one of the R̥ibhus. This may be so, though it seems a bold expression (see Bergaigne, II, 410-411). But may it not be a mere synonym of sutashā, and intended for vibhvane tashā? see Selected Essays, I, p. 143.

Verse 5.

Note 1. See Taitt. Br. II, 8, 5, 7. As to mimikshuḥ, see note to I, 165, 1.

Verse 6.

Note 1. On prīshatībhiḥ āsvaiḥ, see II, 34, 4; V, 55, 6. Bergaigne's note (II, p. 378) does not settle the question whether the horses of the Maruts were speckled, or whether they had speckled deer for their horses.

Note 2. On rizaté vānāni, see V, 57, 3.

Note 3. Dyaus, the father of the Maruts, the oldest and highest god of heaven, the strong bull, or, it may be, the man of the dawn. See v. Bradke, Dyaus Asura, p. 63; Bergaigne, I, p. 316.

Verse 7.

Note 1. Roth conjectures svām for svām, taking it as a locative of sū, genetrix. This is not without difficulties, nor is it necessary. That we find in the Rig-veda no other locative in ām after monosyllabic stems in ū is perhaps no serious objection. But the text as it stands can be translated, 'as a husband the germ, they have placed (sown) their own strength.' Sāvas is the same as vrīshnyam and vrīshni sāvaḥ in VIII, 3, 8; 10. Dhuḥ is used like dhā in retodhā.

MANDALA V, HYMN 59.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 24.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. They truly¹ tried to make you grant them welfare. Do thou sing² praises to Heaven (Dyu), I offer sacrifice (rita) to the Earth. The Maruts wash their horses and race to the air, they soften their splendour by waving mists.

2. The earth trembles with fear from their onset. She sways like a full ship, that goes rolling¹. The heroes who appear on their marches, visible from afar, strive together within the great (sacrificial) assembly².

3. Your horn is exalted for glory¹, as the horns of cows; your eye is like the sun², when the mist is scattered. Like strong racers, you are beautiful, O heroes, you think of glory, like manly youths³.

4. Who could reach, O Maruts, the great wise thoughts, who the great manly deeds of you, great ones? You shake the earth like a speck of dust, when you are carried forth for granting welfare.

5. These kinsmen¹ (the Maruts) are like red horses, like heroes eager for battle, and they have rushed forward to fight. They are like well-grown manly youths, and the men have grown strong, with streams of rain they dim the eye of the sun.

6. At their outbreak there is none among them who is the eldest, or the youngest, or the middle: they have grown by their own might, these sons of Prisni, noble by birth, the boys of Dyaus; come hither to us!

7. Those who like birds flew with strength in rows¹ from the ridge of the mighty heaven to its ends, their horses shook the springs² of the mountain (cloud) so that people on both sides³ knew it.

8. May¹ Dyaus Aditi (the unbounded)² roar for our feast, may the dew-lighted Dawns come striving together; these, the Maruts, O poet, (the sons) of Rudra, have shaken the heavenly bucket (cloud), when they had been praised.

NOTES.

The same poet and deity. Metre, 1-7 Gagati; 8 Tri-shūbh. None of the verses occurs in SV., VS., AV., TB., TS., MS.

Verse 1.

Note 1. If we accept the text as it stands, we have to translate, 'The spy called out to you to grant welfare.' The spy is then either Agni (Bergaigne, II, p. 378) or the priest. See also VIII, 61, 15; X, 35, 8. But there are many objections to this. Pra-krand is not used in that sense, and we should expect pra krānt suvitāya. Pra-kar, when it is construed with a dative, means generally to prepare some one for something, to cause some one to do a thing. Thus, I, 186, 10. pró asvínau ávase krínudhvam, get the Asvins to protect. VI, 21, 9. prá útāye várunam mitráṁ índram marútaḥ kríshva ávase naḥ adyá, make Varuna, Mitra, and Indra to protect, make the Maruts to protect us to-day. X, 64, 7. prá vaḥ vāyúm—stómaiḥ krínudhvam sakhyāya pūshānam, make Vāyu by your praises to be your friend. I, 112, 8. prá andhām sronām kákshase étave krítháḥ, whereby you make the blind and lame to see and to walk. The poet therefore seems to have said in our verse also, 'They (my men or priests) made you or wished you to give them welfare.' What spaṭ can mean in such a sentence, is difficult to say. Till we know better, we must simply accept it as a particle of asseveration, like baṭ.

Note 2. Árkā may also be the first person.

Verse 2.

Note 1. With regard to vyáthir yatí, cf. I, 117, 15. samudráṁ avyathír gaganván, and VIII, 45, 19. vyáthir gaganvámsaḥ; Bergaigne, Journ. As. 1884, p. 490.

Note 2. Mahé vidátḥ must be taken as a locative sing. It occurs again X, 96, 1. We have similar forms in maḥé ráne, IX, 66, 13, &c. The locative is governed by antáḥ, as in II, 27, 8. vidáthe antáh eshám. The etymology and the meaning of vidatha have been often discussed, for the last time by M. Regnaud, Revue de l'histoire des religions, 1890. Prof. Roth, as M. Regnaud states, explains it by conseil, avis, réunion où l'on délibère, assemblée, troupe, armée. Grassmann takes it generally for réunion, rencontre, combat. Geldner derives it from vid, in the sense of art, science. Ludwig derives it likewise from vid, but in the sense of Bekanntschaft, then Gesellschaft, and lastly as synonymous with yagña, sacrifice, assemblage. M. Regnaud differs from all his predecessors, and derives vidatha from vidh, to sacrifice. He maintains that vidhatha* would become vidatha, like adhak from dah or dhagh, and phaliga for parigha. I know nothing about the etymology of phaliga, but if it stands for parigha, the second aspirate has lost its aspiration and thrown it on the initial. In adhak, the final has lost its aspiration, and thus allowed its appearance in the initial. But in vidatha, if it stood for vidhatha, there would be no phonetic excuse whatever for changing dh into d, at least in Sanskrit. It is possible that in Sanskrit such a form as vidhatha might have been avoided, but there is no phonetic law to prevent the formation of such a word as vidhatha, like ukátha, yagatha, &c. We say vidhatha in the 2 pers. plur., as we say bodhatha. No Sanskrit grammarian could derive vidatha from vidh. If therefore vidatha signifies sacrifice, this is not because it is derived from vidh, to sacrifice. Vidatha may have been the name of a sacred act, as veda is of sacred knowledge. But the fact remains that it is best translated by assembly, particularly an assembly for sacrificial purposes.

Verse 3.

Note 1. On sriyáse, see I, 87, 6.

Note 2. I see no necessity for changing sûrya into sûra, see Bergaigne, Mélanges Renier, p. 94. He would translate, 'they are like the eye of the sun.'

Note 3. Máryâ may be bridegrooms, as in V, 60, 4

(varāh iva), but there is nothing to indicate that meaning here. The difficulty is to find a word to express sriyāse. It means to shine, but at the same time to excel. Possibly it may have even a more definite meaning, such as to shine in battle, or to triumph.

Verse 5.

Note 1. As to sabandhu, see VIII, 20, 21.

Verse 7.

Note 1. On srénih, see Gaedicke, p. 164; Bergaigne, Mél. Renier, p. 94.

Note 2. The meaning of nabhanú, spring, is doubtful.

Note 3. Ubháye refers to many on both sides, and cannot be taken for ubhe, heaven and earth. It may mean all, particularly when there are two sides only, as in a battle.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Ludwig seems to have seen the true meaning of this verse, namely that, though Dyaus may roar for the feast, and though the Dawns may strive to come near, the Maruts alone deserve the sacrifice, because they opened the chest of rain.

Note 2. On Dyaus Aditi, see note to I, 166, 12, p. 261, where the translation has to be corrected.

MANDALA V, HYMN 60.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 25.

TO AGNI AND THE MARUTS.

1. I implore¹ Agni, the gracious, with salutations, may he sit down here, and gather what we have made². I offer³ (him sacrifice) as with racing chariots; may I, turning to the right, accomplish this hymn to the Maruts.

2. Those who approached on their glorious deer, on their easy chariots, the Rudras, the Maruts,—through fear of you, ye terrible ones, the forests even bend down, the earth shakes, and also the mountain (cloud).

3. At your shouting, even the mountain (cloud), grown large, fears, and the ridge of heaven trembles. When you play together, O Maruts, armed with spears, you run together like waters.

4. Like rich suitors the Maruts have themselves¹ adorned their bodies with golden ornaments; more glorious for glory², and powerful on their chariots, they have brought together splendours on their bodies.

5. As brothers, no one being the eldest or the youngest, they have grown up together to happiness. Young is their clever father Rudra, flowing with plenty is Prīṣni (their mother), always kind to the Maruts.

6. O happy Maruts, whether you are in the highest, or in the middle, or in the lowest heaven, from thence, O Rudras, or thou also, O Agni, take notice of this libation which we offer.

7. When Agni, and you, wealthy Maruts, drive down from the higher heaven over the ridges, give then, if pleased, you roarers, O destroyers of enemies¹, wealth to the sacrificer who prepares (Soma-juice).

8. Agni, be pleased to drink Soma with the brilliant Maruts, the singers, approaching in companies¹, with the men (Āyus²), who brighten and enliven everything; do this, O Vaisvânara (Agni), thou who art always endowed with splendour.

NOTES.

This hymn, by the same poet, is supposed to be addressed either to the Maruts alone, or to the Maruts and Agni. The same might have been said of hymn 56 and others which are used for the Âgnimâruta Sastra. See Bergaigne, Recherches sur l'histoire de la liturgie védique, p. 38. Metre, 1-6 Trishubh ; 7, 8 Gagatî. No verse of this hymn occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS., TB., except verse 1 in AV. VII, 50, 3 ; TB. II, 7, 12, 4 ; MS. IV, 14, 11 ; verse 3 in TS. III, 1, 11, 5 ; MS. IV, 12, 5 ; verse 6 in TB. II, 7, 12, 4.

Verse 1.

The AV. reads svâvasum, prasaktó, pradakshinám, all of them inferior readings. The TB. agrees with RV., except that it seems to read prasapták (prakarshena samâgatah).

Note 1. That îd or îd has originally the meaning of imploring, asking, begging, we see from such passages as RV. III, 48, 3. upasthâya mâtâram ánnam aîta, 'he, having approached his mother, asked for food,' unless we prefer to construe îd with two accusatives, 'he, having approached, asked his mother for food.' The same verb is also construed with the accusative of the god implored, the dative of the object, and the instrumental of the means by which he is implored. See RV. VIII, 71, 14. agním îishva ávase gáthâbhih, implore Agni with songs for his protection. Whether the root îd is distantly connected with either ish, to desire (Brugmann, I, 591), or with ard, to stir, or with ar, to go, is a question which admits of many, or of no answer.

Note 2. Viki krítam seems to have the settled meaning of gathering in what one has made at play, or in battle ; see X, 42, 9 ; 43, 5 ; IX, 97, 58 ; X, 102, 2. The same meaning is applicable here, though we may also translate, 'Take notice of our kríta or our karma, i. e. the sacrifice.' A similar thought is expressed in verse 6. Sâyaṇa explains vigânâtu and vikinuyât.

Note 3. Perhaps prá bhare means, 'I am carried forth,' as in V, 59, 4, where it is applied to the Maruts.

Verse 4.

Note 1. See note 2 to I, 6, 4. Instead of svadhābhiḥ we have svayām in VII, 56, 11.

Note 2. Sriyé sréyāmsaḥ is difficult to translate ; cf. II, 33, 3. sréshthaḥ sriyá asi. Ludwig translates, zu herlichkeit die herlichen.

Verse 7.

Note 1. On risâdas, see Aufrecht, Bezenb. Beitr. XIV, p. 32.

Verse 8.

Note 1. On ganasrî, see BR. s. v. ; Lanman, 372 ; Benfey, Vedica und Verwandtes, p. 108 ; Pischel, Ved. Stud. I, 53 seq. Ludwig translates scharenherlich, but what does that mean ? 'Shining in their companies' is a possible meaning, but the analogy of abhisrî and adhvarasrî points in another direction.

Note 2. On the Âyus as a proper name, see Bergaigne, Rel. Véd. I, 62 ; II, 323.

MANDALA V, HYMN 61.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 26-29.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Who are you, O men, the very best, who have approached one by one, from the furthest distance¹?

2. Where are your horses, where the bridles? How could you, how did you come?—the seat on the back, the rein in the nostrils?

3. Their goad is on the croup¹, the heroes stretched their legs apart². . .

4. Move along, heroes, young men, the sons of an excellent mother¹, so that you may warm yourselves at our fire².

5. (1.) May the woman, if she stretched out her arm¹ as a rest for the hero, praised by Syâvâsva², gain cattle consisting of horses, cows, and a hundred sheep.

6. (2.) Many a woman is even more often kindlier than a godless and miserly man,

7. (3.) A woman who finds out the weak, the thirsty, the needy, and is mindful of the gods.

8. (4.) Even though many an unpraiseworthy miser (Pāṇi) is called a man, she is worth as much in weregild.

9. (5.) Also the young woman joyfully whispered to me, to Syâva, the road,—and the two bays went straight to Purumī/za¹, the wise, the far-famed,

10. (6.) Who gave me a hundred cows, like Vaidadasvi, like Taranta, in magnificence.

11. (1.) The Maruts, who drive on their quick horses, drinking the delightful mead, have gained glory here;

12. (2.) They on whose chariots Rodas¹ glitters in glory², like the golden disk above in heaven ;

13. (3.) That youthful company of the Maruts, with blazing chariots, blameless, triumphant, irresistible.

14. (4.) Who now knows of them where the strikers rejoice, the well-born, the faultless ?

15. (5.) You who are fond of praise, become the leaders of the mortal, listening to his imploring invocations, thus is my thought¹.

16. (6.) Bring then to us delightful and resplendent¹ treasures, ye worshipful Maruts, destroyers of enemies.

17. (1.) O night, like a charioteer, carry away this hymn to Dârbhya, and these songs, O goddess.

18. (2.) And then tell him thus from me, 'When Rathavîti offers Soma, my desire never goes away from me.'

19. (3.) That mighty Rathavîti dwells among people rich in cattle¹, retired among the mountains.

NOTES.

This hymn is of a very composite nature. It is addressed to the Maruts by Syāvâsya. According to the Anukramanî, however, the Maruts are addressed in vv. 1-4, 11-16 only; vv. 5-8 are addressed to Sasîyasî Tarantamahishî, 9 to Purumîlha Vaidadarvi, 10 to Taranta Vaidadarvi, 17-19 to Rathavîti Dârbhya. None of the verses occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS., TB., MS. Metre, 1-4, 6-8, 10-19 Gâyatri; 5 Anushûbh; 9 Satobṛihatî.

It has been pointed out that in the hymns addressed to the Maruts beginning with V, 52, and ending with V, 60, there is the usual decrease in the number of verses of each successive hymn, viz. 17, 16, 15, 10, 9, 8, 8, 8, 8. Our hymn, however, which is the last in the collection of hymns addressed by Syāvâsya to the Maruts, breaks the rule, and it has been suggested with great plausibility that it contains a number of verses thrown together at random. Possibly the four verses in the beginning formed an independent hymn, addressed to the Maruts, and again 5-10, and 11-16, followed by an appendix, 17-19. These verses refer to a legend which will have to be discussed at verse 5.

Verse 1.

Note 1. As to paramâsyâḥ parāvâtaḥ, see TS. IV, 1, 9, 3, where we also find (IV, 1, 9, 2) pârasyâ âdhi samvâtaḥ.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Gaghâne, like gaghanataḥ, may mean simply behind, as agre and agrataḥ mean before.

Note 2. It is clear that the Maruts are here supposed to sit astride on their horses. This is also shown by prishthé sâdas (v. 2), and by putrakrîthé ná gânyah, they stretched out their legs, ὡς γυναῖκες ἐν τεκνοποιῶν. Zimmer (p. 230) says, 'Zum Reiten wurde das Ross nicht benutzt.' On p. 295 he modifies this by saying, 'Keine einzige klare Stelle des Rigveda ist mir bekannt, wo das Reiten beim Kampfe erwähnt würde; man fährt immer zu Wagen, wie die Griechen in homerischen Zeiten.'

Verse 4.

Note 1. Bhádragānaya^h, generally rendered by 'possessed of beautiful wives,' seems really to mean 'possessed of an excellent mother.' Gāni clearly means mother, when Agni dvimâtā, having two mothers, is called dvigāni^h; for it is never said that he has two wives. Besides, the Maruts are constantly addressed as the sons of their mother, Prisni, while their wives are mentioned but rarely. However, the other meaning is not impossible. See also Bergaigne, II, 387 seq.

Note 2. The fire here intended is, I suppose, the sacrificial fire, to which the Maruts are here invited as they had been in former hymns.

Verse 5.

Note 1. Ludwig compares the A. S. expression healsgebedde; see also RV. X, 10, 10.

Note 2. I have very little belief in the legends which are told in the Brāhmaṇas and in the Anukramanī in illustration of certain apparently personal and historical allusions in the hymns of the Veda. It is clear in many cases that they are made up from indications contained in the hymns, as in IX, 58, 3, and it seems best therefore to forget them altogether in interpreting the words of the Vedic hymns.

The story told in the introductory verses, quoted by Sāyana, is this:—'Arkaṇānas Ātreya was chosen by Rathavīti Dārbhya to be his Ritvig priest. At the sacrifice Arkaṇānas saw the daughter of Rathavīti and asked her in marriage for his son Syāvāsva. Rathavīti consulted his wife, but she declined on the ground that no daughter of theirs had ever been given to a man who was not a poet (Rishi). Thereupon Syāvāsva performed penance, and travelled about collecting alms. He thus came to Saśiyasī, who recommended him, as a Rishi, to her husband, king Taranta. King Taranta was very generous to him, and sent him on to his younger brother, Purumīlla. On his way to Purumīlla, Syāvāsva saw the Maruts, and composed a hymn in their praise (vv. 11–16). He had thus become a real poet or Rishi, and on returning home, he received from Rathavīti his daughter in marriage.'

Saunaka confirms the same story, see Sâyana's commentary to V, 61, 17. Here therefore we have to deal with two princely brothers, both Vaidadarvis, namely Taranta and Purumilla. They both give presents to Syâvârva, who is a Brâhmana, and he marries the daughter of another prince, Rathavîti Dârbhya.

In the Tândya-Brâhmana, however, XIII, 7, 12, another story is told, which I quoted in my edition of the Rig-veda at IX, 58, 3 (vol. v, p. xxxiii). Here Dhvasra and Purushanti are introduced as wishing to give presents to the two Vaidadarvis, Taranta and Purumilla. These hesitate for a while, because they have no right to accept a present without deserving it or having done something for it. They then compose a hymn in praise of Dhvasra and Purushanti, and after that feel justified in accepting their present.

Here therefore the Vaidadarvis are receivers, not givers of presents, therefore of princely, not, as has been supposed, of priestly rank, and this would agree better with the words of verse 9, purumillâya viprâya. See on all this Oldenberg in Z. D. M. G. XLII, p. 232.

If we accept this story, we have to take sâsiyasî in verse 6 as a proper name.

But sâsiyasî may be a comparative of sas-vat (see B.-R. s.v.), and would then mean, more frequent. We expect, no doubt, an adverb rather like sasvat, but a feminine corresponding to vâsiyasî is perhaps admissible. In that case we should have simply to deal with some woman, tvâ strî, who, as the poet says, is as good as, if not better than, many a man.

Verse 8.

This verse is very obscure. Sâyana translates: 'And the other half (the husband of Sâsiyasî, viz. Taranta) is a man not praised (enough), thus I, the poet, say: and that Taranta is equal or just in the giving of wealth.' Grassmann translates: 'Und dagegen ist mancher nicht lobenswerth geizig, der ein Mann sich nennt, ein solcher ist der Strafe verfallen.' Ludwig: 'Auch mancher halbmensch, ungepriesen, der "mensch" zwar heisst, doch ein Pani ist, der ist auf böse gabe nur bedacht.'

The first light that was thrown on this verse came from Prof. Roth. He showed (Z. D. M. G. XLI, p. 673) that vairadeya means weregild, the German wergelt, the price to be given for a man killed. Vaira would here be derived from vira, man, the Goth. waír, the Latin vir, and vairadeya would mean what is to be given as the value of a man. Still I doubt whether Prof. Roth has discovered the true meaning of the verse. He translates: 'So ist auch mancher Mann nicht zu loben, mehr ein Pani (unfromm, gegen die Götter karg, zugleich Bezeichnung habstüchtiger Dämonen), obschon man ihn einen Menschen nennt—nur am Wergeld steht er den andern gleich.' I confess I do not see much point in this. It is quite clear that the poet praises a charitable woman, and wishes to say that she is sometimes better than a man, if he gives nothing. Now the weregild, if we may say so, for women was generally, though not always, less than that for men, and I therefore propose to read sá vaíradeye ít samá, and translate: 'Even though many an unpraiseworthy miser (Pani) is called man, she is like him in weregild, i.e. she is worth as much, even though she is a woman.' On uta, see Delbrück, Syntaktische Forschungen, V, p. 528.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Purumi/ha is here clearly the man from whom benefits are expected, and therefore could not be the same as Purumi/ha Vaidadarvi, mentioned by the commentator, who accepted gifts from Dhvasra and Purushanti. Nor can Taranta Vaidadarvi in the next verse be taken for a recipient, but only for a giver, and therefore, most likely, a prince. The whole story, however, is by no means clear, and I doubt whether the commentator drew his information from any source except his own brain.

Verse 11.

I agree with Ludwig that a new hymn begins with verse 11.

Verse 12.

Note 1. I have adopted the reading Rodasī vibhrāgate in my translation; cf. VI, 66, 6, where Rodasī is compared with a rōkaḥ.

Note 2. Roth (K. Z. XXVI, 51) takes sriyādhi as sriyās adhi, but such a sandhi has not yet been established in the hymns of the Rig-veda, see Oldenberg, Proleg. p. 459, Anm. 1. Oldenberg himself suggests sriyó-dhi, and would translate, 'They whose charms shine over the two worlds on their chariots.' Pischel (Ved. Stud. p. 54) translates yéshām sriyā by 'for whose sake.'

Verse 15.

Note 1. On itthā dhiyā, see Pischel, Ved. Stud. p. 184.

Verse 16.

Note 1. The Pada ought to have puru-kandrá, as suggested by Grassmann and Ludwig.

Verses 17-19.

These verses are very peculiar, and may refer to historical events, for Dālbhya or Dārbhya and Rathavīti sound like real names. Of course the Indian commentators are never at a loss to tell us what it all refers to, but we can never say how little they knew, and how much they invented. The invocation of Ūrmyā, if it is meant for the Night, and the request that she may convey the hymn to Dārbhya, is different from the usual style of the hymns. See, however, VIII, 24, 28, and Oldenberg, Z. D. M. G. XXXIX, 89.

The following names, occurring in our hymn, have the sanction of the Anukramanī: Sasīyasi Tarantamahishī (V, 61, 5; 8), Purumīḥa Vaidadarvi (V, 61, 9), Taranta Vaidadarvi (V, 61, 10), Rathavīti Dālbhya (V, 61, 17-19). There is another Purumīḥa, a Sauhotra, in IV, 43, and a Purumīḥa Āngirasa in VIII, 71.

Verse 19.

Note 1. See Oldenberg, Z. D. M. G. XXXIX, 89. He corrects gómatīḥ to gómatīm, the name of a river, mentioned in a very similar way in VIII, 24, 30.

MANDALA V, HYMN 87.

ASHTAKA IV, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 33-34.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Let your voice-born¹ prayers go forth to the great Vishṇu, accompanied by the Maruts, Evayāmarut, and to the chasing host, adorned with good rings, the strong, in their jubilant throng, to the shouting power (of the Maruts).

2. O Maruts, you who are born great, and proclaim it yourselves by knowledge, Evayāmarut, that power of yours cannot be approached by wisdom, that (power) of theirs (cannot be approached) by gift or might¹; they are like unapproachable mountains.

3. They who are heard with their voice from the high heaven, the brilliant and strong, Evayāmarut, in whose council no tyrant¹ reigns, the rushing chariots² of these roaring Maruts come forth³, like fires with their own lightning.

4. The wide-striding (Vishṇu)¹ strode forth from the great common seat, Evayāmarut. When he has started by himself from his own place along the ridges, O ye striving, mighty² Maruts, he goes together with the heroes (the Maruts), conferring blessings.

5. Impetuous, like your own shout, the strong one (Vishṇu) made everything tremble, the terrible, the wanderer¹, the mighty, Evayāmarut; strong with him you advanced self-luminous, with firm reins, golden coloured, well-armed², speeding along.

6. Your greatness is infinite, ye Maruts, endowed with full power, may that terrible power help, Evayâmarut. In your raid¹ you are indeed to be seen as charioteers ; deliver us therefore from the enemy, like shining fires.

7. May then these Rudras, lively like fires and with vigorous shine, help, Evayâmarut. The seat of the earth is stretched out far and wide¹, when the hosts of these faultless Maruts come quickly to the races.

8. Come kindly on your path, O Maruts, listen to the call of him who praises you, Evayâmarut. Confidants of the great Vishṇu, may you together, like charioteers, keep all hateful things far¹, by your wonderful skill.

9. Come zealously¹ to our sacrifice, ye worshipful, hear our guileless call, Evayâmarut. Like the oldest mountains in the sky, O wise guardians, prove yourselves for him irresistible to the enemy.

NOTES.

This hymn is evidently a later addition at the end of the fifth Mandala. It is addressed to the Maruts, and is ascribed to Evayāmarut Ātreya. None of its verses occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS., TB., MS., except the first, which is found in SV. I, 462. Metre, Atigagati.

The name of the poet is due to the refrain Evayāmarut which occurs in every verse, and sometimes as an integral portion of the verse. Evayāmarut is a sacrificial shout, much like Evoî in Greek, Evoe in Latin, though I do not mean to say that the two are identical. Evayāh, as I explained in note to I, 168, 1, is an epithet of Vishṇu, as well as of the Maruts, meaning quickly moving. Evayāmarut, therefore, may mean the 'quick Marut.' This is strange, no doubt, because in the Rig-veda the Maruts always occur in the plural, except in some doubtful passages. Still Evayāmarut, the quick Marut, might be a name of Vishṇu. It cannot be taken as a Dvandva, Vishṇu and the Maruts.

This hymn was translated by Benfey in his glossary to the Sāma-veda, p. 39. Benfey takes evayā as identical with εὐοῖ, and explains it as an adverbial instrumental, like āśuyā, in the sense of stürmisch. But this would leave evayāvan unexplained.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Giri-gāh may mean 'produced on the mountains,' but it may also mean 'produced in the throat or voice,' and it is so explained elsewhere, for instance in SV. I, 462 (Bibl. Ind., vol. i, p. 922). girau vāki nishpannāh; [also by another commentator, hridaye gâtā, yagñagâtā vā ity uktam]. Oldenberg suggests girige, which would be much better, considering how Vishṇu is called girikshit, girishthā, &c.; see Bergaigne, II, 47. Most of the epithets have occurred before. I take sāvase as a substantive, like sardhas, not as an adjective. As to dhūnivrata, see V, 58, 2; as to prāyagyu, V, 55, 1.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Krátvá, dāná, and mahnā seem to me in this place to belong together. The difficulty lies in the transition from vaḥ to eshām, but this is not uncommon. On mahinā=mahimnā, dāná, and mahnā, see Wenzel, Instrumentalis, p. 17; Lanman, p. 533. Pischel, Ved. Stud. p. 101, translates, 'Ihre Macht gereicht ihnen zu grosser Gabe.' See also VIII, 20, 14. Gātāḥ mahinā, born by greatness, seems to mean born in greatness, or born great. It would be easy to write mahínāḥ.

Verse 3.

Note 1. The translation of īri is purely conjectural.

Note 2. Syandrāsaḥ, as suggested by Oldenberg, are probably meant for rathāḥ. Syandana is a carriage in later Sanskrit. In VIII, 20, 2, we have to supply rathaiḥ; in VI, 66, 2, rathāḥ.

Note 3. Prá, with the verb understood, they come forth; cf. VII, 87, 1. prá árnāmsi samudrīyā nadīnām; X, 75, 1. Dhuni, like dhûti, has become almost a name of the Maruts, see I, 64, 5.

Verse 4.

Note 1. The god here meant seems to be Vishnu, mentioned already in verse 1, and probably recalled by the Evayā in Evayāmarut.

Note 2. We must either take vīspardhasaḥ and vīmahasaḥ with Benfey as names of the horses, or accept them as vocatives, addressed to the Maruts. Vimahas is used as an epithet of the Maruts, see I, 86, 1.

Verse 5.

Note 1. On yayīḥ, see note to I, 87, 2; but it seems better to take it here as an adjective.

Note 2. On svâyudha, see Geldner, Ved. Stud. I, p. 143; Oldenberg, Gött. Gel. Anzeigen, 1890, p. 424.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Prásiti may be, as Ludwig translates it, fangschnur, a noose, but it can hardly mean Noth, as Grassmann suggests. I take it here in the sense of shooting forth, onslaught, raid; cf. VII, 46, 4. Geldner, Ved. Stud. I, p. 139, takes it for a trap. Lanman, p. 386, is right in considering the locative in au before consonants a sure sign of the modern origin of this hymn.

Verse 7.

Note 1. The idea that the earth is stretched out or becomes large during a thunderstorm has been met with before, V, 58, 7. We read I, 37, 8; 87, 3, that at the racings of the Maruts the earth trembled, and that the Maruts enlarged the fences in their races. I therefore translate, though tentatively only, that the earth is opened far and wide, as a race-course for the faultless Maruts, whose hosts ā, appear, āgmeshu, on the courses, mahāh, quickly. If the accent of paprathe could be changed, we might translate, 'at whose coursings (āgmeshu ā) the seat of the earth is quickly stretched out far and wide,' and then take sārdhāmsi ādbhutainasām in apposition to rudrāsaḥ. Adbhutainas, in whom no fault is seen.

Bergaigne translates, 'faisant du mal mystérieusement.' See Geldner, in K. Z. XXVIII, 199, Anm. 2; Bezzenberger's Beiträge, III, 169.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Cf. VI, 48, 10.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Susāmi, generally explained as a shortened instrumental, for suramī=suramyā, used in an adverbial sense. Susāmi has a short i here, because it stands at the end of a pāda, otherwise the i is long, see VII, 16, 2; X, 28, 12, even before a vowel. The same applies in the Rig-veda to samī; it has short i at the end of a pāda, see II, 31, 6; VIII, 45, 27; X, 40, 1. The phrase dhiyā sāmī, which has short i in II, 31, 6; X, 40, 1, has long i in IX, 74, 7. dhiyā sāmī. It is shortened, however, before vowels in the middle of a pāda, and written samy; see I, 87, 5; III, 55, 3.

MANDALA VI, HYMN 66.

ASHTAKA V, ADHYĀYA 1, VARGA 7-8.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. This may well be a marvel, even to an intelligent man, that anything should have taken the same name dhenu, cow :—the one is always brimming to give milk among men, but Prisni (the cloud, the mother of the Maruts) poured out her bright udder once (only).

2. The Maruts who shone like kindled fires, as they grew stronger twice and thrice,—their golden, dustless (chariots¹) became full of manly courage and strength.

3. They who¹ are the sons of the bounteous Rudra, and whom she indeed was strong enough to bear ; for she, the great, is known as the mother of the great, that very Prisni conceived the germ for the strong one (Rudra).

4. They who do not shrink from being born in this way¹, and who within (the womb) clean themselves from all impurity², when they have been brought forth brilliant, according to their pleasure, they sprinkle their bodies with splendour.

5. Among them there is no one who does not strive to be brought forth quickly ; and they assume the defiant name of Maruts. They who are not (unkind¹), never tiring in strength², will the generous sacrificer be able to bring down these fierce ones ?

6. Fierce in strength, followed by daring armies, these Maruts have brought together heaven and earth¹, both firmly established² ; then the self-shining Rodast stood among the impetuous Maruts, like ³ a light.

7. Even though your carriage, O Maruts, be without your deer ¹, without horses, and not driven by any charioteer, without drag², and without reins, yet, crossing the air³, it passes between heaven and earth, finishing its courses.

8. No one can stop, no one can overcome him whom you, O Maruts, protect in battle. He whom you protect in his kith, his cattle, his kin, and his waters, he breaks the stronghold at the close of the day¹.

9. Offer a beautiful song to the host of the Maruts, the singers, the quick, the strong, who resist violence with violence; O Agni, the earth trembles before the champions.

10. Blazing like the flame of the sacrifices, flickering like the tongues of the fire, shouters, like roaring fighters, the flame-born Maruts are unassailable.

11. I invite with my call this strong and Marut-like son of Rudra¹, armed with flaming spears. Bright thoughts, like wild waters from the mountain², strove to reach the host of heaven.

NOTES.

Hymn ascribed to Bharadvāga Bārhaspatya. None of its verses occurs in SV., VS., AV. Verse 2 in MS. IV, 14, 11. Verse 9 in TS. IV, 1, 11, 3; TB. II, 8, 5, 5; MS. IV, 10, 3. Verse 10 in MS. IV, 14, 11. Metre, Trishṭubh.

Verse 1.

The meaning seems to be that it is strange that two things, namely, a real cow and the cloud, i.e. Prisni, the mother of the Maruts, should both be called dhenu, cow; that the one should always yield milk to men, while the other has her bright udder milked but once. This may mean that dhenu, a cow, yields her milk always, that dhenu, a cloud, yields rain but once, or, that Prisni gave birth but once to the Maruts. See also VI, 48, 22; Gaedicke, Accusativ, p. 19; Delbrück, Tempuslehre, p. 102. Dhenu must be taken as the neuter form, and as a nominative, as is shown by II, 37, 2. dadīh yāh nāma pátýate.

Verse 2.

Note 1. It seems necessary to take arenávaḥ hiranyáśaḥ for rathāḥ, chariots, as in V, 87, 3. Sáyana takes the same view, and I do not see how the verse gives sense in any other way. The first páda might be referred to the Maruts, or to the chariots.

Verse 3.

Note 1. The relative pronouns may be supposed to carry on the subject, viz. Marútaḥ, from the preceding verse, unless we supply eshām mâtá. I am doubtful about mahó mahī; cf. I, 102, 1; II, 33, 8. Grassmann proposes to read mahâm, gen. plur.; Ludwig thinks of garbha. It may also be a compound, as in mahámaha, mahámahivrata, or an adverb, but the construction remains difficult throughout. Oldenberg suggests that the second páda may have been yān ko nú prīsnīḥ dādhrivīḥ bháradhyai.

Verse 4.

Note 1. A tentative rendering and no more. I take áyá for ayá as an adverb in the sense of thus, in this way, see I, 87, 4, note 2. Grassmann seems to take it as an instr. fem., dependent on ganúshaḥ, which is possible, but without analogy. Lanman, p. 358, takes it for áyāḥ, nom. plur. of aya, wanderer, and translates, 'as long as the ones now wanderers quit not their birth.' Grassmann: 'Die nicht verleugnen die Geburt aus jener.' But is gan with instrumental ever used of a woman giving birth to a child? Ludwig: 'Die sich nicht weigern der geburt.'

Note 2. Pû with accusative occurs AV. XIX, 33, 3.

Verse 5.

This verse is again very obscure. It would be more honest to say that it is untranslatable. Possibly the poet may have taken doháse in the same sense as duhré in verse 4. The Maruts are born as by being milked from the udder of Prisni. It would then mean, 'Among whom there is no one not striving to be born quickly.'

Note 1. Stauna is an unknown word. Sâyana explains it as stena, thieves. It probably meant something not favourable, something that must be denied of the Maruts. This is all we can say. It cannot be a corruption of stavânâḥ, praised.

Note 2. Ayás can hardly refer to Prisni, never tiring to suckle the Maruts. In B.-R. ayás is explained as sich nicht anstrengend, behende, leicht, unermüdlich. See also Windisch, K. Z. XXVII, 170; also Johansson, Bezzenb. Beitr. XV, p. 180.

Verse 6.

Note 1. To join together heaven and earth is, as Bergaigne remarks (II, p. 374, n. 1), the apparent effect of a thunderstorm, when the clouds cover both in impenetrable darkness. We have the same expression in VIII, 20, 4.

Note 2. On suméke, see Geldner, K. Z. XXIV, 145; and Windisch, Festgruss an Böhrling, p. 114.

Note 3. The ná, placed before rókaḥ, is irregular, see Bergaigne, Mélanges Renier, p. 79. Oldenberg suggests narokâh = nri-okâh, 'she who is fond of the men,' namely, of the Maruts. The corruption may be due to the writers of our text.

Verse 7.

Note 1. Anenáh is strange, and might be changed into anetáh; it cannot be anenáh, without guilt.

Note 2. If avasa in an-avasa comes from ava-so, it may mean the step for descending or ascending, or possibly a drag. Bergaigne explains it by sine viatico.

Note 3. Ragah-tŭh, according to Ludwig, den Staub aufwirbelnd, which seems too much opposed to arenu, dustless. Ragas + tar means to pass through the air, and in that sense only conquering the air. Geldner, Ved. Stud. p. 123, ignores the various shades of meaning in tur at the end of compounds.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Párye dyóh, according to Grassmann, 'on the decisive day,' like párye divi.

Verse 11.

Note 1. I have translated Rudrásya sūnúm by the son of Rudra. It is true that a single Marut, as the son of Rudra, is not mentioned; but on the other hand, one could hardly call the whole company of the Maruts, the māruta scil. gana, the son of Rudra. In I, 64, 12, we have Rudrasya sūnu in one pāda, and māruta gana in the next. The R̥ibhus also are called in the same line savasaḥ napātaḥ, and indrasya sūno, IV, 37, 4. Here sūnu corresponds almost to the English offspring, only it is masculine.

Note 2. Giráyah may have been meant for giryah, a possible ablative of giri; see Lanman, p. 383. Ugráh would then refer to āpah, unless we break the sentence into two, viz. 'my bright thoughts tend to the host of heaven,' and 'the fierce Maruts strive like waters from the mountain.' If we compare, however, IX, 95, 3. apām iva íd ūrmáyah tárturánāh prá manishāh írate sómam ákkha, we see that the whole verse forms one sentence. All would be right if we could change girayah into giribhyah, but is not this a conjecture nimis facilis?

MANDALA VII, HYMN 56.

ASHTAKA V, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 23-26.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Who are these resplendent men, dwelling together, the boys of Rudra, also ¹ with good horses?
2. No one indeed knows their births, they alone know each other's birthplace.
3. They plucked each other with their beaks ¹; the hawks, rushing like the wind, strove together.
4. A wise man understands these secrets ¹, that Prisni, the great, bore an udder.
5. May that clan be rich in heroes by the Maruts, always victorious, rich in manhood!
6. They are quickest to go, most splendid with splendour, endowed with beauty, strong with strength.
7. Strong is your strength, steadfast your powers, and thus by the Maruts is this clan mighty.
8. Resplendent is your breath, furious are the minds of the wild host, like a shouting maniac ¹.
9. Keep from us entirely your flame, let not your hatred reach us here.
10. I call on the dear names of your swift ones, so that the greedy should be satisfied ¹, O Maruts,
11. The well-armed, the swift, decked with beautiful chains, who themselves adorn their bodies.
12. Bright are the libations for you, the bright ones, O Maruts, a bright sacrifice I prepare for the bright. In proper order came those who truly follow the order, the bright born, the bright, the pure.
13. On your shoulders, O Maruts, are the rings, on your chests the golden chains are fastened; far-shining like lightnings with showers¹, you wield your weapons, according to your wont.

14. Your hidden¹ splendours come forth; spread out your powers (names), O racers! Accept, O Maruts, this thousandfold, domestic share, as an offering for the house-gods².

15. If you thus listen, O Maruts, to this praise, at the invocation of the powerful sage, give him quickly a share of wealth in plentiful offspring, which no selfish enemy shall be able to hurt.

16. The Maruts, who are fleet like racers, the manly youths, shone like Yakshas¹; they are beautiful like boys standing round the hearth, they play about like calves who are still sucking.

17. May the bounteous Maruts be gracious to us, opening up to us the firm heaven and earth. May that bolt of yours which kills cattle and men, be far from us! Incline to us, O Vasus, with your favours.

18. The Hotri priest calls on you again and again, sitting down and praising your common gift, O Maruts. O strong ones, he who is the guardian of so much wealth, he calls on you with praises, free from guile.

19. These Maruts stop the swift, they bend strength by strength¹, they ward off the curse of the plotter, and turn² their heavy hatred on the enemy.

20. These Maruts stir up even the sluggard¹, even the vagrant², as the gods³ pleased. O strong ones, drive away the darkness, and grant us all our kith and kin.

21. May we not fall away from your bounty, O

Maruts, may we not stay behind, O charioteers, in the distribution of your gifts. Let us share in the brilliant wealth, the well-acquired, that belongs to you, O strong ones.

22. When valiant men fiercely fight together, for rivers, plants, and houses¹, then, O Maruts, sons of Rudra, be in battles our protectors from the enemy.

23. O Maruts, you have valued¹ the praises which our fathers have formerly recited to you ; with the Maruts the victor is terrible in battle, with the Maruts alone the racer wins the prize.

24. O Maruts, may we have a strong son, who is lord among men, a ruler, through whom we may cross the waters to dwell in safety, and then obtain our own home for you¹.

25. May Indra then, Varuna, Mitra, Agni, the waters, the plants, the trees of the forest be pleased with us. Let us be in the keeping, in the lap of the Maruts ; protect us always with your favours.

NOTES.

Ascribed to Vasishṭha. Verse 1 occurs in SV. I, 433; verse 10 in TS. II, 1, 11, 1; MS. IV, 11, 2; verse 12 in TB. II, 8, 5, 5; MS. IV, 14, 18; verse 13 in TB. II, 8, 5, 5; MS. IV, 14, 18; verse 14 in TS. IV, 3, 13, 6; MS. IV, 10, 5; verse 16 in TS. IV, 3, 13, 7; MS. IV, 10, 5; verse 19 in TB. II, 8, 5, 6; MS. IV, 14, 18. Metre, 1-11 Dvipadā Virāg; 12-25 Trishṭubh.

Verse 1.

Note 1. The SV. reads athā for the older adhā. Sanikā in the edition of the Bibl. Ind. is a misprint for sanīā.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Sva-pû is explained by Roth as possibly a broom, raising the dust. Grassmann translates it by light, Ludwig by blowing. I suggest to take it for *vapû, in the sense of beak or claw, from vap, which follows immediately. See note to I, 88, 4. I do not see how the other meanings assigned to svapû give any sense. Oldenberg therefore suggests pavanta, 'Sie strömten hell auf einander zu mit ihren svapûs.'

Verse 4.

Note 1. Sâyana explains etāni ninyā by svetavarṇāni marudātmakāni bhūtāni. He takes ūdhas as a locative.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Geldner translates: 'Der Spielmann des wilden Heeres ist wie ein Muni,' and adds, 'Aber was ist ein Muni im Veda?'

Verse 10.

Note 1. I read tripān for tripāt of the Pada text, and refer vāvasānā to the Maruts. The TS. has tripāt, and the commentary explains it by triptim. The first line is Virāg, the second Trishṭubh, and the Trishṭubh metre is afterwards carried on.

Verse 11.

This verse refers to the Maruts, not, as Ludwig thinks, to the priests. Dr. v. Bradke (Dyaus Asura, p. 65) proposes to join verses 10 and 11 into one Trishúbh, and possibly to insert á before huve. I doubt whether for the present such changes are justified. On the structure of this hymn, see Oldenberg, Prol. 96, Anm. 3; 200, Anm. 5.

Verse 13.

Note 1. TB. II, 8, 5, 6, reads vyrishābhiḥ (not vrishābhiḥ), and the commentator explains, vyrishābhir āyudhaviśeshair vyriśtyākhyair, viśeshena rokamānāḥ sthitāḥ. And again, riśtaya eva viśiśtatvād vyriśtaya ity ukyante. Bollensen, Z. D. M. G. XLI, 501, conjectures riśābhiḥ for vrishābhiḥ, which is very ingenious. See also note 1 to II, 34, 2.

Verse 14.

Note 1. Budhnyā, explained by budhne bhavāni, and also by kālapravrittāni.

Note 2. Grihamedhiya may refer to the Maruts as grihamedhās or grihamedhinas; see RV. VII, 59, 10; VS. XXIV, 16. The grihamedhiyā ishī in Sat. Br. XI, 5, 2, 4, is meant for the Maruts.

Verse 16.

Note 1. Yakshadrīśaḥ is explained as wishing to see a sacrifice or feast. Ludwig retains this meaning. Grassmann translates, 'wie feurige Blitze funkeln.' Yaksha may mean a shooting star or any meteor, literally what shoots or hastens along; see VII, 61, 5. nā yāsu kītrām dādriśe nā yakshām; also note to V, 55, 1. But driś is not sadrīś. If we follow the later Sanskrit, yaksha would mean a class of spirits, followers of Kuvera, also ghosts in general. If this is not too modern a conception for the Rig-veda, we might translate yakshadrīś, 'appearing as ghosts' (see Kaus. Sūtra 95 in BR.), or, considering the expression ātyaḥ nā yamsat yakshabhṛt viketāḥ, I, 190, 4, take it for a name of horses.

Verse 19.

Note 1. Does not sáhasa á stand for sáhasá á, and not for sáhasaḥ á? Comp. Oldenberg, Prolegomena, 465 seq.

Note 2. On dadhanti, see Hübschmann, Indogerm. Vocal-system, p. 12.

Verse 20.

Note 1. On radhra, see Pischel, Ved. Stud. pp. 124 seq.

Note 2. Bhrīmi is doubtful, but as it stands by the side of radhra, it seems to have a bad meaning, such as a vagrant, unsteady.

Note 3. The Vasus are often mentioned with the Ādityas and Rudras, see III, 8, 8; X, 66, 12; 128, 9. By themselves they became almost synonymous with the Devas. Thus in VII, 11, 4, we read that Agni became the master of all sacrifices, krátum hí asya Vāsavaḥ gushánta átha devāḥ dadhire havyaváham, 'for the Vasus liked his wisdom, therefore the Devas made him the carrier of offerings.' See also V, 3, 10. pitá Vaso yádi tát gosháyāse. In one passage, VI, 50, 4, Vasavaḥ means the Maruts. In our passage it seems better to take it in the sense of gods, but we might also refer it to the Maruts.

Verse 22.

Note 1. With pāda b, compare VII, 70, 3 b.

Verse 23.

Note 1. I have taken bhūri kakra in the sense of magni facere, though I can find no analogous passages.

Verse 24.

Note 1. This verse has been well explained by Dr. v. Bradke, Dyaus Asura, p. 66. Svám ókaḥ, our own home, occurs IV, 50, 8; V, 33, 4; VI, 41, 1; VIII, 72, 14. Abhyas means generally to obtain what is not our own. See also VII, 48, 2. Vaḥ, which I have translated 'for you,' may also mean 'from you.'

Verse 25.

This verse is marked as a galita taken from VII, 34, 25, while the last pāda is a galita taken from VII, 1, 25.

MANDALA VII, HYMN 57.

ASHTAKA V, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 27.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. O ye worshipful, your company of Maruts is fond of honey, they who delight in their strength at the sacrifices, the Maruts, who shake even the wide heaven and earth, and fill the well, when they move about, the terrible ones.

2. Truly the Maruts find out the man who praises them, and guide the thoughts of the sacrificer. Sit down then to rejoice to-day, on the altar¹ in our assemblies² well pleased.

3. Others do not shine so much as these Maruts with their golden chains, their weapons, and their own bodies; the all-adorned, adorning heaven and earth, brighten themselves with the same brightness, when starting for triumph.

4. May your shining thunderbolt be far from us, O Maruts, whatever sin we may commit against you, men as we are: O worshipful, let us not fall under¹ its power, let your best favour rest on us.

5. May the Maruts be pleased with whatever little we have done here, they the faultless, the bright, the pure. Protect us, ye worshipful, with your favours, lead us to prosperity through booty.

6. And let the manly Maruts, when they have been praised, under whatever names, enjoy these offerings! Grant that our offspring may not die¹, raise up for us riches², glory, and wealth.

7. O Maruts, when you have thus been praised, come all together with help towards our lords who with their hundredfold wealth freely prosper us;—protect us always with your favours!

NOTES.

Ascribed to Vasishtha. None of its verses occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS., TB., MS. Metre, Trishubh.

Verse 1.

This hymn has been translated by Geldner and Kaegi. The first verse is most difficult. G.-K. avoid all difficulties by translating, 'Beim Fest des süßen Trankes weiss man tüchtig euch zu begeistern, hehre Schaar der Marut.' Ludwig grapples with them by translating: 'An eures madhu kraft, o zu vererende, freut bei den opfern sich der Marut geschlecht.' I doubt, however, whether savas is ever ascribed to madhu, though it is ascribed to Soma. Oldenberg suggests, 'The sweet ones' is your Marut-name, O worshipful, they who rejoice in their strength at the sacrifices.' Here the difficulty would be that Mārutam nāma is the recognised term for the name, i.e. the kin of the Maruts. Still, unless we venture on a conjecture, this would seem to be the best rendering. Could we change mādhvāḥ vaḥ nāma mārutam into madhvād vaḥ nāma mārutam? Madhvād is a Vedic word, though it occurs once only, in I, 164, 22, and as trisyllabic. Its very rarity would help to account for the change. The meaning would then be, 'your Marut kin eats honey, is fond of honey.'

It has been proved that the present mādāti is always neutral, meaning to rejoice, while mand (Par.) is transitive, to make rejoice. Otherwise madhvāḥ might possibly have been taken in the sense of sweet things, as in I, 180, 4; IX, 89, 3, and construed with madanti.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Barhis, which I translate by altar, is the simplest form of an altar, mere turf or kusa-grass, on which the offerings are placed. See note to VII, 46, 4.

Note 2. On vidatha, see my note, V, 59, 2.

Verse 3.

See Gaedicke, Accusativ, p. 241; his rendering would be acceptable but for the â. Without any verb of motion â ragas can hardly mean 'through the air,' nor â rôdasî 'through the worlds.'

Verse 4.

Note 1. On api bhû and api as, see B.-R. s. v.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Amrita cannot be rendered by immortality in our sense, it simply means not dying.

Note 2. Gigritâ, imp. aor. caus. of gar. Râyâk, acc. plur.

MANDALA VII, HYMN 58.

ASHTAKA V, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 28.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Sing to the company (of the Maruts), growing up together, the strong among the divine host¹: they stir heaven and earth by their might, they mount up to the firmament from the abyss of Nirṛiti².

2. Even your birth¹ was with fire and fury, O Maruts! You, terrible, wrathful, never tiring! You who stand forth with might and strength; every one who sees the sun², fears at your coming.

3. Grant mighty strength to our lords, if the Maruts are pleased with our praise. As a trodden path furthers a man, may they further us; help us with your brilliant favours.

4. Favoured by you, O Maruts, a wise man wins a hundred, favoured by you a strong racer wins a thousand, favoured by you a king also kills his enemy: may that gift of yours prevail, O ye shakers.

5. I invite these bounteous sons of Rudra¹, will these Maruts turn again to us? Whatever they hated secretly or openly, that sin we pray the swift ones to forgive.

6. This praise of our lords has been spoken: may the Maruts be pleased with this hymn. Keep far from us, O strong ones, all hatred, protect us always with your favours!

NOTES.

Ascribed to Vasishtha. None of its verses occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS., TB., MS. Metre, Trishubh.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Dhâman is one of the cruces of translators, and it remains so after all that has been written on the subject by Bergaigne, III, 210 seq. There are many words in the Veda which it is simply impossible to translate, because their meaning has not yet been differentiated, and they convey such general or rather vague concepts that it is utterly impossible to match them in our modern languages. Translators are often blamed that they do not always render the same Vedic by the same English word. It would be simply impossible to do so, because, according to the different surroundings in which it occurs, the same word receives different shades of meaning which in English can only be approximately expressed by different words. Bergaigne is, no doubt, right when he says that dhâ-man is derived from dhâ, to set or settle, and that it therefore meant at first what is settled. From this he proceeds to argue that the original meaning of dhâman, from which all others are derived, is law. But law is a very late and very abstract word, and we must never forget that words always progress from the concrete to the abstract, from the material to the spiritual, and but seldom, and at a much later time, in an opposite direction. Now even if we were to admit that dhâman does not occur in the Veda in the sense of settlement, i.e. abode, this is certainly its most general meaning afterwards, and no one would maintain that a settlement, i.e. a household, was called dhâman, because it involved a settlement, i.e. laws. The same applies to vratâ. Bergaigne (III, 213) agrees with me that vrata should be derived from var, to surround, to guard, and not from var, to choose, but he thinks that it meant at once 'garde, protection,' and not 'lieu clos.' I still hold that like νομός, vrata must have meant first a real hedge, or ἔρκος, and then only an abstract enclosure, i.e. a law, νόμος. In this case we can see the actual transition of thought. People would begin by saying, 'there is a fence here against your cattle,' and this would in time assume the meaning 'there is a defence against your cattle straying on my meadow.' But it would be impossible to begin, as Bergaigne (p. 216) does, with the abstract meaning of protection, law, and then return and use the word in such phrases as V, 46, 7. apām vraté, 'within the pale of the waters.'

Dhāman, therefore, meant originally, I still believe, what was actually laid down or settled, hence an abode. When, as in the Veda, it means law, I do not say that this was necessarily derived from the meaning of abode. I only maintain that it was a second, if not a secondary, meaning, and that, at all events, the meaning of abode cannot be derived from that of law.

After dhāman meant what is settled, it has sometimes to be translated by law, by nature, sometimes by class, or clan, where it comes very near to nāman, name, while sometimes it may best be rendered by a general and abstract suffix, or even by a plural. Thus in our passage, daívyasya dhāmnaḥ is not very different from devānām.

What is peculiar to our passage is the genitive governed by tuvishmān. After all the learning which Bergaigne has expended on the analysis of dhāman, he does not help us to a translation of our sentence. If we translate 'of the divine law, powerful,' we have words, but no sense. I take daívyasya dhāmnaḥ as a genitivus partitivus, such as AV. IV, 37, 5. óshadhînam vírúdhām víryāvatî. See Kuhn, Zeitschrift XIII, 120; Siecke, Genitivus, p. 14. Grassmann: 'Die mächtig walten in der Götter Wohnsitz.' Ludwig: 'Die von göttlicher natur, die starke.' He denies that tuvishmān could be followed by the genitive. I do not maintain that I am satisfied on that point. All I say in this as in many other cases is that my translation gives something which we can understand. Let others give us something better.

Note 2. On Nirriti, see Hibbert Lectures, p. 245; Lect. Science of Lang., vol. ii, p. 562. Avamsá, literally without beams of support, or bottomless.

Verse 2.

Note 1. On ganûs, see Lanman, p. 571.

Note 2. Svardrîk, according to Grassmann, der lichte Himmel; according to Ludwig, jeder der das licht schaut. Sâyana, among other meanings, gives that of tree. See VII, 83, 2.

Verse 3.

On the construction of this verse, see Delbrück, Syntax, p. 384, and Bergaigne, Mélanges Renier, p. 82.

Verse 5.

Note 1. With regard to tán mî/húsha/ rudrásya, 'these bounteous (sons) of Rudra,' see VIII, 20, 3.

MANDALA VII, HYMN 59.

ASHTAKA V, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 29-30.

TO THE MARUTS AND RUDRA.

1. Whom you protect again and again, O gods, and whom you lead, to him, O Agni, Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman, and Maruts, yield your protection.

2. He who sacrifices, O gods, overcomes his enemies by your protection on a happy day. He who gives to your delight, spreads forth his dwelling, spreads out much food.

3. This Vasishṭha will not despise even the last among you, O Maruts; drink¹ all of you, to-day, at my libation here, full of desire.

4. Your help does not indeed fail that man in battle to whom you granted it, O men! Your newest favour has turned hither, come quick then, ye who wish to drink.

5. O ye whose gifts are cheering, come to drink the (juice of the Soma) flowers: these are your libations, O Maruts, for I gave them to you, do not go elsewhere!

6. Sit down on our altar and protect¹ us, to give us brilliant riches. O Maruts, who never miss the Soma mead, hail to you here to enjoy yourselves.

7. Having adorned their bodies, the swans with dark blue backs came flying in secret¹—the whole flock sat down all around me, like gay men, delighting in the Soma offering.

8. O Maruts, that hateful man who beyond our thoughts tries to hurt us, O Vasus, may he catch the snares of Druh, kill him with your hottest bolt!

9. O you Maruts, full of heat, here is the libation ; be pleased to accept it, O you who destroy the enemies by your help¹.

10. O you who accept the domestic sacrifices¹, come hither, O Maruts, do not keep away, you who are bounteous by your help².

11. O Maruts, strong and wise, with sun-bright skins, I choose the sacrifice for you here and there¹.

12. We sacrifice to Tryambaka¹, the sweet-scented, wealth-increasing (Rudra). May I be detached from death, like a gourd from its stem, but not² from the immortal³.

NOTES.

Ascribed to Vasishtha. Verse 12 addressed to Rudra.

Verse 3 occurs SV. I, 241; verse 8, AV. VII, 77, 2; TS. IV, 3, 13, 3; MS. IV, 10, 5; verse 9, AV. VII, 77, 1; TS. IV, 3, 13, 3; MS. IV, 10, 5; verse 10, TS. IV, 3, 13, 5; MS. IV, 10, 5; verse 11, TĀ. I, 4, 3; MS. IV, 10, 3; verse 12, VS. III, 60; AV. XIV, 1, 17; TS. I, 8, 6, 2; MS. I, 10, 4; TĀ. X, 56; Sat. Br. II, 6, 2, 12.

Metre, 1, 3, 5 Bṛīhatī; 2, 4, 6 Satobṛīhatī; 7, 8 Trishṭubh; 9, 10, 11 Gāyatrī; 12 Anuṣṭubh.

Verse 2.

With pāda a compare I, 110, 7; with c and d, VIII, 27, 16.

Verse 3.

Note 1. SV. has pibantu, and as a various reading the comment. gives pivanta. Suté sákā is a standing phrase.

Verse 6.

Note 1. I cannot see how avitá can stand for avishṭa (Delbrück, Verb, 186; Whitney, Gram. § 908). I translate as if the text gave ávatá.

Verse 7.

Note 1. On the secret approach of the Maruts, see I, 88, 5.

Verse 8.

The text in the AV. VII, 77, 2, is bad, yó no mártō maruto durhrinâyús, práti muñkatām sáh, and tápasā for hánmanā. The TS. IV, 3, 13, 3, has tiráh satyáni. It reads besides, yó no mártō vasavo durhrinâyús tiráh satyáni marutaḥ glghâṁsât druháh pásam, and tápasā. Tiráh kītāni may mean 'beyond all conception,' as Grassmann takes it, or 'unobserved,' as B.-R. suggest. Tiráh satyáni might mean 'in spite of all pledges,' but that is probably an emendation. All this shows the unsettled state of Vedic tradition, outside that of the Rig-veda; see Oldenberg, Prolegomena, p. 328.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Ūtī, taken here as a dative, by Lanman, p. 382.

Verse 10.

Note 1. On the Maruts gr̥hamedhinaḥ, see Sat. Br. II, 5, 3, 4. Possibly the Maruts may be called gr̥hamedhas, i.e. gr̥hasthas, performing the Gr̥hya sacrifices. See on these names TS. I, 8, 4, 1; 2.

Note 2. The last pāda in the TS. is pramuñḥānto no āmhasaḥ.

Verse 11.

Note 1. On ihéha, see Delbrück, Syntax, p. 51. It means 'here and there,' that is, 'again and again.'

Verse 12.

Note 1. Tryambaka is a name of Rudra, but its original meaning is doubtful. Some commentators explain it by 'three-eyed,' but its natural meaning would be 'having three mothers.' The Sat. Br. II, 6, 2, 9, derives it from Stry-ambikā, because Ambikā, Rudra's sister, shares the sacrifice with him.

Note 2. On mā with optative, see Delbrück, Synt. Forsch. I, 194; Syntax, 338, 361, Anm. 1.

Note 3. That amṛitāt is right, not, as Grassmann suggests, amṛita, is clear from the parallel forms, prétó muñḥāmi nāmútaḥ, or itó mukshīya māmútaḥ. Pischel in Z.D.M.G. XL, 121, demands too much logical accuracy from a poet; see AV. XIV, 1, 17; VS. III, 60.

All scholars seem to agree that this hymn is a composite hymn, and that it breaks the law of decrease in the number of verses. It begins with three Pragâthas, verses 1 and 2, 3 and 4, 5 and 6, which may be in their right place. Then follow two Trishubhs, 7 and 8, which may form a hymn by themselves. The next three Gâyatrîs, which clearly belong together, are a later addition; so is the last verse, which ought to stand in the Atharva rather than in the Rig-veda. The Pada text does not divide this last verse. See on this subject, Oldenberg, Z.D.M.G. XXXVIII, 449 seq., Proleg. 200; 511; Bergaigne, Recherches sur l'histoire de la Samhitâ, II, 10.

MANDALA VIII, HYMN 7.

ASHTAKA V, ADHYĀYA 8, VARGA 18-24.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).'

1. When the sage has poured out the threefold¹ draught to you, O Maruts, then you shine forth in the mountains (clouds).

2. Aye, when, O bright Maruts, growing in strength, you have seen your way, then the mountains (clouds) have gone down¹.

3. The sons of Prisni, the bulls, have risen together with the winds, they have drawn forth the swelling draught.

4. The Maruts sow the mist, they shake the mountains (clouds), when they go their way with the winds,

5. When the mountain bent down before your march, the rivers before your rule, before your great power (blast).

6. We invoke you by night for our protection, you by day, you while the sacrifice proceeds.

7. And they rise up on their courses, the beautiful, of reddish hue¹, the bulls, above the ridge of the sky.

8. With might they send forth a ray of light, that the sun may have a path to walk¹: they have spread far and wide with their lights.

9. Accept, O Maruts, this my speech, this hymn of praise, O *R̥bhukshans*¹, this my call.

10. The *Prisni*¹ (the clouds) yielded three lakes (from their udders) as mead for the wielder of the thunderbolt (Indra), the well, the water-skin, the watering-pot².

11. O Maruts, whenever we call you from heaven, wishing for your favour, come hither towards us.

12. For you are bounteous¹, in our house, O Rudras, R̥bhukshans: you are attentive, when you enjoy (the libations).

13. O Maruts, bring to us from heaven enrapturing wealth, which nourishes many, which satisfies all.

14. When you have seen your way, brilliant Maruts, as it were from above¹ the mountains, you rejoice in the (Soma) drops which have been pressed out.

15. Let the mortal with his prayers ask the favour of that immense, unconquerable (host)¹ of them,

16. Who like torrents¹ foam along heaven and earth with their streams of rain, drawing the inexhaustible well.

17. These sons of Prisni rise up together with rattlings, with chariots, with the winds, and with songs of praise.

18. That (help) with which you helped Turvāsa, Yadu, and Kāṇva when he carried off riches, that we pray for, greatly for our wealth.

19. O bounteous Maruts, may these draughts, swelling like butter, strengthen you, together with the prayers of Kāṇva.

20. Where do you rejoice now, O bounteous Maruts, when an altar has been prepared for you? What priest serves you?

21. For you for whom we have prepared an altar, do not, as it was with you formerly, in return for these praises, gladden the companies of our sacrifice.

22. These Maruts have brought together piece by piece¹ the great waters, heaven and earth, the sun, and the thunderbolt;

23. And, while performing their manly work, they have trodden Vṛitra to pieces, and the dark mountains (clouds).

24. They protected the strength and intelligence of the fighting Trita, they protected Indra in his struggle with Vṛitra.

25. Holding lightnings in their hands, they hasten heavenward, golden helmets¹ are on their head; the brilliant Maruts have adorned themselves for beauty.

26. When with *Usanâ*² you have come from afar to Uksh̥norandhra (ox-hollow)¹, he roared from fear, like Dyu (the sky).

27. O gods, come to us with your golden-hoofed horses, for the offering of the sacrifice¹.

28. When the red leader leads their spotted deer in their chariot, the brilliant Maruts approach and let the waters run.

29. The heroes went downwards to Saryanâvat, to Sushoma, to Ârgika, to Pastyâvat.

30. When will you come hither, O Maruts, to the sage who calls you so, with your consolations to the suppliant?

31. What then now? Where are your friends, now that you have forsaken Indra? Who is counted in your friendship?

32. O Kâṇvas, I praise Agni, together with our Maruts, who carry the thunderbolt in their hands, and are armed with golden daggers.

33. Might I succeed in bringing hither the strong hunters, hither with their splendid booty for the newest blessings.

34. The hills even sink low, as if they thought themselves valleys, the mountains even bow themselves down.

35. The crossing (horses) bring them hither, flying through the air; they bestow strength on the man who praises them.

36. The old fire¹ has been born, like the shine² by the splendour of the sun, and the Maruts have spread far and wide with their lights.

NOTES.

Ascribed to Punarvatsa Kāṇva. Verse 8 occurs MS. IV, 12, 5; verse 11 in TS. I, 5, 11, 4; MS. IV, 10, 4; verse 28 in AV. XIII, 1, 21. Metre, Gāyatrī.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Trishṭúbham is an adjective belonging to ísham. The same expression occurs again, VIII, 69, 1, as a galita, and is therefore of little help. In IX, 62, 24, the íshaḥ are called parishṭúbhaḥ, which seems to mean something like paríśrut, i. e. standing round about. I therefore take trishṭubh in our passage simply as threefold, referring probably to the morning, noon, and evening sacrifice. The sacrifice is often called trivṛt, X, 52, 4; 124, 1. Some scholars ascribe to stubh in trishṭubh the meaning of liturgical shouting.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Besides ní ahâsata, we find úd ahâsata, I, 9, 4, and ápa ahâsata, IX, 73, 6. On ñi, see verse 14, and V, 55, 7. It is often impossible to say whether the Vedic Aorist should be translated in English by the perfect or the imperfect. If we take the verse as describing an historical fact, it would be, 'When you saw your way, or, as soon as you had seen your way, the clouds fell.' If it is meant as a repeated event, it would be, 'when, i. e. whenever you have seen your way, the clouds have fallen.' The difficulty lies in English, and though the grammars lay down rules, usage does not conform to them. The difference in the use of tenses in English is so great that in the revised version of the Bible, a number of passages had to be translated differently for the English and for the American public. Thus in Rom. ii. 12, the English edition gives, 'For as many as have sinned without law, shall perish without law.' The American edition changes this into 'As many as sinned without the law.' Gal. iii. 22, English: 'The scripture hath shut up;' American: 'The scripture shut up.' It was on account of this and other changes of idiom which have sprung up between English and American, that different editions of the revised version had actually to be printed for England and America. No wonder, therefore, that an American critic should in his innocence have charged me with not knowing the difference between the aorist, the imperfect, and the perfect in Vedic Sanskrit!

Verse 7.

Note 1. Arunapsu, perhaps reddish-coloured, an epithet of the dawn, here applied to the Maruts. The Maruts are sometimes called vrishapsu, ahrutapsu, I, 52, 4; VIII, 20, 7.

Verse 8.

Note 1. The relation between the light cast forth by the Maruts and the path of the sun is not quite clear, except that in other places also the Maruts are connected with the morning. The darkness preceding a thunderstorm may be identified with the darkness of the night, preceding the sunrise. See Bergaigne, II, 379 seq.

Verse 9.

Note 1. The meaning of ṛibhukshan is doubtful. It is applied to Indra and the Maruts. See Bergaigne, II, 403; 404 note; 412.

Verse 10.

Note 1. The *Prisni*s in the plural fem. are the clouds, see VIII, 6, 19. Mythologically there is but one Prisni, the mother of the Maruts. See also Bergaigne, II, 397.

Note 2. I am doubtful about the three lakes of Madhu, here of rain, poured from their udders by the clouds. The number three is common enough, and Ludwig has pointed out a parallel passage from the AV. X, 10, 10-12, where we read of three pâtras, filled with milk and Soma. Many similar passages have been collected by Bergaigne, I, 177, but again without a definite result. The question is whether the three words utsa, kavandha, and udrin are meant as names of the three pâtras, in our passage, of the three lakes, or whether they should be taken as an apposition, the three lakes, namely, the well (of the sky), the skin full of water, and udrin, the watering-pot. Udrin is elsewhere an adjective only, but I think we must here translate, 'the well, the water-skin, the watering-pot.'

Verse 12.

Note 1. On sudánavaḥ as vocative, see Delbrück, Syntax, p. 106.

Verse 14.

Note 1. For adhi with genitive, one expects ati. But Delbrück doubts whether ati can govern the genitive. See Altind. Syntax, p. 440.

Verse 15.

Note 1. As ádábhyaśya can only refer to etávataḥ, I have taken etávāt in the sense of gāṇa, followed by eśhām. But I am not certain that the rendering is right.

Verse 16.

Note 1. I have ventured to translate drapsáḥ by torrents. Neither drops nor sparks nor banners seem to yield an appropriate simile, but I feel very doubtful. See VIII, 96, 13; IX, 73, 1.

Verse 22.

Note 1. I thought at first that by sám parvasáḥ dadhuḥ was meant the mixing or confounding together of heaven and earth; it being impossible, during a storm, to distinguish the two. But there is clearly, as Ludwig points out, an opposition between sám dadhuḥ and ví yayuḥ. I therefore take parvasáḥ in verse 22 in the sense of piece by piece, as in AV. IV, 12, 7. sám dadhat párushā páruḥ, while in verse 23 it means in pieces.

Verse 25.

Note 1. On sipráḥ, see note to II, 34, 3.

Verse 26.

Note 1. Ukshnáḥ rándhram, 'the hollow of the bull,' whatever that may be, is not mentioned again. If it is meant for the dark cloud which hides the rain, then the roar of the bull would be the thunder of the cloud, stirred by the Maruts. Aukshnorandhra, however, is the technical name of certain Sâmans, so that Ukshnorandhra may have been, like Usanâ (later Usanas), a proper name. See Tândya Br. XIII, 9, 18; 19.

Note 2. If usânâ stands for usanayâ it might mean, 'with desire,' but it seems more likely that it refers to the Rishi, who is called Usanâ in the Rig-veda, and Usanas in later writings. See Lanman, p. 562, l. 21; Bergaigne, II, 338, n. 3; Schmidt, K. Z. XXVI, 402, n. 1.

Verse 27.

Note 1. On makhâsya dâvâne, see note to I, 6, 8, where I accepted the old explanation, 'Come to the offering of the priest.' But does makha mean priest? In later Sanskrit it means sacrifice, so that makhâsya dâvâne has been translated, 'for the offering of the sacrifice,' that is, 'that we may be able to offer you sacrifice.' If makha means glad and refers to Soma, which is doubtful, the sense would be the same. Possibly dâvâne may here be derived from do, to divide, but this would not help us much.

Verse 28.

The AV. reads yâm tvâ prîshatî râtî prâshîr vâhati rohita, subhâ yâsi rinânn apâh, which yields no help.

Verse 29.

This verse is very difficult. First of all, nîkâkrayâ can hardly mean 'without a chariot' (B.-R.), but seems an adverb, meaning downwards. But the chief difficulty lies in this, that we must decide, once for all, whether words, such as sushoma, saryavât, ârgîka, pastyâvat, &c., are to be interpreted in their natural sense, as expressing localities, well known to the poet, or in their technical sense, as names of sacrificial vessels. That this decision is by no means easy, may be inferred from the fact that two scholars, Roth and Ludwig, differ completely, the former preferring the technical, the latter the geographical meaning. We must remember that in the hymns to the Maruts the poets speak occasionally of the countries, far and near, visited by the storm-winds. We must also bear in mind that in our very passage the poet asks the Maruts to come to him, and not to tarry with other people. When, therefore, he says, that they went to Saryanâvat, &c., is that likely to be meant for a tank of Soma at his own or any other sacrifice?

Saryanâvat is derived from sarya, this from sara. Sara means reed, arrow; sarya, made of reeds, saryâ, an arrow, but also reeds tied together and used at the sacrifice for carrying Soma-oblations. From it, saryana, which, according to Sâyana, means lands in Kurukshetra (RV. VIII, 6, 39), and from which Saryanâvat is derived, as the name of a lake in that neighbourhood (not a Landstrich, B.-R.). When this saryanâvat occurs in the Rig-veda, the question is, does it mean that lake, evidently a famous lake and a holy place in the early settlements of the Vedic Âryas, or does it mean, as others suppose, a sacrificial vessel made of reeds? It occurs in the Rig-veda seven times.

In I, 84, 14, Indra is said to have found the head of the horse, which had been removed among the mountains (clouds) at Saryanâvat. This seems to me the lake in which the sun sets. In the 8th Mandala saryanâvat occurs three times. In VIII, 6, 39, Indra is invoked to rejoice at Saryanâvat, or, according to others, in a vessel full of Soma. In our passage the Maruts went to Saryanâvat, to Sushoma, Ârgîka, and Pastyâvat, countries, it would seem, not vessels. In VIII, 64, 11, after saying that the Soma had been prepared among the Pûrus, it is added that the Soma is sweetest in Saryanâvat, on the Sushomâ, and in Ârgîkiya. In IX, 65, 22, we read of Somas prepared far and near, and at Saryanâvat, and in the next verse we read of Somas to be found either among the Ârgîkas, among the Pastyâs, or among the Five Tribes. In IX, 113, 1; 2, Indra is asked to drink Soma at Saryanâvat, and the Soma is asked to come from Ârgîka. In X, 35, 2, the aid is implored of heaven and earth, of the rivers and the mountains, and these mountains are called saryanâvatah.

Ârgikiyâ, besides the three passages mentioned already, occurs X, 75, 5, where it is clearly a river as well as Sushomâ, while in IX, 65, 23, the Ârgikas, in the plural, could only be the name of a people.

Taking all this into account, it seems to me that we ought to accept the tradition that Saryanâvat was a lake and the adjoining district in Kurukshetra, that Ârgikâ was the name of a river, Ârgika the name of the adjoining country, Ârgikâh, of the inhabitants, Ârgikiyâ another name of Ârgikâ, the river, and Ârgikiyam another name of the country Ârgika. Sushoma in our passage is probably the name of the country near the Sushomâ, and Pastyâvat, though it might be an adjective meaning filled with hamlets, is probably another geographical name; see, however, IX, 65, 23. Ludwig takes Saryanâvat as a name of the Eastern Sarasvatî; see Zimmer, Altindisches Leben, p. 19; but we should expect Saryanâvatî as the name of a river. See also Bergaigne, I, 206, who, according to his system, takes all these names as 'préparateurs célestes du Soma.'

Verse 31.

See I, 38, 1, note 1.

Verse 36.

Note 1. Sâyana may be right in stating that this verse was intended for an Âgnimâruta sacrifice, and that therefore Agni was praised first, and afterwards the Maruts. In that case pûrvya might mean first.

Note 2. Khandas is doubtful; see, however, I, 92, 6.

MANDALA VIII, HYMN 20.

ASHTAKA VI, ADHYĀYA 1, VARGA 36-40.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Come hither, do not fail, when you march forward! Do not stay away, O united friends, you who can bend even what is firm.

2. O Maruts, R̥bhukshans, come hither on your flaming strong fellows¹, O Rudras, come to us to-day with food, you much-desired ones, come to the sacrifice, you friends of the Sobharis².

3. For we know indeed the terrible strength of the sons of Rudra, of the vigorous Maruts, the liberal givers¹ of Soma² (rain).

4. The islands (clouds) were scattered, but the monster remained¹, heaven and earth were joined together. O you who are armed with bright rings, the tracts (of the sky)² expanded, whenever you stir, radiant with your own splendour.

5. Even things that cannot be thrown down resound at your race, the mountains, the lord of the forest,—the earth quivers on your marches.

6. The upper sky makes wide room, to let your violence pass, O Maruts, when these strong-armed heroes display their energies in their own bodies.

7. According to their wont these men, exceeding terrible, impetuous, with strong and unbending forms¹, bring with them beautiful light².

8. The arrow of the Sobharis is shot from the bowstrings at the golden chest on the chariot of the Maruts¹. They, the kindred of the cow (Prisni), the well-born, should enjoy their food, the great ones should help us.

9. Bring forward, O strongly-anointed¹ (priests), your libations to the strong host of the Maruts, the strongly advancing.

10. O Maruts, O heroes, come quickly hither, like winged hawks, on your chariot with strong horses, of strong shape, with strong naves, to enjoy our libations.

11. Their anointing is the same, the golden chains shine on their arms, their spears sparkle.

12. These strong, manly, strong-armed Maruts, do not strive among themselves; firm are the bows, the weapons on your chariot, and on your faces are splendours.

13. They whose terrible name¹, wide-spreading like the ocean, is the one of all that is of use, whose strength is like the vigour of their father,

14. Worship these Maruts, and praise them! Of these shouters, as of moving spokes¹, no one is the last; this is theirs by gift, by greatness² is it theirs.

15. Happy is he who was under your protection, O Maruts, in former mornings, or who may be so even now.

16. Or he, O men, whose libations you went to enjoy; that mighty one, O shakers, will obtain your favours with brilliant riches and booty.

17. As the sons of Rudra, the servants of the divine Dyu¹, will it, O youths, so shall it be.

18. Whatever liberal givers may worship¹ the Maruts, and move about together as generous² benefactors, even from them turn³ towards us with a kinder heart, you youths!

19. O Sobhari, call loud with your newest song

[32]

n d

the young, strong, and pure Maruts, as the plougher calls the cows.

20. Worship the Maruts with a song, they who are strong like a boxer, called in to assist those who call ¹ for him in all fights; (worship them) the most glorious, like bright-shining bulls.

21. Yes, O united friends, kindred, O Maruts, by a common birth, the oxen lick one another's humps ¹.

22. O ye dancers, with golden ornaments on your chests, even a mortal comes (to ask) for your brotherhood ¹; take care of us, ye Maruts, for your friendship lasts for ever.

23. O bounteous Maruts, bring us some of your Marut-medicine, you friends, and (quick, like) steeds.

24. With the favours whereby you favour the Sindhu, whereby you save, whereby you help Krivi ¹, with those propitious favours be our delight, O delightful ones, ye who never hate your followers ².

25. O Maruts, for whom we have prepared good altars, whatever medicine ¹ there is on the Sindhu, on the Asikni, in the seas, on the mountains,

26. Seeing it, you carry it all on your bodies. Bless us with it! Down to the earth, O Maruts ¹, with what hurts our sick one,—straighten what is crooked!

NOTES.

Ascribed to Sobhari Kânva ; metre, Kâkubha pragâtha.
Verse 1 = SV. I, 401 ; verse 21 = SV. I, 404.

Verse 1.

SV. reads sthâta, and dridhâ kid yamayishnavah.

Verse 2.

Note 1. It might be better to supply rathaiḥ, but the poet may have used pars pro toto.

Note 2. The Sobharis, who are mentioned in the 8th Mandala only, are clearly a clan of that name, and their hymns form a small collection by itself. See Oldenberg, Prolegomena, p. 209 seq.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Milhvas is sometimes used by itself in the sense of patron or benefactor, VII, 86, 7 ; 97, 2. Whether it can govern a genitive is doubtful, but see VII, 58, 5, note.

Note 2. Here again, as in II, 34, 11, Vishnu esha seems to mean Soma, possibly the food, or even the seed (retas) of Vishnu. Sâyana too takes Vishnu as a name of rain. In I, 154, 5, we read that the spring of madhu is in the highest place of Vishnu. Could it mean the generous sons of Vishnu ?

Verse 4.

Note 1. My translation is purely conjectural. I take dvipa for isolated or scattered clouds, different from the dukkhunâ, which I take for the black mass of storm-clouds, threatening destruction. Grassmann : 'Die Wolkeninseln stoben und das Unheil floh.' Ludwig : 'Empor stiegen gewaltig die waszerinseln, still stand das unglück.'

Note 2. The coming together of heaven and earth and their apparent widening have been ascribed to the Maruts before. It seems hardly possible to translate dhanvâni here by bows. I take it for the wide expanse, as if the desert, of the sky.

Verse 7.

Note 1. On psu in vṛishapsu, see note to VIII, 7, 7.

Note 2. Possibly srīyam vāhante has to be taken like subham yā, see Gaedicke, Accusativ, p. 163.

Verse 8.

Note 1. In support of the translation which I proposed in I, 85, 10, note 2, all I can say is that ag is a verb used for shooting forth an arrow, see I, 112, 16, and that vāna may be used in the sense of bāna, reed and arrow, and that go is used for bowstring, see B.-R. s.v. The question, however, arises, how does this verse come in here? How does the fact that the Sobharis, who are praising the storm-gods, shoot their arrow at the golden chest on their chariot, agree with what precedes and follows?

Let us look first whether a more natural translation can be found. B.-R. translate: 'The sacrificial music of the Sobharis is furnished and therefore made more attractive by draughts of milk (or animal food).' In order to support such a translation, it should be proved, first, that vāna ever means sacrificial music, and that such sacrificial music can be spoken of as agyate (it is furnished), gobhiḥ (by milk-draughts). Grassmann translates: 'Durch Milchtrank wird der Sobharis Musik belohnt.' Here again it must be proved that vāna can mean sacrificial music, and agyate, it is rewarded. Ludwig translates: 'Mit der milch wird gesalbt den Sobhari der zapfen am wagen am goldnen korbe.' This is explained to mean that 'the bolt on the chariot of the Maruts is to be greased with milk, so that the milk may stream down on the Sobharis.' I doubt whether vāna can mean bolt, and I do not see that the intention of the poet, namely to ask for rain, would be conveyed by such words.

Sâyana interprets: 'Through the cows, i. e. the hymns, of the Sobharis the lyre of the Maruts is made evident;' or, 'by the cows, i. e. the Maruts, the lyre is manifested for the sake of the Sobharis.'

In support of my own translation I can only appeal to a custom ascribed by Herodotus (IV, 94) to another ancient Aryan tribe, namely the Thracians, who, when there is thunder and lightning, shoot arrows against the sky. Herodotus in trying to find a motive for this says they do it to threaten the god, because they believe in no other god but their own. This may be so; the only question is whether in shooting their arrows against the sky, they hoped to drive the clouds away, or wished them to give up their treasure, namely the rain. I should feel inclined to take the latter view, but in either case we see that what the Thracians did, was exactly what the Sobharis are said to do here, namely to shoot an arrow at the golden chest or treasure on the chariot of the Maruts. This is, of course, no more than a conjecture, and I shall gladly give it up, if a more appropriate meaning can be elicited from this line. What is against it is the frequent occurrence of aṅg with gobhiḥ in the sense of covering with milk, see IX, 45, 3; V, 3, 2, &c. As to rátke kóse hiranyáye, see VIII, 22, 9.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Vrishad-aṅgayak for vrishan-aṅgayak, see J. Schmidt, K. Z. XXVI, 358. It cannot mean 'raining down ointments,' as Grassmann supposes, because that would be varshad-aṅgayak, if it existed at all. Besides, the aṅgis are never poured down, nor are they sacrificial viands. The repetition of the word vrishan is intentional, and has been discussed before.

Verse 13.

Note 1. Nāman is, of course, more than the mere name; but name can be used in much the same sense.

Verse 14.

Note 1. The simile of the aras, as in V, 58, 5, seems to require another negative.

Note 2. See V, 87, 2, on dānā and mahnā.

Verse 17.

Note 1. On diváh ásurasya vedhásak, see von Bradke, Dyaus Asura, pp. 44 and 46. It should be remembered, however, that vedhas and medhas interchange. Thus in RV. IX, 102, 4, we have vedhām, in SV. I, 101, medhām. On medhās, the Zend mazdā, see Darmesteter, Ormazd, p. 29. I take servant in the sense of worshipper, from vidh.

Verse 18.

Note 1. Arhanti, in the sense of arhayanti, to worship, seems better than to be worthy of, or to have a right to.

Note 2. Mil'kúshaḥ can be nominative, see Lanman, p. 511; but it may also refer to the Maruts, and then be accusative.

Note 3. Instead of ā vavridhvam, which Ludwig translates, Nemt uns für euch in besitz, Grassmann translates, Wendet euch zu uns her. He read therefore ā vavridhvam, and this, the plural corresponding to ā vavritsya, seems to be the right reading.

Verse 20.

Note 1. Grassmann proposes to change pritsú hótṛishu into yutsú pritsúshu. But may not hótṛishu be used here in a sense corresponding to that of hávya? Hávya has almost the technical meaning of an ally who is to be called for assistance. Thus IV, 24, 2. sáh vrītrahátye hávyah; VII, 32, 24. bháre-bhare ka hávyah, &c. Now a hávyaḥ, one who is called, presupposes a hótṛi, one who calls for assistance. It is true that hotṛi, from hu, to pour out, has so completely become a technical name that it seems strange to see it used here, in a new etymological sense, as caller. But the connection with havya may justify what may have been meant as a play on the words. Wilson seems to have taken the verse in a similar sense, when he translates: 'and like a boxer who has been challenged over his challengers.' He, like Ludwig, takes hotṛi as a challenger. I prefer to take it as calling for aid. I am not satisfied, however, with either translation, nor does Grassmann or Ludwig offer anything useful.

Verse 21.

Note 1. In the SV. marútaḥ and riháte have the accent on the second syllable. Sábandhavaḥ was used before of the Maruts, V, 59, 5; according to its accent it would here refer to gávaḥ. I can see no meaning in this verse except a very naturalistic one, namely that the Maruts, who are described as friends and brothers, as never quarrelling and always of one mind, are here compared to oxen, grazing in the same field, and so far from fighting, actually licking the humps on each other's backs.

Verse 22.

Note 1. Grassmann, 'geht euch an um eure Brüderschaft;' possibly, 'becomes your brother.'

Verse 24.

Note 1. It is, no doubt, very tempting to change tūrvatha into turvāsam, as Ludwig proposes. The difficulty is to understand how such a change should have come about. Sindhu may mean here, not so much the river, as the people living on its shores. Krivi is said to be an old name of the Pañkālas (Sat. Br. XIII, 5, 4, 7). But, because the Pañkālas were called Krivis, and because in later times we often hear of Kuru-Pañkālas, it does in no way follow that the Krivis were identical with the Kurus. It proves rather the contrary. Kuru may be derived from kar, and may have meant active, but it may also have had a very different original meaning. A derivation of krivi from kar is still more objectionable.

Note 2. Asaḥadvishaḥ, which I translate by not hating your followers, is translated by Ludwig: 'ihr, denen kein haszer folgt.' It may also be rendered by 'hating those who do not follow you.'

Verse 25.

Note 1. The medicines are generally brought by Rudra, and by his sons, the Maruts.

Verse 26.

Note 1. As to kshamá rápaḥ, see X, 59, 8-10; AV. VI, 57, 3; as to íshkarta, VIII, 1, 12.

MANDALA VIII, HYMN 94.

ASHTAKA VI, ADHYÂYA 6, VARGA 28-29.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. The cow, wishing for glory, the mother of the bounteous Maruts, sends forth her milk; the two horses¹ have been harnessed to the chariots,—

2. She in whose lap¹ all gods observe their duties, sun and moon (also), that they may be seen;

3. Therefore all our friends¹, the singers, invite the Maruts always, to drink (our) Soma.

4. This Soma here has been prepared, the Maruts drink of it, the Asvins also drink of the lord (Soma)¹.

5. Mitra, Aryaman, Varuṇa drink of the Soma which is continually¹ clarified, dwelling in three abodes², procuring offspring.

6. May Indra also rejoice to his satisfaction in this pressed juice, mixed with milk, like a Hotri¹ at the morning-sacrifice.

7. Did the brilliant lords flare up? Endowed with pure strength they rush, like water, through their enemies.

8. Shall I now choose the favour of you, the great gods, who by yourselves shine forth marvellously,

9. The Maruts, who, when going to drink Soma, spread out the whole earth and the lights of heaven.

10. I call now them who are endowed with pure strength, you, O Maruts, from heaven, that you may drink the Soma here;

11. I call now those Maruts who hold heaven and earth asunder, that they may drink the Soma here ;

12. I call now that manly company of the Maruts, dwelling in the mountains, that they may drink the Soma here.

NOTES.

Ascribed to Bindu or Pūṭadakṣha. Metre, Gāyatrī. Verse 1=SV. I, 149; verse 4=SV. I, 174; II, 1135; verse 5=SV. II, 1136; verse 6=SV. II, 1137. The whole hymn can easily be divided into trikas.

Verse 1.

Note 1. I adopt Ludwig's correction of the Pada, changing váhniḥ to váhni iti, though it interrupts somewhat the connection between the first and second verses. Still it seems as impossible to change Prisni, the mother of the Maruts, into a cart-horse as into a sucking-calf. This we should have to do, if we took dhayati in its usual sense of sucking. Still dhayati means to suck, not to suckle. The commentary to the SV. explains vahniḥ as vodhrī, the driver.

Verse 2.

Note 1. I should prefer to take upásthe in the sense of proximity, which, as in the case of vṛikshopasthe, may be translated by shadow, or protection.

Verse 3.

Note 1. I cannot believe that we can take aryá ā in our passage as aryé ā, and translate it with Pischel (Z. D. M. G. XL, p. 125) by 'our singers among the Aryas.' With the plural kārávaḥ we should expect aryéshu ā, not aryé ā; see also Bergaigne, III, 287; II, 218. Pāda a and b are galita, see VI, 45, 33.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Svarāg seems to be meant for Soma as lord, not as brilliant.

Verse 5.

Note 1. Tánā is generally explained by ūrṇāstukanirmita daśāpavitra; see also Bergaigne, I, 179.

Note 2. The three abodes are either the morning, noon, and evening sacrifices, or the three Soma-vessels, the Dronakalasa, Ādhavanīya, and Pūtabhrīt.

Verse 6.

Note 1. I do not see why hótā-iva should not mean 'like the priest,' for the priest also rejoices in the libation; see Arthasaṃgraha, ed. Thibaut, pp. 10 and 20. Ludwig prefers to take hótā for Agni, fire.

Verse 9.

Note 1. See note to I, 6, 9, and 10, note 1.

MANDALA X, HYMN 77.

ASHṬAKA VIII, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 10-11.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Let me with my voice shower¹ wealth like cloud-showers², like sacrifices of a sage, rich in oblations. I have praised the goodly host of the Maruts³, so that they may be worthy of a Brahman⁴, so that they may be glorious.

2. These boys have prepared their ornaments for beauty, the goodly host of the Maruts, through many nights; the sons of Dyu struggled, like harts, they, the Âdityas, grew high, like banners¹.

3. They who by their own might seem to have risen above heaven and earth, like the sun above the cloud, they are glorious, like brilliant heroes, they shine forth like foe-destroying youths.

4. When you move along on the bottom of the waters, the earth seems to break and to melt¹. This perfect sacrifice is meet for you, come hither together, as if enjoying our offerings.

5. You are as drivers¹ on the poles with their reins, and as brilliant with light at daybreak; like hawks, you are famous destroyers of foes; like wells² springing forth, you scatter moisture.

6. When you, O Maruts, come from afar, knowing the great treasure of the hidden place, O Vasus, the treasure which has to be gained, then keep away also from afar all who hate us.

7. The man who, firm in his sacrifice, offers gifts to the Maruts to the end of the ceremony¹, he gains health and wealth, blessed with offspring ; he shall also be in the keeping of the gods.

8. They are indeed our guardians, to be worshipped at all sacrifices, most blissful by their name of Ādityas ; may they, swiftly driving on their chariots, protect our prayer, quick even on their march, delighting in our sacrifice.

NOTES.

Ascribed to Syûmarasmi Bhârgava. On the metre, see Rig-veda, translation, Introd. p. civ; Benfey, Quantitätsversch. IV, 2; 38-39; Oldenberg, Prolegomena, 92. This hymn and the next belong closely together. They are both so artificial and obscure that a translation of them can only be tentative. None of its verses occurs in SV., VS., AV., TS., TB., MS.

Verse 1.

Note 1. I take prushâ for prushâni.

Note 2. I do not think that abhraprúshaḥ can be meant for the Maruts.

Note 3. The ná in many of the verses seems to be due to a mere trick, and untranslatable.

Note 4. Or, 'I have praised the priestly host, so that they may be worthy of good Marut-hood.'

Verse 2.

Note 1. Akrâḥ, banners, Grassmann; columns, Ludwig. The meaning is utterly unknown.

Verse 4.

Note 1. See Aurel Mayr, Beiträge aus dem Rig-Veda, p. 12. 'The earth melted,' see Ps. xlv. 6.

Verse 5.

Note 1. Prayug seems to mean here a driver; pra-yug is often used of the Maruts as harnessing or driving their horses; see I, 85, 5; V, 52, 8.

Note 2. Prava has been derived from pru, to float. I should prefer to derive it from pra-van, from which we have pra-vana, precipice, possibly the Latin adjective pronus, and, very irregularly, Greek πρηνής. Stems in radical n frequently enter the class of stems in â and a, and pravan would become pravâḥ or pravaḥ, as -gan becomes -gâḥ and -gaḥ; cf. Lanman, p. 478. Others take vana for a mere suffix like vat. Prava, rushing forward, would have been a good name for a spring. This, of course, is a mere conjecture. Others derive pravâ-s from vâ, to blow. As a substantive pravâ as well as upavâ occurs AV. XII, 1, 51. vâtasya pravâm upavâm ânu vâty arêh. But these words mean the blowing before and the blowing after, and not blowers. There are the verbs pravâ and anuvâ in Tândya Br. I, 9, 7; TS. III, 5, 2, 3; IV, 4, 1, 1. They are there referred to dawn and night. These passages, however, seem too technical to allow us to fix the original meaning of prava-h. Pravâ in RV. I, 34, 8, remains unexplained.

Verse 7.

Note 1. On udrîki, see Ludwig's note.

MANDALA X, HYMN 78.

ASHTAKA VIII, ADHYĀYA 3, VARGA 12-13.

TO THE MARUTS (THE STORM-GODS).

1. Full of devotion like priests with their prayers, wealthy like pious men, who please the gods with their offerings, beautiful to behold like brilliant kings, without a blemish like the youths of our hamlets—

2. They who are gold-breasted like Agni with his splendour, quick to help like self-harnessed winds, good leaders like the oldest experts, they are to the righteous man like Somas, that yield the best protection.

3. They who are roaring and hasting like winds, brilliant like the tongues of fires, powerful like mailed soldiers, full of blessings like the prayers of our fathers,

4. Who hold together like the spokes of chariot-wheels, who glance forward like victorious heroes, who scatter *ghṛita*¹ like wooing youths, who chant beautifully like singers, intoning a hymn of praise,

5. Who are swift like the best of horses, who are bounteous like lords of chariots on a suit, who are hastening on like water with downward floods, who are like the manifold¹ Āngiras with their (numerous) songs.

6. These noble sons of *Sindhu*¹ are like grinding-stones, they are always like Soma-stones², tearing everything to pieces; these sons of a good mother are like playful children, they are by their glare like a great troop on its march.

7. Illumining the sacrifice¹ like the rays of the dawn, they shone forth in their ornaments like triumphant warriors; the Maruts with bright spears seem like running rivers, from afar they measure many miles.

8. O gods, make us happy and rich, prospering us, your praisers, O Maruts! Remember our praise and our friendship, for from of old there are always with you gifts of treasures.

NOTES.

Ascribed to Syûmarasmi Bhârgava. None of its verses occurs elsewhere. Metre, 1, 3, 4, 8 Trishtubh; 2, 5-7 Gagatî.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Ghr̥itaprush, Fett sprühend, Gluth austheilend, according to Grassmann; gh̥r̥ita-sprühend, according to Ludwig. Sâyaṇa takes vareyávaḥ as wishing to give presents, and explains that such gifts were preceded by a gift of water, so that gh̥r̥itaprúshaḥ would mean, giving water or rain. The real meaning is difficult.

Verse 5.

Note 1. Visvarûpa may have been meant in a more special and mythological sense.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Sîndhu-mâtaraḥ may be a synonym of Prisni-mâtaraḥ, sindhu being used as a name of the water in the sky. It may also mean, having the river Sindhu for their mother, i. e. coming from the region of the river. Bergaigne translates (II, 397), 'qui ont pour mère la rivière céleste. Cette rivière peut être une des formes de la vache qui passe aussi pour leur mère.'

Note 2. The grāvānaḥ and ádrayaḥ are probably meant for stones used for pounding corn and squeezing Soma.

Verse 7.

Note 1. On adhvarasrî, see Pischel, Ved. Stud. p. 53.

MANDALA I, HYMN 43.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYÂYA 3, VARGA 26-27.

TO RUDRA.

1. What could we say to Rudra, the wise, the most liberal, the most powerful, that is most welcome to his heart,—

2. So that Aditi¹ may bring Rudra's healing to the cattle, to men, to cow, and kith,

3. So that Mitra, that Varuna, that Rudra hear us, and all the united Maruts¹.

4. We implore Rudra, the lord of songs, the lord of animal sacrifices¹, the possessor of healing medicines², for health, wealth³, and his favour.

5. He who shines like the bright sun, and like gold, who is the best Vasu among the gods,

6. May he bring health to our horse, welfare to ram and ewe, to men, to women, and to the cow !

7. Bestow on us, O Soma, the happiness of a hundred men, great glory of strong manhood¹;

8. O Soma¹, let not those who harass and injure overthrow us; O Indu, help us to booty !

9. Whatever beings are thine, the immortal, in the highest place of the law, on its summit¹, in its centre, O Soma, cherish them, remember them who honour thee.

NOTES.

Ascribed to Kanva Ghaura, and addressed to Rudra (1, 2, 4-6), to Rudra and Mitrâ-Varunau (3), and to Soma (7-9). Metre, Gâyatrî (1-8); Anushtubh (9). Verse 2 in TS. III, 4, 11, 2; MS. IV, 12, 6.

The hymn may be divided into two, the first from 1-6, the second from 7-9. See, however, Bergaigne, III, 32, n. 1; and Recherches sur l'hist. de la Samhitâ, I, 65. He would prefer to divide the whole into three hymns.

Verse 1.

See TÂ. X, 17, 1; Delbrück, Synt. Forsch. I, 246.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Ludwig takes Aditi here as a name of Rudra; also Hillebrandt, Über die Göttin Aditi, p. 6.

Verse 3.

Note 1. The visve sagóshasaḥ, following on Rudra, can hardly be meant for any but the Maruts, who are often called sagóshasaḥ. But it may also have been intended for all the gods together.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Gâthápatim and medhápatim are both difficult. We expect gâthápatim and medhápatim. If, as Ludwig maintains, gâtha in Zend is equivalent to ritu, season, then gâthapati might be ritupati, a name of Agni, X, 2, 1. But this is extremely doubtful. We must derive gâthápati from gâthā, I, 167, 6, and medhápati from medhā, animal sacrifice, till we know more on the subject.

Note 2. Gálâsha-bheshagam, an epithet of Rudra; see VIII, 29, 5, where Rudra is intended. In II, 33, 7, the arm of Rudra is called bheshagáh gálâshaḥ; in VII, 35, 6, Rudra himself is called gálâshaḥ. Gálâsha seems connected with gala, water. Bergaigne, III, 32, translates it by adoucissant.

Note 3. On samyóḥ, see note 2 to I, 165, 4.

Verse 7.

Note 1. Tuvi-nr̥im̐na would seem more appropriate as a vocative. In verse 8, too, I should prefer to take Soma as a vocative, like Benfey and Grassmann.

Verse 8.

Note 1. I read Soma, paribádhaḥ. See Delbrück, Synt. Forsch. p. 116.

Verse 9.

Note 1. Unless we can take mûrdhá for a locative, attracted by nábhā, I should propose to read mûrdhán nábhā. It can hardly be an adverbial Dvandva, mûrdhá-nábhā, nor do I see how it can be applied as a nominative to Rudra. The whole verse is difficult, possibly a later addition. On ritásya amṛtasya dhāman, see IX, 97, 32 ; 110, 4 (dhárman).

MANDALA I, HYMN 114.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYĀYA 8, VARGA 5-6.

TO RUDRA.

1. We offer these prayers¹ to Rudra, the strong, whose hair is braided², who rules over heroes³, that he may be a blessing to man and beast, that everything in this our village may be prosperous and free from disease.

2. Be gracious to us, O Rudra, and give us joy, and we shall honour thee, the ruler of heroes, with worship. What health and wealth father Manu acquired by his sacrifices, may we obtain the same, O Rudra, under thy guidance.

3. O bounteous Rudra, may we by sacrifice obtain the goodwill of thee, the ruler of heroes; come to our clans, well-disposed, and, with unharmed men, we shall offer our libation to thee.

4. We call down for our help the fierce Rudra, who fulfils our sacrifice, the swift, the wise; may he drive far away from us the anger of the gods; we desire his goodwill only.

5. We call down with worship the red boar of the sky, the god with braided hair, the blazing form; may he who carries in his hand the best medicines grant us protection, shield, and shelter!

6. This speech is spoken for the father of the Maruts, sweeter than sweet, a joy¹ to Rudra; grant to us also, O immortal, the food of mortals, be gracious to us and to our kith and kin!

7. Do not slay our great or our small ones, our growing or our grown ones, our father or our mother, and do not hurt our own¹ bodies, O Rudra!

8. O Rudra, hurt us not in our kith and kin, nor in our own life, not in our cows, nor in our horses! Do not slay our men in thy wrath: carrying libations, we call on thee always.

9. Like a shepherd¹, I have driven these praises near to thee; O father of the Maruts, grant us thy favour! For thy goodwill is auspicious, and most gracious, hence we desire thy protection alone.

10. Let thy cow-slaying and thy man-slaying be far away¹, and let thy favour be with us, O ruler of heroes! Be gracious to us, and bless us, O god, and then give us twofold protection².

11. We have uttered our supplication to him, desiring his help; may Rudra with the Maruts hear our call. May Mitra, Varuna, Aditi, the River, Earth, and the Sky grant us this!

NOTES.

Ascribed to Kutsa Ângirasa. Metre, 1-9 Gagatî; 10, 11 Trishubh. Verse 1=VS. XVI, 48; TS. IV, 5, 10, 1; MS. II, 9, 9 (yáthâ nah sám); verse 2=TS. IV, 5, 10, 2; verse 7=VS. XVI, 15; TS. IV, 5, 10, 2; verse 8=VS. XVI, 16; TS. III, 4, 11, 2; IV, 5, 10, 3; MS. IV, 12, 6 (áyushi; havishmanto námasâ vidhema te); verse 10=TS. IV, 5, 10, 3.

Verse 1.

Note 1. TS. reads imám matím, and yáthâ nah sám.

Note 2. Kapardin is an epithet not only of Rudra, but also of Pûshan (VI, 55, 2; IX, 67, 11), and of a Vedic clan, the Trîtsus (VII, 83, 8) or Vasishthas; see Roth, Zur Literatur und Geschichte des Weda, pp. 94 seq.; Oldenberg, Z.D.M.G. XLII, p. 207. Kaparda is the name of a shell, and the hair twisted together in the form of a shell seems to have suggested the name of kapardin.

Note 3. Kshayád-vîra means 'ruling over heroes,' just as mandád-vîra (VIII, 69, 1) means 'delighting heroes.' This meaning is applicable to all passages where kshayád-vîra occurs, and there is no reason why we should translate it by 'destroyer of heroes,' which can hardly be considered as an epitheton ornans. No doubt, a god who rules and protects can also be conceived as punishing and destroying, and this is particularly the case with Rudra. Hence in certain passages Rudra may well be invoked as nrîhán (IV 3, 6), just as we read of the Maruts (VII, 56, 17): 'May that bolt of yours which kills cattle and men be far from us! Incline to us, O Vasu, with your favours!' See Muir, S.T. IV, p. 301, note.

Verse 2.

TS. reads áyagé and pránîtau. See Ludwig, Notes, p. 265.

Verse 6.

Note 1. On the meaning of vardhana and vridh in Zend, see Darmesteter, Ormazd, pp. 41, 6; 92, 1.

Verse 7.

Note 1. TS. reads priyá má nas tanúvaḥ rudra rīriṣaḥ. Priya, dear, used like φίλος, in the sense of our own. See Bergaigne, III, 152.

Verse 8.

See Colebrooke, Misc. Ess. I, p. 141 (ed. 1837); and Svetāsvat. Up. in S. B. E. XV, p. 254, note. Āyushi for āyaú is supported by VS. and TS. I propose to read āyau for āyaú. Bhāmitáḥ is supported by TS. and Svet. Up., while VS. reads bhāmīnaḥ, which Mahidhara refers to virān. The last line is the same in RV. and VS., but the TS. reads havīshmanto námasā vidhema te, while the Svet. Up. reads havishmantaḥ sadasi tvā havāmahe.

Verse 9.

Note 1. As to the simile, see RV. X, 127, 8, and Muir S. T. IV, p. 304, note.

Verse 10.

Note 1. TS. reads ārāt te, goghná (°é), purushaghné, kshayádvirāya, rákshā for mṛiṣā, deva brūhi.

Note 2. I take dvibárhāḥ, which stands for dvibárhaḥ, as an adjective to sárma, or possibly as an adverb, see Lanman, p. 560. It can hardly refer to Rudra, as Grassmann supposes. See J. Schmidt, Pluralbildungen der Neutra, pp. 132 seq.

MANDALA II, HYMN 33.

ASHTAKA II, ADHYĀYA 7, VARGA 16-18.

TO RUDRA, THE FATHER OF THE MARUTS
(THE STORM-GODS).

1. O father of the Maruts, let thy favour come near, and do not deprive us of the sight of the sun ; may the hero (Rudra) be gracious to our horse¹, and may we increase in offspring, O Rudra !

2. May I attain to a hundred winters through the most blissful medicines which thou hast given ! Put away far¹ from us all hatred, put away anguish, put away sicknesses in all directions !

3. In beauty thou art the most beautiful of all that exists, O Rudra, the strongest of the strong, thou wielder of the thunderbolt ! Carry us happily to the other shore of our anguish, and ward off all assaults of mischief¹.

4. Let us not incense thee, O Rudra, by our worship, not by bad praise, O hero, and not by divided praise ! Raise up our men by thy medicines, for I hear thou art the best of all physicians.

5. He who is invoked¹ by invocations and libations, may I pay off² that Rudra with my hymns of praise. Let not him who is kind-hearted³, who readily hears our call, the tawny, with beautiful cheeks, deliver us to this wrath !

6. The manly hero with the Maruts has gladdened me, the suppliant, with more vigorous health. May I without mischief find shade, as if from sunshine¹, may I gain the favour of Rudra !

7. O Rudra, where is thy softly stroking hand which cures and relieves¹? Thou, the remover of all heaven-sent mischief, wilt thou, O strong hero, bear with me?

8. I send forth a great, great hymn of praise to the bright tawny bull. Let me reverence¹ the fiery god² with prostrations; we celebrate the flaring name³ of Rudra.

9. He, the fierce god, with strong limbs, assuming many forms, the tawny Rudra, decked himself with brilliant golden ornaments. From Rudra, who is lord of this wide world, divine power¹ will never depart.

10. Worthily thou bearest arrows and bow, worthily, O worshipful¹, the golden, variegated chain; worthily thou cuttest every fiend² here to pieces, for there is nothing indeed stronger than thou, O Rudra.

11. Praise him, the famous, sitting in his chariot¹, the youthful, who is fierce and attacks like a terrible wild beast² (the lion). And when thou hast been praised, O Rudra, be gracious to him who magnifies thee, and let thy armies³ mow down others than us!

12. O Rudra, a boy indeed makes obeisance to his father who comes to greet him¹: I praise the lord of brave men, the giver of many gifts, and thou, when thou hast been praised, wilt give us thy medicines.

13. O Maruts, those pure medicines of yours, the most beneficent and delightful, O heroes, those which Manu¹, our father, chose, those I crave from Rudra, as health and wealth.

14. May the weapon of Rudra avoid us¹, may the great anger of the flaring one pass us by.

Unstring thy strong bows² for the sake of our liberal lords, O bounteous Rudra, be gracious to our kith and kin.

15. Thus, O tawny and manly god, showing thyself¹, so as neither to be angry nor to kill, be mindful of our invocations², and, rich in brave sons, we shall magnify thee in the congregation.

NOTES.

Ascribed to Gṛītsamada. Metre, Trishṭubh. See Muir, S. T. IV, 309; Geldner and Kaegi, p. 90. Bergaigne, III, 153; Leop. v. Schroeder, Indiens Literatur und Cultur, 343. Verse 1=TB. II, 8, 6, 9; verse 2=TB. II, 8, 6, 8; verse 10=TĀ. IV, 5, 7; verse 11=TS. IV, 5, 10, 3; AV. XVIII, 1, 40; verse 14=VS. XVI, 50; TS. IV, 5, 10, 4; verse 15=TB. II, 8, 6, 9.

Verse 1.

Note 1. The words abhi naḥ vīráḥ árvati kshameta admit of different interpretation. Grassmann has: 'Der Held sei huldreich unsren schnellen Rossen;' Muir: 'May the hero spare our horses;' Ludwig: 'Unser held möge tüchtig zu Rosse sein.' The passages quoted by Ludwig from the Sat. Br. III, 7, 3, 1, and IV, 3, 4, 14, do not bear out the meaning of tüchtig sein, to be strong, they rather mean, to suffer, to submit to, with a dative. Yet vīráḥ by itself may mean son or offspring (III, 4, 9; VII, 1, 21; 56, 24), and if abhi-ksham in our passage could mean to be capable and strong, Ludwig's translation would be justified. But if we take vīrá, hero, as intended for Rudra, as Indra also is often called simply vīra, abhi kshameta would lend itself to the translation of 'to be gracious,' or 'to spare,' and I therefore translate: 'May the hero (Rudra) be gracious to our horse.' It should be understood in the same sense in verse 7, at least I see no reason to vary the translation as Geldner does, and also Ludwig, while Muir is right and consistent. Our poet uses the verb abhiksham frequently, II, 28, 3; 29, 2 (abhikshantāraḥ?). It seems confined to the second Mandala.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Vitarám, wherever it occurs, is always joined with vī in the Rig-veda.

Verse 3.

Note 1. If rāpas is derived from rap, to whisper, it would have meant originally what is whispered, that is, slander, accusation, and then only crime. Latin crimen also meant originally what is heard, Leumund. Crimen is not connected with the Greek κρίνω. The î in crimen has to be accounted for like the î in liber, from lubh (libh). The r is irregular, unless we find an analogy in increpare.

Verse 5.

Note 1. Hávate, we expect húyáte. Ludwig's explanation has not solved the difficulty, and suhávaḥ points back to yo havate. Oldenberg suggests an anacoluthon, He who invokes—may I.

Note 2. I formerly took áva dishīya in the sense of 'to unloose,' used originally with reference to tethered horses. As horses are unloosed before they can do their work, so the gods are, as it were, unloosed by prayer, or set off, so that they may fulfil what they are asked to do; see RV. I, 25, 3. In the passage quoted by Ludwig from the TS. I, 8, 6, 2, the same meaning seemed quite appropriate: áva Rudrám adimahi—yáthā naḥ sréyasaḥ kárat, 'We unloosed Rudra, that he might make us happier.' Ludwig takes it to mean, 'We have bound, tied, or obliged Rudra, so that he make us happy,' but the preposition ava is against this interpretation. Muir proposes 'to avert' or 'to propitiate,' the latter being adopted by Geldner.

However, in an article lately published by Roth on Wergeld in the Veda (Z.D.M.G. XLI, 672), ava-day has been recognised as an almost technical legal term, meaning 'to pay off, to compound.' Thus, Tândya Br. XVI, 1, 12, we read yâḥ satam vairam tad devân avadayate, 'He portions off, i.e. he satisfies, or pacifies, the gods who were offended, by giving a hundred cows.' With niḥ, we find TB. I, 6, 10, 1. pragâ rudrân nîr áva dayate; the same occurs in Maitr. S. I, 10, 20, where we also read, grîheshv eva Rudram nir ava dayata esha te Rudra bhâgas. See also Ait. Br. II, 7, 1. There is a verse quoted, ávâmba Rudrám adimahi, in TS. I, 8, 6, 2; and again in MS. I, 10, 4; Kāth. IX, 7; Kap. S. VIII, 10; VS. III, 58, and this gives us the right key to our verse, namely, 'May I pay off, may I pacify, Rudra with my songs of praise,' dishîya being the optat. of the aorist, adimahi the aor. ind.

Note 3. On ridûdārah, see Benfey, Quantitätsversch. V, 1; p. 25; Geldner, K.Z. XXVIII, 201; Ludwig, Süsses in seinem bauche habend; Bergaigne, miséricordieux. The meaning is doubtful.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Ghrîṇīva, divided into ghrîṇi-iva, is a difficult form. Various attempts have been made to explain it. Grassmann translates: 'Wie Schatten von der Gluth mög unverseht ich des Rudra Huld erreichen,' preferring to write ghrîner va. Ludwig, in his notes: 'Bei hitze,' taking ghrîṇi as a locative. Muir: 'Shade in the heat.' Geldner: 'Vor Sonnengluth den Schatten,' taking ghrîṇi as an instrumental. Lanman (p. 379) takes the same view, though he admits that this would be the only example of an instrumental in the masculine, contracted to i. He translates: 'As by the heat unharmed, to shelter bring me.' He adds: 'It may be ablative with elision and crasis,' and this is likewise Roth's view. Weber thinks that we may retain ghrîṇīva in the Samhitā text, but should divide it into ghrîṇi-iva, 'like a man suffering from heat' (Ind. Stud. XIII, p. 58). I think we must take into account a parallel passage, VI, 16, 38. ûpa khâyām iva ghrîṇeh āganma sārma te vayām, see M.M., Preface to translation of Rig-veda, p. cxliii. Probably the apparent irregularity of the metre led to the change of ghrîner iva to ghrîṇīva, but ghrîner iva can be scanned $\cup - \cup$; see M.M., l. c., p. cxlviii.

Verse 7.

Note 1. Gālāsha by itself occurs but once more as an epithet of Rudra, VII, 35, 6, and twice in composition, gālāshabheshaga; see I, 43, 4. The second pāda begins with hāstak.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Namasyá is difficult, but we can hardly take it for namasyámasi, masi being supplied from grinimasi. Nor do we gain by taking namasyá for an instrumental. Perhaps it is best to take it as a 1st pers. of the imperative.

Note 2. The meaning of kalmalikin is unknown.

Note 3. I think it is best to translate náma by name, though, no doubt, it implies more than the mere name. Geldner's 'majestätisch Wesen' is right, but it is only one side of náma. See VIII, 20, 13, note 1.

Verse 9.

Note 1. On vai, see Delbrück, Syntax, p. 483. On asurya, see von Bradke, Dyaus Asura, pp. 29, 34.

Verse 10.

Note 1. I have changed yagatám into yagata.

Note 2. Árhan idám dayase vísvam ábhvam has been rendered in different ways. Grassmann: 'Du theilst alle diese Macht aus.' Ludwig: 'Du besitzest all diese gewalt.' Geldner: 'Du besitzest höchste Macht.' Muir: 'Thou possessest all this vast world.' Dayase is used, no doubt, in the sense of cutting and distributing, but never in the sense of possessing. In several places, however, it has been translated by to cut and to destroy, e.g. X, 80, 2. agn/h vrítráni dayate purúni, 'Agni cuts up many enemies.' VI, 22, 9. vísvá/h agurya dayase ví máyá/h, 'thou destroyest all deceits.' See also IV, 7, 10; VI, 6, 5. As to ábhva in the sense of fiend, we had it before in I, 39, 8. á yá/h na/h ábhva/h íshate, ví tám yuyota. In other places it assumes a more neutral character, meaning monster, or monstrous power; see B.-R. s.v. 'To distribute power' is not a Vedic conception, nor does ábhva ever mean power in the sense of 'ungeheure Macht, or Urkraft' (Delbrück, Chrest. p. 49).

Verse 11.

Note 1. AV. XVIII, 1, 40, has gartasádam gánânám rágânám, and anyám asmát te. Garta-sad, literally, sitting in the hole, probably the place of the chariot where the king sat, separated from the driver. These divided chariots can be seen in the ancient monuments of Assyria and Babylon. The king seems to stand in a box of his own, fighting, while the charioteer holds the reins, so as not to interfere with the king. See, however, Bergaigne, III, 122 seq.; Z. D. M. G. XL, 681.

Note 2. The mṛigá bhîmá is probably meant for the lion, cf. I, 154, 2, and Zimmer, Altindisches Leben, p. 78.

Note 3. As to the senâs of Rudra, see TS. IV, 5, 2, 1, senâni; AV. XI, 2, 31; Pâr. Grîhy. III, 8, 11.

Verse 12.

Note 1. The sense would be better if vándamānam could be changed to vándamānaḥ.

Verse 13.

Note 1. That father Manu obtained health and wealth from Rudra was mentioned before, I, 114, 2, and it is curious that the Vedic authority of Manu's Smṛiti should be based on the well-known sentence, yat kimka Manur abravīt tad bhesagam, Taitt. Saṃh. II, 2, 10, 2; cf. M. M., Hist. of Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 89.

Verse 14.

Note 1. The VS. reads pāri no rudrāsya hetír vrinaktu, pāri tveshāsya durmatír aghâyóḥ. Vṛigyâh is the 3rd pers. sing. in s of the aor. opt.

Note 2. Rudra is called sthiradhanvan; see also IV, 4, 5; VIII, 19, 20; X, 116, 5; 6; 120, 4; 134, 2; Maitr. S. II, 9, 9.

Verse 15.

Note 1. Kekitāna, the vocative of the participle.

Note 2. Muir seems to translate bodhi, which Sâyana explains by budhyasva, by 'think of us now.' The TB. reads havanasrôḥ.

MANDALA VI, HYMN 74.

ASHTAKA V, ADHYĀYA 1, VARGA 18.

TO SOMA AND RUDRA.

1. Soma and Rudra, may you maintain your divine dominion, and may the oblations reach you properly. Bringing the seven treasures to every house, be kind to our children and our cattle.

2. Soma and Rudra, draw far away in every direction¹ the disease² which has entered our house. Drive far away Nirṛiti³, and may auspicious glories belong to us!

3. Soma and Rudra, bestow all these remedies on our bodies. Tear away and remove from us¹ whatever evil we have committed, which clings to our bodies.

4. Soma and Rudra, wielding sharp weapons and sharp bolts, kind friends, be gracious unto us here! Deliver us from the snare of Varuṇa, and guard us, as kind-hearted gods!

NOTES.

Ascribed to Bhâradvâga Bârhaspatya. Verse 2 occurs TS. I, 8, 22, 5; AV. VII, 42, 1; verse 3, TS. I, 8, 22, 5; AV. VII, 42, 2. All the four verses, but in a different order (3, 1, 2, 4), in MS. IV, 11, 2; see also Kâth. XI, 12. Metre, Trishûbh.

This is the only hymn addressed to Soma and Rudra. In the Khândogya Up. III, 7 and 9, the Rudras are said to have Indra, while the Maruts have Soma at their head.

It is translated by Geldner and Kaegi.

The whole hymn betrays its secondary character; first by violating the law of decrease, secondly by duals in au before consonants, and thirdly by using a very large number of passages from other hymns. Compare verse 1, pâda c, with V, 1, 5, c; verse 2, pâda c, with I, 24, 9, c; verse 2, pâda d, with VI, 1, 12, d. Phrases like verse 1, pâda d, sâm nañ bhûtam dvipâde sâm kâtuhpade, occur again and again, with slight modifications; see I, 114, 1; 157, 3; VII, 54, 1; X, 165, 1. Sumanasyâmânâ also is suspicious. It occurs again in the next hymn, the last of the Mandala, in VII, 33, 14, likewise a suspected hymn, and in the tenth Mandala, X, 51, 5; 7.

Verse 2.

Note 1. On vîshûkîm, see II, 33, 2.

Note 2. Âmivâ has been identified with âvîa by Fick, Orient und Occident, III, p. 121. The difficulty is m=n.

Note 3. The AV. reads bâdhethâm dûrâm nîrrîtim, the AV. and TS. read parâkalî kritâm kid énah prâ mumuktam asmât.

Verse 3.

Note 1. AV. reads asmât for asmé, and ásat for ásti.

Verse 4.

In the Maitr. S. the second half of this verse is, mumuktâm asmân grastân abhîke prâ yakḥḥatam vrishanâ sântamâni.

MANDALA VII, HYMN 46.

ASHṬAKA V, ADHYĀYA 4, VARGA 13.

TO RUDRA.

1. Offer ye these songs to Rudra whose bow is strong, whose arrows are swift, the self-dependent¹ god, the unconquered conqueror, the intelligent, whose weapons are sharp—may he hear us !

2. For, being the lord¹, he looks after what is born on earth ; being the universal ruler, he looks after what is born in heaven. Protecting us, come to our protecting doors, be without illness among our people, O Rudra !

3. May that thunderbolt of thine, which, sent from heaven, traverses the earth, pass us by ! A thousand medicines are thine, O thou who art freely accessible¹ ; do not hurt us in our kith and kin !

4. Do not strike us, O Rudra, do not forsake us ! May we not be in thy way when thou rushest forth furiously. Let us have our altar and a good report among men¹—protect us always with your favours !

NOTES.

Ascribed to Vasishṭha. Verse 1 occurs TB. II, 8, 6, 8. Metre, 1-3 Gagatī; 4 Trishṭubh.

Verse 1.

Note 1. The TB. has svadhāmne for svadhāvne, mîdhûshe for vedhâse, and srinotana for srinotu nah. The commentator explains both svadhāmne = svakīyasthānayuktāya, and svadhāvne = svadhārabdavākyenānnena yuktāya vā. On vedhas, see Bartholomae, K. Z. XXVII, 361; Ludwig, Z. D. M. G. XL, 716.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Geldner translates kshayena by 'from his high seat.' The meaning of kshaya in this place seems defined by the parallel expression sāmrāgyena.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Svapivāta has been variously translated. Grassmann gives Vielbegehrter; Ludwig, des windhauch in schlaf versenkt; Roth, wohl verstehend, denkend; Geldner, freundlicher; Muir, thou who art easy of access, which seems to me the right rendering; cf. sūpāyana. It is derived from api + vat, which occurs six times in the Rîg-veda. As a simple verb it means 'to go near, to attend,' as a causative, the same, or 'to bring near.' Thus, VII, 3, 10. āpi krātum su-kétasam vatema, may we obtain wisdom, full of good thoughts. VII, 60, 6. āpi krātum su-kétasam vātantaḥ, (the gods) obtaining wisdom, full of good thoughts (for their worshippers). X, 20, 1 (X, 25, 1). bhadrām nah āpi vātaya mānaḥ, let us obtain a good mind. I, 128, 2. tām yagñā-sādham āpi vātayāmasi, we go near to, or we bring near Agni, the performer of the sacrifice. I, 165, 13. mān-māni—api-vātáyantaḥ, bringing the prayers near, or attending to the prayers. X, 13, 5. pitṛé putrásaḥ āpi avivatan ritām, the sons brought the sacrifice to the father.

Api-vāta would then mean approach, or in a more spiritual sense, attention, regard, and su-apivâta would mean either of easy approach, opposed to durdharsha, or full of kind attention and regard. See Muir, S.T. IV, p. 314, note. Bergaigne, III, 306, does not help us much, though he points out where the difficulty lies.

The following are the Zend passages in which api-vat occurs, with some notes sent me by Dr. Stein: Apivatahê, Y. 9, 25, 2. p. sg. med. c. Gen. 'Hom, du verstehst dich auf rechte Preissprüche' d.h. 'kannst sie würdigen;' apivatâtê daênayâo mâzdayaçnois, V. 9, 2, 47, 'vertraut mit dem Gesetz;' daênâm zarazca dât apaêca aotât, yt. 9, 26: 'wer das Gesetz lernt und in dasselbe eindringt;' verezyôtûca frâcâ vatôyôtû, Y. 35, 6, 'das richtig erkannte führe er aus und theile es mit;' Y. 44, 18 scheint apivaiti 1. p. sg. med. in der Bedeutung: 'in Erfahrung gebracht haben;' die Stelle ist indess sehr dunkel.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Ā naḥ bhaga barhīshi gīvasamsé seems a very simple sentence. It has been translated without any misgivings by Grassmann, Ludwig, Geldner and Kaegi and others.

Grassmann translates: 'Lass lange lebend uns die Streu noch schmücken.'

Ludwig: 'Gib uns anteil an dem barhis als verheiszung des lebens.'

Kaegi and Geldner (or Roth): 'Verstatt uns Theil an Opfer und an Herrschaft.'

Bergaigne often points to such translations with scorn, but after he has written several pages on the words in question, here on gīvasamsa, he is indeed very positive that it means 'formule qui donne la vie' (I, p. 306), but what such a 'formule' is, and how this meaning fits the whole sentence, he does not tell us.

Let us begin with what is clear. Ā bhaga naḥ with locative, means 'appoint us to something,' i.e. 'give us something.' Thus I, 121, 15. ā naḥ bhaga gōshu, means 'divide us, distribute us, appoint us to cows,' i.e. 'give us cows as our share.' The same expression is used when instead of cows or riches, the gods are asked to give long life, glory, or sinlessness. Thus we read, I, 104, 6. sáh tvám naḥ indra sūrye sáh apsú anâgâstvé á bhaga gīvaramsé, that is, 'Indra, allow us to share and rejoice in the sun, in water, in sinlessness and praise of men.' X, 45, 10. á tám bhaga sausravaséshu, 'give him, let him share in, good renown.'

When we are once familiar with this phraseology, we cannot doubt that in our passage also we have to translate, 'let us have our barhis, our homely altar, and good report among men.'

Another word narâsamsa had originally the same meaning as gīvaramsa, but it was chiefly used as a name of Agni. He was called Narâsamsa, i. e. Männerlob, or dyóh sámśa, Himmelslob, as a German poet was once called Frauenlob, not only because he praised women, but because he was praised by women. As we can say, God is my song, the Vedic Rishis might call any god the samsa, i. e. the praise or song of men, of the fathers, or of the gods. So far from agreeing with Bergaigne, 'on comprendrait moins bien qu'une locution dont le sens propre aurait été "éloge mortel" eût désigné celui qui est loué par le mortel,' nothing is easier and better confirmed by other languages, while the invocation of 'une formule sacrée' is almost unintelligible. If in a later hymn Indra is called gyéshtāḥ mántrāḥ, in X, 50, 4, I should translate, 'thou art the oldest or the best song,' that is, 'the theme of the oldest song,' but not thou art a magic formula. There is no necessity therefore for taking narâsamsa as a possessive compound, possessed of the praise of men, nor must we forget that in words which become almost proper names the accent is by no means always a safe guide.

MANDALA I, HYMN 2.

ASHTAKA I, ADHYĀYA 1, VARGA 3-4.

To VÂYU.

1. Come hither, O Vâyu, thou beautiful one!¹
These Somas are ready, drink of them, hear our call!

2. O Vâyu, the praisers celebrate thee with hymns, they who know the feast-days¹, and have prepared the Soma.

3. O Vâyu, thy satisfying stream¹ goes to the worshipper, wide-reaching, to the Soma-draught.

4. O Indra and Vâyu, these (libations of Soma) are poured out; come hither for the sake of¹ our offerings, for the drops (of Soma) long for you.

5. O Indra and Vâyu, you perceive the libations, you who are rich in booty¹; come then quickly hither!

6. O Vâyu and Indra, come near to the work¹ of the sacrificer, quick, thus is my prayer², O ye men!

7. I call Mitra, endowed with holy strength¹, and Varuṇa, who destroys all enemies; who both fulfil a prayer accompanied by fat offerings².

8. On the right way, O Mitra and Varuṇa, you have obtained great wisdom, you who increase the right and adhere to the right¹;

9. These two sages, Mitra and Varuṇa, the mighty, wide-ruling, give us efficient strength.

NOTES.

Ascribed to Madhukēkandas Vaisvāmītra, and addressed to Vāyu (1-3), Indra and Vāyu (4-6), and to Mitra and Varuṇa (7-9). Metre, Gāyatrī. Verse 4=VS. VII, 8; XXXIII, 56; TS. I, 4, 4, 1; MS. I, 3, 6. Verse 7=SV. II, 197; VS. XXXIII, 57. Verse 8=SV. II, 198. Verse 9=SV. II, 199.

This hymn, with the hymn I, 3, belongs to the Pra-uga ceremony. It consists of three trikas.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Darsata, as applied to the wind, may be intended for visible, but its more general meaning is conspicuous, clarus, insignis.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Aharvid, which Benfey translates by tagekundig, Grassmann, die des Tages (Anbruch) kundig, seems to have two meanings. When applied to men, poets or priests, it means those who know (vid) the right days or seasons for every sacrifice, but when it is applied to certain deities, particularly those of the morning, it means finding (vind), bringing back the day, like lucifer. Thus the Asvins are called aharvidā (VIII, 5, 9; 21). The power (daksha) of Viṣṇu is called aharvid, conquering, or bringing, the light of the day (I, 156, 4). The priests, as inviting these gods, might possibly themselves be called aharvid, bringing back the light of day, but this seems doubtful.

Verse 3.

Note 1. This verse, though it seems easy, is really full of difficulties. The meaning of dhenā is very doubtful. It is explained as lips by native authorities, and would in that case be derived from dhe, to suck. But though this meaning is possible in some passages, particularly where dhene occurs in the dual, in other passages dhenā seems clearly to mean a stream of milk, or of some other liquid, poured out (visrīṣhta) from the clouds or at a sacrifice. It often occurs in the dual dhene, and has then been taken as the upper and lower lips (not the nares, as Roth suggests), distinguished from sipre, the upper and lower jaws. See note on II, 34, 3. Sāyana (Rv. Bh. I, 101, 10) explains it by gihvopagihvike. Durga adds (Nirukta Bhāṣya, VI, 17) ādhastye damṣhṛe vā gihvopagihvike vā, ity eke, taylor hy annam dhiyate.

Benfey translates: 'Vāyu, deine vorkostende Lippe schreitet zum Opferer, weit hingestreckt zum Somatrank.' Prapriṅkatī can hardly mean vorkostend.

Verse 4.

Note 1. The instrumental práyobhiḥ is best translated here by 'for the sake of;' see Wenzel, Instrumental, p. 104.

Verse 5.

Note 1. On vāginī and vāga, see 'India, what can it teach us?' pp. 164, 166. The transition of meaning from vāga, booty, to vāga, wealth in general, finds an analogy in the German kriegen, to obtain, also in Gewinn, and A.S. winnan, to strive, to fight, to obtain. Vāginīvasū, in the dual, is a frequent epithet of the Asvins, II, 37, 5; V, 74, 6; 7; 75, 3; 78, 3; VIII, 5, 3; 12; 20; 8, 10; 9, 4; 10, 5; 22, 7; 14; 18; 26, 3; 85, 3; 101, 8; of Indra, III, 42, 5; X, 96, 8.

It differs little from vāginīvat, which is likewise applied to the Asvins, I, 120, 10, and comes to mean simply wealthy, liberal; cf. I, 122, 8; VII, 69, 1. Vāginīvatī is an epithet of Ushas, Sarasvatī, and Sindhu. A common phrase is vāgebhiḥ vāginīvatī, lit. wealthy in wealth, cf. I, 3, 10. Vāginī occurs as the feminine of vāgin, wealthy, or strong, but never in the sense of mare; cf. III, 61, 1. úshaḥ vāgena vāginī, Ushas wealthy by wealth or booty; VI, 61, 6. Sarasvatī vāgeshu vāginī, Sarasvatī, strong in battles; cf. I, 4, 8; 9. Native commentators generally explain vāginī by sacrifice, vāginīvasu, by dwelling in the sacrifice. I take vāginī in compounds like vāginīvasu as a collective substantive, like padminî, ûhinî, vâhinî, tretinî, anikinî, &c., and in the sense of wealth ; unless we may look upon vâginîvat as formed in analogy to such words as tavishî-mat, only that in this case tavishî exists in the sense of strength. Pischel's explanation, Ved. Stud. p. 9, rich in mares, takes for granted the existence of vâginî in the sense of mare. I have not found any passage where vâginî has necessarily that sense.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Nishkrîta can hardly mean here what it means in later Sanskrit, a rendezvous.

Note 2. On îthâ dhiyâ, see Pischel, Ved. Stud. p. 184.

Verse 7.

Note 1. Pûtâdaksha, cf. pûtâkratu, VIII, 68, 17.

Note 2. Ghrîtâkî seems to be taken here in a technical sense, like ghritavat, i.e. with oblations of butter thrown into the fire. In I, 167, 3, I took ghritâkî in the more general sense of bright, resplendent, while others ascribed to it the meaning of bringing fatness, i.e. rain. It may also mean accompanied by ghee. See B.-R. s. v.

Verse 8.

Note 1. Rîtasprîs, probably not very different from rîtasâp.

MANDALA I, HYMN 134.

ASHTAKA II, ADHYĀYA 1, VARGA 23.

TO VĀYU.

1. O Vāyu, may the quick racers bring thee towards the offerings, to the early drink¹ here, to the early drink of Soma! May Sûnṛitâ² (the Dawn) stand erect, approving thy mind! Come near on thy harnessed chariot to share, O Vāyu, to share in the sacrifice³!

2. May the delightful drops of Soma delight thee, the drops made by us, well-made, and heaven-directed, yes, made with milk, and heaven-directed. When his performed aids assume strength for achievement, our prayers implore the assembled steeds for gifts, yes, the prayers implore them.

3. Vāyu yokes the two ruddy, Vāyu yokes the two red horses, Vāyu yokes to the chariot the two swift horses to draw in the yoke, the strongest to draw in the yoke. Awake Purandhi (the Morning)¹ as a lover wakes a sleeping maid, reveal heaven and earth, brighten the dawn, yes, for glory brighten the dawn.

4. For thee the bright dawns spread out in the distance beautiful garments, in their houses¹, in their rays, beautiful in their new rays. To thee the juice-yielding² cow pours out all treasures. Thou hast brought forth the Maruts from the flanks³, yes, from the flanks of heaven.

5. For thee the white, bright, rushing Somas, strong in raptures, have rushed to the whirl, they have rushed to the whirl of the waters. The tired hunter asks luck of thee in the chase¹; thou shieldest² by thy power from every being, yes, thou shieldest by thy power from powerful spirits³.

6. Thou, O Vâyu, art worthy as the first before all others to drink these our Somas, thou art worthy to drink these poured-out Somas. Among the people also who invoke thee and have turned to thee¹, all the cows pour out the milk, they pour out butter and milk (for the Soma).

NOTES.

Ascribed to Paru~~kk~~hepa Daivodâsi, and addressed to Vâyu. Metre, 1-5 Atyashî; 6 Ashî. No verse occurs in the other Vedas.

Verse 1.

Note 1. Pûrvapîti may here imply that Vâyu receives his libation first, before the other gods, see verse 6.

Note 2. Whatever the etymology of sûnrîta may be, in our passage, which describes the morning sacrifice and the arrival of Vâyu as the first of the gods, it can hardly mean anything but dawn. Ūrdhvâ sthâ is an expression applied frequently to the rise of the dawn or the morning, see III, 55, 14; 61, 3; VIII, 45, 12. In the last passage sûnrîta is simply the dawn. Ludwig translates, 'deine treflichkeit erhebe sich, günstig aufnemend die absicht.' He, like Bergaigne, III, 295, takes sûnrîta as su-nri-tâ, virtue. It seems to me that sûnrîta may be formed irregularly in analogy to an-rîta, and then mean true, good. In other places sûnrîtam seems to mean hymn, like rîtavâka, IX, 113, 2. In places where it occurs as a name of Ushas, one feels tempted to conjecture su-nrîtûs. See also Bartholomae, in Bezenb. Beitr. XV, 24.

Note 3. On makhâsya dâvâne, see note to I, 6, 8; but also note to VIII, 7, 27.

Verse 2.

My translation is purely tentative, and I doubt whether the text can be correct. I have taken krâna here in the sense of made, but I am quite aware that this meaning becomes incongruous in our very verse, when repeated for the third time. On its other meanings, see Pischel, Ved. Stud. p. 67. For the whole verse, compare VI, 36, 3. Grassmann translates :

Die lust'gen Indu's mögen, Vâyu, dich erfreuen,
Die starken, die wir schön gebraut, die himmlischen,
Die milchgemischten, himmlischen ;
Wenn Tränke tüchtig deinen Sinn

Uns zu gewinnen, bei dir sind, Dann fordere Lieder die vereinte Rosseschar, Die Speisen zu empfangen auf.

Ludwig: Erfreuen sollen dich die frohen tropfen, Vāyu, von uns bereitet, die morgendlichen, mit milch bereitet, die morgendlichen, dasz der (opfer) tüchtigkeit zukomen hilfeleistungen zum gelingen, gewärt, die insgesamt herwärts gerichteten gespanne (antworten) zur (mit) beschenkung den liedern, ihn sprechen an die lieder.

These translations may serve to show that certain verses in the Veda are simply hopeless, and that the translators must not be held responsible if they cannot achieve the impossible.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Purandhi may have meant originally doorkeeper or bar-holder (cardo), from pûh and dhi, being formed like ishudhí, vr̥śhandhi, śevadhí, &c. Purandhrí also may have been πυλωρός, janitor, or rather janitrix, then housewife. Grassmann translates it by Segensfülle, Ludwig by Fülle; Bergaigne, III, 476, has a long note on purandhi, as one of the many names of 'la femelle.' Whatever it meant etymologically, in our passage, where she is to be woke by the wind in the morning (cf. ushásaḥ budhí, I, 137, 2), it is again a characteristic epithet of the dawn, πολιοῦχος, πολιάς, πολαίτης. See also Pischel, Vedica, p. 202; Hillebrandt, Wiener Zeitschrift, III, 188; 259.

Verse 4.

Note 1. I have translated damsu as a locative; could it be a nom. plur. of damsu, δασυ, referring to vastrā, the terminations being left out? see Lanman, p. 415.

Note 2. Sabardúghā, juice-yielding. Roth explains it as quickly yielding, identifying sabar with Greek ἄφαρ. But Greek φ never represents Sanskrit b. Sabar, juice, milk, water, would really seem to yield the true source of A. S. sæp, O. H. G. saf, sap, for it is clear that neither δρός, nor Lat. sucus, would correspond with A. S. sæp; see Brugmann, Grundriss, vol. i, § 328; also Bartholomae, in Bezenb. Beitr. XV, 17.

Note 3. Vakshánābhyaḥ, from the flanks. It would be better if we could refer vākshānābhyaḥ to Dhenu, the cow, the mother of the Maruts, while Dyaus is their father, see V, 52, 16. Here, however, Vāyu is conceived as their father, and dyaus (fem.) as their mother.

Verse 5.

Note 1. I have followed Ludwig in his explanation of tsārī, hunter, watcher, and takvaviya, chase of the takva, whatever animal it may be.

Note 2. Oldenberg suggests prāsi for pāsi, which on many accounts would be excellent.

Note 3. On asuryā, see von Bradke, Dyaus Asura, p. 39, and Bergaigne, Journal Asiatique, 1884, p. 510.

Verse 6.

Note 1. Vihutmat is translated by Roth as not sacrificing. But vihutmat can hardly be separated from vihava and vihavya, and seems to mean therefore invoking, possibly, invoking towards different sides. Hu, to sacrifice, does not take the preposition vi. Vavargushī is doubtful. Without some other words, it can hardly mean 'those who have turned towards the gods,' as we read in X, 120, 3 (tvé krátum ápi vriṅganti víśve); nor is it likely to be the same as vrikta-barhis, 'those who have prepared the barhis.' I have translated it in the former sense. See Geldner, Ved. Stud. p. 144, and Oldenberg, Gött. Gel. Anz. 1890, p. 414.

MANDALA X, HYMN 168.

ASHTAKA VIII, ADHYĀYA 8, VARGA 26.

TO VĀTA.

1. Now for the greatness of the chariot of Vāta !
Its roar goes crashing and thundering. It moves touching the sky, and creating red sheens ², or it goes scattering the dust of the earth.

2. Afterwards there rise the gusts of Vāta ¹, they go towards him, like women to a feast ². The god goes with them on the same chariot, he, the king of the whole of this world.

3. When he moves on his paths along the sky, he rests not even a single day ¹; the friend of the waters, the first-born, the holy, where was he born, whence did he spring ?

4. The breath of the gods, the germ ¹ of the world, that god moves wherever he listeth ; his roars indeed are heard, not his form—let us offer sacrifice to that Vāta !

NOTES.

Ascribed to Anila Vâtâyana, and addressed to Vâyu, here called Vâta. The metre is Trishṭubh. This hymn does not occur in the other Vedas. See Muir, Sanskrit Texts, V, p. 145; Geldner and Kaegi, p. 95.

Verse 1.

Note 1. For this use of the accusative, see Pischel, Ved. Stud. p. 13.

Note 2. Arunâni is explained by Geldner, Ved. Stud. p. 274, as the reddish colours of the lightning.

Verse 2.

Note 1. Vishṭhâ means kind or variety. Anu seems to refer to ratha, which I take as the subject of the whole of the first verse.

Note 2. 'Sie gehn mit einander zum Tanz,' Geldner and Kaegi.

Verse 3.

Note 1. Geldner and Kaegi propose aha for ahaḥ.

Verse 4.

Note 1. Vâta seems to be called the garbha of the world, in the sense of being its source or life.

MANDALA X, HYMN 186.

ASHTAKA VIII, ADHYĀYA 8, VARGA 44.

TO VĀTA.

1. May Vāta waft medicine, healthful, delightful to our heart; may he prolong our lives!
 2. Thou, O Vāta, art our father, and our brother, and our friend; do thou grant us to live!
 3. O Vāta, from that treasure of the immortal which is placed in thy house yonder, give us to live!
-

NOTES.

Ascribed to Ula Vâtâyana, and addressed to Vāyu, under the name of Vāta. The metre is Gâyatrî. Verse 1 occurs in SV. I, 184; II, 1190; Taitt. Br. II, 4, 1, 8; Taitt. Âr. IV, 42, 8. Verse 3 in SV. II, 1192; Taitt. Br. II, 4, 1, 8; Taitt. Âr. IV, 42, 7.

APPENDICES.

- I. INDEX OF WORDS.
- II. LIST OF THE MORE IMPORTANT PASSAGES QUOTED 'IN THE PREFACE AND IN THE
NOTES.
- III. A BIBLIOGRAPHICAL LIST OF THE MORE IM-PORTANT PUBLICATIONS ON THE RIG-VEDA.

THE following Index of Words was commenced by Professor Thibaut, and continued and finished by Dr. Winternitz. I beg to express my gratitude to both of them, more particularly to Dr. Winternitz, who has spared no pains in order to make the Index as complete and as accurate as possible.—F. M. M.

The Index contains all the words of the hymns translated in this volume, and besides, all the words about which something is said in the Notes.

The lists of passages are complete, except when three dots (...) are put after the word (e. g. ákkba ...).

Three figures refer to Mandala, hymn, and verse, a small figure to a note, e. g. X, 77, 2¹, stands for Mandala X, hymn 77, verse 2, note 1 (the word occurs in X, 77, 2, and also in note 1).

If a word occurs in a note only, the passage is put in parentheses, e. g. (V, 61, 4¹) means that the word occurs in note 1 on V, 61, 4, but not in V, 61, 4.

In the case of longer notes, it seemed advisable to refer to the page. One number refers to the page, e. g. (287) means that the word occurs in a note on page 287.

I. INDEX OF WORDS.

- ámsa, shoulder:
ámseshu, I, 64, 4; 166, 9; 10;
 168, 3; V, 54, 11; VII, 56, 13;
ámsayob ádhi, V, 57, 6.
- amhatí, tribulation:
amhatí-bhyab, V, 55, 10.
- ámhas, anguish:
ámhab, II, 34, 15; 33, 2; ámhasab, II, 33, 3.
- ákanishṭha:
ákanishṭhāsab, among whom none is the youngest, V, 59, 6; 60, 5.
- ákava, not deficient:
ákavāb, V, 58, 5.
- aketú, without light:
aketāve, I, 6, 3.
- aktú, night:
aktún, V, 54, 4.
- akrá, banner (?):
akráb, X, 77, 2¹.
- áksha, axle:
ákshab, I, 166, 9³.
- ákshita, unceasing:
ákshitam (bīgam), V, 53, 13;
útsam, the inexhaustible well,
 I, 64, 6¹; VIII, 7, 16.
- akshna-yāvan, crossing:
akshna-yāvānab, the crossing (horses), VIII, 7, 35.
- ákhidrayāman, never-wearying:
ákhidrayāma-bhiḥ (steeds), I, 38, 11³.
- akḥkhalikri:
akḥkhalikrītya, (V, 52, 6²).
- Agastya:
agastya, I, 170, 3; (287 seq.)
- ágrībhīta-śoṭis, untouched splendour:
ágrībhīta-śoṭishab, V, 54, 5¹; -am,
 V, 54, 12².
- Agni, the god:
agne, I, 19, 1-9; VI, 66, 9; VII,
 59, 1; agne, V, 56, 1; 60, 6;
 8; agnib, V, 60, 7; VII, 56,
 25; agnib ná, X, 78, 2; agnib
gāni pūrvyāb, VIII, 7, 36; agnim,
 I, 38, 13¹; V, 60, 1; VIII,
 7, 32.—Agni and the Maruts,
 (339; 354; V, 59, 1¹).—Agni has two mothers, (V, 61, 4¹).—
hótā=Agni, (VIII, 94, 6¹).
agní, fire, light:
agnib, V, 58, 3; agnim, X, 121,
 7; I, 170, 4; agnáyab yathā,
 V, 87, 7; agnáyab ná idhānāb,
 VI, 66, 2; agnáyab ná suru- kānāb, II, 34, 1; surukvāmsab
ná agnáyab, V, 87, 6; agnáyab
ná svá-vidyutab, V, 87, 3; ag- néb guhvāb, VI, 66, 10; agni- nām gihvāb, X, 78, 3.
agni-táp, warming oneself at the
 fire:
agni-tápab, V, 61, 4².
agní-bhrāgas, fiery:
agní-bhrāgasab, V, 54, 11.
ágra:
ágre, in the beginning, X, 121,
 1.—agra, top of a tree, (I, 37,
 6¹).
agratas and agre, before:
 (V, 61, 3¹).
aghá, mischief:
aghát, I, 166, 8.
ághnya, bull:
ághnyam, I, 37, 5¹.
ánga, limb:
ángaiḥ, II, 33, 9.
angá:
té aṅgá, they alone, VII, 56, 2;
yát aṅgá, aye when, VIII, 7, 2.
Āngiras:
āngirasab (visvá-rūpāb), X, 78, 5¹.—Āngiras and Daragvas, (II, 34, 12¹).
ákarama:
ákaramāb, no one being last, V, 58, 5.
ákḥba, prep. c. acc. . . .:
 approach thou, V, 52, 14; 15;
 on to, I, 165, 14.
átyuta, unshakable:
átyutā, I, 85, 4; 167, 8; VIII, 20, 5.

akṛuta-kyút, shaking the unshakable :
epithet of Indra [not of the Maruts, correct on p. 278],
(I, 167, 8².)

ag :
ágati, he drives, VI, 66, 7.—vânáb
*agya*te, the arrow is shot, VIII, 20, 8¹; (I, 85, 10²).—ví ágatha, you drive forth, V, 54, 4¹.

agá, goat :
(234.)
agá-ava, having goats for his horses :
ep. of Pūshan, (I, 87, 4¹).
agára, never growing old :
agárāb, I, 64, 3.

agina, skin :
(234.)
agirá, ready, swift (horses) :
agirá, I, 134, 3; V, 56, 6.
ágoshya, unwelcome :
ágoshyab, I, 38, 5².
ágma, racing :
ágmeshu, I, 37, 8¹; 10²; 87, 3;
V, 87, 7¹.

ágman, racing :
ágman (Loc.), I, 166, 5; VIII, 20, 5.
agyeshibá :
agyeshibáb, among whom none is the eldest, V, 59, 6; agyesh- ibásab, V, 60, 5.

ágra, a plain :
ágrān, V, 54, 4.
añk, to bow :
sām akyanta, V, 54, 12.

añg :
añgate (añgi), they brighten themselves, VII, 57, 3.—añg, with góbhib, to cover with milk, (VIII, 20, 8¹; 405).—prá anaga, you have fashioned, V, 54, 1.—
with ví, to deck, adorn oneself ;
ví aňgate, I, 64, 4; ví ānagre,
I, 87, 1; ví aňgata, VIII, 7,
25.—sām aňge, I prepare, I,
64, 1.

āñgasā, straightway, and aňgasīna, straightforward :
(V, 53, 10¹.)

aňgi :
aňgi aňgate, they brighten themselves with brightness, VII, 57, 3; samānám aňgi, their anointing is the same, VIII, 20, 11.—
pl. the glittering ornaments of the Maruts, aňgáyab, I, 166,
10; aňgín, X, 77, 2; aňgi-bhib,

I, 37, 2²; 64, 4¹; 85, 3; 87, 1;
V, 52, 15¹; 56, 1¹; X, 78, 7; (arunébhib) II, 34, 13¹; (307;
308); *aňgi*shu, V, 53, 4¹.—(VIII,
20, 9¹.)

aňgin, possessed of aňgis ?
(V, 52, 15¹.)

aňgi-mát, well-adorned :
aňgi-mántab, V, 57, 5.

átas :
átab, from yonder, I, 6, 9; from thence, I, 165, 5; V, 60, 6;
átab kít, even from them, VIII, 20, 18.

āti :
gánān āti tasthau, I, 64, 13; across,
II, 34, 15.—āti=ādhi? V, 52,
3¹; (VIII, 7, 14¹).—pūrvīb āti
kshápab, through many nights, X, 77, 2; āti kshápab, Gen., (I, 64, 8².)

*āti*thi, guest :
play on the words *āti*thi and *á*dit*i*, (262.)

átka, garment :
átkān, V, 55, 6.

átya, rushing, horse, racer :
átyam, I, 64, 6²; átyām ná sáptim,
(I, 85, 1¹); vṛishanab vṛisha- bhāsab átyāb, strong and powerful horses (140); átyāb-iva, V, 59, 3; átyāsab ná, VII, 56, 16;
átyān iva āgishu, II, 34, 3.—
átyena págasā, with rushing splendour, II, 34, 13².

*át*ra :
now, I, 165, 11; here, I, 165, 13;
V, 61, 11; VII, 57, 5.

*át*ra, food :
(I, 86, 10².)
atrā, tooth, jaw, eater, ogre :
(I, 86, 10².)

atrín, tusky fiend :
atrínam, I, 86, 10².

*át*ha, therefore :
I, 87, 4; 114, 9; (VII, 56, 1¹)

adás, yonder :
X, 186, 3.

ádābhya, unbeguiled, unconquerable :
adābhyāb, II, 34, 10; ádābhyasya,
VIII, 7, 15¹.

Aditi :
Aditi, (241 seqq.); ādityāb áditib, (244); earth, (255; 263); as
adj. unbound, unbounded, (257);
unrestrained, independent, free,

- (261 seqq.); masc. = Āditya (255; 261); ep. of Agni (262).
 —āditiḥ, I, 43, 2¹; 114, 11;
āditeb-iva, I, 166, 12.—Dyaūḥ
Āditiḥ, V, 59, 8².
aditi-tvā, Aditi-hood, perfection or holiness:
 (257.)
ā-dū, not worshipping:
āduvaḥ, nom. plur., (I, 37, 14¹).
ādeva-tra, godless:
ādeva-trāt, V, 61, 6.
ādbhuta, n., strange thing:
ādbhutam, I, 170, 1¹.
ādbhuta-enas, in whom no fault is seen, faultless:
ādbhuta-enasām, V, 87, 7¹.
adyā, to-day ...
ādri, stone:
 thunderbolt, ādriḥ, I, 165, 4³;
 p. xv; xxi; (182); ādrim, I, 85, 5¹; ādrivā, I, 168, 6.—Soma- stone, ādrim, I, 88, 3; ādrayaḥ
nā, X, 78, 6².—mountain, ādrim, V, 52, 9; ādrayaḥ, V, 87, 2.
adriyat, wielding the thunderbolt:
adriyaḥ, voc., (I, 85, 5¹).
adrūḥ, without guile:
adrūhaḥ, I, 19, 3³.
adroghā, guiltless:
adroghām, V, 52, 1.
ādvayāvin, free from guile:
ādvayāvi, VII, 56, 18.
adveshā, kind:
adveshāḥ, V, 87, 8.
ādha, then ...:
ādha, also VII, 56, 1¹.—ādha yāt,
 now that, I, 167, 2.—ādha priyā,
 for adha-priyā, (I, 38, 1¹).
ādhi, over, on, in (c. Loc.), from (c.
 Abl.) ...:
devēshu ādhi, above all gods, X, 121, 8.—(V, 52, 3¹).—riyāḥ ādhi, not riyās ādhi, V, 61, 12².—
ādhi snūnā divāḥ, above the ridge of the sky, VIII, 7, 7; ādhi-iva girīṇām, as it were from above the mountains,
 VIII, 7, 14¹.
ādhriṣṭa, unassailable:
ādhriṣṭāsab, V, 87, 2; ādhriṣṭāḥ,
 VI, 66, 10.
ādhri-gu, irresistible:
ādhri-gāvaḥ, I, 64, 3.
ādhvan, road, way, journey:
ādhvan ā, I, 37, 13; ādhvanab, V, 53, 7; asyā ādhvanab, V, 54, 10;
gatāḥ ādhvā, a trodden path,
 VII, 58, 3.
adhvarā, sacrifice:
adhvarām, I, 19, 1; VII, 56, 12;
adhvaré, I, 165, 2; X, 77, 8;
 VIII, 7, 6; adhvarāsya-iva, VI, 66, 10.
adhvara-rī, illumining the sacrifice:
adhvara-rīyaḥ, X, 78, 7¹; (V, 60, 8¹).
adhvare-sthā, firm in the sacrifice:
adhvare-sthāḥ, X, 77, 7.
adhasmān, smooth:
adhasmā-bhiḥ pathī-bhiḥ, on smooth roads, II, 34, 5¹.
an, to breathe:
prānatāḥ, of the breathing (world),
 X, 121, 3.
ananudā, not yielding:
ananudāḥ, (I, 165, 9¹).
anantā-rushma, of endless prowess:
anantā-rushmāḥ, I, 64, 10.
anabhīrū, without reins:
anabhīrūḥ, VI, 66, 7.
anamivā, without illness:
anamivāḥ, VII, 46, 2.
ānarus, without wound:
 (66.)
anarvān:
anarvānam, unscathed, I, 37, 1¹;
 (65 seqq.); epithet of Aditi,
 (260); āditiṃ anarvānam = Agni, (262).
anavadyā, faultless:
anavadyāḥ, I, 6, 8; anavadyāsab,
 VII, 57, 5.
anavabhrā-rādhas, of inexhaustible wealth:
anavabhrā-rādhasab, I, 166, 7; II,
 34, 4; V, 57, 5.
anavasā, without drag (?):
anavasāḥ, VI, 66, 7².
anavā, without horses:
anavāḥ, VI, 66, 7; (67).
ānava-dā, the West (?):
ānava-dām, V, 54, 5¹.
anava-yā, moving without horses:
anava-yāḥ (?), (V, 54, 5¹).
an-āgāstvá, guiltlessness, purity: (257.)
anāturā, free from disease:
anāturām, I, 114, 1.
ānādhriṣṭa, unconquerable:
ānādhriṣṭāsab, I, 19, 4.
ānānata, never flinching:
ānānatāḥ, I, 87, 1.

Ānitabhā, N. of a river:

V, 53, 9¹.

ānika:

āditer ānikam, the face of Aditi (the dawn), (243).—marūtām ānikam, the train of the Maruts, I, 168, 9.—ānikeshu ādhi, on the faces, VIII, 20, 12.

ānu, prep. . . .:

according to, svadhām ānu, see svadhā; ānu gōsham, according to pleasure, VI, 66, 4.—ānu dyūn, day by day, I, 167, 10; (I, 6, 8²).—ānu ātakshata, I, 86, 3¹; ānu scil. sasrub, V, 53, 2¹.—after, X, 168, 2¹.—synzesis, p. cxxii.

ānutta, not shaken, strong:

ānuttam, I, 165, 9¹.

ānutta-manyu, of irresistible fury:

(I, 165, 9¹.)

ānu-patha, follower:

ānu-pathāb, V, 52, 10.

anu-bhartṛī, comforting:

anu-bhartṛī, I, 88, 6¹; (178.)

anu-stubh:

Anushrubh='After-step,' p. xcvi.

anu-svadhām, according to their nature:

V, 52, 1.

anetā:

anenāb for anetāb? (VI, 66, 7¹.)

ānedyā, blameless:

ānedyāb, I, 87, 4; 165, 12; V, 61, 13; p. xviii seq.

anenā, without deer:

anenāb, VI, 66, 7¹.

anenās, without guilt:

anenāb, (VI, 66, 7¹.)

ānta, end:

āntam, the hem of a garment, I, 37, 6¹.—rāvasab āntam, I, 167, 9.—āntān divāb, V, 59, 7.

āntab-patha, enterer:

āntab-pathāb, V, 52, 10.

antamā, friend:

antamēbbiāb, I, 165, 5¹.

antār:

antāb, from within, I, 168, 5.—c. Loc. within, V, 59, 2².—antāb sāntab, within (the womb), VI, 66, 4.

antāriksha, sky, air:

antāriksham, V, 54, 4; 55, 2; divāb ā antārikshāt, V, 53, 8; urāū antāriksha, V, 52, 7; antāriksha rāgasab, the air in the sky, X, 121, 5²; antāriksha, through the air, I, 165, 2; X, 168, 3; antārikshena, VIII, 7, 35.—antāriksha, prithivī, and dyū, (50); rōdasi antāriksham, (I, 64, 9².)

antārikshya:

antārikshyāb pathyāb, the paths in the sky, V, 54, 9.

ānti, near:

I, 167, 9.

āndhas, (Soma) juice:

āndhasab (mādhvab), I, 85, 6²;

āndhasā (mādhvab), V, 54, 8³;

āndhāmsi pītāye, to drink the (juice of the Soma) flowers, VII, 59, 5.

anyā, other . . .:

nā tvād anyāb, no other than thou, X, 121, 10.—anyāb, enemy, VII, 56, 15.

anyātas, to a different place:

anyātab, p. xl.

anyātra, elsewhere:

VII, 59, 5.

āp, water:

āpab, V, 54, 2; 58, 6; VII, 56, 25; āpab-iva, V, 60, 3; VIII, 94, 7; girāyab nā āpab ugrāb, VI, 66, 11²; āpab nā, X, 78, 5; āpab brihatīb, the great waters, X, 121, 7¹; 8; 9; mahatīb apāb, VIII, 7, 22; apāb mātṛīb, (307); apāb, I, 165, 8; VIII, 7, 28.—apāb tārema, cross the waters, VII, 56, 24.—apāb, the waters (at sacrifices), I, 64, 1³; 6².—apām arnavām, I, 85, 9; apām nā ūrmāyab, I, 168, 2; apām budhnē, X, 77, 4; bhurvāni apām, I, 134, 5; apām sākḥā, the friend of the waters (Vāta), X, 168, 3.—ap-sū, VI, 66, 8.—apāb, the waters between heaven and earth, the sky, (309).—āpab, Acc. (cf. Lanman, 483), V, 53, 14.

āpatya, 'Nachkommen':

(215, note *.)

apa-bhartṛī, the remover:

apa-bhartṛā (rāpasab), II, 33, 7.

āpas, n., work, deed:

āpab, (I, 64, 1³); āpāmsi (nāri), I, 85, 9.

apās, m., workman:

apāb, (I, 64, 1³); apāsam (dāksham), efficient, I, 2, 9.

- apârá, infinite:
 apâráb, V, 87, 6.
 ápi, adv. :
 even, II, 34, 10; also, X, 77, 7.
 ápi, prep. :
 ápi (bhúma, c. Loc.), under, VII,
 57, 4¹.
 api-vâta, approach, attention, regard :
 (VII, 46, 3¹).
 ápûrva, incomparable :
 ápûrva, V, 56, 5; ápûrva
 prathamâb, as the first before all others, I, 134, 6. apeśas, without form :
 apeśase, I, 6, 3.
 áprati-skuta, irresistible :
 áprati-skutab, V, 61, 13.
 ápra-jasta, infamous :
 ápra-jastân, I, 167, 8.
 Apsaras :
 (307; 308).
 ábibhîvas, fearless :
 ábibhyushâ, I, 6, 7; ábibhyushab,
 (I, 6, 1²).
 abda, cloud :
 (V, 54, 3¹).
 abdâ, wish to give water (?) :
 abdâ-yâ, wishing to give water, V,
 54, 3¹.
 abdi-mât, with clouds :
 (V, 54, 3¹).
 abhî, prep., to . . . :
 yâb karshanîb abhî (bhûvab ?), who surpasses all men, I, 86, 5¹.—
 abhî dyûn=ânu dyûn, (I, 6, 8²).
 —synzesis of abhî, p. cxxii.
 abhî-iti, assault :
 abhî-itîb râpasab, II, 33, 3.
 abhî-gñû, knee-deep :
 I, 37, 10².
 abhîtas, all around :
 abhîtab mâ, VII, 59, 7.
 abhî-dyu, hastening, or, heaven-directed. [It is doubtful which is the right meaning] :
 abhîdyu-bhîb, hasting, I, 6, 8²;
 abhî-dyavab, hastening heavenward, or, shining forth, VIII,
 7, 25; I, 134, 2 (bis); X, 77, 3; 78, 4.
 abhî-mâtin, adversary :
 abhî-mâtinam, I, 85, 3.
 abhî-ñrî :
 cf. gaurî, (V, 60, 8¹).
 abhîshî, victory :
 abhîshraye, II, 34, 14².
 abhîshî, conqueror, victorious :
 (II, 34, 14²).
 abhisam-karénya, to be approached,
 accepted, consulted :
 abhisam-karényam, I, 170, 1¹.
 abhisam-kârin, changeable :
 (I, 170, 1¹).
 abhî-svartî, intoning :
 abhî-svartârab arkâm, intoning a hymn of praise, X, 78, 4.
 abhî-hrut, assault, injury :
 (I, 166, 8¹).
 abhî-hruti, injury :
 abhî-hruteb, I, 166, 8¹.
 ábhîru, fearless :
 ábhîravab, I, 87, 6.
 abhîsu, rein, bridle :
 abhîsavab, I, 38, 12¹; V, 61, 2.
 abhok-hân, slayer of the demon :
 abhok-hânab, I, 64, 3¹.
 abhrâ, cloud :
 abhrât ná sūryab, X, 77, 3.
 abhra-prúsh, cloud-shower :
 abhra-prúshab, X, 77, 1².
 abhrîya, belonging to the cloud :
 abhrîyâm vâkam, the voice of the clouds, I, 168, 8; abhrîyâb vrishîyâb, streams from clouds,
 II, 34, 2¹.
 ábhva, fiend :
 ábhvab, I, 39, 8¹; vísvam ábhvam,
 II, 33, 10²; ábhvam, the dark cloud, I, 168, 9³.
 áma, onslaught :
 áma, V, 56, 3; ámat, V, 59, 2;
 ámaña vab yâtave, VIII, 20, 6.
 amâti, impetus, power, light :
 amâtîb, I, 64, 9³.
 ámadhyama :
 ámadhyamâsab, among whom none is the middle, V, 59, 6. ámartya, immortal :
 ámartyâb, I, 168, 4.
 áma-vat, violent, impetuous :
 áma-vatî, I, 168, 7; áma-vat, V, 58, 1; áma-vân, V, 87, 5; áma-vat-su, VI, 66, 6; áma-vantab,
 I, 38, 7; VIII, 20, 7.
 amât, from near :
 V, 53, 8¹.
 ámita, infinite :
 ámitâb, V, 58, 2.
 ámivâ, sickness :
 ámivâb, II, 33, 2; ámivâ, VI, 74, 2³.

amṛita, immortal, pl. the immortals :
amṛitāb, I, 38, 4 ; amṛita (Rudra), I, 114, 6 ; amṛitasya (Indra), I, 170, 4 ; (Rudra), I, 43, 9¹.—amṛitam nāma, V, 57, 5.—amṛitāb (Maruts), I, 166, 3 ; amṛitāsab, I, 166, 13 ; ámṛitāb, V, 57, 8 ; 58, 8.
amṛita, n., the immortal, immortality, not dying :
amṛitam, X, 121, 2 ; amṛitasya, V, 58, 1 ; VII, 57, 6¹ ; X, 186, 3 ; amṛitāt, VII, 59, 12².
amṛita-tvā, immortality :
amṛita-tvám ṣṭhīre, they became immortal (I, 6, 4³) ; amṛita-tvé dadhātana, V, 55, 4.
ámṛidhra, unceasing :
ámṛidhram (rain), I, 37, 11.
ambhrinā, ὄβριμος ? (275.)
áya, wanderer :
áyāb, (VI, 66, 4¹) ayā, going :
ayāsab, (I, 64, 11¹)
áyab-damshtra, with iron tusks :
áyab-damshtrān, I, 88, 5.
ayā, adv., hence :
I, 87, 4².—Instrum., ayā dhiyā, through this prayer, I, 166, 13.
áyā for ayā, VI, 66, 4¹.
ayās, untiring :
ayāb, (I, 87, 4²) ; ayāsab, I, 64, 11¹ ; 167, 4¹ ; VI, 66, 5² ; áyāsab, VII, 58, 2 ; ayāsām, I, 168, 9.—ayāb, not striving (?), VI, 66, 5².
ar, to hurt :
(65 seq. ; I, 64, 15¹ ; 85, 5²) ; upa-ārimā, we have offended, (66.)
ará, spoke :
aráb-iva, like the spokes of a wheel, V, 58, 5 ; rāthānām ná arāb, X, 78, 4 ; aránām ná karamāb, as of moving spokes no one is the last, VIII, 20, 14¹.
arakshás, guileless :
araksháb, V, 87, 9.
árathi, not a charioteer :
árathib, VI, 66, 7.
arapás, without mischief :
arapáb, II, 33, 6.
áram, properly :
VI, 74, 1 ; áram krinvantu, let them prepare, I, 170, 4 ; áram-kritāb, ready, I, 2, 1.
arámati, service :
arámatim, V, 54, 6².

árarivas, hostile :
áarushe, on the enemy, VII, 56, 19 ; (66.)
aráru, enemy :
(66.)
arágin, dark :
arágināb (párvatân), VIII, 7, 23.
árāti, enemy :
árátib, V, 53, 14 ; árátayab, I, 43, 8.
arádhás, miserly :
arádhāsab, V, 61, 6.
árāvan, selfish :
árāvā, VII, 56, 15.
ári, friend :
vísve arýāb, VIII, 94, 3¹.
ári, enemy :
arýāb, Gen., V, 54, 12² ; Abl., VII, 56, 22.—(66) ; (I, 64, 15¹)—arib = arib = arayab, pp. xxxix ; xli.
árishta, inviolable :
árishtam (sáhab), II, 34, 7.
árishta-grāma, whose ranks are never broken :
árishta-grāmāb, I, 166, 6.
árishta-vīra, with unharmed men :
árishta-vīrāb, I, 114, 3.
arunā, red :
arunébhiḥ aṅg-bhiḥ, II, 34, 13¹ ; arunāib, with the red (rays), II, 34, 12.—Red (horses), arunébhiḥ, I, 88, 2 ; arunā, I, 134, 3.—arunāni, red sheens, X, 168, 1².
arunā-arva, having red horses :
arunā-arvāb, V, 57, 4.
arunā-psu, reddish-coloured :
arunā-psavāb (Maruts), VIII, 7, 7¹.
arunī, red :
arunī, the ruddy cows, (I, 64, 7²).—aṅg arunāyab, bright red ornaments, (308.)
arushā, red ; m. f., red horse :
arushām (horse), I, 6, 1¹ ; arushā-sya, I, 85, 5² ; arushib, red mares, V, 56, 6 ; arusháb vāgī, V, 56, 7 ; arushāsab ávāb, V, 59, 5 ; arushām varāhām, I, 114, 5.—(See 17 seqq.) Adj. red, (17-19) ; white, bright, (19, 24) ; vṛishan arushā, fire in the shape of lightning, (18) ; the red hero, (18, 25) ; the red horses of the Sun and of Agni, (19 seq.) ; the cloud as one of the horses of the Maruts, (20.)

- N. pr. of a deity, the Morning Sun, (20–23, 26, 27); the red cloud, (27.)—ārushī, fem. adj. or subst. (23); fem. subst. dawn, &c. (24); flames? (27.)
- ārus*, n., a wound: (65; 66); (I, 64, 15¹.)
- arenū*, dustless:
- arenāvab*, I, 168, 4; VI, 66, 2¹.
- arepās*, blameless:
- arepāsab*, I, 64, 2; V, 53, 3; 57, 4; 61, 14; X, 78, 1.
- arkā*, song:
- the music of the Maruts, (I, 38, 15¹; II, 34, 1³); arkām (rik), I, 19, 4¹; 85, 2; 166, 7².—Song of praise, hymn, arkām, VI, 66, 9; X, 78, 4; arkaib, I, 88, 4.
- arkā*, singer:
- arkāb*, I, 167, 6¹; divāb arkāb, V, 57, 5¹; (II, 34, 1³.)
- arkin*, musical:
- arkīnam*, I, 38, 15¹; arkīnab, (II, 34, 1³.)
- ark*, see rik.
- arkātri*, shouter:
- arkātrayab*, VI, 66, 10.
- Arkanānas* Ātreya : (V, 61, 5¹.)
- arkī*, light: (I, 87, 6²; II, 34, 1³.)
- arkīm*, blazing:
- arkīnab*, II, 34, 1³.
- arkīs*, splendour:
- arkīshā sūrab*, VIII, 7, 36.
- arnavā*, wave, waving:
- samudrām arnavām*, the surging sea, I, 19, 7²; apām arnavām, the stream of water, I, 85, 9; tveshām arnavām, the terrible sea, I, 168, 6; arnavaib, by waving mists, V, 59, 1.
- arnas*, the sea:
- ārnab*, I, 167, 9; VIII, 20, 13.
- arnasā*, waving:
- arnasām*, V, 54, 6¹.
- ārtha*, n., errand:
- ārtham*, I, 38, 2.
- arbhakā*, small:
- mahāntam utā arbhakām*, I, 114, 7.
- aryā*:
- aryē ā*, among the Aryas, (Pischel, VIII, 94, 3¹.)
- Aryamān*:
- aryamō*, I, 167, 8¹; āryaman, VII, 59, 1; aryamā, VIII, 94, 5.—
- aryamānab* (the three Aryamans, i.e. Aryaman, Mitra, and Varuṇa), V, 54, 8¹.
- ārvat*, horse, racer:
- ārvā*, VII, 56, 23; 58, 4; ārvat-bhiḥ, I, 64, 13; ārvantam vāgam, a strong horse, V, 54, 14²; ārvate, I, 43, 6; ārvati, II, 33, 1¹.—(65; 67.)—ārvā, the right horse, (I, 39, 6¹.)
- ārvan*, horse, racer, (66 seq.)
- ārvan*, hurting:
- (65; 66); (I, 64, 15¹.)
- arvāṇā*:
- arvāṇab vab ā vavṛityām*, let me bring you hither, I, 168, 1; arvāṇī sū—ūtīb, may that grace come hither, II, 34, 15; arvāḥ (ayām yagñāb), it is meet for you, X, 77, 4.
- arh*, to be worthy:
- arhāse*, X, 77, 1⁴; arhasi (pītim), I, 134, 6 (bis); ārhan, II, 33, 10 (tris); ārhanṭab, V, 52, 5.—ārhanṭi, they worship, VIII, 20, 18¹.
- alamātardana*, explanation of alātrinā, (227.)
- alātrinā*, not reviling:
- alātrināsab*, I, 166, 7¹.
- av*, to protect, to save, to help:
- avatha*, V, 54, 14; āvatha, VIII, 20, 24; VI, 66, 8; avatu, V, 87, 6; avantu, V, 87, 7; X, 77, 8; āvata (conj. for avitā), VII, 59, 6¹; āvat, I, 85, 7²; (134); āvata, I, 64, 13; 166, 8; 13; āvā, VIII, 7, 18; āvan āvantīb, VII, 46, 2.—āvya, having granted, I, 166, 13.—ānu āvan, VIII, 7, 24.—prā avata, VII, 57, 5; prā-avitā (with Gen.), I, 87, 4.
- āva*, adv., down:
- I, 168, 4; 8.
- avamsā*, abyss:
- avamsāt*, VII, 58, 1².
- avatā*, well:
- avatām*, I, 85, 10¹; 11.—(I, 64, 6¹.)
- avadyā*, unspeakable:
- avadyāt*, I, 167, 8; avadyām, V, 53, 14.—avadyāni, impurity, VI, 66, 4.
- avāni*, course:
- avānā*, V, 54, 2.
- avamā*, lowest:
- avamē*, in the lowest (heaven), V, 60, 6.

āvayāta-he/as :

āvayāta-he/āb bhāva, let thy anger be turned away from (Instr.), I, 171, 6².

āvara :

āvaram, the bottom, I, 168, 6 ;
āvarān, descending, II, 34, 14.

āvas, help, protection :

āvab, I, 39, 7 ; VIII, 94, 8 ; I, 114, 9 ; āvasā, I, 39, 7 ; 85, 11 ; 166, 2 ; VII, 59, 2 ; āvase, I, 168, 1 ; II, 34, 14 ; I, 114, 4 ; āvasab, V, 57, 7 ; āvab-bhiḥ, I, 86, 6¹ ; 167, 2.—āvasā, by (his) will, X, 121, 6.

avasā, drag (?) :

(VI, 66, 7².)

avasyā, desiring help :

avasyāvab, I, 114, 11.

āvāta, unconquered, (90.)

avātā (or āvāta), never dried up :

avātām, I, 38, 7¹.

avikrīta, not dyed :

(234.)

āvithura, immovable :

āvithurāb, I, 87, 1 ; (I, 87, 3¹.)

āvi-hruta, uninjured, intact :

(I, 166, 8¹.)

as, to eat :

prā asāna, I, 170, 5.

as, to reach, to attain to :

ārata, I, 85, 2 ; 87, 5 ; ārāthe, I, 2, 8 ; asnutha, V, 54, 10 ; asyāma, I, 114, 2 ; 3 ; ariya, II, 33, 2 ; 6.—abhi asyām, I, 166, 14.—ūt asnavat, V, 59, 4.—prā asnavantu, VI, 74, 1.

asās, impious fiend :

asāsab, II, 34, 9.

āsiva, unlucky, uncanny :

(I, 166, 1¹.)

āsma-didyu, shooting with thunderbolts :

āsma-didyavab, V, 54, 3.

āsman, stone :

āsmā, I, 172, 2.—āsmānam sva-ryām, the heavenly stone (the sky), V, 56, 4².

asman-māya, made of stone :

asman-māyī (vāśī), (I, 88, 3¹.)

āsva, horse :

āsvāb-iva, V, 53, 7 ; 59, 5 ; āsvā-sab nā gyēshibāsab, X, 78, 5 ; āsvā sāptī-iva, (I, 85, 1¹) ; gōshu, āveshu, I, 114, 8 ; vṛishabhiḥ āsvaiḥ, stallions, (I 39) ; asva and vāga, (I, 167, 1¹).—For āsvām-

iva, read asvām-iva, II, 34, 6².—

The horses of the Maruts, āsvā-sab, I, 38, 12 ; V, 59, 7 ; āsvāb, V, 54, 10 ; 61, 2 ; āsvān, I, 171, 1 ; II, 34, 3 ; 8 ; V, 55, 6¹ ; 58, 7 ; 59, 1 ; āsvaiḥ, I, 88, 2 ; V, 55, 1 ; VIII, 7, 27 ; prīshatibhiḥ āsvaiḥ, V, 58, 6¹ ; (I, 37, 2¹.)

asvatthā, horse-stable, i.e. West :

(V, 54, 5¹.)

arva-dā, giving horses, the dawn, the East (?) :

(V, 54, 5¹.)

ārva-parva, winged with horses :

ārva-parvaiḥ, (I, 87, 4¹) ; I, 88, 1.

ārva-budhna, having their resting-place among the horses :

ārva-budhnāb, the Dawns (V, 54, 5¹.)

arva-yāt, wishing horses :

arvayāntab, (I, 167, 1¹.)

arva-yūg, harnessing horses :

arva-yūgab, V, 54, 2.

ārva-vat :

ārva-vat rādhāb, wealth of horses, V, 57, 7.

Asvīn :

asvīnā, the Asvins, VIII, 94, 4.

āsrya, consisting of horses :

āsryam (rādhāb), V, 52, 17 ; āsryam parūm, V, 61, 5.

āshālba, unconquered :

āshāl/bāya, VII, 46, 1.

as, to throw :

āsyaṭha, you hurl, I, 172, 2 ; as-yatu āre asmāt, may he drive far away from us, I, 114, 4 ; āsyan, scattering, X, 168, 1.—prā āsyatha, you cast forwards, I, 39, 1.—vī asyatha, you scatter, V, 55, 6.

as, to be . . . :

naḥ astu, may it be ours, X, 121, 10 ; yushmākam astu, may yours be, I, 39, 2 ; 4.—vab santu, I, 38, 12 ; 39, 2 ; smāsi eshām, we are their servants, I, 37, 15 ; me astu, I, 165, 10 ; vab sānti, you have for (dat.), I, 85, 12.—sānti, there are, I, 37, 14 ; āsti (with dat.), there is enough for, I, 37, 15 ; nā āsti, there is no such thing, I, 170, 1.—yāt syātana, syāt, I, 38, 4¹ ; syāma té, may we be such, V, 53, 15.—asan, may they be, I, 38, 15² ;

- (96); asati, V, 53, 15; *yáthā ása*tha, V, 61, 4; *ása yáb vā ása*ti, who was or who may be so, VIII, 20, 15; táthā it asat, so shall it be, VIII, 20, 17; astu, though it be, VI, 66, 7.—syāma sahā, V, 53, 14¹; sam-dṛīsi sthāna, V, 87, 6; úrdhvā santu, I, 171, 3; sám with as, (191 seq.)—ānu syāt nab, may he be with us, I, 167, 10.—antáb sántab, VI, 66, 4.—abhi syāma, may we obtain, VII, 56, 24¹.—prá sánti, they stand forth, VII, 58, 2; prá astu, may it prevail, VII, 58, 4.
- ásamyatab* (not asamyattab): (I, 64, 13².)
- asaka*-dvish, not hating the followers:
asaka-dvishab, VIII, 20, 24².
- ásāmi*, whole:
ásāmi-bhiḥ, I, 39, 9; ásāmi, whole, I, 39, 10 (bis).—adv., wholly, I, 39, 9.
- ásāmi*-jvas, of perfect strength:
ásāmi-jvasab, V, 52, 5.
- Ásiknī*, N. of a river:
ásiknyām, VIII, 20, 25.
- ásu*, breath:
ásuḥ, X, 121, 7.
- ásura*, divine:
ásurāb, I, 64, 2; diváb ásurasya, VIII, 20, 17¹.—ásurab, lord, VII, 56, 24.
- asuryā*, divine; n., divine power:
asuryā, I, 167, 5; asuryā-iva, like heavenly lightning, I, 168, 7¹.—asuryām, II, 33, 9¹; VI, 74, 1; asuryāt, I, 134, 5².
- asú*, barren:
asvām-iva (conjecture for ásvām-iva) dhenūm, like a barren cow, II, 34, 6².
- ástuta*, unpraiseworthy:
ástutab, V, 61, 8.
- ástri*, archer:
ástārab, I, 64, 10.
- asmad*...:
iyām asmát matlb, this prayer from us, V, 57, 1; asmān, I, 165, 14¹; (203.)—asmé tanūshu, on our bodies, VI, 74, 3.—nab (útāyab), accorded to us, I, 167, 1.—asmāka for asmākam, p. cxviii.—no (nab), short, p. lxxxii seq.
- ah*, to say:
āhub, X, 121, 4; V, 53, 3.
- āha*, indeed:
V, 52, 6; VIII, 20, 20; (X, 168, 3¹).—āt āha, thereupon, I, 6, 4.—nā āha, nowhere, never, V, 54, 4; 10.
- ahab*-víd, (1) knowing the days, (2) finding, bringing back the day, lucifer:
ahab-vídab, knowing the feast-days, I, 2, 2¹.
- āhan*, day:
āhāni, I, 88, 4¹; V, 54, 4; āhāni vīsvā, always, I, 171, 3; āhā-iva, V, 58, 5; āhani priyé, on a happy day, VII, 59, 2; kata-māt kanā āhab, not even a single day, X, 168, 3; kshapābhiḥ āha-bhiḥ, by night and by day, (I, 64, 8².)
- ahanyā*, of the day:
ahanyāb, I, 168, 5⁴.
- aham*-yú, proud:
aham-yúb, I, 167, 7.
- āhi*-bhānu, shining like snakes:
āhi-bhānavab, I, 172, 1¹.
- āhi*-manyu, whose ire is like the ire of serpents:
āhi-manyavab, I, 64, 8; 9¹.
- ahi*-hátya, the killing of Ahi:
ahi-hátye, I, 165, 6.
- āhruta*-psu, with unbending forms:
āhruta-psavab, VIII, 20, 7; (VIII, 7, 7¹.)
- ā*, prep. . . .:
with Loc., on, in, ādhvan ā, I, 37, 13; *dhānvan ā*ti ā, I, 38, 7; āgmeshu ā, on the courses, V, 87, 7¹.—with Acc., over, I, 38, 10; towards, V, 52, 12; I, 167, 2; on to, V, 56, 1; gōsham ā, to his satisfaction, VIII, 94, 6; ā rāgas, through the air (?), (VII, 57, 3¹).—with Abl., diváb ā, from heaven, V, 53, 8; 54, 1²; asmát ā, towards us, V, 56, 3.—pāri ā vab ā agub, I, 88, 4; ā te, before thee, I, 165, 9.—ā, 6, I, 165, 14²; VII, 59, 5; VIII, 7, 33.—adv., here, I, 37, 6; hither, II, 34, 4; mūhub ā, V, 54, 3.

- â, pronominal base, see ayā.
 āgas, āyos, guilt, sin:
 āgab, VII, 57, 4; (257.)
 Āngirasa:
 Purumīlba Āngirasa, (362.)
 āga, skin of a goat:
 (232.)
 āgī, race, course:
 āgīshu, II, 34, 3; (I, 37, 8¹)
 āt, then:
 āt āha, thereupon, I, 6, 4¹; āt it, then only, I, 87, 5; 168, 9.
 ātura, sick:
 āturasya, VIII, 20, 26.
 ātma-dā, he who gives breath:
 ātma-dāb, X, 121, 2; (4.)
 ātmán, breath:
 ātmā devānām, the breath of the gods (Vāta), X, 168, 4.
 Ātreya:
 Arkānāsa Ātreya, (V, 61, 5²).
 â-dardirā, tearing to pieces:
 â-dardirāsab (ādrayab), X, 78, 6.
 Ādityā, the Ādityas:
 ādityāsab, X, 77, 2; ādityéna nāmnā, X, 77, 8.—ādityā = nāka, (X, 121, 5²).—Vasus, Ādityas, Rudras, (VII, 56, 20²).—(See 243 seqq.); ādityāb āditib, (244);
 eight Ā., (251 seqq.); seven Ā., (252 seqq.); six Ā., (253.)
 ādhavanīya, a Soma-vessel:
 (VIII, 94, 5²).
 ā-dhita, known:
 ā-dhītam, what we once knew, I,
 170, 1.
 â-dhrish, see dhrish.
 âp, to find:
 âpúb, I, 167, 9; âpānām = âpnuvantam, (II, 34, 7¹).
 â-pathi, comer:
 â-pathayab, V, 52, 10.
 â-pathī, wanderer:
 â-pathyāb, I, 64, 11.
 âpānā, a draught:
 âpānām, II, 34, 7¹.
 âpī, friend:
 âpāyab, II, 34, 10; V, 53, 2¹.
 âpi-tvā, friendship:
 âpi-tvām, VIII, 20, 22.
 â-prīkkbya, honourable:
 â-prīkkbyam, I, 64, 13¹.
 â-bhū, mighty:
 â-bhūvab, I, 64, 1³; 6; 86, 5¹.
 â-bhūshénya, to be honoured:
 â-bhūshényam, V, 55, 4.
 âmbhrinī, the voice of the thunder:
 (275.)
 â-yagī, erjagend, obtaining:
 (V, 54, 1²).
 âyu, life:
 âyau (for âyaú), I, 114, 8¹.
 âyú, man:
 âyú-bhiḥ, with the men (Āyus), V,
 60, 8².—âyaú, read âyau, I, 114,
 8¹.
 âyudha, weapon:
 âyudhā, I, 39, 2; V, 57, 6; VIII,
 20, 12; âyudhaiḥ, VII, 56, 13;
 57, 3.
 âyus, life:
 âyub, I, 37, 15; âyushi, (I, 114, 8);
 âyumshi prá târishat, X, 186, 1; âyumshi sú-dhitāni, (225.)
 ârā, a shoemaker's awl:
 (I, 37, 2²; 88, 3¹).
 ârāt, far:
 ârāt kit yuyota, VII, 58, 6; X, 77, 6.
 ârātāt, from afar:
 I, 167, 9.
 ârugatnú, breaking through:
 ârugatnú-bhiḥ (c. Acc.), I, 6, 5.
 âruni, red flame:
 ârunīshu, I, 64, 7².
 âré, far:
 âré kakrima, we have put away, I,
 171, 4; âré, may it be far, I, 172,
 2 (bis); VII, 56, 17; I, 114, 10;
 âré asmāt asyatu, may he drive far away from us, I, 114, 4; âré bādhethām, VI, 74, 2.
 Ârgikā, N. of a country:
 ârgiké, VIII, 7, 29¹.—A sacrificial vessel, (VIII, 7, 29¹).—Ârgikāb, N. of the people of Ârgika, (398
 seqq.)
 Ârgikā, N. of a river:
 (399.)
 Ârgikiya, n. = Ârgika, the country:
 (398 seqq.).—Ârgikiyā, f. = Ârgikā, the river, (399.)
 âvis, openly:
 âvib (karta), I, 86, 9; VII, 58, 5.
 â-vrita, invested:
 â-vritab, I, 87, 4.
 â-sās, wish:
 â-sāsab, V, 56, 2.
 âsā, cleft:
 âsāb, I, 39, 3².
 â-sīr, milk (for the Soma):
 â-sīram, I, 134, 6 (bis).

ârú, quick, swift :

ârāvab, X, 78, 5.—ârú-bhiḥ, on the quick steeds, I, 37, 14; II, 34, 3^a; V, 55, 1; 61, 11.

ârú-arva, with quick horses :

ârú-arvāb, V, 58, 1; (I, 37, 2¹.)

ās, to sit :

āsate, they are enthroned (as gods), I, 19, 6; āsate, they dwell, I, 168, 3.—upa-āsate, they revere, X, 121, 2.

ās, mouth :

āsā vāndyāsab, visibly like, I, 168, 2.—ās, mouth, as the instrument of praise (41-43); etymology (42, note *); āsā, instr. (42 seq.).

āsān, mouth :

āsā-bhiḥ, I, 166, 11^a.

āsā :

instr. āsayā, (I, 168, 1^a.)

āsāt, coram :

(42 seq.)

āsyā, mouth :

āsyē, I, 38, 14.

i, to go . . . :

iyānāb, approaching for (two Acc.), II, 34, 14¹; yatīb vṛishī, going with rain, V, 53, 5¹; vyāthib yatī (a ship) that goes rolling, V, 59, 2¹; rītām yatē, to the righteous man, X, 78, 2; iyante, they move along, V, 55, 1; iyate, X, 168, 2; iyamānāb, X, 168, 3.—āti iyāma, let us pass, V, 53, 14.—adhi-ithā, you listen (c. Gen.), VII, 56, 15.—ānu yanti, they follow, V, 53, 6.—ā-itāsab, they are come, I, 165, 1^a; ūpa ā ayati, he comes (to ask) for (Acc.), VIII, 20, 22¹.—ūt-itab sūrab, the risen sun, X, 121, 6; ūt-ite sūrye, at sunrise, V, 54, 10.—nīb-etave, to come forth, I, 37, 9¹.—pārā itana, move along, V, 61, 4.—prayāt yantu, go forth, V, 87, 1; prayāt-bhyab, V, 54, 9; pra-yatī adhvarē, while the sacrifice proceeds, VIII, 7, 6; ānu prā yanti, V, 53, 10.—vī yayub parva-rāb, they have trodden to pieces, VIII, 7, 23; (VIII, 7, 22¹.)

lā, food :

lābhiḥ, V, 53, 2.

īt, indeed . . . :

āt it, then only, I, 87, 5; 168, 9;

evā it, I, 165, 12; gha it, II, 34, 14; it u, V, 55, 7; sā sā it, VI, 66, 3; sādām it, I, 114, 8.

itās, from here :

itāb (opp. to ātab), I, 6, 10.

iti :

V, 52, 11; 53, 3; 61, 8; 18.

itī, pace :

ityā (nābhasab), I, 167, 5.

itthā, thus :

I, 39, 1; 7; 165, 3; VII, 56, 15; VIII, 7, 30.—itthā dhiyā, thus is my thought, V, 61, 15¹; I, 2, 6².

itvan, see prātab-Itvan.

idām, this here . . . :

dyām imām, X, 121, 1; iyām prithivī, V, 54, 9.—asyā, X, 121, 3; I, 86, 4¹; 5; asya, his (Indra's), I, 6, 2¹.—eshām, I, 37, 3¹; 9; 13; 15; 38, 8; 12; 165, 13; V, 52, 15¹; 87, 2¹; etāvatab eshām, VIII, 7, 15¹; tāt eshām, this is theirs, VIII, 20, 14 (bis).—imā, here are, I, 165, 4; imē Marūtab (opp. anyē), VII, 57, 3.—idām, here, II, 33, 10.

idām-idam, again and again :

VII, 59, 1.

inā, strong :

ināsab, V, 54, 8.

īndu, (Soma) drop :

īndu-bhiḥ, VIII, 7, 14; īndavab, I, 2, 4; 134, 2.—īndo, O Indu, I, 43, 8.

Indra :

indra, īndra, I, 6, 5; 165, 3; 5; 7; 167, 1; 170, 2; 5; 171, 6; īndrab, I, 85, 9; 165, 10; 166, 12; VII, 56, 25; VIII, 94, 6; vāyo īndrab āa, I, 2, 5; 6; īndram, I, 6, 10; 87, 5; VIII, 7, 24; 31; īndrena, I, 6, 7; īndrāya, I, 165, 11; īndrasya, I, 6, 8; 167, 10; īndrāt, I, 171, 4; īndre, I, 166, 11.—Indra called vīra, (II, 33, 1¹.)

īndra-vat, joined by Indra :

īndra-vantab, V, 57, 1.

īndravāyu, Indra and Vāyu :

īndravāyū, I, 2, 4.

īndriyā, vigour :

īndriyām, I, 85, 2.—īndriyēna, with (Indra's) might, I, 165, 8¹.

īndh, to kindle :

īdhānāb, VI, 66, 2.—sām indhatām (agnīm), let them light (the fire),

I, 170, 4; sám-iddhab, V, 58, 3.
 —(I, 166, 1²). fndhanvan, fiery :
 fndhanva-bhiḥ, II, 34, 5².
 iradh :
 irādhyai, for achievement, I, 134, 2.
 frin, tyrant (?) :
 frī, V, 87, 3¹.
 írya, active :
 íryam (rágānam), V, 58, 4.
 iva, like . . . :
 ihā-iva, almost close by, I, 37, 3.—
 iva and ná, I, 85, 8¹.—iva, as one syllable, I, 166, 1³; p. cxix.
 ish, to rush :
 ishazanta, ishanta, I, 134, 5; p.
 cxxii.
 fsh, food :
 fsham, I, 168, 2¹; II, 34, 7; 8;
 ishā, I, 88, 1; 165, 15; 166, 15;
 167, 11; 168, 10; p. xx; VIII,
 20, 2; ishē bhugē, VIII, 20, 8;
 fshab (acc. pl.), I, 165, 12; VII, 59, 2; p. xviii; ishām, I, 168, 5.
 —fshab saśrúshib, waters, rain-clouds, I, 86, 5².—fshab, viands,
 I, 167, 1.—fsham, draught, VIII, 7, 1¹; 3; fshab, draughts, VIII, 7, 19.
 ishā, autumn :
 ishām, I, 165, 15; 166, 15; 167, 11; 168, 10; 171, 6; p. xx.
 fshazy, to hasten :
 fshazyata, V, 52, 14.
 fshirā, invigorating :
 fshirām, I, 168, 9.
 fshu, arrow :
 fshum, I, 39, 10; 64, 10.
 fshu-mat, carrying good arrows :
 fshu-mantab, V, 57, 2.
 fshkri, see kri.
 fshri, rite, oblation :
 fshrim, I, 166, 14; fshráyab, VI, 74, 1.
 ishmin, speeding along :
 ishminab, I, 87, 6; V, 87, 5; VII,
 56, 11.—ishminam, strong, V, 52, 16.
 ihā, here . . . :
 ihā-iva, almost close by, I, 37, 3.—
 —ihā-ihā, here and there, VII,
 59, 11¹.
 î, to ask for (with two Acc.) :
 îmahe, I, 6, 10; V, 53, 13; îmahe,
 I, 43, 4; II, 34, 11.—áva îmahe,

we pray to forgive, VII, 58, 5.—
 See also i.
 î, pronominal base, see ayā, and îm.
 îksh :
 abhî afkshetām, they look up to (acc.), X, 121, 6.
 îñkh, to toss :
 îñkháyanti, I, 19, 7.
 id, to implore, to ask :
 î/e, V, 60, 1¹; î/e (with double Acc.), I, 134, 5.
 îm :
 I, 38, 11; 85, 11; 134, 2; 167, 8
 (bis); V, 54, 4; yāt îm, I, 87, 5;
 167, 5; 7; VII, 56, 21; yē îm,
 V, 61, 11; ké îm, VII, 56, 1; úpa îm, I, 171, 2.
 îr :
 â-îrîré, they produced, assumed, I,
 6, 4³.—ut-îráyanti (vātam), they send out, I, 168, 8; út îrayatha, you raise, V, 55, 5¹; út îrayanta, they have risen, VIII, 7, 3; út îrate, VIII, 7, 7; 17.—prá îrate, they come forth, VII, 56, 14;
 prá airata, they expanded, VIII,
 20, 4; prá îrayāmi, I send forth, II, 33, 8; sám prá îrate, they rise, X, 168, 2.
 îvat, so much :
 îvatab, VII, 56, 18.
 îr, to rule, to be lord (with Gen.) :
 îre, X, 121, 3; îre, I, 165, 10;
 îrishe, I, 170, 5; îshre, V, 87, 3;
 îsire, V, 58, 1.—îrānāb, I, 87, 4;
 îrānāt, II, 33, 9.
 îrāna-kṛit, conferring powers :
 îrāna-kṛitab, I, 64, 5¹.
 îsh, to shrink :
 îshante, VI, 66, 4.
 u, particle . . . :
 ná vaf u, II, 33, 9.—u before loka,
 p. lxxiv seqq.
 ukthā, praise, hymn :
 ukthām, I, 86, 4; ukthā, I, 165, 4¹; ukthāni, VII, 56, 23; uk-thaib, VII, 56, 18; ukthēbhiḥ, I, 2, 2.—vāhniḥ ukthaib, the priest with his hymns (41).
 ukthā-vāhas, offering hymns of praise :
 (40.)
 ukthyā, praiseworthy :
 ukthyām, I, 64, 14¹.—ukthyām

- (gâyatrām), praising, of praise, I, 38, 14.
- uksh, to sprinkle, to pour out, to wash:
- ukshānti, I, 166, 3; ukshānte, II, 34, 3¹; V, 59, 1; ukshāmānāb, VI, 66, 4.—ā ukshata, I, 87, 2. —(I, 85, 2¹.)
- uksh, to grow:
- see vaksh.
- ukshān, bull:
- ukshānāb, I, 64, 2¹; V, 52, 3; gāvab ukshānāb, excellent bulls, I, 168, 2⁸. — ukshnāb rāndhram, 'the hollow of the bull,' VIII, 7, 26¹.
- Ukshnorandhra, N. pr.: (VIII, 7, 26¹.)
- ugrā, terrible, strong:
- ugrāb, I, 19, 4; VI, 66, 6; VII, 56, 6; 57, 1; I, 134, 5; ugrāsab, VIII, 20, 12; āpab ugrāb, wild waters, VI, 66, 11²; ugrāb, I, 166, 6; 8; V, 57, 3; 60, 2; ugrāb, I, 165, 6; 10; VII, 56, 23; II, 33, 9; ugrāb ugrēbhiḥ, I, 171, 5; ugrān, VI, 66, 5; ugrām, VII, 56, 7; VIII, 20, 3; II, 33, 11; ugrāya manyāve, fierce anger, I, 37, 7. — dyaūb ugrā, the awful heaven, X, 121, 5¹.
- ugrā-putra, having terrible sons:
- ugrā-putrā (Aditi), (254; 260.)
- ugrā-bāhu, strong-armed:
- ugrā-bāhavab, VIII, 20, 12.
- ūt, prep. . . .
- utā, and, also; even . . . : then, after yāt, I, 85, 5.—utā vā, aye, or also, I, 86, 3; V, 60, 6; V, 58, 1; utā sma—utā sma—utā, whether—or whether, V, 52, 8; 9; mā—utā mā, I, 114, 7 (tris).—utā gha, even though, V, 61, 8¹; nūnām utā, even now, VIII, 20, 15.
- ut-rík:
- ut-ríkī yagñé, to the end of the ceremony, X, 77, 7¹.
- utó, also:
- V, 55, 4; VIII, 94, 6; I, 134, 6; X, 168, 1.
- ūt-ogas, ever-powerful:
- ūt-ogasab, V, 54, 3.
- ut-tamá, highest:
- ut-tamām, exalted, V, 59, 3; ut-tamé, in the highest (heaven), V, 60, 6.
- út-tara, higher:
- út-tarāt diváb, V, 60, 7; út-tarā dyaūb, VIII, 20, 6.
- ut-bhíd, breaking out:
- ut-bhídaḥ, V, 59, 6.
- útsa, spring, well (cloud):
- útsam, I, 64, 6⁴; (I, 85, 10¹); I, 85, 11; V, 52, 12⁸; 54, 8; VII, 57, 1; VIII, 7, 10²; 16; diváb útsāb, the springs of heaven, V, 57, 1.
- utsa-dhí, the lid of the well:
- utsa-dhīm, I, 88, 4¹; (176.)
- udán, water:
- udā-bhiḥ, I, 85, 5; nimnāb udā-bhiḥ, X, 78, 5.
- udanyú, longing for water:
- udanyávab, V, 54, 2; udanyáve, V, 57, 1.
- uda-vāhá, water-carrier:
- uda-vāhēna, I, 38, 9; uda-vāhāsab, V, 58, 3.
- udrín, watering-pot:
- udrínam, VIII, 7, 10².
- und, to water, moisten:
- vi-undānti, I, 38, 9; ví undanti, I, 85, 5; V, 54, 8.
- úpa, prep. . . . : with Loc., úpa rátheshu, I, 39, 6; 87, 2.—with Acc., to, I, 166, 2¹; úpa te, near to thee, I, 114, 9.—úpa dyú-bhiḥ, day by day, V, 53, 3¹.
- upa-má, very high:
- upa-māsab, V, 58, 5.
- úpara, carried behind:
- úparā, I, 167, 3⁸.
- upári, above:
- V, 61, 12.
- upavā, the blowing after:
- (X, 77, 5².)
- Upastutā, N. pr., son of Vṛishnihavya: (152 seq.).—See stu.
- upá-stha, lap:
- upá-sthe, VII, 56, 25; VIII, 94, 2¹.
- upa-hatnú, attacking:
- upa-hatnúm, II, 33, 11.
- upa-hvará, cleft:
- upa-hvaréshu, I, 87, 2.
- upará, injury:
- (66.)
- ubg:
- níb aubgat, he forced out, I, 85, 9.
- ubhá, both:
- ubhé, heaven and earth, (V, 59, 7⁸); VI, 66, 6; ubhé ródasí, VIII, 20, 4.

ubhāya :
 ubhāye, people on both sides, V, 59, 7.²
 urú, wide :
 urú, I, 85, 6 ; 7 ; uráu antárikṣhe, V, 52, 7 ; urávab, V, 57, 4 ; urvī, VII, 57, 1.—uru as one syllable, p. lxxvi.
 uru-kramá, wide-striding :
 uru-kramáb (Vishṇu), V, 87, 4.¹
 uru-kshāya, wide-ruling :
 uru-kshāyā, I, 2, 9.
 urú-loka :
 urú-lokam (antáriksham), p. lxxvii.
 uru-vyátas :
 ep. of Aditi, (260.)
 uru-vyáñk, wide-reaching :
 urúñk, ep. of Aditi, (260.)—urúñk, I, 2, 3.
 uru-vraga :
 uru-vragā, ep. of Aditi, (260.)
 urushy, to deliver :
 urushyata, V, 87, 6.
 urúñk, see uru-vyáñk.
 Urvasī :
 (308.)
 urvāruká, gourd :
 urvārukám-iva, VII, 59, 12.
 urviyā, wide :
 V, 55, 2.
 uloka for u loka :
 pp. lxxiv seqq.
 ur, see var.
 Uśanas :
 = Uśanā, (VIII, 7, 26².)
 Uśanā, N. of a Rishi :
 uśanā, with Uśanā, VIII, 7, 26².
 urānā, desire :
 uśanā, with desire, (VIII, 7, 26².)
 ushás, dawn :
 ushásab ví-usháishu, usháb ná, II, 34, 12 ; ushásab, the Dawns, V, 59, 8 ; I, 134, 3 (bis) ; 4 ; ushát-bhiḥ, I, 6, 3² ; ushásām ná ketávab, X, 78, 7.
 usrá :
 kshápab usráb ka, and usráb, by night and by day, (I, 64, 8².)—usráb-iva, the heavens, I, 87, 1.
 —usráb, the mornings, I, 171, 5.
 usri :
 usrí, in the morning, (II, 34, 12¹) ; V, 53, 14.¹
 usríya, bright :
 usríyab, the bright ones (days or clouds), I, 6, 5³ ; usríyab, (II, 34, 12¹.)—usríyab vrishabháb, the bull of the Dawn, V, 58, 6².

 útí, protection, help, favour :
 útí, II, 34, 15 ; VII, 59, 4 ; útí, instr., I, 64, 13 ; 172, 1¹ ; VII, 57, 7 ; 59, 9¹ ; 10 ; útáye, II, 34, 14 ; VIII, 7, 6 ; útáyab, I, 167, 1 ; V, 54, 7 ; I, 134, 2 ; útí-bhiḥ, favours, I, 39, 8 ; 9 ; VII, 58, 3 ; VIII, 20, 24 ; útíshu, VIII, 20, 15.
 ūdhan and ūdhar, udder :
 ūdhab divyāni, the heavenly udders (clouds), I, 64, 5.—ūdhani, II, 34, 2² ; 6.—ūdhab, II, 34, 10 ; VI, 66, 1 ; VII, 56, 4.¹
 ūma, guardian :
 ūmāsab, I, 166, 3 ; ūmāb, V, 52, 12 ; X, 77, 8.
 ūrnā, wool :
 ūrnāb vasata, V, 52, 9¹.
 ūrnu :
 āpa ūrnute, she uncovers, II, 34, 12¹.
 ūrdhvā, erect :
 ūrdhvā kṛinavante, they stir up, I, 88, 3¹ ; ūrdhvām nunudre, they pushed up, I, 85, 10 ; 88, 4 ; ūrdhvā santu, may they stand erect, I, 171, 3¹ ; ūrdhvā nab karta, lift us up, I, 172, 3 ; ūrdhvā tishṭbatu, may (the dawn) stand erect, I, 134, 1².
 ūrml, wave :
 ūrmáyab, I, 168, 2.
 ūrmyā, night :
 ūrmye, V, 61, 17¹.
 ūh, see vah.
 ūh, to watch :
 ohate, V, 52, 10 ; 11 ; ní ohate, V, 52, 11.—ohate (sakhitvé), he is counted (in your friendship), VIII, 7, 31.
 ri, to go :
 lyarti, it rises, I, 165, 4² ; p. xv ; xxi.—arta, it came, V, 52, 6.—ā ūyarta, bring, VIII, 7, 13.—ūt arpaya, raise up, II, 33, 4.—mā náb arāma, may we not fall away, VII, 56, 21.—pró ārata, come on, I, 39, 5¹.—sam-arānāb, coming together, I, 165, 3.
 ri, to hurt, see ar.
 rikti, praise :
 su-rikti (?), (I, 64, 1².)
 ríkvan, singer :
 ríkvānab (Maruts), I, 87, 5 ; ríkva-

- bhiḥ, V, 52, 1; 60, 8.—ríkva- bhiḥ, men to celebrate them,
I, 87, 6².
- ríksha*, bear:
ríkshab ná, V, 56, 3.
- rik*, to sing, praise:
arkati, I, 6, 8¹; árkanti, I, 165, 1⁴;
p. xiii; árka, V, 59, 1⁴; árkantab,
I, 85, 2; árkate, I, 87, 2; án- rikúb (arkám), I, 19, 4¹; arkat,
I, 165, 14.—Inf. rikáse, (I, 87, 6¹).—prá árka, V, 52, 1¹; 5;
prá arkata, V, 54, 1; VII, 58, 1;
prá árkonti, I, 166, 7².
- rikás*, praiser:
rikáse, (I, 87, 6¹.)
- rigipyá*, headlong:
rigipyásab, II, 34, 4².
- rigishá*, what remains of the Soma-plant after it has been squeezed:
(I, 64, 12⁶.)
- rigishín*, impetuous:
rigishínám, I, 64, 12⁶; rigishínab,
I, 87, 1; II, 34, 1.
- riṅg*, to strive, to yearn:
riṅgáta, you advanced, V, 87, 5;
riṅgati, straightforward, I, 172,
2; Inf. riṅgáse, (I, 87, 6¹); rigi- shá from rig, (I, 64, 12⁶).—nf riṅgate, they gain, I, 37, 3².—
sám asmin riṅgate, they yearn for it, I, 6, 9.
- rina-yá*, going after debt:
(I, 87, 4².)
- rina-yāvan*, searching out sin:
rina-yāvā, I, 87, 4².
- ritá*, right; rite, sacrifice:
riténa, in proper order, VII, 56, 12; on the right way, I, 2, 8;
ritám yaté, to the righteous man, X, 78, 2.—ritásya sáda- neshu, in the sacred places, II, 34, 13²; ritásya párasmin dhā- man, in the highest place of the law, I, 43, 9¹.—ritám, sacrifice, V, 59, 1; ritásya, VIII, 7, 21;
ritānām, I, 165, 13.—(I, 38, 6¹.)
- ritá-gāta*, well-born:
ritá-gātāb, V, 61, 14.
- rita-gña*, righteous:
rita-gñāb, V, 57, 8; 58, 8.
- rita-yú*, pious:
rita-yāvab, V, 54, 12².
- ritá-van*, holy:
ritá-vā, X, 168, 3.
- rita-váká*, hymn:
(I, 134, 1².)
- rita-vridh*, increasing the right:
rita-vridhau (mitrávarunau), I, 2, 8.
- rita-sāp*, following the order:
rita-sāpab, VII, 56, 12; (I, 2, 8¹.)
- rita-spriṣ*, adhering to the right:
rita-spriṣā (mitrávarunau), I, 2, 8¹.
- riti*, hurting:
(65); (I, 64, 15¹.)
- riti-sáh*, defying all onslaughts:
riti-sāham, I, 64, 15¹.
- ritu-thā*, at the right season:
I, 170, 5.
- ritupati*, N. of Agni:
(I, 43, 4¹.)
- ridūdára*, kindhearted (?):
ridūdaráb, II, 33, 5².
- ridh*, to accomplish:
ridhyām, V, 60, 1.
- ridhak*, far:
VII, 57, 4.
- Ribhu*, the Ribhus:
(V, 58, 4¹; VI, 66, 11¹.)
- ribhukshan* (?):
ribhukshanab, VIII, 7, 9¹; 12; 20, 2.
- ribhukshás*, lord:
ribhukshāb, I, 167, 10.
- ribhvas*, bold, rabid:
ribhvasam, V, 52, 8¹.
- rish*:
tiráb (srídhab) árshanti, they rush through, VIII, 94, 7.
- ríshi*, seer:
ríshe, V, 52, 13; 14; ríshe, V,
59, 8; ríshim vā rágānam vā, V,
54, 7; ríshim—rágānam, V, 54,
14.—(V, 61, 5².)
- rishi-dvish*, enemy of the poets:
rishi-dvíshe, I, 39, 10.
- rishí*, spear:
rishírb, I, 167, 3²; rishíráyab, I,
64, 4; (II, 34, 2¹); V, 54, 11;
57, 6; VIII, 20, 11; rishírb, V,
52, 6; rishírb-bhiḥ, I, 37, 2; 64,
8; 85, 4; (VII, 56, 13¹); rish- tíshu, I, 166, 4.
- rishri-mát*, armed with spears:
rishrimát-bhiḥ, I, 88, 1; (170);
rishri-mántab, V, 57, 2; 60, 3.
- rishírb-vidyut*, armed with lightning-spears:
rishírb-vidyutab, (I, 167, 3²); V, 52,

- 13; rishri-vidyutab, I, 168, 5; (II, 34, 2¹).
rishvá, tall:
rishváśab, I, 64, 2; rishvāb, V, 52, 6¹; 13.
- éka*, alone:
ékab, X, 121, 1; 3; 7²; 8; I, 165, 3; ékam, I, 165, 6; VIII, 20, 13; ékasya kit me, I, 165, 10.—ékab-ekab, one by one, V, 61, 1.
- ékam-eka*:
ékam-ekā śatā, each a hundred, V, 52, 17.
- eg*:
egati, (the earth) trembles, V, 59, 2.—égatha, you stir, VIII, 20, 4.
- eda*, a kind of sheep:
(I, 166, 10³; 235.)
- ena*, a kind of antelope:
(I, 166, 10³; 235.)
- éta*, the fallow deer:
étāb, (I, 165, 1³); V, 54, 5; étān, I, 165, 5².—étāb, speckled deer-skins, I, 166, 10³; (232; 234 seq.)—étāb ná, like harts, X, 77, 2.—See ena.
- etād*, this . . .:
etāni víśvā gātāni, all these created things, X, 121, 10.—etān and étān, (I, 165, 5²).—eté, there they are, I, 165, 12.—etāt tyāt, I, 88, 5; eshā syā, I, 88, 6.—etāni nityā, these secrets, VII, 56, 4¹.
- étara*, the (solar) horse:
étarab, I, 168, 5⁴.
- etāvat*, so much:
etāvat, VII, 57, 3.—etāvatab kit eshām, of that immense (host) of them, VIII, 7, 15¹.
- ena*, fem. enī:
enyāb, spotted deer, V, 53, 7².—See éta, (234 seq.)
- enad*, this:
enā, instr., II, 34, 14; V, 53, 12; enān, V, 52, 6.
- énas*, sin:
énab, VII, 58, 5; VI, 74, 3.
- éman*, march:
éma-bhiḥ, V, 59, 2.
- éva*, horse:
évāśab, I, 166, 4; (I, 168, 1²).
- evá*:
evá it, truly, I, 165, 12; evá and evám, (I, 168, 1²).—evá, thus, II, 33, 15.
- evám*, thus:
adverb of éva, (I, 168, 1²).
- evayā*, quickly moving, quick:
eva-yāb, I, 168, 1² (conjecture for deva-yāb); (365.)
- evayāmarut*, Evayāmarut, a sacrificial shout:
evayāmarut, V, 87, 1 to 9; (365); (I, 168, 1²).
- eva-yāvan*, the constant wanderer:
eva-yāvnab, II, 34, 11.—fem. eva-yāvarī, (I, 168, 1²); (365.)
- eshā*, rapid:
eshāsya (vishṇob), II, 34, 11¹; VIII, 20, 3².
- aineya*, skin of an antelope:
(232; 234.)
- aídh*, torch:
aidhā-iva, I, 166, 1².
- ó, see ā.
- ókas*, home:
svám ókab, VII, 56, 24¹.
- ógas*, power:
ógab, I, 39, 10; V, 57, 6; VII, 56, 7; I, 165, 10; ógasā, I, 19, 4; 8; 39, 8; 85, 4; 10; V, 52, 9; 14²; 55, 2; 56, 4; 59, 7; VII, 58, 2; VIII, 7, 8; ógab-bhiḥ, VII, 56, 6.—ógiyab, stronger, II, 33, 10.
- óshadhi*, plant:
óshadhīb, I, 166, 5; óshadhīshu, VII, 56, 22; óshadhīb (nom.), VII, 56, 25.
- aukshṇorandhra*:
(VIII, 7, 26¹).
- Ka*, Who, the Unknown God:
(p. 3.)
- kakúbh*, hump:
kakúbbab rihaté mithāb, they lick one another's humps, VIII, 20, 21¹.
- kakuhā*, exalted:
kakuhān, II, 34, 11.
- Kāṇva*:
kāṇvam, I, 39, 9; VIII, 7, 18;
kāṇvāya, I, 39, 7¹.—kāṇvāb, I, 37, 1; kāṇveshu, I, 37, 14;
kāṇvāśab, VIII, 7, 32.

- kát, interrog. part.:
VIII, 94, 7; 8.—See kím.
- katamá:
katamát kaná áhab, even a single day, X, 168, 3.
- kathám, how:
V, 61, 2.
- kathá, how:
V, 53, 2; 61, 2.
- kadž, when:
VIII, 7, 30.
- kádha:
when, I, 38, 1¹; where, VIII, 7, 31.
- kadha-prí:
kadha-priyab (read kádha priyáb), I, 38, 1¹; VIII, 7, 31.
- kan, see kanáná.
- kananā, a caterpillar:
kananā-iva, V, 54, 6¹.
- kaparda, a shell, the hair twisted together in the form of a shell:
(I, 114, 1²).
- kapardín, with braided hair:
kapardíne (rudráya), I, 114, 1²;
kapardínám, I, 114, 5.
- kám, part.:
I, 39, 7; 87, 6¹; 88, 2; 3 (bis); VII, 57, 3; VIII, 94, 2; hí kam, VII, 59, 5.
- kambala, m., cloth made of vegetable substance:
(233-)
- kárna:
kárnaib nadásya, with the points of the reed, II, 34, 3².
- karmalíkin, fiery (?):
karmalíkinám, II, 33, 8².
- kávandha, water-skin:
kávandham, VIII, 7, 10²; (V, 54, 8²).
- kavandhín, carrying water-skins:
kavandhínab, V, 54, 8².
- kaví, poet; wise:
kaváyab, V, 52, 13; kaváyab, V, 57, 8; 58, 8; wise, VII, 59, 11; kaváyab, V, 58, 3; kavím, wise, I, 114, 4; kaví, I, 2, 9.
- káśā, whip:
káśāb, I, 37, 3¹; káśayā, I, 168, 4.
- Kānvá:
kānvásya, VIII, 7, 19.
- kāma, desire:
kāmam, I, 85, 11; kāmasya, I, 86, 8; kāmab, V, 61, 18.
- kāmín, loving, desiring:
kāmínab, V, 53, 16; VII, 59, 3.—
kāmínám, the needy, V, 61, 7.
- kāmya, beloved:
kāmyā, I, 6, 2; V, 61, 16; kām-yaib, I, 6, 8.
- kārú, poet, singer:
kārúb, I, 165, 14; kārób, I, 165, 15; 166, 15; 167, 11; 168, 10;
kárave, II, 34, 7; káravab, VIII, 94, 3.
- kārpāsa, cotton dress:
(234-)
- kāvya:
kāvya, wise thoughts, V, 59, 4.
- kāshāya, dark red:
(232, 234-)
- kāshubā, fence:
kāshubāb, I, 37, 10².
- kím, interrog. pron. . . .:
kásmai devāya havishā vidhema, X, 121, 1-9; kím te, what has happened to thee? I, 165, 3; káb nú, I, 165, 13; káb nūnám, V, 61, 14; kát ha nūnám, what then now? I, 38, 1¹; VIII, 7, 31; kát ártam, what errand? I, 38, 2; kát votéma, what could we say? I, 43, 1.—kím, why? I, 170, 2; 3.—kím with kaná, indef. pron., (265 seq.)—
káb kit, any one, I, 37, 13; ké kit, a few only, I, 87, 1¹; V, 52, 12; kéna kit, whatever, I, 87, 2.
- kirāna, speck of dust:
kirānam, V, 59, 4.
- kilāś, spotted deer:
kilāśyāb, V, 53, 1¹.
- kírn, gleeman:
kírínab, V, 52, 12².
- kutapa, woollen cloth:
(234-)
- kútas, whence:
kútab, I, 165, 1; 3¹; X, 168, 3; p. xiv.
- kup, caus., to rouse:
kopáyatha, V, 57, 3.
- kubhanyú, wildly shouting:
kubhanyávab, V, 52, 12².
- Kúbhā, the Kabul river:
kúbhā, V, 53, 9¹.
- kumārā, boy:
kumārāb, II, 33, 12.
- Kuru:
(VIII, 20, 24¹)

Kurukshetra :

(398 seq.)

kuvít, interrog. part.:

VII, 58, 5.

kûlabheda, cutting through the banks (of a river) :

(263.)

kûshtab=kú shtab :

(I, 38, 1¹.)

kri, to make . . . :

krinavante ū:dhvā, may they stir up, I, 88, 3; ūrdhvān karta, I, 172, 3; bhūri *āk*artha, thou hast achieved much, I, 165, 7; bhūriṇi krināvāma, I, 165, 7; p. xvi; bhūri *āk*akra, you have valued, VII, 56, 23¹.—krinōti, he performs a sacrifice for (Dat.), (205, note *); krinvāntab brāhma, making prayer, I, 88, 4; krité kit, whatever little we have done, VII, 57, 5.—kārāma āgāb, VII, 57, 4; *kritām énab, VI, 74, 3. — yāni karishyā krinuhī, do what thou wilt do, I, 165, 9⁴; p. xvii; yā nū krināvai, I, 165, 10.—kartana tavishāni, prove your powers, I, 166, 1.—*ārē āk*rima, we have put away, I, 171, 4.—mā kirām karat, may it not cause delay, V, 56, 7.—kritām, made (at play, or in battle), V, 60, 1².—*āk*akrire satrā, they have brought together, V, 60, 4.—krinuté mānab deva-trā, she is mindful of the gods, V, 61, 7.—*āk*akrire vridhē, I, 85, 1; kridhi gīvātave, X, 186, 2.—āram krinvantu, let them prepare, I, 170, 4.—*ā asmān āk*kré, has brought us hither, I, 165, 14¹; (203); ā akaram ūpa te, I have driven thee to thee, I, 114, 9.—āvīb karta, make manifest, I, 86, 9.—īshkarta, straighten, VIII, 20, 26¹.—prā akran, they tried to make, V, 59, 1¹.—See krāná, nib-kritā.

krití, sword :

kritīb, I, 168, 3.

krish, to plough :

*āk*arkrishat, VIII, 20, 19.

k/ṛp :

tébhib kalpasva sādhu-yā, fare kindly with them, I, 170, 2.

ketú, light :

ketúm, I, 6, 3¹; ketúnā, V, 60, 8; ketávab (ushásām), rays, X, 78, 7.—ketāve, herald, I, 166, 1².—See aketú.

Kailāsa :

from kilāsa ? (V, 53, 1¹.)

komyā (?) :

I, 171, 3¹.

kōra, cask, bucket (cloud) :

kōrāb, I, 87, 2¹; kōram, V, 53, 6; 59, 8.—kōre hiraṇyāye, at the golden chest (on the chariot), VIII, 20, 8¹.

krátu, power of body and mind :

krátvā, wisdom, I, 39, 1; V, 87, 2¹; with our mind, I, 165, 7²; krátum, I, 64, 13; 2, 8; VIII, 7, 24; might, I, 19, 2.

krand, to roar :

*āk*radat bhiyā, VIII, 7, 26.—áva krandat, V, 58, 6.—prā krand, to call out, (V, 59, 1¹.)

krāndasī, heaven and earth :

krāndasī, X, 121, 6¹.

kram, to stride :

*āk*rame, V, 87, 4; ānu krāmema, let us follow, V, 53, 11; akra-mīm, (I, 165, 8¹.)

kravis, raw flesh :

(I, 166, 6³.)

krāná, made (?) :

*krānásab, *krānáb (bis), I, 134, 2¹.

Krivi :

krívim, VIII, 20, 24¹.

krívib-dat, gory-toothed :

krívib-datí, I, 166, 6³.

kríd, to play :

krílanti, I, 166, 2; krílatha, V, 60, 3.

krílā, playful :

krílām (sárdhab), I, 37, 1; 5; krílāb, I, 166, 2.

krílī, sportive, playful :

krílāyab, I, 87, 3; (sírlílāb), X, 78, 6.

krudh :

*mā tvā āk*rudhāma, let us not incense thee, II, 33, 4.

krúdhmin, furious :

krúdhmī, VII, 56, 8.

Krúmu, the Kurrum :

*Krúmub, V, 53, 9¹.

krúra, horrible :

(I, 166, 6³.)

Kṛīradantī, N. of Durgā:

(I, 166, 6³.)

kvā, where:

I, 38, 2¹ (bis); 3 (bis, and kvō); I, 165, 6; V, 61, 2 (bis); VIII, 7, 20; II, 33, 7; kvā svit, kvā, I, 168, 6; X, 168, 3.—kvā, pronounced kuva, (86.)

ksháp, night:

kshápab, by night, I, 64, 8²; pūrváb áti kshápab, through many nights, X, 77, 2.

ksham:

abhí kshameta nab árvati, may he be gracious to our horse, II, 33, 1¹; abhí ákshamīthāb mā, wilt thou bear with me? II, 33, 7.

kshám, earth:

kshamá, on earth, V, 52, 3; down to the earth, VIII, 20, 26¹.

kshámya, earthly:

kshámyasya gánmanab, what is born on earth, VII, 46, 2.

ksháya, dwelling:

ksháye, I, 86, 1; ksháyam, VII, 59, 2.

ksháya, lordship:

ksháyena, being the lord, VII, 46, 2¹.

kshayát-víra, ruling over heroes:

kshayát-víráya (rudráya), I, 114, 1²; 2; kshayát-vírasya, I, 114, 3; kshayát-víra, I, 114, 10.

kshar, to flow:

ksharati, (the ship) sways, V, 59, 2.—prá áksharat, he has poured out, VIII, 7, 1.

kshi, to dwell:

ksheti, V, 61, 19.—á ksheti, he acquires, I, 64, 13.

kshiti, hamlet:

kshitinām, X, 78, 1.

kshiprá-ishu, with swift arrows:

kshiprá-ishave (Rudra), VII, 46, 1.

kshud:

kshódante ápab, the waters gush, V, 58, 6; kshodanti, they stir, VII, 58, 1.

kshumá, flax:

(233.)

kshurá, sharp edge:

kshuráb, I, 166, 10⁴.

kshoní:

kshoníbhiḥ, with the (morning) clouds, II, 34, 13¹.—kshoníb, pl., women, (308; 309 seq.); kshoní, du., heaven and earth, VIII, 7, 22; (309.)

kshódas, rush of water:

kshódasā, V, 53, 7.

kshaumí, linen dress:

(234.)

kshamá, earth:

kshamayā kárati, it traverses the earth, VII, 46, 3.

khād, to chew up:

khádatha, I, 64, 7².

khādí, ring, quoit:

khādíb, I, 168, 3.—khádáyab, I, 166, 9²; V, 54, 11; VII, 56, 13; khádíshu, V, 53, 4.—(I, 64, 10²; II, 34, 2¹.)

khādín, having rings:

khádínab, II, 34, 2¹.

khádi-hasta, adorned with rings on their hands, or, holding the quoits in their hands:

khádi-hastam, V, 58, 2; (I, 166, 9².)

ganá, host, company:

ganáb, I, 87, 4 (bis); V, 61, 13; VII, 56, 7; (VI, 66, 11¹); ganám, I, 38, 15; 64, 12; V, 52, 13; 14, 53, 10; 56, 1; 58, 1; 2; VIII, 94, 12; X, 77, 1⁴; ganám-ganam, V, 53, 11; ganáya, VII, 58, 1.—ganaíb, hosts (of Indra), I, 6, 8.

gana-jrí, marching in companies:

gana-jriyab, I, 64, 9; ganajrí-bhiḥ, V, 60, 8¹; p. lxxxviii.

gábhasti, fist:

gábhastyob, I, 64, 10; V, 54, 11; from our hands, I, 88, 6¹; (178.)

gam, to go . . .:

gántā, he will live in, I, 86, 3¹.—gatáb ádhvā, a trodden path, VII, 58, 3.—á gahi, come hither, I, 6, 9; 19, 1-9.—úpa á gamam, I, 2, 4; á nab úpa gantana, VIII, 7, 11; 27.—práti á gathá, VIII, 20, 16.—sam-gagmānáb, coming together, I, 6, 7.

gám, earth:

gmáb, I, 37, 6.

gáya, house:

gáyam, VI, 74, 2.

gar, see gri.

garút-mat, p. xxv.

garta-sád, sitting in the chariot (hole):

garta-sadam, II, 33, 11¹.

gárbha, germ :

gárbham, X, 121, 7; V, 58, 7; VI, 66, 3; bhūvanasya gárbhaḥ, the germ of the world, X, 168, 4¹.

garbha-tvá, the form of new-born babes :

garbha-tvám, I, 6, 4³.

gávya, consisting of cows :

(rādhā) gávyam, V, 52, 17; paśúm gávyam, V, 61, 5.

gavyát, desirous of cows :

gavyántab, (I, 167, 1¹).

gā, to go :

gīgāti, V, 87, 4; I, 2, 3.—ádhi gātana, do remember (c. Gen.), V, 55, 9; ádhi gāta, VIII, 20, 22; X, 78, 8.—ā gāt, she went to, I, 167, 5; ō gīgātu, II, 34, 15; ā gīgātana, V, 59, 6; ā gīgāta, VII, 57, 7.—ūpa gāt, I, 38, 5.—pāri ā vaḥ ā agub, they went round you and came back to, I, 88, 4¹; pāri gāt, may it pass by, II, 33, 14.—prā gīgāta, come forth, I, 85, 6; prā gīgāti, I, 87, 5.

gātú, path :

gātúm, V, 87, 8.

gāthá, song :

gāthám, I, 167, 6; (I, 43, 4¹).

gāthá-pati, lord of songs :

gāthá-patim (rudrám), I, 43, 4¹.

gāyatrá, song :

gāyatrám (ukthyām), I, 38, 14.

gír, speech, song :

iyám gírb, I, 165, 15; 166, 15; 167, 11; 168, 10; imám me. gíram, VIII, 7, 9; gírā, I, 38, 13; V, 52, 13; 53, 16; 87, 3; VIII, 20, 19; 20; gírāb, I, 64, 1; V, 61, 17; VII, 46, 1; (I, 37, 10¹; 165, 4¹).

gír, singer :

gírāb (the Maruts), I, 6, 6¹; 9; 37, 10¹.

gírí, mountain, cloud :

gírí, VIII, 7, 5; gírīm, I, 37, 12; gírāyab, I, 64, 7; VIII, 7, 34; gírīm ānaṣva-dām, western mountain, V, 54, 5¹; gírāyab for gírāyab (?), VI, 66, 11²; ádhi-iva gírínām, VIII, 7, 14.—gírí (párvatab), gnarled (cloud), I, 37, 7¹; párvatam gírím, V, 56, 4².

gírī-kshít, ep. of Vishṇu :

(V, 87, 1¹).

gírī-gā, voice-born :

gírī-gāb, V, 87, 1¹.

gírī-sthā, dwelling on mountains :

gírī-sthām (mārutam ganám), VIII, 94, 12; (V, 57, 8¹; 87, 1¹).

gurú, heavy :

gurú, I, 39, 3; VII, 56, 19; laghu and guru, light and heavy syllables, p. xcvi.

guh, to hide :

gúhata, I, 86, 10.

gúha, hiding-place :

gúhā, I, 6, 5; gúhā (śárantī), in secret, I, 167, 3.

gúhya, hideous :

gúhyam, I, 86, 10.

gúrtá-tama, most delightful :

gúrtá-tamāb, I, 167, 1.

gri (gar), caus., to raise up :

gigrítā, VII, 57, 6².

grídhra, hawk :

grídhraḥ, I, 88, 4¹.

gríhá, house :

gríhé, X, 186, 3.

gríha-medha, accepting the domestic sacrifices :

gríha-medhāsab, VII, 59, 10¹; (VII, 56, 14²).

gríhamedhin :

marutab gríhamedhinab, (VII, 56, 14²; 59, 10¹).

gríha-medhiya, offering for the house-gods :

gríha-medhíyam, VII, 56, 14².

grí, to praise :

grínímasi, I, 64, 12; II, 33, 8; grínántam, VII, 57, 2; grínaté, VI, 66, 9; gríníhi, V, 53, 16; gríníshe, (V, 58, 1¹); II, 33, 12; grínânāb, V, 55, 10; 59, 8; grínânāb, VII, 56, 18.—ā grínanti, they invite, VIII, 94, 3.—ūpa grínímasi, II, 34, 14.

gai, to sing :

gāya, I, 38, 14; gāyat, I, 167, 6; agub, (175.)—abhí gāya, VIII, 20, 19.—prā gāyata, I, 37, 1; 4.

gó, cow, bull :

gáúb-iva, V, 56, 3; gāvab ná, I, 38, 2; V, 53, 16; 56, 4; gāvab ná ukshānab, I, 168, 2²; gāvab, VIII, 20, 21¹; gāb-iva, VIII, 20, 19; gāvām sárgam-iva, V, 56, 5; gāvām-iva, V, 59, 3.—gáve, I, 43, 2; 6; góshu, VI, 66, 8; I, 114, 8.—góshu, among the cows (clouds), I, 37, 5¹; gāb, the (rain-giving) cows, II, 34, 1.—gāub, the cow (Prisni), VIII, 94, 1¹; gām, V, 52, 16.—gō, cow, milk, leather, thong, (232); gōbhiḥ, from the bowstrings, VIII, 20, 8¹; milk, I, 134, 2.

gō-arnas, a sea of milk :
gō-arnasā, II, 34, 12¹.
go-ghnā, cow-slaying :
go-ghnām, I, 114, 10.
gō-gāta, name of the Maruts :
(I, 85, 3¹).
Gótama :
gótamāya, I, 85, 11; gótamāsab, I, 88, 4¹; gótamab, I, 88, 5; (125.)
godhā, not godhāb :
p. lxvii.
gopā, guardian :
gopāb, VII, 56, 18; (I, 86, 1¹).
gopāy, to guard :
gopāyātam, VI, 74, 4.
go-pithā, a draught of milk :
go-pithāya, I, 19, 1¹.
go-pithā, keeping :
go-pithē devānām, X, 77, 7.
gō-bandhu, the kindred of the cow (Prisni) :
gō-bandhavab, VIII, 20, 8.
gō-mat, rich in cattle :
gō-mati (vragē), I, 86, 3; gō-matib ānu, V, 61, 19¹; gō-mat rādhab, wealth of cows, V, 57, 7.—gō-matab, (Soma) mixed with milk, VIII, 94, 6.
gō-mātri, having the cow (Prisni) as their mother :
gō-mātaraḥ, I, 85, 3¹; (I, 168, 9¹).
go-hān, killing cattle :
go-hā, VII, 56, 17.
gnā, woman :
gnāb, (307; 308.)
grāma, village :
grāme asmin, I, 114, 1.
grāma-gīt, conqueror of clans :
grāma-gītab, V, 54, 8.
grāvan, grinding-stone :
grāvānab nā, X, 78, 6².
gha, particle :
I, 37, 11; gha it, II, 34, 14; utā gha, V, 61, 8; kit gha, VIII, 20, 21.
gharmā, formus, pit :
(217 seq.); (V, 54, 1²).
gharma-sād, dwelling on the hearth (the Pitris) :
(218.)

gharma-stūbh, who praises the warm milk (of the sacrifice) :
gharma-stūbhe, V, 54, 1².
gharmya and gharmye-sthā :
see harmya, (217.)
ghrīni :
ghrīni-iva, i. e. ghrīner iva? as if from sunshine, II, 33, 6¹.
ghritā, fatness :
ghritām, fatness (rain), I, 85, 3; 87, 2; 168, 8.—ghritām nā, like butter, VIII, 7, 19; ghritām āsram, butter and milk for the Soma, I, 134, 6.
ghrita-prūsh, scattering ghrita :
ghrita-prūshab, X, 78, 4¹.
ghritā-vat, fat :
ghritā-vat (pāyab), I, 64, 6².
ghritākī :
ghritākī, resplendent, I, 167, 3.—ghritākīm (dhiyam), accompanied by fat offerings, I, 2, 7².
ghrīshu, brisk :
ghrīshum, I, 64, 12.
ghrīshī, boar :
(I, 37, 4¹).
ghrīshvi, wild :
ghrīshvaye, I, 37, 4¹; ghrīshvayab, I, 85, 1; 166, 2.
ghrīshvi-rādhas, whose gifts are cheering :
ghrīshvi-rādhasab, VII, 59, 5.
ghorā, terrible :
ghorāb, I, 167, 4.
ghorā-varpas, of terrible designs :
ghorā-varpasab, I, 19, 5; 64, 2³.
ghōsha, shout, roar :
ghōshab, X, 168, 1; ghōsham, V, 54, 12; ghōshāb, X, 168, 4.
ka, and . . . :
also, I, 165, 12; see kanā (264; 266 seq.); ka-ka, I, 168, 3; ko, VI, 66, 3.
kakānā, delighting in (Loc.) :
kakānāb, X, 77, 8.
akrā, wheel :
akrā, I, 166, 9².—akra, the weapon, (I, 166, 9²).
akrī, wheel :
akrīyā, the wheels, II, 34, 9²; on their chariot, II, 34, 14.
aksh :
prā akshaya, reveal, I, 134, 3.—sam-ākshya, wherever I have looked for you, I, 165, 12.

kákshana, sight :

kákshavam, V, 55, 4.

kákshas, sight :

kákshasā, I, 87, 5.

kákshus, eye :

kákshub, V, 54, 6; 59, 3²; 5.

kāt :

ví kātayasva, put away, II, 33, 2.

kātub-pad, beast :

dvi-pádab kātub-padab, man and beast, X, 121, 3; sám dvi-páde kātub-pade, (191); I, 114, 1; VI, 74, 1; p. cxi.

kaná :

kaná, not even, I, 166, 12⁵; X, 168, 3; (264 seqq.); nahí kaná, not even, VII, 59, 3.—kaná, in negative sentences, (264); in positive sentences, (264 seq.); with interrogative pronouns, (265 seq.); kaná, for ka ná, (264; 266 seq.)

kánishṭha, best :

kánishṭhā su-matīb, VII, 57, 4.

kandrā, bright :

kandrāb, X, 121, 9; kandrān, VIII, 20, 20.

kandrā-vat, golden :

kandrā-vat, V, 57, 7.

kandrā-varna, in bright splendour :

kandrā-varnāb, I, 165, 12.

kar, to move :

kāratī, VII, 46, 3; X, 168, 4; kārantam, I, 6, 1; kārantī, I, 167, 3; kārantī, VIII, 20, 18.—ā kara, come, I, 114, 3.—ūpa kara, come, VII, 46, 2.

karātha, movable :

sthātúb karātham, what stands and moves, pp. lxxii seq.—karātha, flock, movable property, p. lxxiii.

karamá, last :

karamám, VII, 59, 3; karamáb, VIII, 20, 14¹.

karkārya, glorious :

(176.)

karkrītya, glorious :

karkrītyam, I, 64, 14.

kārman, skin :

kārma-iva, I, 85, 5².

karshanī, pl., men :

karshanīb, I, 86, 5.—karshanīnām, the swift gods (Maruts), I, 86, 6¹.

kāru, beautiful :

kārum (adhvarám), fair, I, 19, 1.—kāravab, V, 59, 3.

ki, to gather :

ví kayat krítām, may he gather what we have made, V, 60, 1².

ki, to perceive, to see :

ákidhvam, I, 87, 2; V, 55, 7; VIII, 7, 2¹; 14; káyate, I, 167, 8.—ni-ketārab, they find out, VII, 57, 2.—ketú, from ki (I, 166, 1²).

kit, to perceive, &c. :

kitáyante, they see, I, 171, 5.—kitáyante, they appear, V, 59, 2; kitayanta, they appeared, II, 34, 2; kekite, appears, II, 34, 10; kekitāna, showing thyself, II, 33, 15¹.—kétati, he looks after (Gen.), VII, 46, 2; ketathab, you perceive (Gen.), I, 2, 5; ketatha, you think of (Dat.), V, 59, 3.—kikitúshe, to the intelligent man, VI, 66, 1; keketa, he understands, VII, 56, 4; yáthā kikitati, that he may hear, I, 43, 3.—aketi, it was known, I, 88, 5.—ā kikitrire, they have become well known, I, 166, 13.—kitáyat, exciting, rousing, II, 34, 7¹.

kit, even . . . :

nú kit, I, 39, 4; VI, 66, 1; 5; VII, 56, 15; kit gha, I, 37, 11; VIII, 20, 21; kit hí, VII, 59, 7.—yáb kit, X, 121, 8; yáthā kit, V, 56, 2.—káb kit, see kím.—kríté kit, whatever little we have done, VII, 57, 5.

kitṭá, thought :

kitṭám, I, 170, 1; tiráb kitṭāni, VII, 59, 8¹.

kitrá, brilliant, beautiful :

kitráb, I, 88, 2; (171); I, 166, 4; 172, 1 (bis); kitrá, II, 34, 10; VI, 66, 9; kitráb, I, 165, 13; VIII, 7, 7; X, 78, 1; the bright ones (the clouds), I, 38, 11²; kitráb, I, 64, 4; kitrá, V, 52, 11; I, 134, 4; kitráya, for mitráya, Ludwig, (II, 34, 4¹).—kitrá, splendour, I, 37, 3².—kitrá, from ki, (I, 166, 1²).

kitrá-bhānu, of beautiful splendour :

kitrá-bhānavab, I, 64, 7²; 85, 11.

kītrā-vāga, with splendid booty :

kītrā-vāgān, VIII, 7, 33.

kīrām :

mā kīrām karat, may it not cause delay, V, 56, 7.

kud, to stir :

kodata, I, 168, 4.—prā kodata, spur forth, V, 56, 7.

kētana, to be seen :

kētanam, I, 170, 4¹.

ko, see ka.

kōda, goad :

kōdab, V, 61, 3.

kyu, to shake, caus., to throw down :

kyavante, I, 167, 8²; akutyavitana, I, 37, 12¹ (bis); akutyavub, I, 166, 5; 168, 4; V, 53, 6; kyāvam, I, 165, 10; kyavāyatha, I, 168, 6.—kyu, to send down the rain, (135).—ā akutyavub, V, 59, 8.—prā kyavayanti, I, 37, 11; 64, 3; V, 56, 4²; prā kyavāyantab, I, 85, 4; prā akutyavub, V, 59, 7.

kbad, to appear :

ākkbānta, kbadāyātha, I, 165, 12; p. xviii.

kbandab-stūbh, stepping according to a measure :

kbandab-stūbhab, V, 52, 12¹; p. xcvi seq.

kbandas, shine :

kbandab, VIII, 7, 36².

kbāndu :

vrīshā kbāndub, (147.)

kbarāls, shelter :

kbarālb, I, 114, 5.

kbāyā, shadow :

kbāyā, X, 121, 2²; kbāyām, II, 33, 6.

-ga, from -gan :

(X, 77, 5²).

gaksh=gaggb, to laugh :

(284); (V, 52, 6²).

gāgat, world :

gāgatab, X, 121, 3.—gāgatab sthātūb, of what is movable and what is immovable, p. lxxiv.

gāgmi, rushing about :

gāgmayab, I, 85, 8.

gaghāna, croup :

gaghāne, on the croup, or behind, V, 61, 3¹.

gaghanatas, behind :

(V, 61, 3¹).

gaggb, to laugh :

gāggbatī (conjecture for gāṅgati), I, 168, 7¹; (V, 52, 6²).

gaggb, to laugh :

gāggbatib, V, 52, 6².

gāṅg, see gaggb.

gāṅganā-bhū, to rattle :

gāṅganā-bhāvan, (V, 52, 6²).

gan, to be born, caus., to beget :

agāyathāb, I, 6, 3; agāyanta, I, 37, 2; gagāire, I, 64, 2; 4; āgani, II, 34, 2²; gāni, VIII, 7, 36; gāyamānab gātāb, who is now born and who has been born, I, 165, 9²; gātāb, X, 121, 1; 168, 3; gātāb, V, 55, 3; 87, 2¹; gātāsyā, of all that exists, II, 33, 3; gātāni, X, 121, 10.—ganāyanti, X, 121, 7; 8; ganāyantab, I, 85, 2; aganayanta, I, 168, 9; ganayatha, V, 58, 4; āganayab, I, 134, 4; dīvam gāgāna, X, 121, 9.—abhi-gāyanta, they were born to bring (Acc.), I, 168, 2¹.—prā-pra gāyante, they are born on and on, V, 58, 5; prā gāyemahi pra-gābhīb, may we increase in offspring, II, 33, 1.

-gan :

-gab and -gāb, (X, 77, 5²).

gāna, man :

gānab, I, 86, 1; gānam, I, 166, 8; gānāya, I, 166, 12; II, 34, 8; V, 58, 4; gānāsab, I, 166, 14; gānāsab jūrāb, valiant men, VII, 56, 22; gānān, I, 37, 12; 64, 13; gānānām, VII, 56, 24.

gāni, wife :

gānayab, I, 85, 1¹; V, 61, 3²; gānīb, mothers, I, 167, 7¹.

ganitrī, begetter :

ganitā prithivyāb, X, 121, 9.

ganītra, birthplace :

ganītram, VII, 56, 2.

ganús, birth :

ganúshā, V, 57, 5; 59, 6; ganúshab, VI, 66, 4¹; ganúsmhi, VII, 56, 2; ganúb, VII, 58, 2¹.

gantú, a man :

gantúm, VII, 58, 3.

gánman, what is born :

gánmanab, VII, 46, 2; gánmane, host, I, 166, 1.—gánmanā, after the kind, I, 87, 5.

- gabh :
 (I, 37, 5²)
gámbha, tasting :
gámbhe, I, 37, 5².
gar, to praise :
garante tvám ákka, I, 2, 2 ;
garāyai, I, 38, 13.
gāra, the weakening :
garāya, II, 34, 10.
garitrī, praiser, singer :
garitā, I, 38, 5 ; 165, 14 ; garitré,
 II, 34, 6 ; 33, 11 ; garitúb, V,
 87, 8 ; garitārab, I, 2, 2. gālāsha, relieving :
gālāshab, II, 33, 7¹ ; (I, 43, 4²).
gālāsha-bheshaga, the possessor of healing medicines (Rudra) :
gālāsha-bheshagam, I, 43, 4² ; (II, 33, 7¹).
gāsuri, weak :
gāsuri, V, 61, 7.
gā, people :
gāsu nab, among our people, VII,
 46, 2 ; (X, 77, 5²).
gātā, see gan.
gāna, birth :
gānam, I, 37, 9 ; V, 53, 1.
gāni, mother :
 (V, 61, 4¹).
gāmi-tvā, kinship :
gāmi-tvām, I, 166, 13.
gārā, lover :
gārāb, I, 134, 3.
gā-vat, procuring offspring :
gā-vatab (Soma), VIII, 94, 5.
gi, to overpower :
giyate, V, 54, 7.
gigatnú, hasting :
gigatnáva, X, 78, 3 ; 5.
gigivās, victorious :
gigivāmsab, X, 78, 4.
gigishā, valour :
gigishā (Instr.), I, 171, 3.
ginv, to rouse, to gladden :
ginvatha, VIII, 7, 21.—ginvanta
sām, I, 64, 8.
gihmām, athwart :
 I, 85, 11.
gihvā, tongue :
gihvā, I, 87, 5 ; gihvāyā, I, 168, 5¹ ;
agninām ná gihvāb, X, 78, 3 ; agnéb gihvāyā pāhi, drink with the tongue of Agni, (34.)
gīta for gīna, (90.)
gīrá-dānu, bringing quickening rain :
gīrá-dānum, I, 165, 15 ; 166, 15 ;
 167, 11 ; 168, 10 ; 171, 6 ; p. xx ;
gīrá-dānavab, (113 ; 115) ; II, 34,
 4 ; V, 54, 9 ; gīra-dānavab, V, 53, 5.
gīv, to live :
gīvāse, I, 37, 15 ; 172, 3 ; X, 186, 3 ; gīvātave, X, 186, 2.
gīva-rāmsā, good report among men :
gīva-rāmsé, VII, 46, 4¹.
gu, to stir up :
gunānti, V, 58, 3 ; VII, 56, 20.
gugurvāni :
 (I, 168, 1²).
gur, to weaken :
guratām, II, 34, 10¹ ; gugurvān,
 hoary, I, 37, 8.
gush, to be pleased, to accept :
gugushub, I, 165, 2 ; gushānāb, I,
 171, 2 ; gushādhvam, V, 55, 10 ;
 58, 3 ; VII, 56, 14 ; yāthā gush- ānta, VII, 56, 20 ; gushanta, VII,
 56, 25 ; 58, 6 ; gūgoshan it, VII,
 58, 3 ; gugushrana, VII, 59, 9.
 —gushānta, they wished (with Infin.), I, 167, 4 ; gōshat, I, 167, 5.
gūshra-tama, most beloved :
gūshra-tamāsab, I, 87, 1.
guhū, tongue :
guhvāb, VI, 66, 10.
gū, see gu.
gū, quick :
gūvab, I, 134, 1.
gri, see gar.
gōsha, pleasure :
ānu gōsham, VI, 66, 4 ; gōsham ā, to his satisfaction, VIII, 94, 6.
gñā, to know :
te mánab ānu gñatī, approving thy mind, I, 134, 1 ; (I, 86, 3¹).
 —vī gñatī, she finds out, V, 61, 7 ; see gigānivas.
gyéshṭba, oldest, best :
gyéshṭbebbib, I, 167, 2 ; gyésh- tāsab, V, 87, 9 ; X, 78, 5 ;
gyéshṭbāb, X, 78, 2 ; gyéshṭbab māntrab, (439.)
gyótishmat, brilliant :
gyótishmantab, X, 77, 5 ; gyótish- matī, epithet of Aditi, (260.)
gyótis, light :
gyótib, I, 86, 10 ; gyótishā, II, 34, 12.

takva-vīya, chase of the takva (?) :

takva-vīye, I, 134, 5¹.

taksh, to fashion :

tashāb, I, 171, 2; (V, 58, 4¹).—ānu ātakhshata, you have granted, I,
86, 3¹.

tátas, from that :

tátāb, X, 186, 3.

táttra, there :

I, 170, 4; tátro, among them, I, 37, 14.

táthā, so :

táthā ít asat, so shall it be, VIII, 20, 17.

tád, pron. . . . :

sáb, read sá? V, 61, 8¹; sá sá ít, that very (Prisni), VI, 66, 3;
táyā díā, this way, I, 85, 11;
syāma té, may we be such, V,
53, 15.—tát, therefore, so, then,
I, 166, 14; 167, 10; VII, 56,
25; VIII, 94, 3; yáttra-tát, V,
55, 7; yáthā ít-tát ít, V, 56, 2.
—sa and sas, p. cxvii.

tan, to expand, to spread :

tatanāb, I, 38, 14¹; tanāvāvahi,
I, 170, 4²; tanvate, I, 134, 4;
tanushva, unstring (the bow),
II, 33, 14; tatāna, it extended,
V, 54, 5.—tatānāma nrīn abhí,
we may overshadow all men, V,
54, 15.—ā tanvánti, they shoot,
I, 19, 8; ā tatānan, may they spread, I, 166, 14.—út atnata, they stretched out, I, 37, 10.—
ví-tatāb, tied, V, 54, 11; vítatam, far-reaching, V, 54, 12.

tán, race :

tánā, I, 39, 4¹.

tána, race :

tánāya, I, 39, 7.

tánaya, children :

tánayasya, I, 166, 8; tokám tánayam, kith and kin, I, 64, 14;
VII, 56, 20; tokāya tánāyā,
V, 53, 13; I, 114, 6; II, 33, 14;
toké tánaye, VI, 66, 8; I, 114,
8; tokéshu tánayeshu, VII, 46, 3.

tánā, adv., for ever, continually :

I, 38, 13¹; VIII, 94, 5¹.

tanú, body, self :

tanvāb, I, 114, 7; 165, 5; V, 60, 4;
VII, 56, 11; 59, 7; tanúshu, I,
85, 3¹; 88, 3; V, 57, 6; 60, 4;
VIII, 20, 6; 12; 26; VI, 74,

3 (bis); tanvām, VI, 66, 4; tanúbhiāb, VII, 57, 3.—tanvē, for ourselves, I, 165, 15; p. xx; I, 166, 15; 167, 11; 168, 10; tanvē tanúbhiāb, for your own sake, and by your own efforts, I, 165, 11¹;
p. xviii.

tápas :

tápasā, (VII, 59, 8¹.)

tápushība, hottest :

tápushībena hánmanā, VII, 59, 8.

tápus, burning heat :

tápushā, II, 34, 9².

támas, darkness :

támāb, I, 38, 9; 86, 10; támāmsi,
VII, 56, 20.

tar, see tri.

Tarantá :

tarantáb-iva, like Taranta, V, 61,
10; Saviyasí Tarantamahishí, Taranta Vaidadarvi, (359 seq.; 362; V, 61, 5²; 9¹.)

táras, speed :

tárasā, V, 54, 15.

tarutrí, he who overcomes :

ná tarutā, VI, 66, 8.

tavás, strong :

tavásam, I, 64, 12; V, 58, 2; tavasāb, I, 166, 8; tavásāb, V, 60, 4; tavāse, V, 87, 1; I, 114, 1; tavābtamāb tavásām, the strongest of the strong, II, 33, 3.

tavishá, powerful :

tavishāb, I, 165, 6; 8; V, 87, 5;
asmāt tavishāt, I, 171, 4; tavishāb, V, 54, 2; tavishébhiāb ūrmí-bhiāb, (298); (II, 34, 1⁴.)

tavishá, power :

tavishāni, I, 166, 1; strong weapons,
I, 166, 9¹.

távishí, power :

távishí, I, 39, 2; 4; távishíbhíāb, I,
64, 5; 10; 87, 4; 166, 4; II,
34, 1; (298); távishíāb, I, 64, 7;
távishím, V, 55, 2.

távishí-mat, powerful :

távishí-mantam, V, 58, 1; (I, 2, 5¹; 443.)

tavishí-yú, growing in strength :

tavishí-yavāb, VIII, 7, 2.

távyas, most powerful :

távyase (rudráya), I, 43, 1.

tâyú, thief :

tâyavāb, V, 52, 12.

tigmā-āyudha, having sharp weapons :

tigmā-āyudhau (Soma and Rudra),

- VI, 74, 4; tigmá-âyudhâya (Rudra), VII, 46, 1.
 tigmá-heti, having sharp bolts :
 tigmá-heti, VI, 74, 4.
 tirás, across :
 tiráb, I, 19, 7; 8; through, V, 53, 14; VIII, 94, 7.—tiráb kittáni, beyond thoughts, VII, 59, 8¹.
 tish/badgu, at sunset :
 (V, 54, 5¹).
 tishyā, N. of a star :
 tishyāb, V, 54, 13⁴.
 tú, part. :
 VIII, 7, 11.
 tug :
 Inf. tugāse, (I, 87, 6¹).
 tuturvāni, hastening :
 tuturvānib, I, 168, 1².
 tur, to hasten :
 turayante, II, 34, 3.
 -tur at the end of compounds :
 (VI, 66, 7³). turā, quick :
 turāsab (Maruts), I, 166, 14; turānām, I, 171, 1; VII, 56, 10; 58, 5; turāya, VI, 66, 9; turām, VII, 56, 19.
 turanyū, rushing :
 turanyāvab, I, 134, 5.
 Turasravas :
 (V, 52, 11¹).
 turv, to save :
 tūrvatha, VIII, 20, 24¹.—turvāne, (48.).
 Turvāsa :
 Turvāsam, VIII, 7, 18; (VIII, 20, 24¹).
 tuvi-gâtā, mighty :
 tuvi-gâtāb, I, 168, 4; tuvi-gâtāu, I, 2, 9.
 tuvi-dyumnā, vigorous :
 tuvi-dyumnāsab, I, 88, 3¹, 2; tuvi-dyumnāb, V, 87, 7.
 tuvi-nrīmā, of strong manhood :
 tuvi-nrīmām (śrāvab), I, 43, 7¹.
 túvi-magha, of great bounty :
 túvi-maghāsab, V, 57, 8; 58, 8.
 túvi-manyu, wrathful :
 túvi-manyavab, VII, 58, 2.
 tuvi-mrakshā :
 (I, 64, 4²).
 tuvi-rādhās, of great wealth :
 tuvi-rādhāsab, V, 58, 2.
 tūvishmat, strong :
 tūvishmān, I, 165, 6; VII, 56, 7; 58, 1¹.
 tuvi-svan, strong-voiced :
 tuvi-svanab, I, 166, 1.
 tuvi-svāni, loudly neighing :
 tūvi-svānib, V, 56, 7.
 tūyam, quick :
 VII, 59, 4.
 Trina-skandā :
 trina-skandāsya, I, 172, 3.
 Trītsu :
 Trītsus, or Vasishthas, are called Kapardinab, (I, 114, 1²).
 trid, to pierce :
 tatridānāb, V, 53, 7¹; (227).
 trip, to be satisfied, caus. to satisfy :
 tarpayanta, I, 85, 11; tripán (for tripát, Pada), VII, 56, 10¹.
 triptā-amsu, (squeezed) from ripe stems :
 triptā-amsavab, I, 168, 3.
 trish, to be thirsty :
 trishyantam, V, 61, 7.
 trishu-āyāvas, flickering :
 trishu-āyāvasab, VI, 66, 10.
 trishnāg, thirsty :
 trishnāge, I, 85, 11; V, 57, 1.
 trishnā, greed :
 trishnayā sahā, I, 38, 6.
 trī, to cross :
 tārema apāb, VII, 56, 24; tarati, VII, 59, 2; tārema, let us speed, V, 54, 15; rāgas tar, to pass through the air, (VI, 66, 7³); see tarutri.—tārushante ā, they race, V, 59, 1.—prā tirate, he spreads forth, VII, 59, 2; prā tiradhvam, VII, 56, 14; prā tirata nab, lead us to (Dat.), VII, 57, 5; prā tireta, help us, VII, 58, 3; prā tārishat (āyūm-shi), may he prolong, X, 186, 1.—vī tirāti, it furthers, VII, 58, 3.
 tokā, kith :
 tokāya, I, 43, 2; tokām tánayam, kith and kin, I, 64, 14; VII, 56, 20; tokāya tánayāya, V, 53, 13; I, 114, 6; II, 33, 14; toké tánaye, VI, 66, 8; I, 114, 8; tokéshu tánayeshu, VII, 46, 3.
 tmān, self :
 tmāne tokāya tánayāya, to us and to our kith and kin, I, 114, 6.
 tmānā, by oneself :
 (I, 167, 9¹); I, 168, 4; 5; V, 52, 2; 6; 8; 87, 4; VIII, 94, 8; freely, VII, 57, 7; barhānā

- tmánâ, by their own might, X, 77, 3.
 tyag, to push off, to drive away, then, to leave :
 (270.)
 tyâgas :
 tyâgasâ, in his scorn, I, 166, 12⁶; (267 seqq.); tyâgas, leaving, forsaking, (267); attack, on-slaughter, (268 seqq.); weapon, (268.)
 tyád, pron. . . :
 etát tyát, I, 88, 5; eshá syá, I, 88, 6.
 trâtrí, protector :
 trâtárab, VII, 56, 22.
 tri, three :
 tísráb kshápab, Acc., (I, 64, 8²); trîni sâramsi, three lakes, VIII, 7, 10³.
 trí-ambaka, see tryâmbaka.
 Tritá : tritám, II, 34, 10¹; tritáb, II, 34, 14; V, 54, 2; tritâsya, VIII, 7, 24.
 tri-dhātu, threefold :
 tri-dhâtûni, I, 85, 12.
 tri-vrít, threefold :
 of the sacrifice, (VIII, 7, 1¹).
 trís, thrice :
 dvíb tríb, VI, 66, 2.
 tri-sadhashá, dwelling in three abodes (Soma) :
 tri-sadhashâsya, VIII, 94, 5³.
 tri-stúbh, threefold :
 tri-stúbham ísham, the threefold draught, VIII, 7, 1¹.—tri-stubh = 'Three-step,' p. xcvi.
 trai, to protect :
 tráyadhve, V, 53, 15; VII, 59, 1.
 tryâmbaka, N. of Rudra :
 tryâmbakam, VII, 59, 12¹.
 tva, pron. :
 tvâ strí, some woman, V, 61, 6; (360.)
 tvákshas, energy :
 tvákshâmsi, VIII, 20, 6.
 tvákshiyams, more vigorous :
 tvákshiyasâ váyasâ, II, 33, 6.
 tvad, pron. . . :
 kím te, what has happened to thee, yát te asmé, what thou hast against us, I, 165, 3.—túbhya for túbhyam, p. cxvii seq.
 Tvâshtri :
 tvâshhá, I, 85, 9¹.
 tvâ-datta, given by thee :
 tvâ-dattebhih, II, 33, 2.
 tvâ-vat, like unto thee :
 tvâ-vân, I, 165, 9.
 tvish, to blaze, to flare up :
 âtitvishanta, V, 54, 12; atvishanta, VIII, 94, 7.—(I, 37, 4²).
 tvísh, glare :
 tvishâ, X, 78, 6.—drisí tvishé, to see the light, V, 52, 12⁴.
 tvíshi-mat, blazing :
 tvíshi-mantab, VI, 66, 10.
 tveshá, terrible, fierce, blazing :
 tvesháb, V, 87, 5; tveshám, I, 38, 15; 168, 6; 9; V, 53, 10; 56, 9; 58, 2; 87, 6; VIII, 20, 13; I, 114, 4; 5; II, 33, 8; tveshâsya, II, 33, 14; tvesháb, I, 38, 7; VIII, 20, 7; tveshâ, I, 168, 7.
 tveshá-dyumna, endowed with terrible vigour :
 tveshá-dyumnáya, I, 37, 4².
 tveshá-pratíka, with terrible look :
 tveshá-pratíkâ, I, 167, 5.
 tveshá-yâma, whose march is terrible :
 tveshá-yâmâb, I, 166, 5.
 tveshá-ratha, with blazing chariots :
 tveshá-rathab, V, 61, 13.
 tveshá-samdriś, terrible to behold :
 tveshá-samdriśab, I, 85, 8; V, 57, 5.
 tveshyâ, fire and fury :
 tveshyēna, VII, 58, 2.
 tsârín, hunter, watcher :
 tsârí, I, 134, 5¹.
 dams :
 dasra from dams ? (V, 55, 5³).
 damsána :
 damsánaib, valiant deeds, I, 166, 13; damsánâ, by wonderful skill, V, 87, 8.
 dámsu, दासु :
 dámsu, Nom. pl. ? (I, 134, 4¹).
 dáksha, power :
 dáksham, X, 121, 8; I, 134, 2; dáksham apásam, I, 2, 9.—Daksha and Aditi, (245 seqq.; 251.)
 dáksha-pitri, father of strength :
 dáksha-pitarab, (247 seq.); dáksha-pitarâ, (248.)
 dákshinâ, largess :
 dákshinâ, I, 168, 7.

dagh :
 mā paśāt daghma, let us not stay behind, VII, 56, 21.
 dáttra, or dáttra, gift, bounty:
 (240.)
 Dadhyaś, N. pr.: (153.)
 dabh, to hurt:
 ā-dábhat, VII, 56, 15.
 dām, house:
 dām-su, I, 134, 4¹.
 dáma, house:
 dáme, VIII, 7, 12; dáme-dame,
 VI, 74, 1.
 dámya, domestic:
 dámyam, VII, 56, 14.
 day, to divide:
 dayase, thou cuttest, II, 33, 10³.—
 (I, 166, 6⁴).—See dā (do).
 dātrī, breaker:
 dārtā, VI, 66, 8.
 darśatā, visible, conspicuous, beautiful:
 darśatām, I, 38, 13; darśatāb, V,
 56, 7; darśata, I, 2, 1¹; darśatā,
 I, 64, 9.
 dāśya, to be seen:
 dāśyā, V, 52, 11.
 dávidhvat, violently shaking:
 dávidhvatab, II, 34, 3³.
 Dāra-gva:
 dāra-gvāb (Maruts?), II, 34, 12¹.
 dasasy, to help:
 dasasyātha, VIII, 20, 24; dasas-yāntab, bounteous, VII, 56, 17.
 das, to perish:
 ūpa dasyanti, V, 54, 7; 55, 5³.—
 dāsamānab, tired, I, 134, 5.
 dasmā-varśas, shining forth marvellously:
 dasmā-varśasām, VIII, 94, 8.
 dasra, destroyer:
 dasrāb, V, 55, 5³.
 dā, to give:
 dāta, II, 34, 7; (c. Gen.), VII, 56,
 15; dehi, X, 186, 3; dada, V,
 57, 7; dadub, V, 52, 17; dādat,
 V, 61, 10; dādāta (pra-gāyai amṛitasya), VII, 57, 6; dātave, VII, 59, 6; dadūshab, (I, 6, 1²); ná ditsasi, dost thou not wish to give, I, 170, 3.—dadā, you have protected, I, 39, 9¹.—
 ānutta=ānu-datta, (I, 165, 9¹).—
 mā pārā dāb, do not forsake, VII, 46, 4.—See dāvan.

dā (do, dyati), to share, to divide:
 āva dishiya, may I pay off, II, 33,
 5³.—(I, 167, 8³; VIII, 7, 27¹).—
 See day.
 dā, to bind:
 nī-dita, bound, (257.)
 dāti-vāra, dispensing treasures:
 dāti-vārab, I, 167, 8³; dāti-vāram,
 V, 58, 2.
 dātrī, giver:
 dātāram (bhūreb), II, 33, 12.
 dātra, sickle:
 (241.)
 dātrā, bounty:
 dātrām, I, 166, 12³; dātrāt, VII, 56, 21.
 dādhrīvi, strong:
 dādhrīvi, VI, 66, 3.
 dānā, gift:
 dānā, for a gift, V, 52, 14¹; 15;
 by gift, V, 87, 2¹; VIII, 20, 14.
 dānavā, demon:
 (114 seq.)
 dānu:
 giver or gift, (115).—m., demon, (114 seq.)—f., rain (?), (115).—
 n., water, rain, (113; 115);
 Soma, (115.)
 dānū, giving:
 (113 seq.)
 dānu-kiṭra, dew-lighted:
 dānu-kiṭrāb uśhāsab, V, 59, 8; (115.)
 dānunaspāti, ep. of Mitra-Varuṇau and the Asvins:
 (115.)
 dānu-mat:
 dānumat vāsu, the treasure of rain, (115.)
 dāyas, share, inheritance:
 (I, 166, 6⁴).
 Dārbyā:
 Rathaviti Dārbyā, (V, 61, 5³; 359 seq.); dārbyāya, V, 61, 17¹.
 Dālbya, see Dārbyā.
 dāvān, giving:
 makhāśya dāvāne, for the offering of the sacrifice, VIII, 7, 27¹; I, 134, 1 (bis); to the offering of the priest, (47 seq.)—suvitāya dāvāne, to grant welfare, V, 59,
 1¹; 4.—dāvāne, for gifts, I,
 134, 2.
 dā, to give, to sacrifice:
 dāratī, VII, 59, 2; dadārimā, I, 86, 6; dādārat, X, 77, 7; dāśushe, I, 85, 12; V, 57, 3¹; I,

2, 3; dadārushe, I, 166, 3; V, 53, 6.
dāsvās, see dās.
dās, to attack :
 (V, 55, 5^a).
Diti and Aditi :
 (255 seq.)
didrikshēnya, to be yearned for :
didrikshēnyam, V, 55, 4.
didyú, flame :
didyúm, VII, 56, 9.—weapon, (I, 6, 8²).
didyút, weapon, Indra's weapon or thunderbolt :
didyút, lightning, I, 166, 6; shining thunderbolt, VII, 57, 4; VII, 46, 3; (I, 6, 8²).—didyút (adhvarāsyā), flame, VI, 66, 10.
didhishú :
didhishāvab ná rathyāb, like lords of chariots on a suit, X, 78, 5.
div (dīvyati), to throw forth, to break forth, to shine :
 (I, 6, 8²).
dīv, see dýú.
dīvishī, daily sacrifice :
dīvishīshu, I, 86, 4.
divi-sprī, touching the sky :
divi-sprīk, X, 168, 1.
divyā, heavenly :
divyám kōsam, V, 59, 8; divyāsya gānmanab, VII, 46, 2; divyāni, I, 64, 3; 5.—divyāb-iva strībhīb, heavens, I, 166, 11²; (I, 87, 1¹).
dis, to display :
dēdisate, VIII, 20, 6.
dīs, direction :
tāyā dīā, this way, I, 85, 11.
dīrghā, long :
dīrghām, I, 37, 11; 166, 12.—Adv., I, 166, 14; V, 54, 5; dīrghām prithú, far and wide, V, 87, 7¹.
dīrghā-yasas, far-famed :
dīrghā-yasase, V, 61, 9.
dub-gā, stronghold :
dub-gāni, V, 54, 4.
dub-dhārtu, irresistible :
dub-dhārtavab, V, 87, 9.
dub-dhūr, impatient of the yoke :
dub-dhūrab, V, 56, 4.
dub-matī, hatred :
dub-matīb, VII, 56, 9; II, 33, 14.
dub-māda, madman :
durmādāb-iva, I, 39, 5.

dúb-stuti, bad praise :
dúb-stuti, II, 33, 4.
dub-hána, difficult to be conquered :
dub-hánā, I, 38, 6.
dub-hrināyú, hateful :
dub-hrināyúb, VII, 59, 8.
dukkbúnā, monster :
dukkbúnā, VIII, 20, 4¹.
dudhrá, wild :
dudhráb (gaúb), V, 56, 3.
dudhra-krit, making to reel :
dudhra-kritab, I, 64, 11.
dúr, door :
dúrab, VII, 46, 2.
dúvas, worship :
dúvab, (I, 37, 14¹); worship, sacrifice, work, (204.)
duvās, worshipper :
duvāse, I, 165, 14¹; (205); p. xix;
duvāsab, I, 168, 3.
duvasy, to care for, to attend :
duvasyāt, he should help, I, 165, 14¹; p. xix.—duvasyān, sacrificing, I, 167, 6.—(203 seqq.)
duvasyā, worthy of worship :
 (203; 205.)
dustára, invincible :
dustáram, I, 64, 14; II, 34, 7.
duh, to milk :
duhānti, I, 64, 5; 6²; duhúb, II, 34, 10; duduhe (údhak), VI, 66, 1; duhre, duhrate, I, 134, 6; dohate, I, 134, 4; duduhré, VIII, 7, 10².—duhukshānta, they have drawn forth, VIII, 7, 3; duhántab útsam, drawing the well, VIII, 7, 16.—nīb duhré, they have been brought forth, VI, 66, 4.—See dohás.
dū, worshipper :
dúvab, Nom. pl., I, 37, 14¹.
dūre-drīs, visible from afar :
dūre-drīsab, I, 166, 11; V, 59, 2.
drilbā, strong :
drilbā kit, I, 64, 3; (VIII, 20, 1¹); drilbāni kit, I, 168, 4.—drilbā, made fast, X, 121, 5¹.
dris, to see :
drīkshase, mayest thou be seen, I, 6, 7²; drisī tvishé, to see the light, V, 52, 12⁴; drisē kām, that they may be seen, VIII, 94, 2.—Cf. didrikshēnya.
-dris, in yaksha-dris :
 (VII, 56, 16¹).

drih :

dadrîhânám, strong, I, 85, 10.

dri, see dârtri.

devâ, god :

devâya, X, 121, 1-9; devâb, X, 121, 2; yâb devêshu âdhi devâb ékab, he who alone is God above all gods, X, 121, 8; devânâmâsub, X, 121, 7; âtmâ devânâm, X, 168, 4; devânâm go-pithé, in the keeping of the gods, X, 77, 7; srêshîbab devânâm vásub, the best Vasu among the gods (Rudra), I, 43, 5; Vasus = Devas, (VII, 56, 20³); nahî devâb ná mârtyab, I, 19, 2.—vîsve devâsab, I, 19, 3²; devâb vîsve, VIII, 94, 2.—The Maruts, devâsab, I, 19, 6; devâb, I, 167, 4; dévâsab, I, 39, 5; VIII, 7, 27; VII, 59, 1; devâb, I, 171, 2; VII, 59, 2; X, 78, 8; devân, V, 52, 15¹; mahânâm devânâm, VIII, 94, 8.—Rudra, deva, I, 114, 10; II, 33, 15; devâya, VII, 46, 1.—devâb, Vâta, X, 168, 2; 4.—devâ, divine, brilliant, p. xxxvii; devîm (vâr-kâryâm), sacred, I, 88, 4¹; (176); devî, ep. of Aditi, (260); devi, O goddess (the night), V, 61, 17.—deva for devâ, dual, p. lii.

deva-avî, pleasing the gods :

deva-avyâb, X, 78, 1.

devâtâ, among the gods :—

I, 165, 9²; p. xvii.

devâ-tâti :

(I, 165, 9².)

devâtta, god-given :

devâtta, I, 37, 4.

deva-trâ, towards the gods :

V, 61, 7.

deva-yagyâ, sacrifice :

deva-yagyâyâ, I, 114, 3.

deva-yât, pious :

deva-yântab, I, 6, 6.

deva-yâ (?) :

deva-yâb, I, 168, 1, see eva-yâb.

deshnâ, gift :

deshnâm, VII, 58, 4.

daivya, divine :

daivyasya, V, 57, 7; VII, 58, 1¹;

râpasab daivyasya, heaven-sent mischief, II, 33, 7; daivyam

hê/ab, the anger of the gods, I, do, see dâ.

114, 4.

dôb, arm :

dôb, V, 61, 5¹.

dohâs :

dohâse, to give milk, VI, 66, 1;

dohâse, to be brought forth, VI, 66, 5¹.

dyâvâkshâmâ, heaven and earth :

(250.)

dyâvâprithivî, heaven and earth :

V, 55, 7; (250.)

dyu, to shine :

(I, 37, 4².)

dyû, heaven, sky, Dyu :

Dyaus = Zeus, p. xxiv; dyaûb âditib, the boundless Dyu (sky),

(261); V, 59, 8²; dyaûb, Dyu

(the bull of the Dawn), V, 58,

6²; dyaûb ná, VIII, 7, 26;

prithivî utâ dyaûb, Earth and Sky, I, 114, 11; divâb putrâsab, the sons of Dyu, X, 77, 2;

divâb âsurasya vedhâsab, the servants of the divine Dyu,

VIII, 20, 17; divab narab, V,

54, 10; I, 64, 4; divâb mâryâb,

V, 59, 6; divâb ukshânab, I, 64,

2¹; divâb, (sons) of heaven, I,

86, 1; divâb sârdhâya, host of heaven, VI, 66, 11; divé, to heaven (Dyu), V, 59, 1; dyôb sâmsab, 'Himmelslob,' (439).—

divâb vakshânâbhyab, from the flanks of heaven (Dyu, f., mother of the Maruts), I, 134, 4².—

divâb, from heaven, I, 6, 10;

168, 4; V, 52, 14; 53, 6; 8;

54, 13; (brihatâb), V, 87, 3;

VIII, 7, 11; 13; 94, 10; VII, 46,

3; divâb, of heaven, V, 52, 5; 6;

7; 57, 1; 59, 7; I, 37, 6; 38,

2; divâb arkâb, singers of the sky, V, 57, 5¹; divâb prishîbâm, back of heaven, I, 166, 5; V,

54, 1²; divâb sânu, ridge of heaven, V, 60, 3; (snûnâ), VIII,

7, 7; divâb rokanât, from the light of heaven, I, 6, 9¹; V, 56,

1; rokanâ, the lights of heaven,

VIII, 94, 9; rokanâ divî, I, 6, 1; divâb varâhâm arushâm, the red boar of the sky (Rudra), I, 114,

5; divâb prithivîyâb, X, 77, 3;

divî, I, 19, 6¹; 85, 2; V, 52, 3;

- 61, 12; ádhi dyávi, I, 39, 4; diví(uttamé, madhyamé, avamé), V, 60, 6; diváb út-tarât, V, 60, 7; dyaúb út-tarâ, VIII, 20, 6.—dyâm imâm, X, 121, 1; dyaúb ugrâ, X, 121, 5; dívam gagâna, X, 121, 9; dyâm, V, 57, 3; dyaúb-iva, V, 57, 4; dyaúb, V, 54, 9; dyāvab ná strî-bhib, (I, 87, 1¹); II, 34, 2.—prithivî, râgas, dyû, (I, 19, 3¹); (50; 51.)
- dyû, day :
dyāvab, V, 53, 5¹; dívâ, by day, I, 38, 9; VIII, 7, 6; úpa dyû-bhib, ânu dyûn, day by day, V, 53, 3¹; I, 167, 10; divé-dive, from day to day, II, 34, 7; pârye dyób, at the close of the day, VI, 66, 8¹.
- dyut, to shine :
dávidyutati, they sparkle, VIII, 20, 11; ví dyutayanta, they shone wide, II, 34, 2.
- dyu-mât, brilliant :
dyu-mântam, I, 64, 14.
- dyumnâ, brilliant :
dyumnaíb, VIII, 20, 16; (I, 37, 4².)
- dyumnâ-ravas, of brilliant glory :
dyumnâ-ravase, V, 54, 1.
- drapsâ, torrent (?) :
drapsâb, VIII, 7, 16¹.
- drapsîn, scattering rain-drops :
drapsinab, I, 64, 2.
- dravât-pâni, quick-hoofed :
(I, 38, 11¹.)
- drávina, wealth :
drávinam, V, 54, 15.
- dru :
dravât, quickly, I, 2, 5.
- Drúh :
druháb pârân, the snares of Druh, VII, 59, 8.
- dronakalasa, a Soma-vessel :
(VIII, 94, 5².)
- dvi-gâni, having two mothers (Agni) :
dvi-gâinib, (V, 61, 4¹.)
- dvitâ, twice :
I, 37, 9.
- dvi-pád, man :
dvi-pádab kátub-padab, man and beast, X, 121, 3; dvi-páde kátub-pade, I, 114, 1; VI, 74, 1; (191; 435); p. cxi.
- dvi-bárhas, twofold :
dvi-bârhab (probably dvi-bárhab), I, 114, 10¹.
- dvi-mâtrî, having two mothers (Agni) :
dvi-mâtâ, (V, 61, 4¹.)
- dvish, enemy :
dvisham, I, 39, 10; dvishab, VII, 59, 2.
- dvís, twice :
dvíb trib, twice and thrice, VI, 66, 2.
- dvipâ, island :
dvipâni, islands (clouds), VIII, 20, 4¹.
- dvêshas :
dvêshab, haters, I, 167, 9; X, 77, 6.—dvêshâmsi, hateful things, V, 87, 8; dvêshab, hatred, VII, 56, 19; 58, 6; II, 33, 2.
- dhan, to shake :
dhanayante, I, 88, 3²; dhanâ-yanta, they have rushed forth, I, 167, 2.
- dhána, treasure :
dhânâ, I, 64, 13.
- dhána-arâ :
dhána-arâam, may be dhána-rikam, p. lxxxv^a.
- dhana-sprît, wealth-acquiring :
dhana-sprîtam, I, 64, 14¹; VIII, 7, 18.
- dhânus, bow :
from dhan, (66.)
- dhânva-arnas :
dhânva-arnasab, may be dhânva-arnasab, p. lxxxv^a.
- dhana-kyút, shaking the sky :
dhanva-kyútâb, I, 168, 5².
- dhânvan, bow :
dhânvâni, VIII, 20, 12; dhânva, II, 33, 10; (66); (VIII, 20, 4².)
- dhânvan, desert, dry land :
dhânvan kit â, I, 38, 7; dhânvasu, V, 53, 4²; dhânvanâ, V, 53, 6.—dhânvâni, the tracts (of the sky), VIII, 20, 4².
- dhârman, power :
dhârmanâ, I, 134, 5 (bis).
- dhav, to run :
dhavadhve, V, 60, 3.
- dhâ, to place, to bring, to offer, to bestow, to give (c. Loc. and Dat.); pass., to take, to assume; to gain . . . :

- dadhé (vriká-tâti), II, 34, 9¹;
dhuḥ, V, 58, 7¹; dadhanti, VII, 56, 19².—dadhidhvê, will you take, I, 38, 1; dadhidhve, you accept, I, 168, 1²; dádhanāb, X, 121, 7; 8; I, 6, 4; tāvishīb dhâ, to take strength, (I, 64, 7³);
dadhire (várnam), they have assumed, II, 34, 13; dádhanāb, having become, I, 171, 6³;
dadhe mudé, I am made to rejoice, V, 53, 5.—ā dádhanāb, bringing, I, 165, 12; p. xviii;
ā dádhanāb nāma, assuming a name, VI, 66, 5; gārbham ā
adhât, she conceived the germ,
 VI, 66, 3; ā-bitâ, piled up, I,
 166, 9.—nī dhattâ, put down, I,
 171, 1; ādhi nī dhehi asmé, bestow on us, I, 43, 7.—sam- ādhatta mām ékam, you left me alone, I, 165, 6¹; p. xvi;
sām dadhe, it is held, I, 168, 3; sām vi-dyútâ dádhati, they aim with the lightning, V, 54, 2; sām dadhuḥ parva-jāb, they have brought together piece by piece, VIII, 7, 22¹.—See dhâtri, and dhya for dhimahi.
- dhâtri, bestowing:
dhâtârab, VIII, 7, 35.
- dhānyâ:
dhānyām bīgam, the seed of corn,
 V, 53, 13.
- dhāman, abode, law, company:
dhāma-bhiḥ, in their own ways, I, 85, 11.—dhāmnāb (mārutasya), domain, I, 87, 6³; (daśvyasya), host, VII, 58, 1¹.—pārasmin dhāman ritāsya, in the highest place of the law, I, 43, 9¹.—
 (27; 383 seq.)
- dhārayât-kshiti, supporting the earth:
 ep. of Aditi, (260.)
- dhārâ, stream:
dhārâb, I, 85, 5², 3.
- dhârâvarâ, charged with rain:
dhârâvarâb, II, 34, 1¹.
- dhāv, to run:
vi-dhāvatab, rushing about, I, 88, 5.
- dhiyâ-vasu, rich in prayers:
dhiyâ-vasub, I, 64, 15³.
- dhiyâ-jām, engaged in prayer:
 (166.)
- dhī, prayer:
dhīyam, I, 88, 4; II, 34, 6²; I, 2,
- 7; dhīyam-dhiyam, prayer after prayer, I, 168, 1; dhiyâ, I, 166, 13; dhiyâ-jām, (V, 87, 9¹); (166);
dhiyâb, I, 134, 2 (bis); dhiyâb,
 I, 87, 4; dhibhīb, V, 52, 14.—
itthâ dhiyâ, thus is my thought,
 V, 61, 15¹; I, 2, 6².
- dhīti, prayer:
dhīti-bhiḥ, V, 53, 11.
- dhīra, wise:
dhīrab, I, 64, 1; VII, 56, 4.
- dhūni, roaring:
dhūnayab, the roarers (Maruts),
 I, 64, 5²; 87, 3; V, 60, 7; VI,
 66, 10; X, 78, 3; dhūninām,
 V, 87, 3³; VIII, 20, 14.—
dhūniḥ, shouting, VII, 56, 8¹.
- dhūni-vrata, given to roaring:
dhūni-vratam, V, 58, 2; dhūni- vratāya, V, 87, 1.
- dhūr, shaft, yoke:
dhûb-sû, V, 55, 6; X, 77, 5; dhuri,
 V, 56, 6 (bis); 58, 7; I, 134, 3
 (bis).
- dhû, to shake (with two Acc.):
dhûnuthâ, I, 37, 6; V, 57, 3¹.—
vī dhûnutha, V, 54, 12¹.
- dhûb-sād, charioteer:
dhûb-sādab, II, 34, 4.
- dhūti, shaker:
dhūtayab (Maruts), I, 37, 6; 39, 1;
 10; V, 54, 4; VII, 58, 4; VIII,
 20, 16; (V, 87, 3²); dhūtayab, I,
 64, 5; 87, 3; 168, 2; V, 61, 14.
- dhūrv:
dhūrvane, (48.)
- dhri, to hold:
dadhire, I, 64, 10; 85, 3; (nā- māni), I, 87, 5; dādhāra, he established, X, 121, 1; dhārā- yante vratâ, they observe their duties, VIII, 94, 2; dhārāye- thām, may you maintain, VI, 74, 1.—ādhi sriyab dadhire, they clothed themselves in beauty,
 I, 85, 2².—vī ānu dhire, they spread out behind, I, 166, 10.
 —nī dadhré, he holds himself down (Dat.), I, 37, 7¹.
- dhriśh, to defy:
ā-dhriśhe, I, 39, 4²; V, 87, 2.—da- dhriśhvān, daring, I, 165, 10¹.
- dhriśhatâ, adv., boldly:
 I, 167, 9¹.
- dhriśhat-vīn, full of daring:
dhriśhat-vināb, V, 52, 2¹.

- dhriṣṇú, bold :
dhriṣṇú, I, 6, 2; dhriṣṇú, VI, 66, 5;
dhriṣṇúnā, I, 167, 9; dhriṣṇa- vab, V, 52, 14²; pp. cxxi; cxxiv;
dhriṣṇób, VII, 56, 8.
dhriṣṇú-ogas, endowed with fierce force :
dhriṣṇú-ogasaḥ, II, 34, 1.
dhriṣṇu-yā, boldly :
V, 52, 1; 2; 4.
dhriṣṇú-sena, followed by daring armies :
dhriṣṇú-senāḥ, VI, 66, 6.
dhe, to suck :
gaúb dhayati, the cow sends forth
her milk, VIII, 94, 1¹.
dhénā, stream (of milk); du., lips :
dhénā, I, 2, 3¹.
dhenú, milch-cow :
dhenúb, II, 34, 8; I, 134, 4³;
dhenúm, II, 34, 6; dhenávab, V, 53, 7; 55, 5; I, 134, 6; dhe- núnām, V, 61, 10; dhenú-bhiḥ,
II, 34, 5.—dhenú (neut.), VI,
66, 1¹.
dhéshṭa, most generous :
dhéshṭab, I, 170, 5.
dhmā, to blow :
dhāmantaḥ, I, 85, 10; II, 34, 1⁶.—
dhāmanti ānu, foam along, VIII, 7, 16.
dhyā :
tāsyā dhīmahi, that we pray for,
VIII, 7, 18.
dhraḡ, to float :
dhraḡataḥ, I, 165, 2.—prā adh- raḡan, they rushed forth, I, 166, 4².
dhru :
dhruváse, Inf., (I, 87, 6¹).
dhruvá, firm :
dhruváni, I, 167, 8.
dhruva-kyút, throwing down what is firm :
dhruva-kyútaḥ, I, 64, 11; (I, 168, 5²).
dhvan, to dun, to din :
(I, 64, 5²).
Dhvasra :
(360); (V, 61, 5²; 9¹).
ná, not . . . :
nahí-ná, I, 19, 2; 39, 4; ná-nó, I, 170, 1; nákib-ná, I, 165, 9.—
kvā ná, where not, I, 38, 2¹; ná, not, interrog., I, 170, 3.—ka ná and kaná, (264; 266 seq.) — ná
áha, nowhere, never, V, 54, 4; 10. — arāṇām ná karamáb for arāṇām ná ná karamáb, VIII, 20, 14¹. ná, like . . . :
ná and iva, I, 85, 8¹; ná rókaḥ,
VI, 66, 6².—I, 64, 9³; VIII, 20, 14¹; X, 77, 1³.
nákis :
nákib, nothing, I, 165, 9; no one,
VII, 56, 2; not, VIII, 20, 12.
nakt, nákta, night :
(V, 52, 16¹).—náktam, by night,
VIII, 7, 6.
naksh, to reach :
nákshanti, I, 166, 2; nákshante,
VII, 58, 1.
nad, Caus., to cause to tremble :
nadáyanta, I, 166, 5¹; (I, 37, 7¹).
nad, to roar :
nānadati, I, 64, 8.—ā nānadati, they resound, VIII, 20, 5.
nadá, reed :
nadáśya, II, 34, 3².
nadí, river :
nadīnām, V, 52, 7; nadyāḥ, V, 55, 7.
nápāt, offspring :
miháb nāpātam, I, 37, 11¹.—java- sab nāpātaḥ, (VI, 66, 11¹).
nabhanú, spring :
nabhanún, V, 59, 7².
nábhas, the sky between heaven and earth :
(X, 121, 5²).—nábhasaḥ, cloud, I, 167, 5.
nam, to bow :
ánamam (vadha-snaḥ), I escaped,
I, 165, 6¹; p. xvi; namadhvam, incline, VII, 56, 17; kuvít nám- sante, will they turn, VII, 58,
5.—ā namanti, they bend, VII, 56, 19; práti nanāma, he makes obedience, II, 33, 12.
námab-vrīkti :
(I, 64, 1²).
namayishṇu, able to bend :
namayishṇavaḥ, VIII, 20, 1¹.
námas, worship :
námasā, (I, 165, 2¹); II, 34, 14; I, 114, 2; 5; I, 171, 1; námasaḥ
(vrīdhāsaḥ), I, 171, 2²; námab- bhiḥ, salutations, V, 60, 1; II, 33, 4; 8; námab (ávoḥāma), supplication, I, 114, 11.
namasy, to worship :
namasyá, V, 52, 13; II, 33, 8¹.

namasyā, worthy of worship :

(203 ; 205.)

nāmasvat, reverent :

nāmasvān, I, 171, 2.

namasvīn, worshipping :

namasvīnam, I, 166, 2.

Nāmuḥi, name of a demon :

(I, 64, 3¹.)

nārāśansa, 'Männerlob' :

Indra, (II, 34, 6¹) ; Agni, (439.)

narokas, fond of men :

narokāb = nri-okāb, Oldenberg for nā rōkab, (VI, 66, 6².)

nārya, manly :

nāri āpāmsi, I, 85, 9² ; nāryāb, I,

166, 5 ; nāryeshu, I, 166, 10.

nārya-apas, epithet of Indra :

(I, 85, 9².)

nāva, new :

nāvyaṁsi, newest, I, 38, 3 ; nāvyaśe,

VIII, 7, 33 ; nāvīyasi (su-matib),

VII, 59, 4 ; nāvishṭbayā, VIII, nāvedas, mindful (c. Gen.) :

20, 19.

nāvedāb, I, 165, 13² ; nāvedasab, V,

55, 8.

nāvya, new :

nāvyeshu, I, 134, 4.

nāvyaśina, ever-youthful :

nāvyaśinām, V, 53, 10¹ ; 58, 1.

nar, to come near :

nārate, I, 165, 9.—abhī narat, he will obtain, VIII, 20, 16.—prā-nak, let it reach, VII, 56, 9.

nar, to vanish :

vī naryati, I, 170, 1.

nās, du., nostrils :

nasób, V, 61, 2.

nahī, not indeed :

I, 19, 2 ; 39, 4 ; VII, 59, 4 ; nahi nú,

I, 167, 9 ; nahī kaná, not even,

VII, 59, 3 ; nahī sma, VIII, 7, 21.

nāka, the firmament :

nākab, X, 121, 5² ; nākam, I, 85,

7 ; V, 54, 12¹ ; VII, 58, 1 ; nākasya ādhi rokané, I, 19, 6¹.—

nāka, rokaná, sūrya, (50.)

nādh :

nādhāmānam, suppliant, VIII, 7,

30 ; II, 33, 6.

nāpita, barber :

(I, 166, 10⁴.)

nābhi :

nābhā, in the centre, I, 43, 9¹.

nāman, name :

nāma yagñīyam, I, 6, 4 ; nāmāni yagñīyāni, I, 87, 5 ; amṛitam

nāma, V, 57, 5² ; nāma, VI, 66,

1 ; 5 ; VII, 56, 10 ; VIII, 20, 13¹ ;

II, 33, 8² ; nāma mārutam, company of the Maruts, VII, 57, 1¹ ;

nāmāni, powers, VII, 56, 14 ;

nāma-bhiḥ, V, 52, 10 ; VII, 57,

6 ; ādityéna nāmā, by their name of Ādityas, X, 77, 8 ; nā-man and dhāman, (384.)

nāri, woman :

nri-bhyab nāri-bhyab, to men and women, I, 43, 6 ; p. lxxxviii.

nīb-riti, sin :

nīb-ritib, I, 38, 6¹.—nīb-riteb, of

Nirriti, VII, 58, 1² ; nīb-ritim,

VI, 74, 2.

nīb-kritā :

nīb-kritām, the work (of the sacri-ficer), I, 2, 6¹.

nī-kakrayā, adv., downwards :

VIII, 7, 29¹.

ni-keṭri, he who finds out :

ni-keṭārāb, VII, 57, 2.

nigā, 'eingeboren,' one's own :

(I, 166, 2².)

nīnyā, secret :

nīnyā, VII, 56, 4¹.

nītya, one's own :

nītyam, I, 166, 2².

nīd, to blame :

nīdé, II, 34, 10¹.

nīd, reviler, enemy :

nīdāb (Abl.), II, 34, 15 ; V, 87, 6 ;

9 ; nīdāb (Acc. pl.), V, 53, 14.

nī-dhī, treasure :

nī-dhīb, X, 186, 3.

nī-dhruvi, lasting :

āsti nī-dhruvi, it lasts, VIII, 20, 22.

nī-misla, companion :

nī-mislām, I, 167, 6.

nī-mishat, see mish.

nī-méghamāna :

nī-méghamānāb, streaming down,

II, 34, 13.

nīmā, downward :

nīmāb udā-bhiḥ, with downward floods, X, 78, 5.

nī-yút, steed :

nī-yútāb, I, 167, 2 ; V, 52, 11 ; I,

134, 2.

nīyútvat, with steeds :

nīyútvantāb, V, 54, 8 ; nīyútvatā

(ráthena), I, 134, 1.

nir, night :

(V, 52, 16¹.)

nishanḡn, carrying quivers :

nishanḡnab, V, 57, 2.

nishkā, golden chain :

nishkāṁ, II, 33, 10.

nīshṭya, strange, hostile :

(I, 166, 2².)

nīs, out of, from (c. Abl.):

nīb (nayata), V, 55, 10; nīb (ka-krame), V, 87, 4.

nī, to lead :

nāyatha, VII, 59, 1.—nayata ākṣba nīb, lead us towards, and out of,
V, 55, 10.—ānu neshatha, conduct, V, 54, 6.—vī nayanti, they lead about, I, 64, 6⁸.—See pranetrī.

nīla-prishṭba :

nīla-prishṭbāb hamsāsab, the swans with dark blue backs, VII, 59, 7.

nú, indeed ; now . . . :

nākió nú, I, 165, 9; utá vā nú, V, 60, 6; utó nú, VIII, 94, 6; yā
nú, I, 165, 10; yé ka nú, V, 87, 2; yān ko nú, VI, 66, 3.—nú
kit, interrog. part., I, 39, 4²; VI, 66, 1; 5; VII, 56, 15; nú, interrog., I, 64, 15²; II, 33, 7; V, 52, 15¹.

nu, to shout :

anūshata, I, 6, 6; nāvamānasya, who praises you, II, 34, 10¹.

nud, to push :

nunudre, I, 85, 10; 11; 88, 4;
nutthāb, thou shookest, (I, 165, 9¹).—āpa nudanta, they drove away, I, 167, 4; parā-núde, to attack, I, 39, 2.

nūtana, new :

nūtanam, V, 55, 8.

nūnām, now :

I, 39, 7; 165, 12; 170, 1; V, 56,
5; 58, 1; VIII, 20, 15.—kāt ha
nūnām, I, 38, 1; VIII, 7, 31;
kvā nūnām, I, 38, 2; VIII, 7, 20; káb nūnām, V, 61, 14.

nṛí, man ; hero :

nārab ná ranvāh, like gay men, VII, 59, 7; nṛí-bhyaḡ (pāve, gāve, tokāya), I, 43, 2; nṛí-bhyaḡ nāri-bhyaḡ, I, 43, 6; jatāsya nṛinām, I, 43, 7; narām ná sāmsab (Indra), II, 34, 6¹; nṛí-bhiḡ,
I, 64, 13; nári āpāmsi, see nárya.
—narā (Indra and Vāyu), I, 2,
6; narab, men (Maruts), I, 37,
6; 86, 8; 165, 11; V, 53, 15;

54, 10; 59, 3; 61, 1; VII, 59,
4; VIII, 20, 10; 16; nārab, I,
39, 3; 64, 4; 10; 85, 8; 166,
13; V, 52, 5; 6; 8; 11; 53, 3;
6; 54, 3; 8; 55, 3; 57, 8; 58, 8;
59, 2; 5; 61, 3; VII, 56, 1; 57,
6; VIII, 7, 29; 20, 6; 7; nṛin,
I, 171, 6¹; V, 54, 15; 58, 2; nṛi-bhiḡ, V, 87, 4; narām ribhukshāb,
I, 167, 10.

nṛi-okas, see narokas.

nṛit, to dance :

nṛitub, V, 52, 12.

nṛí-tama, most manly :

nṛi-tamāsab, I, 87, 1.

nṛitú, dancer :

nṛitavab (the Maruts), VIII, 20, 22.

nṛi-mānas, manly-minded :

nṛi-mánāb, I, 167, 5.

nṛimā, manhood :

nṛimnām, V, 54, 1; VII, 56, 5;
nṛimnā, manly thoughts, V, 57,
6; nṛimnāib, manly courage, VI,
66, 2.

nṛi-vat, with children and men :

(208.)

nṛi-vāhas, who can carry the heroes :

nṛi-vāhasā, I, 6, 2.

nṛi-sāk, friend of man :

nṛi-sākab, I, 64, 9.

nṛi-hán, killing men :

nṛi-hā, VII, 56, 17.—Ep. of Rudra,
(I, 114, 1².)

nédishṭba, nearest :

nédishṭbam, V, 56, 2.

néma, many a :

némab, V, 61, 8.

nemí, felly :

nemāyab, I, 38, 12.

Nódhas :

nódhab, I, 64, 1¹; (124 seq.)

naú, ship :

nāvab, V, 54, 4; naúb, V, 59, 2.

pakshá, wing :

pakshān, I, 166, 10.

pakshín, winged :

syenāsab pakshínab, VIII, 20, 10.

pagrá, mighty :

pagráṁ, I, 167, 6.

pāñkan, five :

pāñka hótrín, II, 34, 14.

Pañkāla :

krivi=Pañkāla? (VIII, 20, 24¹.)

paní, miser :

panīb, V, 61, 8.

pat, to fly :

paptúb, V, 59, 7; pátatab, VIII, 7, 35.—ā paptata, fly to, I, 88, 1³; ā apaptan, VII, 59, 7.—
ví patatha, you fly across, I, 168, 6; ví pápatan, they were scattered, VIII, 20, 4.

pat (patyate) :

pátyamānam, having taken (a name), VI, 66, 1; távishib pat, (I, 64, 7³.)

pāti, lord :

bhūtāśya pátib, X, 121, 1; bráhmanab pátim, I, 38, 13¹; pátayab rayīmām, X, 121, 10; V, 55, 10.

pátnī, wife :

gāni with pátnī, (I, 85, 1¹.)

pathín, path :

pathā (yamāśya), on the path, I, 38, 5³; kēna kit pathā, I, 87, 2; pathi-bhiś, II, 34, 5; X, 168, 3; pánthām sūryāya yāṭave, a path for the sun to walk, VIII, 7, 8¹.

pathyā, path, course :

pathyāb, V, 54, 9; VI, 66, 7.

pad, to go, depart :

padishrá, I, 38, 6³.

pad, foot :

pat-sú, V, 54, 11.

pan, to glorify :

panayanta, I, 87, 3.

panasyú, praiseworthy, glorious :

panasyúm, I, 38, 15; V, 56, 9; panasyāvab, X, 77, 3.

pánīyas, more glorious :

pánīyasī (távishī), I, 39, 2.

payab-dhā, sucking :

payab-dhāb, VII, 56, 16.

payab-vrīdh, increasing the rain :

payab-vrīdhab, I, 64, 11.

páyas, milk (rain) :

páyasā, I, 64, 5; 166, 3; páyab ghrítā-vat, I, 64, 6².

par, see pri.

pára, highest :

párasmin dhāman, I, 43, 9; páram, top, I, 168, 6.—páre yugé, in former years, I, 166, 13.

pára-para, one after another :

pára-parā, I, 38, 6.

paramá, further :

paramāb, I, 167, 2; paramāśyāb, V, 61, 1¹.

parás, beyond (c. Acc.) :

paráb, I, 19, 2¹.

párā, prep. . . . :

adv., far away, I, 167, 4.

parākāt, from afar :

X, 77, 6.

parākaś, far away :

ārē parākaś, VI, 74, 2.

parā-vát, far :

parā-vátāb, from afar, I, 39, 1; VIII, 7, 26; X, 78, 7; far, V, 53, 8; paramāśyāb parā-vátāb, from the furthest distance, V, 61, 1¹; parā-vāti, in the distance, I, 134, 4.

pári, prep. . . . :

pári (tasthúshab), round, I, 6, 1²; (aguś), I, 88, 4.—With Abl., from, V, 59, 7; VII, 46, 3.—
pári-, excessive, (104 seq.)—
Synizesis of pári, p. cxxiii.

pari-krośá, reviler :

pari-krośám, (104.)

parikshāma, withered away :

(104.)

pári-gman, traveller :

pári-gman (Indra), I, 6, 9.

pári-grī, running, swarming around :

pári-grayaś, I, 64, 5; V, 54, 2 (bis).

pári-dveshas, a great hater :

pári-dveshasāb, (104.)

pari-prī :

pári-priyāb, great lovers or surrounding friends, (105.)

pári-prīta, loved very much :

pári-prītab, (105.)

pári-prūsh, scattering moisture :

pári-prūshab, X, 77, 5.

pári-bādh, harasser :

pári-bādhāb, I, 43, 8¹.

pári-manyú, wrathful :

pári-manyāve, I, 39, 10¹.

pári-ráp, enemy :

pári-rápab, (104.)

parilaghu, per levis :

(104.)

parishubāna, abode :

(I, 6, 1²); (29.)

pári-stúbh :

pári-stúbhab, shouting all around, I, 166, 11.—pári-stúbhab (ishab), standing round about, (VIII, 7, 1¹.)

pári-sprīdh, rival :

pári-sprīdhāb, (104.)

pári-srut :

pári-stubh = pari-srut, (VIII, 7, 1¹.)

pārīnas, wealth :

pārīnasā, I, 166, 14.

pārushñi, (speckled) cloud :

pārushnyām, V, 52, 9¹; (V, 53, 9¹.)

pārus, knot :

(66); p. xxv.

pargānya, cloud :

pargānyena, I, 38, 9¹; pargānyab iva, I, 38, 14¹; pargānyam, V, 53, 6¹.

pārvata, mountain (cloud) :

pārvatab, V, 60, 2; 3; pārvatab girib, I, 37, 7¹; pārvatam girim, V, 56, 4¹; pārvatam, I, 85, 10; pārvatāb, I, 64, 3; V, 54, 9; 55, 7; VIII, 7, 2; 34; pārvatāsab, V, 87, 9; VIII, 20, 5; pārvatān, I, 19, 7¹; 39, 5; 64, 11; 166, 5¹; V, 57, 3; VIII, 7, 4; 23; pārvatasya, V, 59, 7; pārvatānām (ārāb), I, 39, 3²; pārvateshu, V, 61, 19; VIII, 7, 1; 20, 25.—p. xxv.

parvata-kyūt, shaking the mountains :

parvata-kyūte, V, 54, 1; parvata-kyūtab, V, 54, 3; (I, 168, 5².)

pārvan, knot :

(66); p. xxv.

parva-jās, piece by piece, to pieces :

parva-jāb, VIII, 7, 22¹; 23.

pārāna, valley :

pārānāsab, VIII, 7, 34.

pāvī, tire (of a wheel) :

pāvī-bhīb, I, 64, 11; pavyā, I, 88, 2²; V, 52, 9; pāvishu, I, 166, 10; pāvī-bhyab, I, 168, 8.

par, to see :

pāryan, I, 88, 5; V, 53, 3; pāry-antab, VIII, 20, 26.—pari-āparyat, he looked over, X, 121, 8; pāri aparyan, they looked about for (Acc.), I, 168, 9.

parū, cattle :

parvāb, I, 166, 6; parūm (ārvyam), V, 61, 5; pārvē, I, 43, 2.

pasupā, shepherd :

pasupāb-iva, I, 114, 9¹.

parśāt, behind :

parśāt dagh, to stay behind, VII, 56, 21.

Pastyā, N. of a people :

(398.)

Pastyā-vat, N. of a country :

pastyā-vati, VIII, 7, 29¹.—Adj., filled with hamlets, (399.)—

Subst., sacrificial vessel, (VIII, 7, 29¹.)

pastyā, housewife, ep. of Aditi :

(260.)

pā, to protect :

pānti, I, 167, 8¹; V, 52, 2; 4; pāsi, I, 134, 5² (bis); pāhi, I, 171, 6¹; pāthāna, I, 166, 8; yūyām pāta, VII, 56, 25; 57, 7; 58, 6; 47, 4.—nī pānti, they ward off, VII, 56, 19.

pā, to drink :

pāthā, I, 86, 1; pāhi, I, 2, 1; pī-tāsab, I, 168, 3; pībanti asya, VIII, 94, 4; 5; piba, V, 60, 8; pibata, VII, 59, 3¹; pībantab, V, 61, 11; pībadhya, I, 88, 4.

pāgas, splendour :

pāgasā ātyena, II, 34, 13³.

pāgasvat, brilliant :

pāgasvantab (vīrāb), X, 77, 3.

pāñī, hand, hoof :

(I, 38, 11¹.)

pātra, vessel :

three pātras, filled with milk and Soma, (VIII, 7, 10².)

Pāthya :

Vrīshan Pāthya, (153.)

pārā, the other shore :

pārē, I, 167, 2; pārām (pārshi nab), II, 33, 3; pārām, the end, V, 54, 10.

pārāvata, pl., extranei, strangers :

pārāvātāb, V, 52, 11¹.

pārāvata-hān :

pārāvata-ghnī (Sarasvatī), (V, 52, 11¹.)

pārthiva, earthly; earth :

pārthivam (sādma), I, 38, 10¹; V, 87, 7¹; pārthivā, divyāni, I, 64, 3; pārthivāb, V, 52, 7.—pārthivāt ādhi, from above the earth, I, 6, 10; (51 seq.); pārthiva, rāgas, dyū, (I, 19, 3¹); pārthivāni, earth, sky, and heaven, (52); vīsvā pārthivāni, the whole earth, VIII, 94, 9.

pārya :

pārye dyōb, at the close of the day, VI, 66, 8¹.

pāvakā, pure :

pāvakāsab, I, 64, 2; pāvakām, I, 64, 12; pāvakébhiḥ, V, 60, 8; pāvakāb, VII, 56, 12; 57, 5; pāvakān, VIII, 20, 19.—pāvaka ◡—◡—, p. cxvi seq.

pāsa, snare :

pāṣān, the snares of (Druh), VII, 59, 8; vārunasya pāṣāt, VI, 74, 4.

pitṛ, father :

pitā, I, 38, 1; X, 186, 2; pitāram, II, 33, 12; pitāram utā mātāram, I, 114, 7; pitūb, I, 87, 5; pitṛi-nām nā sāmsāb, like the prayers of our fathers, X, 78, 3.—mānub pitā, I, 114, 2; II, 33, 13.—pitāb marutām, Rudra, the father of the Maruts, I, 114, 9; II, 33, 1; pitā, V, 60, 5; pitāram, V, 52, 16; pitṛe marutām, I, 114, 6.

pitrya, of the father or fathers :

pitryāni (ukthāni), VII, 56, 23; pitryam (vāyab), VIII, 20, 13.

pinv, to sprinkle, pour out :

pinvanti, I, 64, 5; 6^a; pinvate, II, 34, 8^a; pinvanti utsam, they fill the well, V, 54, 8; VII, 57, 1.

pipishvat, crushing :

pipishvatī, I, 168, 7.

pipishu, wishing to drink :

pipishavab, VII, 59, 4.

pippala, apple :

pippalam rūsat, the red apple (the lightning), V, 54, 12^a.

piś, to adorn :

piṣe, he decked himself, II, 33, 9; piṣe, it has been laid, V, 57, 6; piśrām, bedecked, V, 56, 1.—abhi piṣe, they have adorned, V, 60, 4.—ā piśāñāb, adorning, VII, 57, 3.

pīś, gold :

(I, 64, 8¹.)

piśā, gazelle :

piśāb-iva, I, 64, 8¹.

piśānga, tawny :

piśāngaiś (horses), I, 88, 2.

piśānga-arva, having tawny horses :

piśānga-arvāb, V, 57, 4.

pish, see pipishvat.

pitf, drinking :

pītāye, for to drink, I, 166, 7; VII, 59, 5; asyā sōmasya pītāye, VIII, 94, 10 to 12; pītīm arhasi, thou art worthy to drink, I, 134, 6 (bis).

pūms, man :

pūmsāb, V, 61, 6; pūmān, V, 61, 8.

putrā, son :

putrām, I, 38, 1; putrāb (prīśneb), V, 58, 5; (rudrāsya), VI, 66, 3; divāb putrāsab, X, 77, 2.

putra-krithā :

putra-krithēnā gānayab, ὄς γυναικες ἐν τεκνοποιῇ, V, 61, 3^a.

púnar, again :

I, 6, 4; VII, 58, 5; VIII, 20, 26.

púr, stronghold :

pûb-bhīb, I, 166, 8.

purandhrī, housewife :

(I, 134, 3¹.)

púram-dhi, morning, dawn :

púram-dhim, I, 134, 3¹.

purás, in front :

purāb, I, 170, 4.

purā :

of yore, I, 39, 7; V, 53, 1; formerly, I, 167, 10; VII, 56, 23; VIII, 7, 21.

purisha, soil :

from prī, (I, 64, 12^a; V, 55, 5^a.)

purishín :

purishínā, marshy, V, 53, 9.—purīshināb, cultivators of the land, yeomen, V, 55, 5^a.

purú, many :

purú, I, 166, 3; 13; pūrvībhīb, I, 86, 6; pūrvīb, X, 77, 2.

puru-kshú, nourishing many :

puru-kshúm, VIII, 7, 13.

puru-kandrá, resplendent :

puru-kandrá (for Pada puru-kand-rāb), V, 61, 16¹.

puru-tāma, manifold :

puru-tāmam, V, 56, 5.

puru-drapsá, rich in rain-drops :

puru-drapsāb, V, 57, 5.

puru-praisha, invoked by many :

puru-praishāb, I, 168, 5^a.

Puru-mīlba :

puru-mīlāya, V, 61, 9¹; (V, 61, 5^a); (359 seq.; 362.)

puru-rūpa, assuming many forms :

puru-rūpab, II, 33, 9.

purusha-ghná, man-slaying :

purusha-ghnām, I, 114, 10.

purushātā, men as we are :

VII, 57, 4.

Purushanti :

(360); (V, 61, 5^a; 9¹.)

puru-sprīh, much-desired :

puru-sprīhab, VIII, 20, 2.

Purúravas :

(307.)

push, to prosper :

púshyati, I, 64, 13^a; pushyema, let us foster, I, 64, 14; púshyanti nrimām, rich in manhood, VII,

- 56, 5; pushrám, prosperous, I, 114, 1.—See pushyás.
pushrī, prosperity:
pushrīshu, I, 166, 8.
pushri-vārdhana, wealth-increasing (Rudra):
pushri-vārdhanam, VII, 59, 12.
pushyás, prosperity:
pushyāse, VII, 57, 5.
pū, to clean:
punishé, (V, 58, 1¹); punānāb, who clean themselves from (Acc.), VI, 66, 4²; pūtāsya, clarified (Soma), VIII, 94, 5.—pavanta, (VII, 56, 3¹).
pūtā-daksha, endowed with holy strength:
pūtā-daksham, I, 2, 7¹.
pūtā-dakshas, endowed with pure strength:
pūtā-dakshasab, VIII, 94, 7; 10.
pūtabhrit, a Soma-vessel:
(VIII, 94, 5²).
Pūru, N. of a people:
(398.). pūrva, former, old:
pūrvāsu vi-ushrīshu, VIII, 20, 15;
pūrvān-iva sākhn, V, 53, 16;
pūrvam, ancient, I, 166, 1.—
pūrva, before, opposed to ūpara, behind, (I, 167, 3²).
pūrvā-pīti, the early draught:
pūrvā-pītaye, I, 19, 9¹; 134, 1¹ (bis).
pūrvyā, old:
pūrvyām, V, 55, 8; pūrvyāb (agnīb), old, or, first, VIII, 7, 36¹.
Pūshan:
is kapardin, (I, 114, 1²).
priksh, food:
priksham yā, to go in search of food, (II, 34, 3⁴); prikshé, to feed, II, 34, 4¹.
prikshām, adv., quick:
II, 34, 3⁴.
Prikshayāma, N. pr.:
(V, 54, 1²).
priksha-yāvan (?) :
priksha-yāvane, (V, 54, 1²).
prik:
pra-priṣṭkatī (dhēnā), satisfying, I, 2, 3¹.—prikshase, (I, 6, 7²).
prināt, a liberal worshipper:
prinātāb, I, 168, 7.
prīt, battle, fight:
prīt-sū, I, 64, 14; VIII, 20, 20¹.
prītanā, battle:
prītanāsu, I, 85, 8; VII, 56, 22; 23; 59, 4.
prīthivī, earth:
prīthivī, antāriksha, dyū, (50);
prīthivī, rāgas, dyū, (I, 19, 3¹);
prīthivī, X, 121, 5; I, 39, 6;
the earth trembles, I, 37, 8; V, 54, 9; 56, 3¹; 60, 2; VI, 66, 9;
opens wide, V, 58, 7; prīthivī
utā dyaūb, I, 114, 11; prīthivīm,
X, 121, 1; V, 57, 3; (vi-undānti),
I, 38, 9; V, 54, 8; prīthivyāb,
X, 121, 9; I, 38, 2; 39, 3; X,
77, 3; 168, 1; prīthivya, V,
59, 1; prīthivyām, I, 168, 8.—
prīthivī, i. e. prīthuvī, (255); = prīthvī, pp. cxx; cxxi.
prīthū, broad:
prīthūm, I, 37, 11; dirghām
prīthū, far and wide, V, 87, 7.— prīthvī, (255; 260.)
prīthu-grāya, wide-spreading:
prīthu-grāyī, I, 168, 7¹.
prīthū-pāni:
(I, 38, 11¹).
Prīni, Prīni, the mother of the Maruts:
prīnib, I, 168, 9¹; V, 60, 5; VI, 66, 1: 3¹; VII, 56, 4; (V, 61, 4¹; VIII, 94, 1¹); prīnim, V,
52, 16; prīnyāb, II, 34, 2²;
10; prīneb putrāb, V, 58, 5.—
prīnaya, the clouds, VIII, 7, 10¹.
prīni-mātri, pl., sons of Prīni:
prīni-mātarab, I, 38, 4; V, 57, 2;
3; prī, I, 85, 2; V, 59, 6; VIII,
7, 3; 17.—(I, 85, 3¹; 168, 9¹;
II, 34, 2²; V, 61, 4¹; X, 78,
6¹).
prīshat-arva, with spotted horses:
prīshat-arvāb, I, 87, 4¹; prīshat- arvāsab, II, 34, 4.—(I, 37, 2¹; II, 34, 3²).
prīshatī, the spotted deer (the clouds):
prīshatībhiḥ, I, 37, 2¹; 64, 8; II
34, 3²; V, 58, 6¹; prīshatīb, I,
39, 6; 85, 4; 5; V, 55, 6¹; 57,
3; VIII, 7, 28; prīshatīshu, V,
60, 2.—(I, 87, 4¹; V, 53, 1¹).
prīshbā, back:
prīshbām (divāb), I, 166, 5; (V, 54, 1²); prīshbē (sādab), V, 61,
2; (V, 61, 3²).

prishṭba-prayag :

(V, 55, 1¹.)

prishṭba-yágvān :

diváb ā prishṭba-yágvane, who sacrifices on the height of heaven, V, 54, 1².

prī (or par), to carry over :

pārshatha, you carry off, I, 86, 7¹ ; pārshi nab pārám āmhasab, carry us to the other shore of anguish, II, 33, 3.—āti pārâyatha, you help across, II, 34, 15 ; (I, 86, 7¹).—apa par, to remove, nib par, to throw down, (I, 86, 7¹.)

prī, to fill :

pipartana, fulfil, I, 166, 6² ; (221.) —pūrṇā (naúb), full, V, 59, 2.

péras, form :

pérasab, I, 6, 3 ; see aperás.

pósha, fulness :

pósham (ráyab), I, 166, 3.

paúmsya, valour :

paúmsyebhiḥ, I, 165, 7 ; VI, 66, 2 ; paúmsyā, manly deeds, I, 166, 7 ; V, 59, 4 ; vriṣhni paúmsyam, manly work, VIII, 7, 23.

pyai, to fill, to swell :

pipyata, II, 34, 6² ; pîpāya, it is brimming, VI, 66, 1 ; pipyúshim (isham), swelling, VIII, 7, 3 ; pipyúshib (ishab), VIII, 7, 19.

prá, prep. . . . :

prá (āti tasthaú), I, 64, 13 ; prá (verb understood), V, 54, 2 ; 87, 3² ; prá rátheshu, I, 85, 5.

pra-avitri, see av.

pra-kri/in, playing about :

pra-kri/inab (the Maruts), (I, 6, 8²) ; VII, 56, 16.

prá-ketas, wise :

pra-ketasab, I, 39, 9 ; V, 87, 9 ; prá-ketasab, I, 64, 8 ; attentive, VIII, 7, 12 ; prá-ketase (rudráya), I, 43, 1.

prakkb, to ask :

sám prikkbase, thou greetest, I, 165, 3² ; p. xv.—See ā-prikkbya.

pra-gá, offspring :

pra-gáyai, VII, 57, 6 ; pra-gābhiḥ prá gáyemahi, II, 33, 1.—pra-gāb, beings, I, 43, 9.

Pragāpati :

prágāpate, X, 121, 10.

pra-gñātrī, expert :

pra-gñātārāb ná gyéshibāb, X, 78, 2.

pra-tarām, further :

V, 55, 3.

prá-tavas, endowed with exceeding power :

prá-tavasab, I, 87, 1.

prāti, prep. . . . :

to, I, 19, 1 ; 171, 1 ; towards, I, 88, 6 ; 165, 12 ; me arapat prāti, V, 61, 9.

prati-skābh, see skambh.

pratná, old :

pratnásyā, I, 87, 5.

prá-tvakshas, endowed with exceeding vigour :

prá-tvakshasab, I, 87, 1 ; V, 57, 4.

prath, to spread :

práthishṭba, (the earth) opened wide, V, 58, 7 ; paprathe, (the earth) is stretched out, V, 87, 7¹.—ā papráthan, they spread out, VIII, 94, 9.

prathamá, first :

prathamáni, I, 166, 7 ; prathamāb, II, 34, 12 ; prathamāb ápúrvyab, I, 134, 6¹.

prathama-gā, first-born :

prathama-gāb, X, 168, 3.

pra-dakshinít, turning to the right : V, 60, 1.

pra-dív :

pra-dívā, always, V, 60, 8.

pra-dír, region :

pra-dírāb, X, 121, 4.

prá-niti, guidance :

prá-nitishu, I, 114, 2¹.

pra-netrí, leader :

pra-netārāb mártam, V, 61, 15 ; pra-netārāb (mánma), they guide, VII, 57, 2.

prá-patha, journey :

prá-patheshu, I, 166, 9².

prá-pada :

prá-padeshu, Roth for prá-pathe-shu, (I, 166, 9²).

pra-bhrithá, offering :

pra-bhrithé, II, 34, 11¹.

pra-yagyū, chasing :

pra-yagyavab, I, 39, 9 ; 86, 7 ; VII, 56, 14 ; prá-yagyavab, V, 55, 1¹ ; prá-yagyave, V, 87, 1 ; prá-yagyūn, hunters, VIII, 7, 33.

práyas, offering :

práyāmsi, I, 86, 7 ; práyab, I, 134, 1 ; práyab-bhiḥ, for the sake of our offerings, I, 2, 4¹.

práyasvat, enjoying the offerings :
 práyasvantab, X, 77, 4.
 pra-yúg, driver :
 pra-yúgab, X, 77, 5¹.
 pra-yúdh, eager for battle :
 pra-yúdhab, V, 59, 5.
 pra-yotrí, one who removes :
 pra-yotā, (267.)
 pravá, spring, well :
 pravásab, X, 77, 5².
 pra-vana, pronus :
 (X, 77, 5²).
 pravátvat, bowing :
 pravátvatī, pravátvatīb, pravátvantab, V, 54, 9.
 pra-van :
 prava=pravan, (X, 77, 5²)
 pravayana, a goad :
 (I, 166, 4¹).
 pravā, the blowing before :
 (X, 77, 5²).
 pra-vetri, driver :
 (I, 166, 4¹).
 prá-jasti, great praise :
 prá-jastim, V, 57, 7.
 pra-sis, command :
 pra-sīsham, X, 121, 2 ; (4.)
 práshri, leader :
 práshrib, I, 39, 6¹ ; VIII, 7, 28.
 prá-sita, springing forth :
 prá-sitāsab (wells), X, 77, 5.
 prá-siti, raid :
 prá-sitau, V, 87, 6¹ ; mā te bhūma prá-sitau, may we not be in thy way when thou rushest forth,
 VII, 46, 4.
 prá-sthāvan, marching forward :
 prá-sthāvānab, VIII, 20, 1.
 prá :
 prási, for pási, (Oldenberg, I, 134, 5²). pránat, see an.
 prātāb, early :
 I, 64, 15 ; at the morning sacrifice, VIII, 94, 6.
 priyá, beloved :
 priyé, I, 85, 7 ; priyása, I, 87, 6 ;
 kádha priyáb, for kadha-priyab (see kadha-pri), I, 38, 1¹ ; VIII,
 7, 31 ; priyā (nāma), VII, 56,
 10 ; áhani priyé, on a happy day, VII, 59, 2 ; priyāb tanvāb, our own bodies, I, 114, 7¹.
 pri, to please :
 pipriyānāb, well pleased, VII, 57, 2.

pru, to float :
 (X, 77, 5²).
 prush, to shower down :
 prushnuvānti, I, 168, 8 ; prushā (for Pada prusha), let me shower, X, 77, 1¹.
 prēshita, most beloved :
 prēshitāb, I, 167, 10.
 phaliga, for parigha (?) :
 (350.)
 bar, particle of asseveration :
 (V, 59, 1¹).
 badh, see vadh.
 bandh, to bind :
 baddhām ásti tanñshu, it clings to our bodies, VI, 74, 3.
 bāndhana, stem :
 urvārukām iva bāndhanāt, like a gourd from its stem, VII, 59, 12.
 bandhu-eshá :
 bandhu-eshé, when there was inquiry for their kindred, V, 52, 16.
 babhrú, tawny :
 babhrúb, II, 33, 5 ; 9 ; babhráve, II, 33, 8 ; babhro, II, 33, 15.
 barhánā, weapon, bolt :
 barhánā, I, 166, 6² ; (226.)—barhánā tmánā, by their own might, X, 77, 3.
 barhís, grass-pile, altar :
 barhíb, I, 85, 6 ; VII, 57, 2¹ ; 59, 6 ; barhíshi, I, 85, 7 ; 86, 4 ;
 VII, 46, 4¹.
 bála, strength :
 bálam, I, 37, 12 ; V, 57, 6.
 bala-dā, giving strength :
 bala-dāb, X, 121, 2.
 bahulá, manifold :
 bahulám, V, 55, 9.
 bānā, reed, arrow :
 (VIII, 20, 8¹).
 bādth, to drive away :
 árē bādthēhām, VI, 74, 2.—bā-dhante ápa, I, 85, 3 ; ápa bādhadhvam, VII, 56, 20.—níbādhita, struck down, (268 seq.)
 bāhú, arm :
 bāhú (the regions are the two arms of Hiranyagarbha), X, 121, 4 ; bāhú-bhīb, I, 85, 6¹ ;
 bāhúshu, I, 166, 10 ; VIII, 20, 11 ; bāhrób, V, 57, 6.

bâhú-ogas, strong-armed :

bâhú-ogasab, VIII, 20, 6.

bâhú-gûta, quick with his arm :

bâhú-gûtab, V, 58, 4.

bîga, seed :

bîgam, V, 53, 13.

budh, to awake :

Sâyana, bodhi=budhyasva, (II, 33, 15².)—prâ bodhaya, awake, I, 134, 3.

budhnâ, bottom :

budhné apâm, X, 77, 4.

budhnyâ, hidden :

budhnyâ, VII, 56, 14¹.

brîh :

barhayati, to crush, (226.)—upa-bârbrîhat, she stretched out (dôb, her arm), V, 61, 5¹.—Cf. vrih.

brîhât, great, mighty :

brîhât, V, 55, 1 ; 2 ; 57, 8 ; 58, 8 ; brîhât váyab, VII, 58, 3 ; brîhât gshîte, VIII, 20, 6 ; brîhât vademâ, we shall magnify, II, 33, 15 ; brîhântam krátum, I, 2, 8 ; âpab brîhatîb, X, 121, 7¹ ; 9 ; brîhatâb divâb, V, 59, 7 ; 87, 3.

brîhat-giri, dwelling on mighty mountains :

brîhat-girayab, V, 57, 8¹ ; 58, 8.

brîhât-diva, coming from the great heaven :

brîhât-divaib, I, 167, 2 ; (V, 57, 8¹.)

brîhat-vayas, of great strength :

brîhat-vayasab (the Maruts), (I, 37, 9¹.)

Brîhaspâti, a variety of Agni :

(I, 38, 13¹.)

bradhnâ, bright :

bradhnâm, I, 6, 1¹.

Brâhmanaspâti, lord of prayer :

N. of Agni, (I, 38, 13¹) ; (246, note^a.)

brahmanyât, prayerful :

brahmanyântab, II, 34, 11.

brahmân, m. priest :

brahmâ kâb, VIII, 7, 20 ; brahmânam, X, 77, 1¹.

brâhman, n., prayer, hymn :

brâhma, I, 37, 4 ; 88, 4 ; 165, 11 ; II, 34, 7¹ ; brâhmâni, I, 165, 2 ; 4¹ ; 14 ; II, 34, 6 ; brâhmanâb pátim, lord of prayer, I, 38, 13¹.

brû, to speak :

bruve (pûmân fti), he is called, V, 61, 8.—âdhi brûhi nab, bless us, I, 114, 10.—ûpa bruvate, they implore, I, 134, 2.—prâ bruvâte, they proclaim, V, 87, 2.—sâm bruvate, they talk together, I, 37, 13.

bhaksh, to enjoy :

bhakshiyâ (c. Gen.), V, 57, 7.

bhâga, luck :

bhâgam, luck, I, 134, 5 ; bhâge â, in wealth, II, 34, 8.

bhag, to obtain :

bhégire, V, 57, 5.—â bhaga nab, appoint us to, give us, help us to (Loc.), I, 43, 8 ; VII, 46, 4¹ ; â bhagatana, VII, 56, 21.—Desider., bhiksh, (220.)

bhadrá, good, auspicious :

bhadrá, good things, I, 166, 9¹ ; 10 ; (sauravasâni), VI, 74, 2 ; (vástrâ), beautiful, I, 134, 4 ; bhadrá (râtîb), I, 168, 7¹ ; (sumatîb), I, 114, 9.

bhâdra-gâni, having an excellent mother :

bhâdra-gânayab, V, 61, 4¹.

bhan, to shout :

(V, 52, 12¹.)

bhandât-ishî, in jubilant throng :

bhandât-ishraye, V, 87, 1.

bharatâ, Bharata (the warrior) :

bharatâya, V, 54, 14¹.

bharas, burden (?) :

(V, 54, 10¹.)

bhârtî, husband :

bhârtâ-iva, V, 58, 7.

bhâ, to shine :

vi-bhâti, he shines forth, X, 121, 6.

bhâgâ, share :

bhâgâm, VII, 56, 14.

bhânú, splendour :

bhânúb divâb, V, 52, 6 ; bhânúm, V, 59, 1 ; bhânú-bhiîb, I, 87, 6 ; VIII, 7, 8 ; 36.

bhâm, to be in wrath :

bhâmitâb, I, 114, 8¹.

bhâma, vigour :

bhâmena, I, 165, 8.

bhâmîn :

bhâmînaâ, VS. for bhâmitâb, (I, 114, 8¹.)

bhâs, light :

bhâsâ, X, 77, 5.

bhiksh, to beg, to implore :

(220) ; bhikshe, I, 171, 1 ; bhiksheta, VIII, 7, 15.

bhind, to cut asunder :
 bhindanti, V, 52, 9.—bibhidub ví, they clove asunder, I, 85, 10.
 bhiyás, fear :
 bhiyásā, V, 59, 2; bhiyáse, (I, 87, 6¹). bhishág, physician :
 bhishák-tamam bhishágām, the best of all physicians, II, 33, 4.
 bhī, to fear :
 bhayate, I, 166, 5; VII, 58, 2;
 bhayante, I, 85, 8; 166, 4;
 bibhāya, V, 60, 3; bibhyúshe,
 I, 39, 7; ábibhayanta, I, 39, 6.
 —See ábibhīvas, bhiyás.
 bhī, f., fear :
 bhiyā, I, 37, 8; 171, 4; V, 57, 3^a; 60, 2; VIII, 7, 26.
 bhīmá, terrible :
 bhīmāb, II, 34, 1; bhīmāsab, VII,
 58, 2; mrigām ná bhīmám, II, 33, 11^a.
 bhīma-yú, fearful :
 bhīma-yúb, V, 56, 3.
 bhīmá-sandriś, terrible to behold :
 bhīmá-sandriśab, V, 56, 2.
 bhumán, the feeding cloud :
 bhumā, (I, 64, 3¹).
 bhuṅg, to enjoy :
 bhuṅgé (ishé), VIII, 20, 8; ékam
 it bhuṅgé, of use, VIII, 20, 13.
 bhurván, whirl :
 bhurváni (apām), I, 134, 5 (bis);
 p. cxxii.
 bhúvana, being, world :
 víśvā bhúvanāni, bhúvanā, I, 64,
 3; 85, 8; 166, 4; II, 34, 4;
 víśvasmāt bhúvanāt, I, 134, 5.—
 asyá bhúvanasya bhūreḥ, of this wide world, II, 33, 9; asyá víś-vasya bhúvanasya rāgā (Vāta),
 X, 168, 2; bhúvanasya gārbhaḥ,
 X, 168, 4¹.
 bhū, to be . . . :
 bhúvaḥ, I, 86, 5¹; nab babhútha,
 thou hast come to be with us,
 I, 165, 5; p. xv; babhúvān, having grown, I, 165, 8; śam nab bhútam, VI, 74, 1; (190 seq.; 435); bhūvan sákām, they became full of, VI, 66, 2; bodhi, II, 33, 15².—mā ápa bhútana,
 do not keep away, VII, 59, 10.
 —mā ápi bhūma tásyam, let us not fall under its power, VII, 57, 4¹.—kútab ā babhúva,

whence did he spring, X, 168,
 3.—pári babhúva, he embraces,
 X, 121, 10.—vi-bhvāne, (48).—
 bhávya and bhútá, what is and what will be, (p. 4); bhútásya pátiḥ, the lord of all that is, X, 121, 1.
 bhūman, earth :
 bhūma, I, 85, 5^a; 88, 2.
 bhūmi, earth :
 bhūmi and dyú, (50); bhūmib, I,
 87, 3; V, 59, 2; VIII, 20, 5;
 bhūmim, I, 64, 5; V, 59, 4;
 bhūmyām, I, 39, 4; bhūmy
 ā dade, p. cxvii.
 bhūri, much :
 bhūri, bhūríni, I, 165, 7; 166, 10;
 bhūri śakra, you have valued,
 VII, 56, 23¹; bhūreḥ, II, 33, 9; 12.
 bhūri-pāni :
 (I, 38, 11¹).
 bhūsh, to honour :
 ā-bhūshantiḥ, who honour, I, 43, 9; cf. ā-bhūshénya.
 bhrī, to bear, to carry :
 bibhritha, I, 39, 10; VIII, 20, 26;
 bíbhratí, V, 56, 8; háste bíbhrat, I, 114, 5; bibharshi, II, 33, 10; bharata, VII, 46, 1;
 bharate, I, 64, 13; bháradhyai,
 VI, 66, 3; gabhára, VII, 56, 4.
 —bíbhratab ūpa, bringing to (Acc.), I, 166, 2¹.—prá bhára-dhve, you are carried forth, V, 59, 4; prá bhara, I, 64, 1; prá bhare, I offer, V, 59, 1; 60, 1^a; prá bharadhvam, VI, 66, 9; prá bharāmahe, I, 114, 1; prá-bhratab, hurled forth, I, 165, 4; (182); pp. xv : xxi.—prāti
 bharadhvam, bring forward,
 VIII, 20, 9.
 bhrími, quick, fresh :
 (II, 34, 1^a).—bhrímim, cloud,
 II, 34, 1^a; vagrant, VII, 56, 20².
 bhesagá, medicine :
 bhesagám, V, 53, 14; VIII, 20, 25¹; X, 186, 1; bhesagáb
 gálāshab, II, 33, 7; (I, 43, 4³); háste b.bhrat bhesagá, carrying in his hand medicines
 (Rudra), I, 114, 5; bhesagā, II, 33, 12; 13¹; VII, 46, 3;
 bhesagāni, VI, 74, 3; bhesa-

- gásya* (mārutasya), VIII, 20, 23;
bheshagébhiḥ, II, 33, 2; 4.
bhogá, liberal:
bhogán, V, 53, 16.
bhrág, to shine:
bhrágante, VII, 57, 3; ábhraḡi,
 V, 54, 6.—vi bhrágante, I, 85,
 4; VIII, 20, 11; vi-bhrágante
 (for vi-bhrágante), V, 61, 12¹.
bhrágat-rishri, with brilliant spears:
bhrágat-rishrayab, I, 64, 11; 87,
 1; 168, 4; II, 34, 5; V, 55, 1;
 X, 78, 7; bhrágat-rishrim, VI, 66, 11.
bhrágat-ganman, flame-born:
bhrágat-ganmānab, VI, 66, 10.
bhrágas, splendour:
bhrágasā, X, 78, 2.
bhrātri, brother:
bhrātarab, I, 170, 2; V, 60, 5; bhrā- tab, I, 170, 3; bhrātā, X, 186, 2.
bhrātri-tvá, brotherhood:
bhrātri-tvám, VIII, 20, 22¹.
bhrúmi:
bhrúmim for bhrímim, (298); (II, 34, 1⁶).
manhánā, in magnificence:
 V, 61, 10.
makshú, quickly:
 I, 39, 7; (II, 34, 12¹); VI, 66, 5;
 VII, 56, 15; I, 2, 6; soon, I, 64, 15.
makhá, adj., strong, brisk:
 (46 seq.); makhāb, I, 64, 11;
makhébhyab, champions, VI, 66, 9.
makhá, sacrifice:
makhásya dāvane, for the offering
 of the sacrifice, VIII, 7, 27¹; I, 134, 1; (47.)—makháb, sacri-
 ficer (?), I, 6, 8¹.
maghá, wealth:
maghāni, VII, 57, 6.
maghá-vat, mighty, lord:
maghá-vā, V, 61, 19; magha-van,
 I, 165, 9; maghāvat-bhyab, VII,
 58, 3; II, 33, 14; maghāvat-su,
 I, 64, 14; maghónām, VII, 58,
 6; VIII, 94, 1.—maghá-vā, Maghavat (Indra), I, 171, 3.
magmán, strength:
magmánā, I, 64, 3.
matí, thought; prayer:
iyám matíb, this prayer, V, 57, 1;
imāb matíb, I, 114, 1¹; matáyab,
 I, 165, 4¹; V, 87, 1; matinām, prayers, I, 86, 2¹.—yáthā matím, after their own mind, I, 6, 6²;
sváyā matyā, their own will, V,
 58, 5.—matí, thoughts, I, 165, 1.
mad, pron. . . .:
 me, they are mine, I, 165, 4; ahám,
 I, 171, 1; 4.
mad, to rejoice:
mādanti (c. Loc.), I, 85, 1; V, 61,
 14; (c. Acc.), V, 52, 1²; mádatha,
 V, 54, 10; VIII, 7, 20; mádanti,
 V, 56, 3¹; mádantab, VII, 59, 7; svadháya mádantam, (34); mat- sati, may he rejoice in (Gen.),
 VIII, 94, 6; mādayādhvai, I,
 37, 14; VII, 59, 6; mādaya- dhvam (c. Gen.), I, 85, 6; mā- dayādhvai, I, 167, 1.—prā ma- danti, thy delight, VII, 57, 1¹.—
 See mand.
māda, enjoying, rapture, Rausch, feast:
mádab, I, 86, 4; máde, I, 85,
 10; V, 53, 3; VIII, 7, 12;
mádeshu, I, 134, 5; mádāya, I,
 37, 15; II, 34, 5.—(135.)
mada-kyút, enrapturing:
mada-kyútam, I, 85, 7²; (134 seqq.);
 VIII, 7, 13.
madirá, delightful:
madirám (mádhū), V, 61, 11; madi- rásya, the sweet juice, I, 166, 7.
mádhū, sweet juice, mead:
mádhū, I, 19, 9; 166, 2; V, 61, 11; VIII, 7, 10³; mádhvab
ándhasab, sweet food, I, 85, 6³;
mádhvab ándhasā, with the juice of sweetness, V, 54, 8³; for mádhvab read madhvád (?), VII, 57, 1¹; mádhob, II, 34, 5;
somyé mádhau, VII, 59, 6.
madhu-ád, eating honey, fond of honey:
madhu-ád (conjecture for má- dhvab), VII, 57, 1¹.
mádhū-varṇa, honey-like:
mádhū-varṇam, I, 87, 2.
madhyamá, middle:
madhyamé, in the middle (heaven),
 V, 60, 6.
man, to think, to perceive:
manmahe, V, 52, 3; mānyase, V, 56, 2; manvánáb, V, 52, 15;
māmsase, (I, 6, 7³); mānyamā- nāb pársānāsab, thinking them-

- selves valleys, VIII, 7, 34.—āti
manyase, thou despisest, I, 170, 3.—pari-mámsate, he will despise, VII, 59, 3.
manab-gd, swift as thought :
manab-gúvab, I, 85, 4.
mánas, mind :
mánab, I, 170, 3; mánab krinuté, she is mindful, V, 61, 7; mánab
ánu gānatī, I, 134, 1; mánāmsi, VII, 56, 8; mánasā, X, 121, 6;
I, 64, 1; 171, 2¹ (bis); mahā
mánasā, with strong desire, I,
165, 2¹.
manā, wrath :
asyaī manāyai, II, 33, 5.
manishā, thought; prayer :
manishāb, VI, 66, 11; manishām,
X, 77, 8; manishā, in my heart,
I, 165, 10.—(I, 64, 12⁶). manishīn, wise :
manishīnab, V, 57, 2.
mānu, man :
mānave, I, 165, 8; 166, 13.—
Mānub pitā, father Manu, I,
114, 2; II, 33, 13¹.
mānus, man :
mānushab (yōshā), I, 167, 3.
māntṛa, song :
gyēshṭhab māntṛab, the oldest song (Indra), (439).
mand, to please, to make rejoice :
(VII, 57, 1¹); māndantu, I, 134, 2; āmandat, I, 165, 11; mamandū- shī, joyful, V, 61, 9; mandadhve, you rejoice, VIII, 7, 14.—ūt
mamanda, he has gladdened, II, 33, 6.—See mad.
mandāt-vīra, delighting heroes :
(I, 114, 1⁸). mandasānā, pleased :
mandasānāb, V, 60, 7; mandasānāb,
V, 60, 8.
mandīn, delightful :
mandīnab, I, 134, 2.
mandū, happy-making :
mandū, I, 6, 7.
mandrā, sweet-toned :
mandrāb, I, 166, 11.
manman, thought; prayer :
mánma, bráhma, gírab, and ukthā,
(I, 165, 4¹); mánma, VII, 57,
2; mánmāni, I, 165, 13; mánma- bhiś, VIII, 7, 15; 19; X, 78, 1.
manyú, courage, spirit, anger, wrath :
(I, 37, 4²); (104); manyáve, I, 37,
7; manyú-bhiś, fiercely, VII,
56, 22.
mayab-bhū, beneficent, delightful :
mayab-bhúvab, I, 166, 3; V, 58, 2;
mayab-bhuvaś, VIII, 20, 24;
mayab-bhū, II, 33, 13; X, 186, 1.
máyas, delight :
máyab nab bhūta, be our delight,
VIII, 20, 24; nab máyab kridhi,
I, 114, 2.
mar, distantly connected with ar :
(65.)
Marút . . . :
etymology, p. xxiv seq.; Marut = Mars, p. xxv; marut, maruta, wind, p. xxiii; marut=deva,
p. xxiv.
marútvat, with the Maruts :
marútvate (Vishṇu), V, 87, 1;
rudrāb marútvān, I, 114, 11;
II, 33, 6.
marút-sakhi, the friend of the Maruts, (Agni) :
marút-sakhā, (I, 38, 13¹).
mārta, mortal :
mártab, I, 64, 13; VIII, 20, 22;
mártam, V, 61, 15; mártāsab, I, 38, 4; márteshu, VI, 66, 1.
marta-bhógana, food of mortals :
marta-bhóganam, I, 114, 6.
mártya, mortal :
mártyab, I, 19, 2; 86, 7; II, 34,
9; V, 53, 15; VIII, 7, 15;
mártyam, V, 52, 4; mártyasya (mâyīnab), I, 39, 2.
mártya-ishita, roused by men :
mártya-ishitab, I, 39, 8.
márya, manly youth :
maryāb, I, 6, 3¹; máryāb, I, 64, 2²;
V, 53, 3; 59, 3²; 5; 6; VII,
56, 1; 16; X, 77, 3; 78, 4;
máryāsab, V, 61, 4; X, 77, 2;
máryāb (kshītnām), X, 78, 1.
mah :
mamahe, he has magnified, I, 165, 13; tāt nab mamahantām, may they grant us this, I, 114, 11.
máh, fem. mahī, great, mighty :
mahā mánasā, I, 165, 2¹; mahé,
I, 168, 1; V, 87, 1; VII, 7, 5;
mahāb, Abl., I, 6, 10; mahāb,
Gen., I, 19, 2; 3; 168, 6; V, 52, 7; 87, 8; X, 77, 6; mahāb, Acc.
pl., II, 34, 11; Nom. pl., II, 34, 12¹; mahāb mahī, the great (mother) of the great, VI, 66,

- 3¹; mahāb mahīm su-stutīm, a great, great hymn of praise, II, 33, 8; mahīm īsham, II, 34, 8; mahāb īshab, VII, 59, 2; mahī, VII, 56, 4; II, 33, 14.
- mahā, great:
mahé vidāthe, V, 59, 2²; mahā-nām devānām, VIII, 94, 8.
- mahāt, great, mighty:
mahāntab, I, 166, 11; VIII, 20, 8; mahāntab, V, 55, 2; mahāntam utā arbhakām, our great or our small ones, I, 114, 7; mahānti mahatām, V, 59, 4; mahatīb apāb, VIII, 7, 22; mahatē rāwāya, I, 168, 9; mahatāb, V, 87, 4.
- mahān, might:
mahnā, I, 166, 11; V, 87, 2¹; VI, 66, 5; VIII, 20, 14.
- māhas, might:
(I, 86, 1¹); māhab, V, 52, 3; māhasā, V, 59, 6; māhāmsi, V, 60, 4; VII, 56, 14; māhab-bhīb, I, 165, 5²; V, 58, 5; VII, 58, 2; (I, 86, 6¹).—mahām, great, I, 6, 6.
- mahās, adv., quickly:
mahāb, (II, 34, 12²); V, 87, 7; X, 77, 8.
- mahā-grāmā, a great troop:
mahā-grāmāb, X, 78, 6.
- mahāmaha, mahāmahivrata:
(VI, 66, 3¹).
- māhi, great; adv., exceedingly:
māhi, n., II, 34, 14; V, 54, 1; I, 43, 7.—Adv., māhi vriddhāb, grown large, V, 60, 3; māhi tve-shāb, exceeding terrible, VIII, 20, 7; truly, I, 167, 10.
- mahi-tvā, greatness, might:
mahi-tvā, Instr., X, 121, 3; 4¹; V, 58, 2; VII, 58, 1; mahi-tvām, I, 87, 3; 166, 1.
- mahi-tvanā, greatness, might:
mahi-tvanā, Instr., I, 85, 7; 86, 9; mahi-tvanām, I, 166, 12¹; V, 54, 5; 55, 4.
- mahinā, greatness, might:
mahinā, X, 121, 8; V, 57, 4; 87, 2¹.—See mahimān.
- mahi-bhānu:
mahi-bhānavab for ahi-bhānavab(?), (I, 172, 1¹).
- mahimān, greatness:
mahimānam, I, 85, 2; mahimā, I, 167, 7; V, 87, 6; mahinā=mahimnā, (V, 87, 2¹).—See mahinā.
- mahishā, mighty:
mahishāsab, I, 64, 7.
- mahī, earth:
mahī, X, 77, 4.
- mahiḥ:
mahiḥyāte, she is magnified, V, 56, 9.
- mahomahī (compound?):
(VI, 66, 3¹).
- mā, not...:
I, 38, 5¹; mó, I, 38, 6; mó sú, VII, 59, 5; mā, with Optative, VII, 59, 12².
- mā, to measure; to fathom:
memire yōganāni, they measure many miles, X, 78, 7; mimihi (ślōkam), fashion, I, 38, 14.—vi mamire (antāriksham), they have measured, V, 55, 2; vi-mānab (antārikshe rāgasab), X, 121, 5².
- mā, to roar:
mimāti, I, 38, 8¹; mīmātu, V, 59, 8.
- mānḡishṭba, bright red:
(232.)
- mātri, mother:
mātā, VI, 66, 3¹; VIII, 94, 1; vatsām nā mātā, I, 38, 8; mātāram, V, 52, 16; pitāram utā mātāram, I, 114, 7; mātúb, I, 37, 9; apāb māttrib, (307.)
- māna, measure:
mānam, I, 39, 1¹.
- Māna:
mānāsab, the Mānas, I, 171, 5¹; (I, 165, 15¹).
- mānusha, adj., of men; m., man:
mānushā yugā, V, 52, 4.—mānushab, I, 37, 7; X, 77, 7; mānushāb, I, 38, 10; 39, 6.
- Māndāryā:
māndāryāsa, I, 165, 15¹; 166, 15; 167, 11; 168, 10; (183 seq.)
- Mānyā, the son of Māna (?):
mānyāsa, I, 165, 14¹; 15¹; 166, 15; 167, 11; 168, 10; (183 seq.; 203.)
- māyīn, deceitful; powerful:
māyīnab (mātyasya), I, 39, 2.—māyīnab (pl.), powerful, I, 64, 7; māyīnam, V, 58, 2.
- māruta, of the Maruts:
mārutam (jārdhab), I, 37, 1; 5; V, 52, 8; p. xxv; (ganām), I, 38, 15; 64, 12; V, 52, 13; 14; 53, 10; 58, 1; VIII, 94, 12; (rātham), V, 56, 8; mārutam

- (nāma), VI, 66, 5; VII, 57, 1¹;
mārutab (ganāb), V, 61, 13;
mārutāya (sārdhāya), V, 54, 1;
 VIII, 20, 9; mārutasya dhām- nab, I, 87, 6.—mārutāya, to the host of the Maruts, VI, 66, 9.—
mārutasya bhesagāya, of the Marut-medicine, VIII, 20, 23.—
mārutam rudrāya sūnūm, the Marutlike son of Rudra, VI, 66,
 11¹; māruta, epithet of Vishnu, (134.)
mārāṭikā, consolation :
mārāṭikēbbhiḥ, VIII, 7, 30.
mārtāṇḍā, addled egg :
 (251.)
mās, month :
māt-bhiḥ, (I, 6, 3²)
māhina, mighty :
māhinab, I, 165, 3; p. xiv.—mā- hinā = mahimā, greatness? (309.)
migh, see ni-mēghamāna.
mitrā, friend :
mitrām nā, I, 38, 13²; V, 52, 14;
mitrāya, II, 34, 4; mitrānām, I, 170, 5.
Mitrā :
Aryaman, Mitra, Varuna, (V, 54, 8¹); mitrāb, VII, 56, 25; VIII,
 94, 5; I, 43, 3; 114, 11; mitra,
 VII, 59, 1; mitrām, I, 2, 7. mitra-pati, lord of friends :
mitrānām mitra-pate, I, 170, 5.
mitrāyu, looking for friends :
mitrāyāvab, mitrāyuvab, (II, 34,
 4¹) Mitrāvaruna, du., Mitra and Varuna :
mitrāvarunau, I, 167, 8¹; nā*, I, 2, 9; mitrāvarunau, I, 2, 8.
mithās, each other :
mithāb, VII, 56, 2; 3; VIII, 20, 21.
mithasprīdhya, clashing against each other :
mithasprīdhya-iva, I, 166, 9¹.
mimiksh, to sprinkle, to shower :
 (185; 187 seq.).—See myaksh.
mimikshā :
mimikshāb sōmab, (188.)
mimikshū :
mimikshūm indram, (188.)
mirā, from mis :
 (185.)
mish :
ni-mishatāb, the twinkling (world),
 X, 121, 3¹.
mih :
mimikshvā, sprinkle, (188.)
mih, rain, mist :
mīham, I, 38, 7; VIII, 7, 4; mihé,
 I, 64, 6.—mihāb nāpātam, rain,
 the offspring of the cloud, I, 37, 11¹.
mī, to dim :
prā minanti, V, 59, 5.
mī/būb-tama, most liberal :
mī/būb-tamāya (rudrāya), I, 43, 1.
mī/būshmat, bountiful :
mī/būshmatī-iva, like a bountiful lady, V, 56, 3¹.
mīdbvās, bounteous :
mīdbvab (rudra), I, 114, 3; II, 33,
 14; mī/būshab (rudrāya), VI,
 66, 3; tān rudrāya mī/būshab,
 the bounteous sons of Rudra, VII, 58, 5¹; mī/būshab (marū- tab), VIII, 20, 18²; mī/būshām, VIII, 20, 3¹; mī/būshī, V, 56, 9.
muṭ, to deliver :
muṭātātha, II, 34, 15; muṭātām,
 VI, 74, 3; mukshīya, VII, 59,
 12².—prā nab muṭkatam, VI,
 74, 4.—prāti āmugdhvam, you have clothed yourselves, V, 55, 6; prāti muṭishra pāṇ, may he catch the snares, VII, 59, 8.
 —vī muṭadhvam, unharness, I, 171, 1.—(270.)
mud, to rejoice :
mudé, V, 53, 5.
mūni, maniac :
mūniḥ-iva, VII, 56, 8¹.
mush, to strip :
mōshatha, V, 54, 6¹.
mushri-hān, boxer :
mushri-hā, V, 58, 4; VIII, 20, 20.
mūhus, suddenly :
mūhub, V, 54, 3.
mūrdhān, summit :
mūrdhā nābhā, I, 43, 9¹.
mrigā :
mrigāb iva hastīnab, like wild elephants, I, 64, 7²; mrigāb nā
bhīmāb, terrible like wild beasts, II, 34, 1²; mrigām nā bhīmām, like a terrible wild beast (the lion), II, 33, 11².—mrigāb, deer,
 I, 38, 5.
mriganyū, hunter :
mriganyāvab, (V, 55, 1¹)
mrig, to clear off :
ūt mrige, nī mrige, V, 52, 17.

mrid, to be gracious :

mriḷayantu nab, I, 171, 3; mriḷāta nab, I, 171, 4; V, 55, 9; 57, 8; 58, 8; mriḷantu, VII, 56, 17; mriḷā (nab), I, 114, 2; 10; II, 33, 11; mriḷa, I, 114, 6; II, 33, 14; mriḷatam, VI, 74, 4.

mriḷayāt-tama, most gracious :

mriḷayāt-tamā (su-matīb), I, 114, 9.

mriḷayāku, softly stroking :

mriḷayākub (hāstab), II, 33, 7.

mriṭyū, death :

mriṭyūb, X, 121, 2; mriṭyōb, VII, 59, 12.

mridh, to fail :

mardhanti, I, 166, 2; mārdhati, VII, 59, 4.

médha, animal sacrifice :

(I, 88, 3¹; I, 43, 4¹).

medhā-pati, the lord of animal sacrifices :

medhā-patim, I, 43, 4¹.

medhas :

medhās and vedhās, (VIII, 20, 17¹).

medhā, wisdom :

medhā, I, 165, 14¹; medhām, II, 34, 7².—medhāb, minds, I, 88, 3¹.

medhā-pati :

(I, 43, 4¹).

meshā, ram :

meshāya meshyē, to ram and ewe, I, 43, 6.

mō, see mā.

myaksh, to cling :

(184 seqq.) : mimyaksha (with Loc.), I, 167, 3; mimikshub, I, 167, 4.—sām mimikshub, I, 165, 1²; p. xiii; V, 58, 5; sām mimikshire, they were united with, they obtained, I, 87, 6².

mraکش, to pound to pieces :

nī mimrikshub, I, 64, 4².

mraکشa-kṛtvan :

(I, 64, 4²).

yaksh, jagōn, to hunt :

(V, 55, 1¹).

yaksha, the Yakshas :

(V, 55, 1¹; VII, 56, 16¹).

yaksha-drīś, shining like Yakshas :

yaksha-drīśab, VII, 56, 16¹.

yag, to sacrifice :

yāgāma, V, 60, 6; yāgāmahe, VII, 59, 12; yāgadhva for yāgadhvam,

p. cxviii; yāgamānāya, V, 60, 7; yāgamānasya, VII, 57, 2; īgānāb, VII, 59, 2.—ā-yegē he acquired by sacrifices, I, 114, 2¹.

yagatā, worshipful :

yagatām, read yagata, II, 33, 10¹.

yāgatra, worshipful :

yagatrāb, V, 55, 10; 58, 4; VII, 57, 1; 4; 5.

yāgus :

from yag, (66.)

yagñā, sacrifice :

yagñām, I, 170, 4; X, 121, 8; II, 34, 12² (vah); V, 52, 4; 5; 10; 87, 9; VII, 59, 11; VIII, 20, 2; havishmantab yagñāb, X, 77, 1; visvá-psub yagñāb, X, 77, 4; ut-rīkī yagñē, X, 77, 7; yagñā-yagñā, to every sacrifice, I, 168, 1¹; yagñālb, I, 86, 2; X, 78, 1; yagñēbhib, I, 166, 14; yagñēshu, VII, 57, 1; X, 77, 8.

yagñā-vāhas, carrying off the sacrifices, worshipped, propitiated :

yagñā-vāhasab, I, 86, 2¹; (40); (II, 34, 12²).

yagñā-sādḥ, fulfilling our sacrifice :

yagñā-sādham (rudrām), I, 114, 4.

yagñīya, to be worshipped, worshipful :

yagñīyam nāma, I, 6, 4; yagñīyāni nāmāni, I, 87, 5²; (167); yagñīyāb, V, 52, 1; yagñīyāb, V, 87, 9; yagñīyāsab, V, 61, 16; yagñēshu yagñīyāsab, X, 77, 8; yagñīyebhib, V, 52, 5.

yāgyu = prayagyū (?) :

yāgyave, (V, 54, 1²).

yāgvan, sacrificing :

(V, 54, 1²); (66.)

yat, to strive :

yetire, I, 85, 8; V, 59, 2; VIII, 20, 12; X, 77, 2.—ādhi yetire, they fastened, I, 64, 4.—sām yatantām, may they come striving together, V, 59, 8.

yatā-sruk, holding ladles (full of libations) :

yatā-srukab, II, 34, 11.

yāt-kāma, which we desire :

yāt-kāmāb, X, 121, 10; (4.)

yātra :

yātra, wherever, I, 166, 6; V, 55, 7; yātra ādhi, over whom, X, 121, 6; where, V, 61, 14; when, VIII, 20, 6.

yáthâ and yathâ, as, like:

yáthâ purâ, as of yore, I, 39, 7;
yáthâ, like, V, 54, 8; 13; 61,
10; VII, 57, 3; yathâ, V, 53, 7; 54, 4; 87, 7.—yáthâ matim, after their own mind, I, 6, 6²; te yáthâ mánab, what thy mind was, I, 170, 3; yáthâ kit mánase, hridâ,
V, 56, 2; yáthâ vidâ, you know,
V, 55, 2; yáthâ gushânta, VII,
56, 20; yáthâ vârantî, VIII, 20,
17.—yáthâ, so that, V, 59, 7;
61, 4; I, 43, 2 (tris); 3 (tris);
114, 1; II, 33, 15.

yathâ-varâm, wherever he listeth:
X, 168, 4.

yâd, rel. pron. . . .:

yâsya, X, 121, 2¹; 4; (p. 4.)—yât ha vâb bâlam, with such strength as yours, I, 37, 12; yât ha vâb purâ, as it was with you formerly, VIII, 7, 21; yât ádbhutam, what strange thing, I, 170, 1.—yêna, that, I, 166, 14; yâs-min, where, I, 168, 6.

yâd, adv., when; that . . .:

yât-tâtâb, X, 121, 7; yât sim, I,
37, 6; 9; yât ha, I, 37, 13; VIII,
7, 11; ádha yât, now that, I,
167, 2; yât ângâ, VIII, 7, 2;
yât-yât vâ, II, 34, 10; V, 60,
6; yât, if, I, 38, 4; yât, that, I,
165, 14; 166, 13; 14; 167, 7;
VII, 56, 4; 10.

yadâ, when:

V, 87, 4.

yâdi:

when, I, 168, 8; if, VII, 56, 15.

Yâdu:

yâdum, VIII, 7, 18.

yam, to hold, to yield, to give:

ârma yakkbata, VII, 59, 1; yakkba,
I, 114, 10; yamsat asmâbhyam,
I, 114, 5; yakkbamânâb âyudhaih, wielding weapons, VII, 56, 13.—yakkbata ádhi, grant, I, 85,
12.—ní yemiré, they bent down before (Dat.), VIII, 7, 5; 34.—
prâ-yatâs, thrust forth, I, 166, 4.—ví yanta, extend, I, 85, 12;
ví yantana, V, 55, 9; ví yamub,
they stretched (their legs) apart,
V, 61, 3²; ví yematub, they went straight to (Dat.), V, 61, 9.

yâma, rein:

yâmab, V, 61, 2.

yamá, twin:

yamâb-iva, V, 57, 4.

Yamá:

yamásya pathâ, I, 38, 5².

yamayishnu:

yamayishnavab, SV. for namayishnavab, (VIII, 20, 1¹).

Yamúnâ:

yamúnâyâm, V, 52, 17; (V, 53, 9¹.)

yayí:

yayím, way, I, 87, 2¹.—yayíb, the wanderer, V, 87, 5¹.—yayiyab (sindhavab), running, X, 78, 7.

yáva, barley:

(I, 38, 5².)

yávase, pasture grass, fodder:

yávase, I, 38, 5²; V, 53, 16.

yaví, or, yavyâ, young maid:

Instr., yavyâ, I, 167, 4¹.

yahví, river:

yahvíshu, VII, 56, 22.

yâ, to go . . .:

yâtave, I, 37, 10; VIII, 7, 8; 20,
6; yânti, they pass along, I,
37, 13¹; yâmi, I explore, V, 54, 15; súbham yâtâm, going in triumph, V, 55, 1 to 9; (VIII, 20, 7²); yâthana súbham, V, 57, 2; (I, 87, 4²); yât âyâsub, when they move about, VII, 57, 1.—
ânu yâtâ, go after, I, 38, 11.—
âva yâsat, will he bring down,
VI, 66, 5.—â yâ, to come . . .: â yâtam úpa dravât, come quickly hither, I, 2, 5; â yâsishra, may it bring, ask for, I, 165, 15²; 166, 15; 167, 11; 168, 10; p.
xx; â nab yântu ákkba, I, 167,
2; â yâtam úpa nib-kritâm, I,
2, 6.—ní âyâtana, you went down, V, 54, 5¹.—yâthana pári, you go round, V, 55, 7.—prâ
yâta, come, I, 37, 14; prâ yâtana, I, 165, 13; prâ yayub,
V, 53, 12; prâ âyâsishra, V, 58,
6.—ví yâthana, you pass through,
I, 39, 3¹; ví yâta, destroy, I, 86, 10¹; ví yâti, it passes between,
VI, 66, 7.

yâma, way, march:

yâmab, I, 166, 4; 172, 1¹; yâmam, (I, 87, 2¹); VIII, 7, 2¹; 14;
yâmam yânti, VIII, 7, 4; yâmam
yêshibâb, VII, 56, 6; yâmena,
V, 53, 12; yâmâya, I, 37, 7;
39, 6; VIII, 7, 5; yâme, V, 54,

- 5; yāmebhiḥ, VIII, 7, 7; yāme-shu, I, 37, 8¹; 87, 3; V, 56, 7; VIII, 20, 5.—yāmaḥ, carriage, VI, 66, 7.
- yāman*, way, march:
yāma, II, 34, 10; yāman, I, 37, 3²; 85, 1; 166, 1; V, 52, 2; 58, 7; X, 77, 8; 78, 6; VII, 58, 2; yāmani, V, 53, 16; on moving, X, 77, 4; yāmani (ishām), on the search, I, 168, 5; yāmanab, out of your way, V, 57, 3²; yāma-bhiḥ, I, 37, 11; V, 56, 4.
- yāma-rṛta*, glorious on their march:
yāma-rṛtebhiḥ, V, 52, 15.
- yāma-hūti*, imploring invocation:
yāma-hūtishu, V, 61, 15.
- yu*, to keep off:
 (I, 87, 4³); yuyōta, VII, 56, 9; ārāt yuyota, VII, 58, 6; X, 77, 6; yuyodhi, II, 33, 3; mā nab yuyothāb, do not deprive us of (Abl.), II, 33, 1; nā vai yoshat, it will never depart, II, 33, 9.—yuyotana āpa, keep far, V, 87, 8¹.—vī yuyota, deprive (Acc.) of (Instr.), I, 39, 8¹.
- yugā*:
pāre yugé, in former years, I, 166, 13; mānushā yugā, generation of men, V, 52, 4.
- yukkb*, to fail:
yūkkbati, V, 54, 13².
- yug*, to join, to yoke, to harness:
yugānti, I, 6, 1; 2; yugāte, I, 87, 3; II, 34, 8; yukkte, I, 134, 3; yugdhvam, V, 56, 6 (tris); yuyugré, V, 53, 1; āyugdhvam, V, 55, 6; 57, 3; yuktā, VIII, 94, 1; āyukta, he started, V, 87, 4.—yuganta, they joined together (heaven and earth), VI, 66, 6¹; VIII, 20, 4²; āyugdhvam (tāvishāb), you have assumed, I, 64, 7²; yugānāb, in company with, I, 165, 5.—ā āyugdhvam, you have yoked, I, 85, 4; ā-yuyugré, V, 58, 7.—ūpo ayugdhvam, I, 39, 6; ūpa yugmahe, I, 165, 5.—prā āyugdhvam, I, 85, 5; prā yugata, V, 52, 8; (X, 77, 5¹).—vi-yukta, sejunctus, (187.)
- yugā*, together with (Instr.):
 I, 39, 4¹.
- yūgya*, companion:
yūgyebhiḥ, I, 165, 7¹.
- yudh*, to fight:
yūdhyataḥ (tritāsya), VIII, 7, 24.—prā yuyudhub, they have rushed forward to fight, V, 59, 5.
- yūdḥ*, weapon, sword:
yudhā-iva, I, 166, 1²; yudhā, V, 52, 6¹; yutsū, (Grassmann, VIII, 20, 20¹.)
- yūyudhi*, thirsting for fight:
yūyudhayab, I, 85, 8.
- yuvatī*, young woman:
yuvatīb, V, 61, 9; yuvatīm, I, 167, 6.
- yūvan*, youthful, youth:
yūvā (ganāb), I, 87, 4; V, 61, 13; yūvā (rudrāb), V, 60, 5; yūvānam (Rudra), II, 33, 11; yūvānab, I, 64, 3; 165, 2; 167, 6; V, 57, 8; 58, 8; yuvānab, V, 58, 3; yūvānab, VIII, 20, 17; 18; yūnab, VIII, 20, 19.
- yushmāt* . . .:
yushmākam, I, 39, 2; 4; yushmāka, VII, 59, 9; 10; p. cxviii.—vaḥ followed by eshām, V, 87, 2¹; vaḥ, for you or from you, VII, 56, 24¹.
- yushmā-ishita*, roused by you:
yushmā-ishitab, I, 39, 8¹.
- yushmā-ūta*, favoured by you:
yushmā-ūtab, VII, 58, 4 (tris).
- yushmāka*, your:
yushmākābhiḥ, I, 39, 8; yushmākena, I, 166, 14.
- yushmā-datta*, bestowed by you:
yushmā-dattasya, V, 54, 13.
- yēshṭba*:
yāmam yēshṭbāb, quickest to go, VII, 56, 6.
- yógana*:
yóganam, hymn, I, 88, 5¹.—yóganam, the daily course (of the sun), V, 54, 5.—yóganāni, many miles, X, 78, 7.
- yodhā*, soldier:
yodhāb, X, 78, 3.
- yoshānā*, woman:
yoshānā, V, 52, 14.
- yóshā*, woman, wife:
yóshā, I, 167, 3; yóshāb, X, 168, 2.
- yós*, wealth:
jām yób, health and wealth, (193 seq.); V, 53, 14²; jām ka yób ka, I, 114, 2; II, 33, 13.

- rawh, to hurl :
ramháyanta, I, 85, 5¹.—arahânáb, racers, I, 134, 1.
- raksh, to shield :
rakshata, I, 166, 8; rákshata, II, 34, 9.
- rákshas, fiend :
rákshab, I, 86, 9¹.
- raghu-pátvan, swift-winged :
raghu-pátvánab, I, 85, 6¹.
- raghu-syád, swiftly gliding along :
raghu-syádab, I, 64, 7; 85, 6.
- ragab-túr, crossing the air :
ragab-túb, VI, 66, 7²; ragab-túram, chaser of the sky, I, 64, 12⁴.
- rágas, air :
rágas, dyú, rokaná, (51; 55); rágas and pārthiva, (51 seq.; 55);
rágab, V, 53, 7; 59, 1; á rágab, through the air (?), (VII, 57, 3¹); rágasab (pl.), X, 121, 5²;
maháb rágasab (Abl.), I, 6, 10;
 (Gen.), I, 19, 3¹; 168, 6.—rágas, water, rain; darkness, (I, 19, 3¹); rágamsi, clouds, mists, I, 166, 3; 4; V, 54, 4; rágasab
vi-sárgane, when the mist is scattered, V, 59, 3.
- ran, to delight in (Loc.), to be pleased, to accept with pleasure (Acc.):
 (85; 86); ránan, V, 53, 16;
rananta, VII, 57, 5; rananti,
 I, 38, 2¹; rañanātā, you have rejoiced, I, 171, 1².
- rána, fight :
ránāya, I, 168, 9.
- ránaya, glorious :
rányāni, I, 85, 10.
- ranvá, gay :
ranváb, VII, 59, 7.
- rátna, treasure :
saptá ratná, VI, 74, 1.
- ratna-dhéya, gift of treasures :
ratna-dhéyāni, X, 78, 8.
- rátha, chariot :
ráthe, II, 34, 7; ráthai-iva, V, 60, 1; ráthānām ná aráb, like the spokes of chariot-wheels,
 X, 78, 4.—ráthe, Indra's chariot,
 I, 6, 2.—ráthāb, the chariots of the Maruts, I, 38, 12; V, 55, 1 to 9; (V, 87, 3¹; VI, 66, 2¹); ráthān, V, 53, 5¹; ráthebhi, I,
 88, 1; V, 58, 6; ráthai, VIII,
 7, 17; (VIII, 20, 2¹); ráthānām,
 V, 52, 9; 53, 10; VIII, 94, 1;
rátheshu, I, 39, 6; 64, 9; 85,
 4; 5; 87, 2; 166, 9; II, 34,
 8; V, 53, 2; 4; 56, 6; 7; 57,
 6; 60, 2; 4; 61, 12; VIII, 20, 12.—rátham, the chariot of the Maruts, I, 167, 5; V, 56, 8; ráthēna, VIII, 20, 10; ráthasya,
 I, 88, 2; ráthe, V, 54, 11; 56,
 6; VIII, 7, 28; 20, 8¹.—
ráthasya (Vāta's), X, 168, 1.—
ráthēna (Vāyu's), I, 134, 1;
ráthe, I, 134, 3.
- ratha-túr, hastening the chariots :
rathatúb-bhi, I, 88, 2; ratha- túb, X, 77, 8.
- rátha-vat, consisting of chariots :
rátha-vat rádhāb, V, 57, 7.
- Rátha-víti Dārbhya :
 (359 seq.; 362); (V, 61, 5²);
rátha-vítāu, V, 61, 18; rátha- vítib, V, 61, 19.
- rathiyánti :
rathiyánti-iva, whirling like chariotwheels, I, 166, 5².
- rathī, charioteer :
rathīb-iva, V, 61, 17; rathyāb ná,
 V, 87, 8; rathyāb, VII, 56, 21.—
rathyāb (didhishāvab), lords of chariots, X, 78, 5.—rathyāb
syāma, let us carry off, V, 54, 13¹.
- rathiyánti, see rathiyánti.
- rathe-rúbh, brilliant on chariots :
rathe-rúbham, I, 37, 1; V, 56, 9.
- ráthya :
ráthyab sáptib, (I, 85, 1¹).
- rad, to scratch, to bite :
rádati, I, 166, 6⁴; rad, to cut, to give, (222 seq.).
- rada, radana, tooth :
 (I, 166, 6⁴).
- radhrá, wretched, a sluggard :
radhrám, II, 34, 15¹; VII, 56, 20¹; radhrá and bhrími, (II, 34, 1⁶).
- rándhra, hollow :
ukshnáb rándhram, 'the hollow of the bull,' VIII, 7, 26¹.
- rap, to whisper :
 (II, 33, 3¹).—me arapat prátī, V, 61, 9.
- rápas, mischief :
rápab (āturasya), VIII, 20, 26¹;
rápasab, II, 33, 3¹; 7.
- rapát-úddhan, whose udders are swelling :
rapádúddha-bhi, II, 34, 5.

rabh, to cling :

rarabhe, I, 168, 3.—rabh, to rush upon, â-rabh, to begin, (I, 166, 1¹.)

rabhab-dâ, giving strength :

rabhab-dâb (Indra), (I, 166, 1¹.)

râbhas, vigour :

râbhab, (I, 166, 1¹.)

rabhasâ, robust :

rabhasâya, I, 166, 1¹; rabhasâsab (aṅgâya), I, 166, 10²; rabhasâb, V, 54, 3.

râbhishîba, most vigorous :

râbhishîbâb, (I, 166, 1¹); V, 58, 5.

ram, to stop, to arrest :

riramâma, I, 165, 2; p. xx; mǎ ní riramat, V, 53, 9; ramayanti, VII, 56, 19.

ram, to delight :

ramâya, V, 52, 13; raranta (read rarâta?), V, 54, 13².

rambhñ, clinging :

rambhñî-iva, I, 168, 3¹.

rayî, wealth :

rayîm, I, 64, 15; 85, 12; V, 54, 14; VIII, 7, 13; rayî-bhîb, I, 64, 10; pátayab rayîñm, X, 121, 10; V, 55, 10.

ramî, ray :

ramîm, VIII, 7, 8; ramâyab, V, 55, 3; ramîshu, I, 134, 4 (bis); ramî-bhîb, I, 87, 6²; darts (lightnings), I, 19, 8; reins, X, 77, 5.

râsa, rain :

râsasya, I, 37, 5.

Rasâ, the distant river :

rasâ, V, 53, 9¹; rasâyâ, X, 121, 4².

râ, to give :

ârâsata, I, 166, 3; ârâdhvam, I, 166, 12; VII, 59, 4; râsya, I, 114, 6; 9; râsi, II, 33, 12; raré, VII, 59, 5; rarâta (for raranta?), V, 54, 13².

râg, to shine :

vî râgatha, V, 55, 2; VIII, 7, 1.

râgan, king :

râgâ gâgatab, X, 121, 3; vívasya bhúvanasya râgâ, X, 168, 2; rîshim vâ râgânâ vâ, V, 54, 7; râgânâ, V, 54, 14; 58, 4; râgânâb-iva, I, 85, 8; râgânâb ná kîtrâb, X, 78, 1.

râga-putra, having kings for her sons :

râga-putrâ, ep. of Aditi, (254; 260.)

râtâ-havis, who has offered libations :

râtâ-havishe, II, 34, 8.

râtâ-havya, generous worshipper :

râtâ-havyâya, V, 53, 12.

râtî, gift :

râtîb, I, 168, 7¹; (V, 52, 11¹);

râtîm, VII, 56, 18.

râdh, to give :

(I, 166, 6¹); râdhyasya (vâsvab), to be gained, X, 77, 6; mǎ rîradhat, let him not deliver, II, 33, 5.

râdhas, wealth :

râdhab, II, 34, 11; V, 52, 17

(bis); 53, 13; 57, 7.

râmî, dark night :

râmîb, II, 34, 12.

ri :

rîñti, it crunches, I, 166, 6¹.—rînaté, they go asunder, V, 58, 6².—rîñân apáb, they let the waters run, VIII, 7, 28.—ânu rîyate, it streams along, I, 85, 3.—ní rîñânti, they disperse, V, 56, 4.

rît :

prâ rîrîtré, they have risen above (Abl.), X, 77, 3.

ripú, enemy :

ripúb, II, 34, 9.

rîśâdas, devourer of foes :

rîśâdasab, I, 19, 5; 64, 5; X, 77, 3; 5; rîśâdasab, I, 39, 4; V, 60, 7¹; 61, 16; VII, 59, 9; rîśâdasam (várûnam), I, 2, 7.

rîsh, to suffer, to drop :

rîshyatha, V, 54, 4; ná rîshyati, V, 54, 7; mǎ rîrishab, do not hurt, I, 114, 7; 8; VII, 46, 3.

rîsh, hurt :

rîshâb, II, 34, 9; V, 52, 4.

rîshany, to fail :

mǎ rîshanyata, VIII, 20, 1.

rîh, to lick :

rîhaté, VIII, 20, 21¹.

rî, see ri.

rukma, gold, golden chains :

rukma, I, 88, 2; (II, 34, 2¹); ruk-mâb, I, 166, 10; V, 54, 11; VII, 56, 13; rukmâsab, VIII, 20, 11; rukmân, I, 64, 4¹; rukma, V, 52, 6¹; VII, 57, 3; rukmébhi, V, 56, 1; rukméshu, V, 53, 4.—rukma, weapons(?), (I, 85, 3²).—rukma-iva, like the golden disk (in heaven), V, 61, 12.

- rukma-vakshas, gold-breasted :
rukma-vakshasab (the Maruts), (I, 64, 4¹); II, 34, 8; V, 55, 1; 57, 5; X, 78, 2; rukma-vakshasab, II, 34, 2¹; VIII, 20, 22.
- ruk, to shine :
rókante, I, 6, 1³; rókate, I, 43, 5; rókamânâb, I, 165, 12.—vī rukânâb, far-shining, VII, 56, 13.
- rug, to crash :
rugán, X, 168, 1.
- Rudrá :
rudrâb, II, 34, 2; V, 60, 5; I, 43, 3; 114, 11; rudra, I, 114, 2 (bis); 3; 7; 8; II, 33, 1 seqq.; VII, 46, 2; 4; rudrâm, V, 52, 16; I, 43, 4²; 114, 4; II, 33, 5; rudrâya, I, 43, 1; 114, 1², 6; VII, 46, 1; rudrâsya, I, 64, 2; 12; 85, 1; V, 59, 8; VI, 66, 3; 11¹; VII, 56, 1; 58, 5¹; VIII, 20, 17; II, 33, 6; 8; 13; 14; rudrât, II, 33, 9; Rudra brings the medicines, (VIII, 20, 25¹); Aditi = Rudra (?), (I, 43, 2¹).—Rudras, Vasus, and Adityas, (VII, 56, 20³); rudrâb, I, 64, 3; 166, 2; II, 34, 13; V, 60, 2; rudrâsab, I, 85, 2; V, 87, 7; rúdrâb, I, 39, 7; VIII, 7, 12; rudrâb, II, 34, 9; V, 54, 4; 60, 6; rúdrâsab, I, 39, 4; rudrâsab, V, 57, 1; VIII, 20, 2.
- rudriya, belonging to Rudra :
rudriyâsab, Maruts, I, 38, 7; V, 58, 7; rudriyâb, II, 34, 10; rudriyâsab, V, 57, 7; VII, 56, 22; rudriyânâm, VIII, 20, 3.—rudriyam, Rudra's healing, I, 43, 2.
- rúrat, red :
rúrat pīppalam, the red apple, V, 54, 12¹.
- rûpá, form :
rûpâni, V, 52, 11; tveshâm rûpâm, the blazing form, I, 114, 5; ghoshâb jrinvire ná rûpâm, X, 168, 4.
- reg, to tremble, to shake :
regate (the earth), I, 37, 8; V, 60, 2; VI, 66, 9; VIII, 20, 5; regamâne, X, 121, 6; regamânâb, I, 171, 4; regata, V, 60, 3; regatha, V, 59, 4; regati, he stirs, I, 168, 5; regayat, he made tremble, V, 87, 5; regayanti, VII, 57, 1.—prá regate, I, 87, 3; áreganta prá, they reeled forward, I, 38, 10.
- renú, dust :
renúm, X, 168, 1.
- retab-dhâ :
(V, 58, 7¹).
- revát, with wealth :
revát váyab, health and wealth, X, 77, 7.
- rai or râ, to bark :
(227 seq.)
- raí, wealth :
râyâb, V, 54, 13; VII, 56, 15; 57, 6²; râyâb pōsham, fulness of wealth, I, 166, 3; râyé, VIII, 7, 18; râyab, treasures, I, 167, 1; V, 54, 7.
- raivatâ, rich :
raivatâsab, V, 60, 4.
- róka, light :
ná rókab, VI, 66, 6²; (V, 61, 12¹).
- rokaná, light :
rokanâ (diví), I, 6, 1²; (divâb), VIII, 94, 9¹; rokanât (divâb), I, 6, 9¹; (49 seqq.); V, 56, 1; nâkasya ádhi rokané, I, 19, 6; rokanâ, sūrya, nâka, (50); three rokanas, (50 seq.)
- ródasī, du., heaven and earth :
ródasī, (X, 121, 6¹); I, 64, 9²; 85, 1; (I, 167, 3²); V, 53, 6; VI, 66, 6¹; 7; VII, 56, 17; 57, 1; 3¹; 58, 1; I, 134, 3; VIII, 7, 16; 20, 4; 94, 11; for ródasī read rodasí, V, 61, 12¹; ródasyob, I, 168, 1.
- Rodasī, f., wife of the Maruts, the lightning :
rodasī, (I, 64, 9²; 167, 3²); I, 167, 5; V, 56, 8¹; VI, 66, 6; rodasī (for ródasī iti), V, 61, 12¹; rodasīm (for rodasī), I, 167, 4¹; Rodasī as Eileithyia, (I, 167, 7¹).
- ródhas, enclosure, fence, bank of a river :
(I, 38, 11²).
- ródhasvat, still locked up, unopened :
ródhasvatib (clouds), I, 38, 11².
- rohít, ruddy horse :
rohitab, V, 56, 6.
- róhita, red (horse) :
rohitab, I, 39, 6¹; VIII, 7, 28; róhitâ, V, 61, 9; I, 134, 3.
- raurava, skin of a deer :
(232.)

laghu, light :

laghu and guru, light and heavy syllables, p. xcvi.

loká, space :

loká and uloká, p. lxxiv seqq.

vámsaga, bull :

(140.)

vákmya, praiseworthy :

vákmyab, I, 167, 7.

vaksh (uksh), to grow, to wax :

vavakshúb, I, 64, 3; vavakshire, II, 34, 4; úkshantam utá ukshitám, I, 114, 7; ukshámânáb, V, 57, 8; 58, 8; ukshitásab, I, 85, 2¹; sákám ukshitáb, V, 55, 3; sám-ukshitânám, V, 56, 5¹.—vívakshase (?), (I, 6, 7².)

vakshánā, flank :

vakshánābhyab diváb ā, I, 134, 4².

vakshánā, offering (?) :

vakshánā, Instr.? V, 52, 15¹.

vákshas, chest :

vákshab-su, I, 64, 4; 166, 10; V, 54, 11; VII, 56, 13.

vañkú, swift :

vañkúm (rudrám), I, 114, 4.

vat, to speak, to tell :

vo^téb, I, 165, 3; vo^tāma, I, 166, 1; vo^temahi, I, 167, 10; vo^tanta, V, 52, 16 (bis); vo^tatāt, V, 61, 18; kát vo^tēma, I, 43, 1; ukyate, I, 114, 6; ávo^tāma námab asmai, I, 114, 11.—ádhi vo^tata, bless us, VIII, 20, 26.—prá vivakmi, I praise, I, 167, 7; prá vo^tanta, they told me of (Acc.), V, 52, 16; prá vā^ti, VII, 58, 6.

vákas, word, speech :

idám vákab, V, 54, 15; I, 114, 6.

vakasy, to murmur :

vakasyate, (of Soma), (148.)

vágra, thunderbolt :

vágram, I, 85, 9; VIII, 7, 22.

vágra-bāhu, holding the thunderbolt in his arms :

vágra-bāhub, I, 165, 8; vagra-bāho, II, 33, 3.

vágra-hasta, with the thunderbolt in their hands :

vágra-hastab, VIII, 7, 32.

vágrin, wielder of the thunderbolt :

vágrīne (Indra), VIII, 7, 10.

vat :

api-vātáyantab, welcoming, I, 165, 13¹; p. xix; api-vat, to go near, to attend, Caus. the same, or, to bring near, (VII, 46, 3¹); api-vat in Zend, (202; 438.)

vatsá, the young :

vatsám, I, 38, 8; vatsásab, calves, VII, 56, 16.

vad, to speak :

vadāmasi, I, 87, 5; brhát vadema, II, 33, 15; udyáte (opp. sas-yáte), V, 55, 8; vādān, they crack (the whips), I, 37, 3.—ák^tba vada, speak forth, I, 38, 13.—ā vadata, salute, I, 64, 9.—sám vadasva, speak with, (I, 165, 3²); I, 170, 5.

vadh, to strike, to slay :

vádhim, I, 165, 8¹; mǎ vadhib, I, 170, 2¹; VII, 46, 4; I, 114, 7; 8; mó vadhit, I, 38, 6; mǎ vadhishvana, V, 55, 9.

vádhar, weapon, bolt :

vádhab, II, 34, 9; VII, 56, 17.

vadha-snā, blow :

vadha-snaib, I, 165, 6¹.

van :

vanata, accept, VIII, 7, 9; see vat and su-apivāta.

vana, water :

(I, 64, 12².)

vāna, forest :

vānā, I, 64, 7; 88, 3¹; V, 57, 3; 60, 2; vānāni, V, 58, 6²; trees (lances), I, 171, 3¹.

vānaspāti, lord of the forest :

vānaspātiab, I, 166, 5; VIII, 20, 5; vānaspátin, I, 39, 5¹.

vanín, tree :

vanínab, I, 39, 3; VII, 56, 25.

vanín, worshipful :

vanínam, I, 64, 12².

vanushy :

vanushyatáb, of the plotter, VII, 56, 19.

vand, to worship :

vāndasva, I, 38, 15; V, 58, 2; VIII, 20, 14; 20; vāndamānam, greeting, II, 33, 12¹.

vanditr, worshipper :

vanditāram, II, 34, 15.

vāndya, excellent :

vāndyāsab, I, 168, 2.

vandhúra, seat (on a chariot) :

vandhúreshu, I, 64, 9.

vap, to pull :

abhí vapanta, they plucked, VII,

- 56, 3¹. — ní vapantu, may they mow down, II, 33, 11.
- vap, to sow :
vápanti marútab mīham, VIII, 7, 4.
- vápus, marvel :
vápúb, VI, 66, 1; vápushe, I, 64, 4².
- váptri, barber :
vápṭa-iva, (I, 166, 10⁴.)
- vayab-vrīdh, invigorating :
vayab-vrīdhāb, V, 54, 2.
- váyas, strength :
váyab, I, 37, 9¹; V, 55, 1; VII, 58, 3; VIII, 7, 35; 20, 13; revát váyab, X, 77, 7; vayasā, II, 33, 6.
- váyasvat, consisting of food :
ráyab váyasvatab, V, 54, 13¹.
- vayā, germ, sprout, offspring :
vayām, I, 165, 15²; 166, 15; 167, 11; 168, 10; pp. xx; xxi; (207 seq.)
- vayā-vat, with offspring :
vayāvantam ksháyam, (208.)
- vayúna, way :
vayúneshu, II, 34, 4².
- vará, suitor :
varāb-iva, V, 60, 4; (II, 34, 1¹; V, 59, 3².)
- vára, delight :
várāya, VII, 59, 2.
- váram, adv., or, it may be :
I, 88, 2.
- varāhá, boar :
vrīshabhiḥ varāhaib, (140); (I, 88, 5²).—divāb varāhām arushām, the red boar of the sky (Rudra), I, 114, 5.
- varāhu, wild boar :
varāhūn, I, 88, 5².
- varivasy, to open :
varivasyāntab, VII, 56, 17.
- Váruṇa :
Aryaman, Mitra, and Varuṇa, (V, 54, 8¹); várunab, VII, 56, 25; VIII, 94, 5; I, 43, 3; 114, 11; váruṇa, VII, 59, 1; várunasya páśāt, from the snare of Varuṇa, VI, 74, 4; várunam, I, 2, 7.
- várūtha, protection :
várūtham, II, 34, 14.
- vare-yú, wooing :
vare-yávab (máryāb), X, 78, 4¹.
- várkas, see samāná-varkas.
- várna, colour :
várnām, II, 34, 13.
- vartanī, road :
vartanīm, V, 61, 9.
- vartrī, one who stops :
ná vartā, VI, 66, 8.
- vartman, path :
vartmāni, I, 85, 3.
- várdhana, joy :
rudráya vārdhanam, I, 114, 6¹.
- várpas, design :
várpasā, I, 39, 1².
- várman-vat, mailed :
várman-vantab (yodhāb), X, 78, 3.
- várman, shield :
śarma várma kbardib, I, 114, 5.
- varshá, rain :
varshām, V, 58, 7.
- varshá-nirmig, clothed in rain :
varshá-nirnigab, V, 57, 4.
- várshishṭba, best, strongest :
várshishṭbayā, I, 88, 1²; várshishṭbab, I, 37, 6; vrīshan, várshīyas, várshishṭba, (144.)
- valkala, bark of trees :
(178.)
- vavrá, spring :
vavrásab, I, 168, 2².
- vas, to wish, to long for :
vajmi, II, 33, 13; uśmási, I, 86, 10; várāma, I, 165, 7²; urānti vām, I, 2, 4; yāthā váranti, as they will it, VIII, 20, 17; vāvaśānāb, the greedy, VII, 56, 10¹.
- vas, to clothe :
tāvishib with vas (I, 64, 7²).—ūrñāb vasata, they clothed themselves in wool, V, 52, 9².
- vas, Caus., to brighten :
vāsaya ushásab, I, 134, 3 (bis).
- vas, to dwell :
pravatsyam, prāvātsyam, p. xvii.
- vasavyā, wealth :
vasavyē, VII, 56, 21.
- Vásishṭba :
vásishṭbab, VII, 59, 3; the Vasishṭbas are kapardinab, (I, 114, 1².)
- Vasu :
vasavab, II, 34, 9; V, 55, 8; VII, 56, 17; 20² (gods); 59, 8; X, 77, 6; śréshtbab devānām vásub, the best Vasu among the gods (Rudra), I, 43, 5.
- vásu, kind :
vāsyaśā hridā, VIII, 20, 18; vá-syaśī, V, 61, 6; (360.)
- vásu, wealth, treasure :
vásu, V, 57, 3¹; VII, 59, 6; X, 77, 1; párvatatam vásu, (V, 52, 11¹); vāsuvab, X, 77, 6; vāsūni, V, 61,

- 16; I, 134, 4; vásūnām, I, 170, 5; vāsyab, greater wealth, V, 55, 10.
- vasu-pati*, lord of treasures:
vasu-pate vásūnām, I, 170, 5.
- vasu-yā*, wishing for wealth:
vasu-yā, I, 165, 1.
- vāstu*, brightening up:
kshapāb vāstushu, at the brightening up of the night, i. e. in the morning, (I, 64, 8²).
- vastrī*, the lighter up:
kshapām vastā (Indra), (I, 64, 8²).
- vāstra*, garment:
bhadrā vāstrā, I, 134, 4.—(234);
vastrānta, the end of a garment, (I, 37, 6¹).
- vāsyas*, see vāsu.
- vah*, to draw, to carry, to drive:
vahati, I, 39, 6; VIII, 7, 28; vāhate, I, 167, 7; vāhante, V, 58, 1; 61, 11; vāhadhve, V, 60, 7; vābave, V, 56, 6 (bis); I, 134, 3 (bis).—vāhadhve, you bring, V, 53, 13; śrīyam vahante, VIII, 20, 7².—yagñām ūhire, they carried on the sacrifice, II, 34, 12²; (40); (V, 52, 15¹).—vahatab ākṛba, they carry hither, I, 165, 4.—ā vahantu, I, 85, 6; 134, 1; ā vahanti, VIII, 7, 35; ā vahata, VIII, 20, 23.—parā vaha, carry away, V, 61, 17.—prā vāhadhve, you come, X, 77, 6.
- vāhishṭba*, strongest:
vāhishṭbā, V, 56, 6; I, 134, 3.
- vāhni*:
 (37 seqq.)—vāhni-bhiḥ, with the swift Maruts, I, 6, 5¹; (37, 41, 43 seq.)—vāhni (for Pada vāhniḥ), the two horses, VIII, 94, 1¹; (39.)—vāhni, bright, luminous, (38 seq.); vāhni-tama, brightest, (38); ep. of Soma, (40); ep. of the Asvins and R̥bhus, (43); m., fire, light, Agni, (37 seq.); minister, priest, (38, 39, 40-43)—vāhni, fem.? (39 seq.)
- vā*, or . . .:
utā vā, I, 86, 3; V, 60, 6; vā, either (the second vā being left out), I, 86, 8.—vā, even, V, 52, 14.
- vā*, to blow:
ā vātu bheshaḡām, may he waft medicine, X, 186, 1.—pra-vā, anu-vā, (X, 77, 5²).
- vā*:
ā vivāse, I invite, VI, 66, 11; VII, 58, 5; ā vivāseyam, may I gain, II, 33, 6.
- vāghāt*, suppliant:
vāghātāb, I, 88, 6.
- vāṭ*, voice:
imām vāṭam, V, 54, 1; vāṭā, X, 77, 1.—vāṭ, Vāṭ (the voice of the thunder), I, 167, 3²; vāṭam (abhrīyām), I, 168, 8.
- vāga*, booty, wealth:
 (I, 2, 5¹); vāgam, I, 64, 13; VII, 56, 23; vāge, I, 43, 8; vāgāb, I, 167, 1¹; vāgebhiḥ, VII, 57, 5; (I, 2, 5¹).—vāge, fight, I, 85, 5.—ārvantam vāgam, a horse, his strength, i. e. a strong horse, V, 54, 14².
- vāga-peṣas*, glorious by booty:
vāga-peṣasam, II, 34, 6.
- vāga-yāt*, racing:
vāgayāt-bhiḥ, racing, V, 60, 1.—vāgayāntāb, (I, 167, 1¹).
- vāga-sāti*:
vāga-sātau, in battle, VI, 66, 8.—vāga-sātibhiḥ, with riches and booty, VIII, 20, 16.
- vāgin*, powerful; strong horse:
vāginam, I, 64, 6²; vāginab (Gen.), I, 86, 3; VII, 56, 15; VIII, 20, 16; f. vāgīni, wealthy, strong, (I, 2, 5¹).—vāgī arushāb, red stallion, V, 56, 7; with sāpti, (I, 85, 1¹); vāginam, II, 34, 7; vāgin, the left horse, (I, 39, 6¹).
- vāgīni*, mare (?):
 (I, 2, 5¹); see vāgin.
- vāgīni-vat*, wealthy, liberal:
vāgebhiḥ vāgīni-vatī, (I, 2, 5¹).
- vāgīni-vasu*:
vāgīni-vasū, rich in booty, I, 2, 5¹.
- vānā*=bāna, arrow:
vānāb agyate, the arrow is shot, VIII, 20, 8¹.
- vānā*, voice:
vānām, I, 85, 10²; (II, 34, 1⁶).—vānāb, sacrificial music (?), (VIII, 20, 8¹).
- vāñi*, speech:
vāñi, I, 88, 6.
- vāta*, wind:
 (90); p. xxiii; vātān, I, 64, 5; V, 58, 7; vātāsab nā sva-yūgab,

- like self-harnessed winds, X, 78, 2; 3.—vātasya, the god Vāta, X, 168, 1; 2; vātāya, X, 168, 4; vātaś, X, 186, 1; vāta, X, 186, 2; 3.
- vāta*, going;
(90.)
- vāta-tvish*, blazing with the wind:
vāta-tvishab, V, 54, 3; 57, 4.
- vāta-svanas*, rushing like the wind:
vāta-svanasab, VII, 56, 3.
- vāmā*, wealth:
vāmām, V, 60, 7.
- vāyú*, wind:
p. xxiii; vāyú-bhiś, VIII, 7, 3; 4;
17.—vāyúb, the god Vāyu, I, 134, 3 (tris); vāyo, I, 2, 1 seqq.; 134, 1 seqq.
- vârkâryâ* (?) :
vârkâryâm devīm, sacred rite, I, 88, 4¹; (176; 178.)
- vârksha*, from the bark of trees:
(234.)
- vârya*, best:
vâryâni (bheshagâ), I, 114, 5.
- vâr*, to shout:
vâratī, V, 54, 2.
- vâśī*, dagger:
vâśībhiś, I, 37, 2¹; vâśīb, I, 88, 3¹;
vâśīshu, V, 53, 4; p. lxxxviii.
- vâśī-mat*, armed with daggers:
vâśī-mantaś, I, 87, 6; V, 57, 2.
- vâśrâ*, bull, f. cow:
vâśrâsab, vâśrâb, VIII, 7, 3; 7;
(I, 38, 8¹); vâśrâb, f., I, 37, 10; vâśrâ-iva, I, 38, 8¹; II, 34, 15.
- vī*, prep. . . .
vī, through, I, 39, 3; across, I, 168, 6; vī vi-tarām, II, 33, 2¹.
- vī*, m., bird:
vāyab arushāb, the red birds (of the Arvins), (26); vāyab, (I, 37, 9¹); vāyab nā, I, 85, 7; 87, 2; 88, 1; 166, 10; V, 59, 7; vī-bhiś, (the Maruts) with their birds, V, 53, 3².
- vī-akta*, resplendent:
vī-aktâb, VII, 56, 1.
- vī-ushri*, flashing forth (of the dawn), daybreak:
vī-ushrishu (śarvatînām), I, 171, 5; (ushâsab), II, 34, 12; (pûrvâsu), VIII, 20, 15; X, 77, 5; (I, 64, 8²).
- vi-rishri*, see vy-rishri.
- vī-oman*, sky:
vī-omani, V, 87, 9.
- vī-karshani*, active:
vī-karshanim, I, 64, 12.
- vī-ketas*, wise:
vi-ketasab, V, 54, 13.
- vi-gânivas*, sage:
vi-gânúshab, X, 77, 1.
- vinâ*, to tear:
vi vinâkanti, they tear asunder, I, 39, 5.
- vī-tata*, see tan.
- vi-tarām*, far away:
II, 33, 2¹.
- vithurâ*, broken:
vithurâ-iva, I, 87, 3¹; (I, 37, 8¹);
vithurâ-iva, like brittle things,
I, 168, 6¹.
- vithury*, to break:
vithuryâti, (the earth) breaks, X, 77, 4.
- vid*, to know (with Acc. and Gen.):
kâb veda, I, 170, 1; V, 53, 1; 61, 14; vêda, vidre, VII, 56, 2;
vidûb, I, 19, 3¹; 166, 7; V, 59, 7; vidâ, you take notice of (Gen.), I, 86, 8¹; vittât, V, 60, 6; vedab, remember, I, 43, 9; vidmâ hī, we know quite well, I, 170, 3; VIII, 20, 3; yâthâ vidâ, V, 55, 2; vidânâsab (c. Gen.), X, 77, 6; vididé, I, 39, 4; vidânab, I, 165, 9; 10; vidé hī, VI, 66, 3.
- vidât-vasu*, giver of wealth:
vidât-vasum (Indra), I, 6, 6.
- vidâtha*, assembly, sacrificial assembly, sacrifice:
vidâtheshu, I, 64, 1²; 6; 85, 1; 166, 2; 7; 167, 6; VII, 57, 2; (276);
vidâthe, V, 59, 2¹; II, 33, 15.
- vidathyâ*, eloquent:
vidathyâ-iva, I, 167, 3².
- vidmân*, knowledge:
vidmânâ, V, 87, 2.
- vi-dyût*, lightning:
vi-dyût, I, 38, 8¹; 64, 9; vi-dyûtâ, I, 86, 9; V, 54, 2; vi-dyûtâb, I, 39, 9²; 64, 5; 168, 8; V, 52, 6; 54, 11; VII, 56, 13.
- vidyût-mahas*, brilliant with lightning:
vidyût-mahasab, V, 54, 3.
- vidyût-hasta*, holding lightnings in their hands:
vidyût-hastâb, VIII, 7, 25.

vidyúnmat, charged with lightning :
 vidyúnmat-bhîb, I, 88, 1.
 vidh, to sacrifice :
 vidhema havîshâ, X, 121, 1 to 9 ;
 168, 4 ; nâmasâ vidhema te, I,
 114, 2 ; vidhatâb, of her servant,
 I, 167, 5.—vedhas from vidh, (VIII, 20, 17¹) ; vidatha, (350.)
 vi-dhartrî, ruler :
 vi-dhartâ, VII, 56, 24.
 vi-dharman, rule :
 vi-dharmâne, VIII, 7, 5.
 vind, to find :
 âvindab, I, 6, 5 ; vidré, I, 87, 6 ;
 vidyâma, may we have, I, 165, 15 ; 166, 15 ; 167, 11 ; 168, 10 ;
 171, 6.
 vip, to tremble :
 prâ vepayanti, they make tremble,
 I, 39, 5 ; VIII, 7, 4.
 ví-pakshas, on each side :
 ví-pakshasâ, I, 6, 2¹.
 ví-pathi, goer :
 ví-pathayaab, V, 52, 10.
 vipanyú, fond of praise :
 vipanyavaab, V, 61, 15.
 ví-pâka, full :
 ví-pâkâ, I, 168, 7.
 vipra, sage, poet :
 viprab, VII, 58, 4 ; VIII, 7, 1 ; vipra,
 V, 58, 2 ; vipram, I, 86, 3 ; 165, 14 ;
 VIII, 7, 30 ; viprâya, V, 61, 9 ;
 viprasya, I, 85, 11 ; 86, 2 ; VII,
 56, 15 ; viprásab, priests, X, 78, 1.
 vi-bhâgâ, distribution :
 vi-bhâgê, VII, 56, 21.
 vi-bhû, almighty :
 vi-bhû, I, 165, 10 ; vi-bhvâb, I,
 166, 11¹.
 ví-bhûti, power :
 ví-bhûtayaab, I, 166, 11¹.
 vibhva-tashrâ, fashioned by Vibhvan :
 vibhva-tashrâm, V, 58, 4¹.
 Vibhvan, one of the Rîbhvas :
 (V, 58, 4¹).
 vi-bhvân, see bhû.
 ví-mahas, mighty :
 vi-mahasab, I, 86, 1¹ ; ví-mahasab,
 V, 87, 4¹.
 vi-mâna, see mâ.
 vi-môkana, resting-place (of horses) :
 vi-môkane, V, 53, 7.
 vi-rapsîn, singer :
 vi-rapsinab, I, 64, 10¹ ; 87, 1 ;
 vi-rapsinab, I, 166, 8.

virúkmat, bright weapon :
 virúkmatâb, I, 85, 3², 3.
 vi-rokín, bright, brilliant :
 vi-rokínab, (I, 85, 3²) ; V, 55, 3 ;
 X, 78, 3.
 vívakshase, see vaksh.
 vivartana = nirgatya bhûmau viluntbanam :
 (V, 53, 7²).
 vivâsvat :
 âditiâ vivâsvân, (262.)
 vivâs, see vâ.
 vis, to enter :
 â-vivêra, VI, 74, 2.—ní visate, he rests, X, 168, 3.
 vís, clan, tribe, people :
 vít, VII, 56, 5 ; víšâ, I, 39, 5 ;
 vísab, I, 172, 3 ; I, 114, 3 ;
 víšâm, I, 134, 6 ; vikshû, houses,
 VII, 56, 22 ; vísab marútâm,
 the folk of the Maruts, V, 56, 1.
 vispâti, king :
 vispâtiâ, I, 37, 8¹.
 vísva, all . . . :
 vísve devâb, X, 121, 2 ; I, 19, 3² ;
 VIII, 94, 2 ; vísve sa-gôshasab,
 all the united Maruts, I, 43, 3¹ ;
 vísvâ gâtâni, X, 121, 10 ; vísvâ
 bhûvanâni, I, 64, 3 ; 85, 8 ; 166, 4 ; II, 34, 4 ; vísvâb kar-shazîb, I, 86, 5 ; vísvam sâdma pârthivam, I, 38, 10 ; vísvâ pârthivâni, VIII, 94, 9 ; vísvâ âhâni, I, 171, 3 ; vísvam grâme asmín, everything in this village,
 I, 114, 1 ; vísvasya tasya, of this all, V, 55, 8.
 vísvâ-âyu, everlasting :
 vísvâ-âyu, V, 53, 13.
 vísvâ-krishri, known to all men :
 (I, 64, 14¹).
 vísvak, in all directions :
 víshûkîb, II, 33, 2 ; víshûkîm, VI, 74, 2.
 vísvâ-kandra, all-brilliant :
 vísvâ-kandrâb, I, 165, 8.
 vísvâ-karshani, known to all men :
 vísvâ-karshanim, I, 64, 14¹.
 vísvâ-ganyâ :
 ep. of Âditi, (260.)
 vísvâ-dhâyas, satisfying all :
 vísvâ-dhâyasam, VIII, 7, 13.
 vísva-pls, all-adorned :
 vísva-plsab, VII, 57, 3 ; (I, 64, 8¹).
 vísva-psu, perfect :
 vísvâ-psub (yagñâb), X, 77, 4.

- visvá-bharas:
visvá-bharasam, (V, 54, 10¹).
visvam, adv., everywhere:
 X, 121, 7.
visvá-mānusha, known to all men:
 (I, 64, 14¹).
visvam-invā, enlivening everything:
visvam-invébhiḥ, V, 60, 8.
visvá-rūpa, manifold:
visvá-rūpāb (āṅgirasab), X, 78, 5¹;
visvá-rūpam (nishkām), variegated, II, 33, 10.
visvá-vedas:
visvá-vedasab, all-knowing, I, 64, 8; 10.—visva-vedasab, wealthy, V, 60, 7.
visvāhā, adv., always:
 X, 78, 6.
Vishnu:
vishnub, I, 85, 7²; (133 seq.; 136 seq.); vishnave, V, 87, 1; (V, 87, 4¹); vishnob, V, 87, 8; vishnob eshāsya, the rapid Vishnu (Soma?), II, 34, 11¹; Soma (rain), VIII, 20, 3².—Vishnu and Trita, Vishnu's three steps, (II, 34, 10¹); Vishnu = Evayāmarut? (365.)
vishpāt, deliverer:
 (I, 166, 8¹).
vi-sārgana, scattering:
vi-sārgane, V, 59, 3.
visita-stuka, with dishevelled locks:
visita-stukā, I, 167, 5.
vi-stārā, straw:
vi-stārāb (read vi-stāré), V, 52, 10¹.
vi-sthā, kind, variety:
vi-sthāb, the gusts (of Vāta), X, 168, 2¹.
vi-spardhas, striving:
vi-spardhasab, V, 87, 4².
vihava, vihavya:
 (I, 134, 6¹).
vihūmat, invoking:
vihūmatinām, I, 134, 6¹.
vi-hruta, injured, crooked:
vi-hrutam, VIII, 20, 26; (I, 166, 8¹).
vī, to stir up:
 ā āvyata, I, 166, 4¹.
vī, to go:
 āpa veti, it goes away, V, 61, 18.
vī, to enjoy:
 vyantu, VII, 57, 6.
vīṭu, strong:
vīṭu, I, 39, 2.—vīṭu, n., stronghold, I, 6, 5².
vīṭu-pavī, strong-fellied:
vīṭupavī-bhiḥ, V, 58, 6; VIII, 20, 2¹.
vīṭu-pānī, strong-hoofed:
vīṭupānī-bhiḥ, I, 38, 11¹.
vītī, rejoicing, feast:
vītāye, V, 59, 8; VII, 57, 2; VIII, 20, 10; 16.
virā, hero, man:
virāb, I, 85, 1; VI, 66, 10; X, 77, 3; virāsab, V, 61, 4; virānab, I, 114, 8; II, 33, 4; virāb (Rudra), II, 33, 1¹; virāya, V, 61, 5; virāya, I, 86, 4; (Indra), I, 166, 7.—virāb, son, VII, 56, 24.
virā-vat, rich in men:
virā-vantam, I, 64, 15.
viryā, strength:
viryām, V, 54, 5.
vri, to keep back:
varanta, V, 55, 7; vrata from vri, vrinoti, (236); vārayati, to prohibit, (237).—āpa avrinvata, they have uncovered, II, 34, 1.—See vartrī, ā-vrita.
vri, to choose, to desire:
vrine, VIII, 94, 8; vrinīmahe, I, 114, 9; āvrinīta, II, 33, 13.—ā vrine, VII, 59, 11; ā vrinīmahe, I, 39, 7; 114, 4; ā vavridhvam (better ā vavridhvam, see vrīt), (VIII, 20, 18²).
vrikā-tāti, among wolves:
 II, 34, 9¹.
vriktā-barhis, for whom the sacred grass has been trimmed:
vrikta-barhishab, I, 38, 1²; VIII, 7, 20; 21; (I, 64, 1²; 165, 15²; 134, 6¹).
vrikti, trimming (of the grass):
 (I, 64, 1²).
vrikshā, tree:
vrikshām, V, 54, 6¹.
vrigāna, invigorating:
vrigānam, I, 165, 15²; 166, 15; 167, 11; 168, 10; 171, 6; p. xx.
vrigāna, n., enclosure, camp, hamlet:
 (I, 165, 15²); vrigāne, I, 166, 14; vrigāne nadīnām, in the realm of the rivers, V, 52, 7; vrigānā, V, 54, 12; vrigāneshu, II, 34, 7²; (237).

vriñg, to turn, to ward off, to clear :
(I, 165, 15³); vriñgāse, (I, 87, 6¹); śirshā vavriḡub, vavriktam, to turn back the heads, (269); vavargūshinām, I, 134, 6¹.—
pāri vriñkta, spare, I, 172, 3; pāri vrinaktu, VII, 46, 3; pāri vriḡyāb, may it avoid, II, 33, 14².

vrit, to turn :

vartáyatha, I, 39, 3; vartáyata,
II, 34, 9; ávartayat, I, 85, 9.—ānu ráthāb avrísata, the chariots followed, V, 55, 1 to 9.—ā vavarta, I, 165, 2;
ó vartta, I, 165, 14²; p. xxi;
ā vavridhvam (for ā vavri- dhvam), VIII, 20, 18³; abhi ā avart, VII, 59, 4; ā vavrityām, let me bring hither, I, 168, 1;
VIII, 7, 33; ā-vavártat, II, 34,
14; ā vavritana, V, 61, 16.—
ví vavrite, it turns, I, 166, 9³;
ví vartante, they roll about, V, 53, 7².—sám avartata, there arose, X, 121, 1; 7; (p. 4.)

vritta=versus:

p. xcv.

vritrá, Vritra :

*vritrá*m, I, 85, 9; 165, 8; VIII, 7, 23; *vritrá*m, enemy, VII, 58, 4.
vritra-túrya, struggle with Vritra :
vritra-túrye, VIII, 7, 24.

vriṭhā, freely, lightly :

I, 88, 6; 168, 4; wildly, V, 56, 4¹; quickly, VIII, 20, 10;
vriṭhā kri, to shake, (311.)

vriddhā, see vridh.

vriddhā-savas, endowed with full power :

vriddhā-savasab, V, 87, 6.

vridh, to grow :

vavridhe, I, 37, 5; 167, 8³; avar- dhanta, I, 85, 7¹; vavridhanta,
V, 52, 7; VI, 66, 2; vavridhub,
II, 34, 13¹; V, 59, 5; X, 77,
2; vridhántam, strong, VI, 66,
11; vriddhāb, grown, V, 60, 3;
vriddhāb, magnified, I, 38, 15²;
*vridh*ha, old, (I, 88, 1²); vridhē, to grow, I, 85, 1⁴; vridhāse, (I, 87, 6¹); vridham, I, 167, 4²;
vardha, strengthen, V, 56, 2;
vardháyanti, VII, 57, 7; vár- dhān, VIII, 7, 19; vavridhānāb
asmān, prospering us, X, 78, 8;

ā vavridhub, V, 55, 3.—pra- *vridh*ha, thou who art grown strong, I, 165, 9; p. xvii.—ví vavridhub, V, 59, 6.—sám va- vridhub, they have grown up together, V, 60, 5.—vridh in Zend, (I, 114, 6¹.)

vridhā, increasing :

vridhāsab sthā, I, 171, 2¹.

vriṣh, spargere, to rain down :

vriṣhiví, V, 53, 14¹; varshayatha, V, 55, 5.—(139; 151 seq.)—ā- vriṣh, to drink, (152.)

vriṣha-khādi, armed with strong rings :

vriṣha-khādayab, I, 64, 10².

vriṣhanarvá, with strong horses :

vriṣhanarvéna, VIII, 20, 10.

vriṣhat - aṅgi, strongly - anointed (priests) :

vriṣhat-aṅgayab, VIII, 20, 9¹.

vriṣhan, strong, manly :

(138 seqq.); strong, powerful, (139 seq.; 142; 149); (I, 64, 10³);
male, (139 seq.); man, husband,
(141; 144); vriṣhanab paúmsye,
(141); giver of rain, bounteous, (141 seq.); fertilising, (142);
bull, horse, stallion, (25 seq.; 139; 140); arushāsab vriṣhanab, the red stallions, (26); vriṣhnab, bulls, VIII, 20, 20; hero, epitheton ornans, (142 seqq.; 149 seqq.); applied to deities, (145 seqq.); arushāb vriṣhā, the red hero (Agni), fire in the shape of lightning, (18; 25; 26);
name of Soma, (134; 136; 142; 146 seqq.); vriṣhanam, I, 85,
7²; vriṣhānam with ā, (149);
N. pr. of a pious worshipper,
(152 seq.); Mahidhara, 'mind,' (153); see vārshishṭba.—vriṣha- nab, the strong Maruts, I, 165, 1; p. xiv; VIII, 20, 12;
vriṣhanab, I, 85, 12²; VII, 56,
18; 20; 21; 58, 6; II, 33, 13;
vriṣhnab, VIII, 7, 33; 20, 19; vriṣhā ganāb, the manly host (of the Maruts), I, 87, 4; vriṣhne sárdhāya, I, 64, 1; VIII, 20, 9¹;
vriṣhanam mārutam ganām, I,
64, 12; VIII, 94, 12.—vriṣhā,
Rudra, II, 34, 2; Vishnu, V,
87, 5; vriṣhne, Indra, I, 165,
11.

- vr̥isha-nâbhi*, with strong naves :
vr̥isha-nâbhinâ, VIII, 20, 10.
vr̥isha-pâni :
 (I, 38, 11¹).
vr̥isha-prayâvan, strongly advancing:
vr̥isha-prayâvne, VIII, 20, 9.
vr̥isha-psu, with strong forms :
vr̥isha-psavaḥ, VIII, 20, 7; (VIII, 7, 7¹); vr̥isha-psunâ, VIII, 20, 10.
vr̥ishabhâ, bull, manly hero :
 (139; 140); vr̥ishabhâb (usr̥iyab),
 Dyū, the bull of the Dawn, V,
 58, 6²; Rudra, II, 33, 6; vr̥isha- bha, II, 33, 4; 7; 15; vr̥isha- bhâya, II, 33, 8; vr̥ishabha, Indra, I, 165, 7; 171, 5; vr̥isha- bhâsya, I, 166, 1.
vr̥isha-manas, manly-minded :
vr̥isha-manâb, I, 167, 7.
vr̥isha-vrata, epithet of Soma :
 (I, 85, 4²).
vr̥isha-vrâta, the manly host :
vr̥isha-vrâtâsab, I, 85, 4².
vr̥ishrî, shower, rain :
vr̥ishrîb, I, 38, 8; vr̥ishrîm, I, 39,
 9²; V, 55, 5¹; 58, 3; vr̥ishrî, V,
 53, 5¹; vr̥ishrâyab, II, 34, 2¹; V,
 53, 2¹; 6; 10; vr̥ishrî-bhiḥ, V,
 59, 5; VII, 56, 13¹; VIII, 7, 16.
vr̥ishni, manly :
vr̥ishni paūmsyam, manly work,
 VIII, 7, 23; vr̥ishni śavab, (V, 58, 7¹).
vr̥ishnya :
 (V, 58, 7¹).
vr̥ih, to draw :
vī vr̥ihatam, draw far away, VI, 74, 2.—Cf. brih.
vēdi, altar :
vēdim, I, 170, 4.
vedyā (?) :
vedyābhiḥ, clearly (?), I, 171, 1³.
vedhās, wise :
vedhāse, I, 64, 1; VII, 46, 1¹; ve- dhāsab, V, 52, 13¹; vedhasab, V, 54, 6.
vedhās, servant (worshipper) :
vedhāsab, VIII, 20, 17¹.
ven, to cherish :
venab, I, 43, 9.
vēnat, suppliant :
vēnatab, I, 86, 8.
vaī :
nā vaī u, never, II, 33, 9¹; 10.
vai, to wither :
 part. vāta and vāna, (90.)
Vaidat-arvi :
valdat-arviḥ yāthâ, like Vaidadarvi,
 V, 61, 10; (V, 61, 5²; 9¹; 360; 362.)
vaiyavā :
 not vayyasva, pp. liii, lvi.
vaīra-deya, weregild :
vaīra-deye, V, 61, 8¹.
Vaīsvânara, N. of Agni :
vaīsvânara, V, 60, 8.
vyath, to shake :
vyathate, V, 54, 7; vithura from vyath, (I, 168, 6¹).
vyāthi, rolling :
vyāthib, V, 59, 2¹.
vyadh, to strike :
vidhyata, I, 86, 9.
vyâ :
 (I, 166, 4¹).
vyūha :
 p. lxxx.
vyr̥ishī (âyudhavīśeṣa) :
vyr̥ishībhiḥ, (VII, 56, 13¹).
vragâ, stable :
vragé, I, 86, 3.—vragâm, stronghold, VI, 66, 8.—vragâb, keeper, (228.)
vratâ, sway, &c. :
 (236 seqq.); what is enclosed, protected, set apart, (236 seq.; 383 seq.); apâm vraté, within the pale of the waters, (384); law, (237 seq.; 384); ānu vratām, according to law, (238); vratâ (dhārâ- yante), duties, VIII, 94, 2; sway, power, (239); vratām, I, 166, 12²; vraté tāva, at thy command, under thy auspices, (239); sacrifice, (238 seq.); deeds of the gods, (239.)
vrâta, troop :
vrâtam-vrâtam, each troop, V, 53, 11.
śams, to recite, to praise :
śasyate, I, 86, 4; śasyāte (opp.
udyāte), V, 55, 8; śasyānte, VII, 56, 23; śamsamânâya, var. l. for śasamânâya, (I, 85, 12¹).—â śams, (271.)—ût śamsa, V, 52, 8.—prâ
śamsa, I, 37, 5.
śamsa, spell, blessing, curse; praise,
 prayer :
 (I, 166, 13¹; 271); narām śamsab, (Indra) praised by men, Mân-nerlob, II, 34, 6¹; (439.)—

- sámsam*, curse, VII, 56, 19;
sámsât, reproach, I, 166, 8.—
sámsâb, prayers, X, 78, 3.
sámsa, singer:
sámsam, I, 166, 13¹; (271.)
sámsya, glorious:
sámsyam, II, 34, 11.
sak, to be able:
sikvas from sak, (V, 52, 16¹).—
kathám saka, how could you,
 V, 61, 2.
sakrá, hero:
sakráb, I, 166, 1.
sana, hemp:
 (233.)
satá, hundred:
satám hílmâb, I, 64, 14; V, 54, 15;
 II, 33, 2; ékam-ekâ satâ, each a hundred, V, 52, 17; dhenûnâm
satám, V, 61, 10; satásya nri- nâm sriyam, the happiness of a hundred men, I, 43, 7.
satá-arkas:
satá-arkasam, may be satá-rikasam,
 p. lxxxv.
satá-avaya, consisting of a hundred sheep:
parûm satá-avayam, V, 61, 5.
satâbhugi, hundredfold:
satâbhugi-bhîb, I, 166, 8.
satasvin, winning a hundred:
satasvî, VII, 58, 4.
satín, hundredfold:
satínam, I, 64, 15; satínab, with hundredfold wealth, VII, 57, 7.
sátru, foe:
sátrub, I, 39, 4; sátrob, I, 165, 6.
sam, to work, to perform worship, to praise:
 (166); sasamânâya, I, 85, 12¹;
sasamânâsya, I, 86, 8.
sám, well, pleasant, sweet; health:
 (190 seqq.); I, 165, 4²; with bhû, (190 seq.); VI, 74, 1; p. cxi;
 with as, (191 seq.); I, 114, 1;
 with asor bhû understood, (192);
 with kar, vah, (192); I, 43, 6;
 with pû, vâ, &c., (192 seq.);
sám yób, health and wealth,
 (193 seq.); V, 53, 14; I, 114,
 2; II, 33, 13.
sámî, deed:
sámî, Loc., I, 87, 5²; sámî and sámî,
 (V, 87, 9¹).
sám-tama, most welcome, blissful:
sám-tamam (hridé), I, 43, 1; sám- tamebhiḥ (bhesagébhiḥ), II, 33,
 2; sám-tamâ (bhesagâ), II, 33, 13.
sám-bhavishtâb, most blissful:
sám-bhavishtâb, I, 171, 3; sám- bhavishtâb, X, 77, 8.
sam-bhû, healthful:
sam-bhû, X, 186, 1.
sam-yób, for health and wealth:
 I, 43, 4³.
sara, reed, arrow:
 (398.)
sarâd, harvest:
sarât-bhîb, I, 86, 6.—Sarad =
 Ceres, p. xxiv.
sâru, shaft:
sârub, I, 172, 2.
sârdha, host:
sârdhas mârutas = cerfo Martio,
 p. xxv; sârdham, V, 53, 10; 56,
 9; sârdham-sârdham, V, 53,
 11; sârdhâya, I, 37, 4; 64, 1;
 V, 54, 1; 87, 1¹; VI, 66, 11;
 VIII, 20, 9; sârdhasya, VII,
 56, 8; sârdhab, see sârdhas;
 (67 seq.; 69).—sârdhân ritâsya,
 the companies of our sacrifice,
 VIII, 7, 21.—sârdha, strong, (68.)
sârdhas, might, host:
 (67; 68 seqq.); sârdhab, I, 37, 1¹;
 5; V, 52, 8¹; 54, 6; VII, 59,
 7; (V, 87, 1¹); sârdhâmsi, V,
 87, 7¹.
sârman, shelter, protection:
sârma, I, 85, 12; V, 55, 9; VII,
 59, 1; I, 114, 5; 10; sârman,
 VII, 56, 25.
sarya, made of reeds:
saryâ, f., an arrow, also a sacrificial vessel, (398.)
saryana, lands in Kurukshetra:
 (398.)
Saryanâ-vat, N. of a lake:
saryanâ-vati, VIII, 7, 29¹.—A sacrificial vessel, (VIII, 7, 29¹).
sârvara, dark:
sârvarîb, the dark cows (the clouds), V, 52, 3².
sâvas, strength:
sâvab, I, 37, 9; 39, 10; V, 58, 7¹;
 87, 2; 6; sâvasâ, I, 39, 8; 64,
 8; 9; 13; 167, 9; 171, 5²; VI,
 66, 6; VII, 57, 1¹; sâvase, V,
 87, 1¹; sâvasab, I, 167, 9; V,
 52, 2; sâvâmsi, VII, 56, 7.—
Savas, (251.)

śavishīṭa, most powerful :

śavishīṭa, I, 165, 7.

Śāṛiyasī :

(V, 61, 5^a) ; (360 ; 362) ; see śāsvat.

śāsvat, all :

śāsvataḥ, V, 52, 2 ; śāsvatām ékam ft, VIII, 20, 13.—śāsvatinām, the eternal dawns, I, 171, 5.—śāṛiyasī, compar., more frequent, V, 61, 6 ; (360.)

śākīn, hero :

śākīnab, V, 52, 17¹.

śāṇakshaumakīra, clothes of hemp or linen :

(234.)

śās :

ā śāsate, they call for me, I, 165, 4.

śikvas, wise, powerful :

śikvasaḥ, V, 52, 16¹ ; 54, 4.

śiksh for śaksh :

(V, 52, 16¹.)

śikhā :

(V, 52, 16¹.)

śipra-vat :

śipravān, (II, 34, 3^a.)

śiprā, helmet ; jaw :

śipre, jaws, (II, 34, 3^a ; I, 2, 3¹).—śiprāḥ (hiraṇyāyib), headbands, V, 54, 11 ; helmets, VIII, 7, 25.

śiprīn, helmeted or possessed of jaws :

(II, 34, 3^a.)

śimī-vat, vigorous, powerful :

śimī-vān, V, 56, 3 ; śimī-vatām, VIII, 20, 3 ; śimī-vantaḥ, X, 78, 3.

śivā, propitious :

śivābhib (ūtī-bhib), VIII, 20, 24.

śīsu, young one, calf :

śīve, II, 34, 8 ; śīsavab, VII, 56, 16.

śīṣṭa, child :

śīṣṭāḥ ná kṛīśyab, X, 78, 6.

śībham, adv., fast :

I, 37, 14.

śīrshān, head :

śīrshān, VIII, 7, 25 ; śīrshā-su, V, 54, 11 ; 57, 6 ; śīrshā vavṛiktaṃ, (269.)

sukrā, bright :

sukrāb-iva sūryab, I, 43, 5 ; sukrām (ūdhab), VI, 66, 1 ; sukré (ūdhani), II, 34, 2^a ; sukrásab,

I, 134, 5 ; sukrébhib hiraṇyab, II, 33, 9.

suk, to shine :

sūkān, VI, 66, 2 ; susukvāmsab, V, 87, 6 ; susukānāb, brilliant, II, 34, 1 ; sukatā, II, 34, 12.

súki, bright, brilliant :

súkayab, I, 64, 2 ; VI, 66, 4 ; 11 ; VII, 57, 5 ; I, 134, 4 ; 5 ; súki, súkinām, súkim, súki-bhyab, súkayab, VII, 56, 12 ; súkini, pure, II, 33, 13.

súki-ganman, bright born :

súki-ganmānab, VII, 56, 12.

sundhyū, brilliant :

sundhyāvab, V, 52, 9.

subh, see sumbh.

śubh, splendour, beauty, glory :

subhā, I, 165, 1 ; p. xiii ; VII, 56, 6 ; subhé, I, 64, 4^a ; 88, 2 ; for triumph, I, 87, 3^a ; 167, 6 ; V, 52, 8 ; 57, 3 ; VII, 57, 3 ; śubham yā, to go in triumph, V, 55, 1 to 9 ; 57, 2 ; (VIII, 20, 7^a.)—śubhab, gems, V, 54, 11.

subham-yā :

(164) ; (I, 87, 4^a.)

subham-yāvan, triumphant :

subham-yāvā, V, 61, 13 ; (164 ; I, 87, 4^a.)

subham-yū, triumphant :

subham-yāvab, X, 78, 7 ; (164.)

subhrā, brilliant :

subhrāb, VII, 56, 8 ; subhrāb, I, 19, 5 ; 85, 3^a ; 167, 4 ; VII, 56, 16 ; VIII, 7, 25 ; 28.—subhrāb, VIII, 7, 2 ; 14.

subhra-khādi, armed with bright rings :

subhra-khādayab, VIII, 20, 4.

subhra-yāvan :

subhra-yāvānā, (164.)

sumbh, to shine ; to adorn :

subháyanta, VII, 56, 16 ; sobhāse, to be glorious, X, 77, 1 ; subháyante, they adorn themselves, I, 85, 3 ; sūmbhamānāb, I, 165, 5 ; VII, 56, 11 ; 59, 7 ; subhānāb, bright, I, 165, 3^a ; p. xv ; subháyat-bhib, brilliant, V, 60, 8 ; (162.)—prā sumbhante, they glance forth, I, 85, 1.

susukvāni :

(I, 168, 1^a.)

susukvās and susukānā, see suk.

śúshma, breath, strength :

śúshmaḥ, I, 165, 4³; p. xv; breath, VII, 56, 8; śúshmam, I, 64, 14; 165, 1⁴; pp. xiii seq.; xxi; VIII, 7, 24; 20, 3; śúshmāya, power (blast), VIII, 7, 5; śúshma with vrīṣhan and vrīṣabhā, (140; 149.)

śushmin, strong :

śushmī, VII, 56, 24; śushmīne, I, 37, 4.

śūra, hero :

śūrāb, I, 64, 9; śūrāb-iva, I, 85, 8; V, 59, 5; gānāsab śūrāb, VII, 56, 22; gigivāmsab ná śūrāb, X, 78, 4.

śūśu-vās, always increasing :

śūśu-vāmsam, I, 64, 15; śūśu-vāmsab, strong, I, 167, 9.

śrīnga, horn :

śrīngam, V, 59, 3.

śridh, strong :

śārdhantam, V, 56, 1.

śé-vridh, conferring blessings :

śé-vridhab, V, 87, 4.

śo :

nī-śitāni, prepared, I, 171, 4.

śokās, blast of fire :

śokāb, I, 39, 1.

śōna, brown :

śōnā, I, 6, 2.

śobhās, see jumbh.

śōbhishīḥ, most splendid :

śōbhishīḥāb, VII, 56, 6.

śkut, to trickle :

śkótanti, I, 87, 2.

Syāvā :

syāvāya, V, 61, 9.

Syāvā-arva :

syāva-arva, V, 52, 1; (V, 61, 5²); (359 seq.)

Syāvārva-stuta, praised by Syāvārva :

syāvārva-stutāya, V, 61, 5².

syenā, hawk :

syenāb, VII, 56, 3; syenāsab ná pakshīṇab, like winged hawks, VIII, 20, 10; syenāsab, X, 77, 5; syenān-iva, I, 165, 2; (175.)

srath :

srathayanta, they tire, V, 54, 10. —srathayante, they soften, V, 59, 1. —śrathantu, may they loose it (plural instead of dual), (258.)

srathary, to melt :

sratharyāti, X, 77, 4¹.

srāvas, glory :

srāvab, I, 165, 12; 171, 5; V, 52, 1²; I, 43, 7; srāvāmsi, V, 61, 11; srāvase, I, 134, 3.

śravasyū, eager for glory :

śravasyūb, VIII, 94, 1; śravasyāvab, I, 85, 8. —śravasyūm, glorious, V, 56, 8.

śrāyā, going :

śrāyāb, V, 53, 4².

śrī :

āpa-sritab, retired, V, 61, 19. —śrī-sriyānāb, fastened, VII, 56, 13.

śriyāse, see śrī.

śrī, splendour, beauty, glory :

śrīb, V, 57, 6; śriyā, V, 61, 12²; VI, 66, 4; VII, 56, 6; śriyā śrēshīḥab, II, 33, 3; śriyē, I, 88, 3; V, 55, 3; VIII, 7, 25; X, 77, 2; śriyē śrēyāmsab, V, 60, 4²; śriyāse, I, 87, 6¹; V, 59, 3² (bis); śriyāb, I, 85, 2²; 166, 10; VIII, 20, 12; śriyam vāhante, they bring with them beautiful light, VIII, 20, 7². —śriyam, happiness, I, 43, 7; śriyē, for happiness sake, I, 64, 12.

śru, to hear :

śrinve, I, 37, 3; śrinōti, I, 37, 13; śrinutā, I, 86, 2¹; śrōta, V, 87, 8; 9; śrudhī, I, 2, 1; śrinōtu, I, 114, 11; VII, 46, 1¹; śurāva, V, 53, 2; śrinvire, V, 87, 3; X, 168, 4; śrinomi (with two Acc.), I hear thou art —, II, 33, 4. —ā śrot, listened, I, 39, 6¹; śroshantu ā, I, 86, 5². —See śrōtri.

śrutā, glorious :

śrutām, I, 6, 6; V, 52, 17; II, 33, 11; śrutāsu, V, 60, 2.

śrūtya, glorious :

śrūtyam, I, 165, 11.

śrushī, a hearing :

śrushīm, I, 166, 13.

śrushī-māt, to be obeyed :

śrushī-mántam, V, 54, 14³.

śréni, row :

śréniḥ, V, 59, 7¹.

śréyas :

śriyē śrēyāmsab, glorious for glory, V, 60, 4².

śrēshīḥ, best :

śrēshīḥab, I, 43, 5. —śrēshīḥab śriyā, the most beautiful in beauty, II, 33, 3.

śrēṣṭhā-tama, the very best :

śrēṣṭhā-tamāb, V, 61, 1.

śrōtri, listening to :

śrōtārab (yāma-hūtiṣhu), V, 61, 15.

ślōka, hymn :

ślōkam, I, 38, 14.

śvās, to-morrow :

śvāb, I, 167, 10 ; 170, 1.

svi, to flourish :

śrāvāma, I, 166, 14 ; see śru-vās.

svit, to shine :

vī svitan, X, 78, 7.

svityāñk, bright :

svitāñk, II, 33, 8.

sakrīt, once (only) :

VI, 66, 1.

sakthān, leg :

sakthāni, V, 61, 3.

sākhi, friend :

sākhā, I, 170, 3 ; X, 186, 2 ; apām

sākhā, X, 168, 3 ; sākhye

sākhāyab, I, 165, 11 ; sākhāyab,

V, 52, 2 ; sākhāyab, VIII, 20, 23 ;

sākhin ākkā sakhāyab, I, 165,

13 ; sākhin, V, 53, 16.

sakhi-tvā, friendship :

sakhi-tvé, VIII, 7, 31.

sakhyā, friendship :

sakhyāsa, V, 55, 9 ; X, 78, 8 ; sakhyāya vrīdham, to grow their friend, I, 167, 4.

sak, to follow :

sisakti, I, 38, 8 ; sakādhyai, I, 167, 5.

—saketa, may he remain united,

V, 52, 15. — sākante dāksham, they assume strength, I, 134, 2.

sātā, with :

I, 167, 7 ; sātā marūt-su, among the Maruts, V, 56, 8 ; 9 ; sutē sātā, VII, 59, 3¹.

sa-gātyā, common birth :

sa-gātyēna, VIII, 20, 21.

sa-gūsh, endowed with :

sa-gūb, V, 60, 8.

